But what will be the benefit to the public from the merger? There are more than 600 pages of briefs, testimony, letters and whatnot on file in the FCC library in regard to this case, but one can search through them ever so diligently without discovering a clue to what specifically the merged ITT-A.B.C. will have to offer the public of more benefit than the old independent A.B.C. would have offered by itself. It is one of the many questions which the majority of the FCC didn't consider of much importance.

LAYING FREEDOM ON THE LINE

PAUL GOOD

Mr. Good is a free-lance writer who specializes in reporting developments in the civil rights movement.

"It's the turning point in my life," said the black young man who told his draft board he would no more enter the U.S. army than he would the Ku Klux Klan. "I know I'm placing myself outside certain things in this society, but I'm not going to fight against the heroic struggle of my colored brothers in the National Liberation Front."

• • •

"I don't want to go to jail," said the young white man on the eve of starting a five-year term for draft evasion. "But this war is illegal if the Nuremberg trials meant anything. So somebody has to raise the issues and I can't cop out now."

■ ■ ■

"I have one piece of advice for anybody fighting the draft," said the black former SNCC worker just released after serving two years as a draft offender. "Don't go to jail. Because jail destroys you."

■ • ■

"These kids are the real heroes of our time," said a lawyer who defends them, "not those poor boys fighting to win the Silver Stars. But these casualties at home get picked off one by one and hardly anybody cares."

• • •

When their cases come to trial, the indictment reads: The United States of America Against. . . This is the standard legal nomenclature in actions brought by the federal government, but it has a peculiar aptness in these cases. To reject the draft today means to stand very much alone. And with the furor over draft-law reform forcing Congressional hearings and Presidential orders, the plight of hundreds—perhaps thousands—of principled young Americans is getting lost in the shuffle.

Changes in the mechanics of Selective Service do not interest them because they disdain notions of equity in the draft if America's military behavior cannot be justified. Black and white, they will not cooperate with what they feel are racist overtones in Vietnam or with Washington's power obsession everywhere. Militant, they cannot don the lambskin of conscientious objector. Right or wrong, they are going to jail in increasing numbers rather than enter the army of the United States.

This body of unyielding young men is dwarfed by the magnitude of the federal apparatus they challenge. It begins with virtually autonomous draft boards that make a mockery of uniform administration of the Selective Service Law, and ends with courts whose judgment seems tempered to the times. In between are the Justice Department and its FBI (or vice versa). The FBI has boasted that 450 draft-evader convictions resulted in 1966 from its investigations. The Bureau doesn't say how many of these subjects openly declared themselves, how many were apprehended by agents who penetrated cunning disguises, or tracked cowardly fugitives to isolated mountain tops. Lumping principled and unprincipled violators together blurs the image of young men laying their freedom on the line to confront an issue.

A sluggard press abets this process by running repetitive columns on the daily business of killing in Vietnam, while sparing only a paragraph or two for men who choose prison over killing. So James Thurber's ticking draftee who swallowed a watch to fail his physical, a movie actor or football player squirming to find deferment, a youth arguing that he would become a criminal under international law by accepting the draft—all become uniformly contemptible.

Finally, the individual draft refuser takes his stand without a clear commitment from the old or New Left. And he has failed generally to strike up allegiances with his own kind. Racial tensions, differing legal and philosophical approaches, even geography, prevent potential allies from forming a common front. So the image is further blurred. But if we focus on individual men who refuse the draft and on those who defend them, the image sharpens and the conduct of the government, its boards, courts and prosecutors, assumes some clarity.

Conrad Lynn is a 58-year-old New York attorney who has been involved in civil rights combat all his adult life. He is currently handling forty-odd draft cases, about evenly divided between whites and Negroes. Lynn once belonged to the New York Communist Party, was expelled in the late thirties for bucking the Moscow line, and condemned by the Daily Worker during World War II when he went to court to oppose drafting Negroes into a segregated army. The case concerned his brother, Winfred, who in 1942 wrote President Roosevelt that he would not serve in the Jim Crow American army but would volunteer in integrated Canada. The President didn't reply but an induction notice arrived almost immediately.

"It was destined to be the only army segregation case heard by the Supreme Court," Lynn recalls. "I remember the New York State selective service director testifying: 'We don't use the lottery system for Negroes. We have a separate quota and when we need some we call them.'" Arthur Garfield Hays eventually argued the case after Thurgood Marshall—then NAACP counsel and now U.S. Solicitor General—declined to help, according to Lynn. By the time the Supreme Court ruled in 1945, Winfred Lynn had fought in a segregated unit through all the Pacific campaigns starting with Guadalcanal. The ruling, by then academic, went against him on a technicality.

"Today," says Lynn, an ebullient man despite the strains of a long career as a black militant, "the issue of a segregated army has disappeared but others have become more complex. These kids are up to it; they're terrifically advanced in their social thinking. Well it's obvious the white ones have to be to come to a Negro lawyer to fight the draft.

"But beyond them there is widespread ignorance among draftees concerning their rights. Many who apparently don't qualify for c.o. status and can't manage academic deferments get sucked in before they know what's hit them. And most draft boards aren't about to apprise them of their rights."

For example, a U.S. Court of Appeals has ruled out a Selective Service Law regulation that a draftee must appeal his classification within ten days of receiving notice. Many are initially confused, uncertain of their attitudes, or unable to secure expert guidance. Now, they may appeal up to the day of induction. But this is generally unknown.

"The Supreme Court with one ruling has greatly liberalized the c.o. status," says Lynn. "In The U.S. v. Seeger, it said that a youth with deep moral and social conviction against war, parallel in intensity with a religiously held belief, may qualify as a conscientious objector.

"For the first time, atheists or nonreligiously motivated youth have legal ground to stand on. If they know about it. If under the Miranda ruling criminals about to be questioned must be apprised of their civil rights, shouldn't men facing possible combat in a highly controversial war be similarly enlightened? They're not."

Too many of the country's 4,088 draft boards are mere assembly lines turning out human war machines. And like an automotive assembly line, run-of-the-mill models don't receive the attention lavished on more prestigious products. Run-of-the-mill human models are the poor, the uneducated, the connection-less. This model frequently comes in black. In New Orleans, where Negroes comprise nearly 40 per cent of the population, none has ever sat on a draft board, although black casualty figures for the area are running about 60 per cent of the total. Last year during a trial that convicted a Negro named Raymond DuVernay for refusing induction, defense lawyer Benjamin Smith produced this thought-provoking statistic: On the day DuVernay's board considered his appeal for a hardship deferment (he was a Poverty Program worker supporting his mother and six younger children), the board met for three hours to consider 584 cases. This works out to an average of eighteen and a half seconds per man.

But DuVernay or those who try for c.o. status under existing law are seeking consideration within the system, not challenging it. The hard-core refusers cannot accept alternative service they feel contributes to the American war effort. They are impelled to carry their uncompromisable convictions to the ultimate conclusion—a showdown with the legality of the Vietnamese War, with jail inevitable if they lose. So far, they have always lost.

"The difficulty," says Lynn, "is getting a clear-cut confrontation with the issue of U.S. policy aired before the Supreme Court. The lower courts are avoiding it and sometimes these cases lack the proper constitutional vehicle to get Vietnam into it. Yet it exists. Article I, Section 8 of the Constitution provides Congress with power to raise armies and provide for the common defense. But the American empire is in an expansionist period and we don't have time for these little Constitutional and laws.

"So as it stands now, 90 per cent of the cases are decided on procedure, 10 per cent on merit. A boy may be determined to go to the penitentiary for principle. But as the time comes near, he will sometimes accept other resources, aware that lower courts won't permit him to raise the constitutional issue. He then may make a technical objection to draft-board procedure, the appeal mechanism, that sort of thing. But one day, one of these cases will get through to the Supreme Court."

The American Civil Liberties Union, for example, is defending the right of a draftee to be a conscientious objector to this war but not to all war. The "particular-war" argument, supporters feel, is a logical extension of the Seeger ruling. While these cases move through the legal mill, about 35 per cent of Lynn's clients try for c.o. status under Seeger. Lynn believes draft refusers should exhaust all legal opportunities of appeal to gain time, and cites the case of a man who began appealing when he was 25. By the time he turned 28, the draft board said it didn't want him any more.

"I'm in love with this generation of the sixties," Lynn says. "The kids who come to me are great. They put us all to shame. They go into jail for principle as calm as a Christian martyr going out to the lions."

David Henry Mitchell is today serving a five-year term in federal prison. An intensely individualistic young man, once jailed for picketing against Soviet resumption of nuclear tests, Mitchell also typifies many who have preached U.S. guilt to defend their own innocence. Other names in this radical tradition include Robert McCormick of Detroit, Edward Miller and Geoffrey Reed Conklin of New York, and Donald Weatherall of Chicago. Mitchell was 24 when he surrendered on February 6 in New Haven, an event scarcely noted by the press or broadcasters. The New York Times, which has used the words "draft dodger" to describe the openly declared pacifist, David A. Reed, allotted Mitchell a few paragraphs. A few months earlier, its learned militarist, Hanson Baldwin, had been given the lead article in its Sunday Magazine to present a general apologia for the present draft, without managing to once mention the moral issues it raises. Mitchell was 18 when those issues induced him to tell his draft board he could not serve; later he expanded his position in a letter:

I oppose the draft, not as something wrong for just me or wrong for only certain people, but as something wrong for the peace and survival of the world. Selective Service is the criminal in this case, as can be judged by American militarism throughout the world—from Cuba to Panama to South Vietnam, and by our basing of policies on nuclear war. I refuse to cooperate in any way which would support the continuance of such activities. I certainly wouldn't have worked in a Nazi concentration camp just because I would not have to tend the ovens or the gas but could be a guard or a clerk. Rather, as I am doing with the draft and the militarism it contributes to, I would have disassociated from such wrong and worked against it.

The year and a half between his initial refusal and his jailing in January is only partly accounted for by Mitchell's two trials and appeals. The fluctuating policy of draft boards and the Justice Department has created "soft" periods when little or no action was taken against those challenging the draft. Whether this fluctuation is a tactic or merely another manifestation of the incredibly random functioning of the Selective Service Law, it has kept the opposition off guard, unable to discern a clear policy to unite against, and vulnerable to being picked off singly. In late 1965 and last year, with monthly draft calls issued at the rate of 20,000 and 30,000, and the Administration locked into a war posture, prosecutions picked up steam. And five-year sentences suddenly became the norm. What happened to Mitchell is instructive.

Mitchell is a soft-spoken, well-barbered young man with an apple-pie American background. He was raised in New Canaan, Conn., in a middle-class family. His father, a World War II veteran, sent his son to prep school and Brown University. Mitchell registered without protest while at Brown, but the Vietnamese build-up increasingly disturbed him and he became involved in anti-war activities. In August, 1961, he sailed out with other demonstrators into the harbor of the New London Navy base to picket against nuclear-armed Polaris submarines.

"Everybody else went limp when Coast Guardsmen arrested them," a friend recalls. "Not Dave. He dove overboard and started swimming. A frogman caught up with him and pulled him into the boat. Dave said later it was a good thing because he never could have made it to shore. They beat him in jail and he came out pretty determined."

Mitchell began working with the End the Draft Committee while evolving his own position. It cost him personally—his mother lamented the legal dangers he faced, his father's patriotism did not permit him to sit by his son's side during subsequent court encounters. The draft board kept sending Mitchell notices and he kept sending them back, but the government did not indict until 1965. He responded through his first lawyer, Conrad Lynn, with a defense resting heavily on the Nuremberg trial principle that individuals could be held accountable for joining in their government's crimes against humanity.

"Was Nuremberg just a device enabling victors to execute the vanquished?" Mitchell said. "Or did it apply to us too? By every measure I knew, America was guilty of international war crimes. I would be guilty if I took part. I wasn't saying that we should never have a draft. I was saying the draft was applied contrary to constitutional provisions for the common defense. I wanted to get at the moral and legal guts of Washington's position."

No less an authority than former Supreme Court Justice Robert Jackson, chief prosecutor at Nuremberg, had written:

If certain acts in violation of treaties are crimes, they are crimes whether the United States does them or whether Germany does them, and we are not prepared to lay down a rule of criminal conduct against others which we would not be willing to have invoked against us.

The United Nations General Assembly had adopted the Tribunal Charter as international law on a motion by the United States, and Article VI of the U.S. Constitution makes international law, to which this country is signatory, the supreme law of the land. What Mitchell had to prove was that American intervention in Vietnam, its use of biological warfare, and its treatment of civilian populations violated the Charter and other treaties.

But at his first trial before Connecticut District Chief Judge William H. Timbers, Mitchell was not permitted to introduce any evidence pertaining to American policy in Vietnam. Judge Timbers called it a "simple" case, dismissed the Nuremberg defense as "irrelevant," and Mitchell was convicted for failure to report for induction. The judge fined him $5,000, sentenced him to five years with the recommendation that it be served in the maximum security Leavenworth Penitentiary, and suggested he not be considered for parole unless he promised to serve in the army.

"That might have been predictable," Mitchell said. "But what bothered me was the disunity among people who should have been banding together. Students for a Democratic Society backed off an anti-draft program after the Administration's get-tough policy scared them. Negroes wouldn't stand with whites even though we're all in it against an immoral society. I got in correspondence with one, a Negro GI in Arkansas last year who refused to go to Vietnam. But eventually he went and became a hero. The white college kids were mostly interested in fighting specifics—schools giving out grades to draft officials, deferment criteria, and so forth. What it all boiled down to was that individual refusers were basically isolated when they needed a unified effort behind them to stand up to government pressures."

With polls showing 80 per cent of college students in basic agreement with Vietnamese policy, this wasn't surprising. Yale Prof. Staughton Lynd, the anti-war militant who visited North Vietnam, said on his return:

Members of the North Vietnam Peace Committee said to us: "We are puzzled that American young men have not taken up the idea of refusing to serve in your army." I am puzzled too. I don't understand why SDS decided not to emphasize an anti-draft program. The most obvious and tragic failure of the movement against the war in this last year has been its failure to develop a responsible program against the draft. We have succeeded in stimulating debate in Congress, but we have left millions of young men, one by one, struggling with this desperate and frightening question, to fend for themselves.

Mitchell appeared to have won a crucial victory when the Second Circuit Court of Appeals reversed his conviction. It said Mitchell's case was not "simple" and pointedly suggested that Judge Timbers assign someone else to the retrial. The appeals court said:

Of basic importance is the fact that the appellant has taken the position that if he submitted to the draft, the "Nuremberg law" would render him "guilty of complicity in crimes defined by the Charter of the International Military Tribunal," specifically wars of aggression and acts of inhumanity.

But the second trial in March, 1966, was almost a carbon copy of the first. The court would not permit Mitchell's attorney to subpoena witnesses—including foreign correspondents, Vietnamese nationals, Professor Lynd and Secretary McNamara—to testify about alleged U.S. peace treaty violations, the use of napalm and defoliation, bombing of the North and prisoner-of-war tortures. Judge T. Emmet Clarie ruled this potential evidence "immaterial." Mitchell was permitted to explain his personal philosophy, but he had insisted all along that his subjective feelings were not the issue. It took the jury twelve minutes to convict him.

He was again sentenced to five years. This time the same appeals court that said his case wasn't "simple" took a new approach. Justice Harold Medina, who presided over the trial of Communist leaders in the 1950s, wrote the following in a short opinion rejecting Mitchell's appeal:

Regardless of the proof that appellant might present to demonstrate the correlation between the Selective Service and our nation's effort in Vietnam, as a matter of law the congressional power to "raise and support armies" and "to provide and maintain a navy" is a matter quite distinct from the use which the Executive makes of those who have been found qualified and who have been inducted into the Armed Forces.

Perhaps Mitchell's defense lacked what Attorney Lynn called the "proper constitutional vehicle." Or did this legalism say that a President could do what he wanted with a draft army since the constitutional restrictions which the judiciary could invoke applied only to the legislative branch? But in 1945 hadn't Justice Jackson said:

We do not accept the paradox that legal responsibility should be the least where power is greatest . . . with the doctrine of immunity of a head of state usually is coupled another, that orders from an official superior protect one who obeys them. It will be noticed that the combination of these two doctrines means that nobody is responsible.

Mitchell has appealed to the Supreme Court where at least four Justices must vote to review before the Nuremberg issue can be considered. A review, whatever the final decision, would probe the deepest, most sensitive regions of the American state, and the implications would be great. Meanwhile, the instrument of the appeal was not permitted to remain at large.

"I don't want to go to jail," said Mitchell the night before his surrender. "I spent eighteen days there after the Polaris demonstrations and I became very aware of gates opening and closing." But he went and other young men were prepared to follow him, some for the same principles and others for different ones.

Afro Americans for Survival had about a dozen members last summer. Rules for membership were simple. You had to be a Negro. If you were eligible for the draft, you had to refuse it and try to get others to do the same (itself a federal offense). If you were already in, you went AWOL to avoid going to Vietnam. Said the Afro Americans' manifesto:

We are united in believing that this is a racist war and that Black men have nothing to gain by fighting for racist America. We intend to make a stand. We will fight it out in the courts, the streets and the halls of Congress. We call upon all our brothers and sisters to support us in this struggle, for is it not better for Black men to fight for Black survival in America than for Black men to fight for white domination in Vietnam?

Behind the statement lay now familiar U.S. casualty figures that showed a lethal disparity between whites and Negroes. Negroes constitute 11 per cent of the population, but they have made up nearly 15 per cent of the army in Vietnam and have taken more than 20 per cent of combat deaths. One of nine men between 18 and 29 is black; so are two of every nine enlisted men in the army. Administration officials concede the disparity, and have marshaled logical explanations. Unemployment of Negro youth, as lamentable as it was widespread, induced many to enlist. Once in through choice or the draft, long years of educational neglect found many suited only for infantry duty in line outfits suffering the casualties. What was the answer? Most answers were grim for black Americans. Defense Secretary McNamara came up with a plan to "salvage" men previously rejected for health and educational deficiencies. One hundred thousand a year would be taken and an estimated 30 per cent would be black. Lacking minimum skills or the education to qualify for service training programs, and with the murderous exigencies of Vietnam requiring bodies with guns in their hands, most would be "salvaged" into combat. The lethal disparity would increase. To the white mind of Saturday Evening Post editorialists, there was potential great good in all this gore. Those Negroes who managed to survive this "genuinely desegregated area of American life" [i.e., Vietnamese combat] could return home to become "the young core of a reasonably responsible, reasonably responsive Negro leadership, which is something we very badly need."

By the Christmas holidays, Afro Americans for Survival was down to four survivors out of the original dozen. Others had drifted away or accepted the draft. One, a former member of the Green Berets who had been AWOL 200 days was enticed back to the army. His punishment? A $10-a-month pay deduction for three months while restricted to camp. There was strong suspicion that the kid-glove treatment was designed to lure other black defectors back to the fold.

One day before Christmas, Afro Americans' chairman, Robert Allen, 24, sat in his small Bronx apartment talking with a reporter and two other members, Steven Moore, 22, and Carl Gibbons, 20. The remaining member, 19-year-old Edward Oquendo, was over in Brooklyn where he had organized an anti-draft group called Blacks Against Negative Dying (BAND). But recruitment was unproductive in Bedford-Stuyvesant, and Oquendo, under federal indictment, had become an unwitting pun, a one-man BAND.

"The system is using us to fight its wars," said Allen, married and studying for a master's degree in sociology. "Black guys we know don't want to go but they don't see an alternative. They're bitter and frustrated. They don't join groups like ours because they don't think anything will do any good; they'll just go to jail. But the whole idea of fighting the draft in organizations is new and it will spread, particularly as the war expands this year."

"If I was white," added Moore, who has had two years of college and works as attendant in a state hospital, "I wouldn't have so much of a beef. When I got my induction notice it scared hell out of me because I knew I wouldn't go but I didn't know how. When they asked me why I wouldn't report I told them: Survival."

Gibbons, a black nationalist with a high school education, who works for the post office, said: "If you don't believe in the war but you go into the army, that's being a coward. This war is inhuman, it's racist and I won't do the white man's murdering. I have someone right here at home to fight—the white man."

As they spoke, their apparent determination mixed with uncertainty about where it would carry them. The assertion that a racist American society was using black men to fight a racist war in Asia did not constitute a legal defense to the Selective Service Law. Mitchell's Nuremberg defense did not interest them much. Nor did the other white draft refusers. They saw that Life had managed to publish (December 9) a cover story on the draft, without once mentioning the peculiar Negro stake in it, and even renegades from what they considered this prevailing white mentality were not wanted as allies. Blackness melded them despite differences in education and family background. Gibbons' family was involved in civil rights, and his mother had written to the draft board saying she would rather see her son in jail than dead. Moore's parents were against his draft opposition, manifesting what he called a "working-class fear" of what could happen to him. Allen's father was a housing project superintendent in Atlanta, and a reporter got the impression the elder Allen did not approve of boat rocking.

The three had refused induction during the summer and Moore and Gibbons had been indicted. Why not Allen? Again, the selective quality of Selective Service prosecutions arose, and with it a suspicion that Allen's position as chairman might have made him "sensitive."

"In May, 1965, I wrote President Johnson explaining my moral opposition to Vietnam," Allen said. "He didn't reply but two weeks later my induction notice came. I refused to sign the subversive statement. A year later they told me I had been cleared anyhow."

"This summer I was between semesters at the New School and they told me again to report. I went down to Whitehall Street and gave out a statement saying I wasn't a pacifist but I couldn't join an army that didn't protect black citizens at home. The commanding officer there had been to Vietnam. He told me it was a terrible war but it had to be done, and that rather than go to jail, entering the army was the lesser of two evils."

Two months after the conversation in Allen's apartment, Oquendo was resolutely awaiting trial and prepared to go to prison. Allen remained unindicted and had already met with other black anti-draft groups to plan a national conference in Detroit in May. But Gibbons had pleaded guilty and would take advantage of President Johnson's recent "amnesty" permitting such offenders to enter the army rather than jail. Steve Moore had already been to court and his holiday determination had faltered while the jury was being empaneled. Moore agreed to induction. Why?

"Jail," he said. "To be perfectly honest, I decided out of weakness. I also thought I could do more damage inside the army, spreading the word. But mostly I just couldn't stand the thought of jail. I had spent one night there when they arrested me and that was enough."

Moore's case ended not with a bang but rejection. Army doctors found that an arthritic condition—which he says existed all along—made him unfit for service. From a militant black point of view, should he have made the supreme protest of going to prison? One Negro voice of experience has one answer.

David Bell left the federal Correctional Institute in Danbury two days before Christmas, after serving two years for refusing to report for induction. He had entered jail without fanfare and left it unnoticed by the press, the general public or civil rights groups.

"My advice to black men is to fight the draft any way you can," says Bell. "But don't go to jail. Whatever you do, don't go to jail."

Bell, 24, was a National Merit Award winner from a Jersey City ghetto called "The Valley," who went to Rutgers University as a math major. But, like Gorky, his ultimate "university" was experience. He left school in 1963 to do field work, the field being southwest Georgia, and his sponsor SNCC. In June, 1964, when he received his induction notice, anti-draft sentiment threw a small shadow on the national landscape.

"It wasn't even prevailing SNCC philosophy then," Bell recalls. "But I knew I was not going to involve myself in that war where nonwhites were struggling for liberation. When I wrote my draft board explaining, I wasn't aware what a sacrifice it was going to be. Most people who haven't been to prison look on it as an honorable alternative to the draft. They don't know."

Six months after his June refusal, Bell quietly offered no defense to his indictment and received two years. He is a slender, articulate young man whose eyes are cautious when he talks to a white man, and who exudes suppressed anger when recalling the prison experience.

"Two weeks after I arrived I was asked by the captain if I were a Communist," he said. "I just chuckled at him."

Bell grants that the physical plant wasn't too oppressive and his initial treatment, at least, was correct. At first he lived in a dormitory with fifty others, a setting he describes as "chaotic." But he soon managed to get a single cell and was assigned to teach new math in prison classes. He learned the routine: Cells open at 6 A.M. Wash and eat. Work at eight. One hour noon lunch. Work until 4:30. An hour out in the yard or recreation house. Head count. Supper. Classes or movies at night. There was full integration, although Bell chose to segregate himself with other Negro prisoners in the life outside his cell. He chafed at censorship of mail and a prison library filled mostly with potboilers. He was not permitted to read proscribed books like Manchild in the Promised Land, A Different Drummer and the Malcolm X autobiography.

"But the biggest hang-up," Bell says, "was the realization that I was inside, where I couldn't do the things I should be doing about the draft or anything else. I found it hard to do sustained thinking because of the psychological atmosphere. I realized I should have taken another course. . . . I was just rotting there . . . it became a negative experience and my whole personality was taken apart."

Two white youths were serving time for draft evasion and there were fifteen Jehovah's Witnesses who, according to Bell, did a uniform one year apiece. But he had little to do with any of them. Bell began holding Saturday morning discussion sessions with a group of Negroes, including Muslims, a Nigerian and two men involved in the plot to blow up the Statue of Liberty. Bell does not explain precisely what form the discussions took. But it's safe to assume they did not foster the American status quo. Officials got wind of it, and when Bell refused to provide a list of all who had attended he lost his privileges and time off for good behavior.

When Bell is asked the overall effect of his choice of prison over the army, his mental reaction is like a man gingerly feeling himself all over after a crack-up, trying to find what is broken and what remains whole.

"I came out stronger in concepts, I think, but weaker in ability. I still haven't recovered from being forced to submit, and I'm not sure if it inhibits my actions now. In prison nothing yields, nothing changes." His smile is rare, wry, at the question of his biggest problem on the outside. "It's waking up at six in the morning but not going to bed at ten at night."

Bell has plunged into work with a highly organized, militant ghetto group in Jersey City called STAND. The word is not an abbreviation but a call to Negroes to unite in economic and political blocs against dominant white interests.

"I haven't met anybody black of draft age ready to go to jail," says Bell. "If I did, I'd talk him out of it. No, I have no contacts with white refusers. I wouldn't know what to say to one, how to justify to them. I don't think there's time now for a white-black front on any issue. Some one of these days the summer riots won't stop in the fall and this might be the summer. . . ."

Bell is probably the first Negro to go to jail for refusing the draft on racial grounds. He will not be the last, nor will David Mitchell be the last white to forfeit freedom rather than abandon principle. What they will achieve, given the indifference of the general public and the Administration's mopping up of draft offenders, is doubtful. The spirit that animates many, however, is clearly expressed in the words of 20-year-old Tom Rodd of Pittsburgh, spoken to the judge who had sentenced him to a four-year term. Judge Louis Rosenberg had originally sentenced Rodd to five years for refusing to register, but placed him on probation with the proviso that he work for a social agency and take no part in public demonstrations. Rodd broke probation by picketing a plant that made helicopters for Vietnam. He said:

With a profound feeling of inadequacy and unworthiness, I am forced by my conscience to stand as a representative of the suffering millions of Vietnam. I am forced to stand for the girl child burned to death in Bien Hoa, for the refugee cold and hungry in a camp on the outskirts of Saigon, for the weary guerrilla fighter, for the Buddhist monk who is now a handful of ashes, for the thousands with no legs, thousands more with no eyes, yes, even for the U.S. Marine now slowly dying in a Philadelphia hospital.

I have tried, Lord knows, to obey this probation. I wanted to go to Selma and walk to Montgomery—but I didn't. I wanted to go to Washington and confront the President—but I didn't. I wanted to picket Girard College in Philadelphia—but I didn't. . . . But this war is too immediate, too pressing, too terrible, for me to have to say later: "But I didn't."

Last, I reiterate what anybody who knows me should know: that I am an incorrigible optimist, that I love life, and that I drink beer, play banjo, and daily toss my head and tap my feet to the romping, stomping all-pervading beat of human existence. That's all I wanted to say and I wish everybody a Happy New Year.

LATIN AMERICA BANS THE BOMB

LINDA EDER

Miss Eder, member of a Colombian-American family and recently a UN observer for The Nation, has written about Colombian women and Manhattan children.

Twenty-one nations of Latin America meeting in Mexico City last month displayed significant one-upmanship over the seventeen nations now conferring in Geneva on nuclear disarmament. The Treaty of Tlatelolco, signed on February 14, is the first pact to ban nuclear arms from an inhabited segment of the earth.

The nuclear powers took benevolent and perhaps patronizing notice of the Mexico City proceedings. They put considerable pressure behind their view that the treaty was to prohibit all nuclear explosions; Latin America could not even be "nuclearized for peace." Some of the most industrialized Latin American nations protested this ban, disliking both the deprivation and especially the attitude. In the end, a compromise was reached between danger and development: when Latin America wants to use atomic explosions to dig a canal, to build a tunnel, to enlarge a harbor, the work will be supplied from the outside.

On this basis, the Treaty to Ban Nuclear Weapons from Latin America was signed by fourteen nations, and on the following day by a fifteenth—well above the eleven agreed upon for passage. The treaty has been ignored, laughed off as a farce or charade, or denigrated by the press for falling short of watertight perfection. No one would claim that its conclusion guarantees salvation from world holocaust, but a significant first has been scored, a model set, and quite conceivably an impetus may have been given for regional action in other sections of the globe.

Attempts at regional agreement among nations to ban nuclear arms are hardly new. Poland's Rapacki Plan in 1958; Sweden's "non-nuclear club" idea, presented at the 16th UN General Assembly in 1961 with Ireland's endorsement; Ethiopia's dormant initiative to unite the African countries in a nuclear-free zone, resolved at a summit conference in May, 1963, all tried to enlist international pledges for the idea. But it remained for Alfonso García Robles, deputy foreign minister of Mexico, with the encouragement of his then President Adolfo López Mateos, to set forth at the United Nations in November, 1963, the plan that in the following year became the Preparatory Commission for the Denuclearization of Latin America (COPREDAL). This organization, launched with the joint blessing of the Presidents of Bolivia, Brazil, Chile, Ecuador and of course Mexico, appears to have done its preliminary work quickly and efficiently, as such things go. A little more than two years from its inception, COPREDAL's purpose has been achieved.

The treaty, which was signed with ritual and solemnity in Mexico City, is binding upon twenty-one nations. It brings a considerable proportion of the earth's surface and approximately one-tenth of its population under a firm agreement whereby nuclear explosives are perpetually excluded, and plans for a careful control system by the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) are set up. This was no mean achievement. The participating countries, though to an extent similar in language and culture, are distinctly mixed in political concepts and quite unlike in degree of economic development. Yet they doggedly reached a common conclusion and departed the conference table with a signed treaty. (Cuba, it might be noted, failed to take any part in COPREDAL; it will hold aloof, it says, until the United States removes its installations from Panama, the Virgin Islands, Puerto Rico, as well as from Guantánamo. Otherwise, it believes in the principle of the pact.)

Much has been made of the Antarctica Treaty of 1959 and the recent agreement on the internationalization of outer space. But extensive as these two areas are, neither is ever likely to be inhabited by more than 250 million people. That is the significance of the Treaty of Tlatelolco.

Twenty-two observers from nonparticipating countries played a significant part in the outcome. The principal stumbling block to agreement, right up to the last week of meetings, was the determination on the part of some of the participants, among them Brazil and Argentina, to reserve to themselves the right to prepare and engage in nuclear explosions for peaceful uses. Such a proviso would have robbed the treaty of any real effectiveness. To quote a ranking U.S. nuclear physicist: "Nuclear devices used for peaceful purposes are in all respects also usable as weapons. . . . Any nation which develops nuclear explosives is at the same time developing bombs. . . . In fact, the Russians regard the U.S. program in this connection with great suspicion, since they maintain that it may well constitute a disguised weapon testing program." In the words of William Epstein, technical consultant for the UN, it would be possible to have a "peaceful nuclear device arms race." Reinhard Rainer, representing the IAEA, lent considerable weight to the effort to convince the recalcitrants that no meaningful distinction could be made between atomic explosives for peaceful and for belligerent purposes. And Fulton Freeman, U.S. Ambassador to Mexico, wielded no little influence in persuading the more technically advanced nations to forgo the use of their resources for development of such explosives.

This was an achievement, since Brazil, Argentina and Uruguay possess sizable nuclear reactors, and Mexico is in the process of building one. Colombia and Venezuela, and possibly other nations, have smaller ones. All these, of course, are categorized as research installations, but the IAEA considers that the first four, at least, have a capacity to produce plutonium large enough to require inspection.

The U.S. statement on the treaty says, with an abundance of caution: "It is our understanding of the text . . . [that it sanctions] carrying out of peaceful nuclear explosions by contracting parties themselves only if and when future advance in technology permits the development of devices for peaceful explosions which are not susceptible of use for weapons purposes. The foregoing understanding of the effect of the treaty is fundamental to the United States Government's position concerning it." Peter Thacher, special adviser on disarmament and outer space to the U.S. Mission to the UN, endorses these views, and has added an ecumenical note to the effect that the treaty's ultimate value depends upon its enhancement of the total nonproliferation effort. For all that the United States casts itself somewhat in the role of ■ adult looking down upon children at play, there is an undeniable logic in its position.

The Tlatelolco Treaty (named for that section of Mexico City), which García Robles hopes will one day take its place beside Locarno and Dumbarton Oaks, is a regional pact. Whether, in due course, the African nations or the non-nuclear European countries conclude similar agreements is ■ matter for speculation. To judge by their earlier recorded stance, a number may so elect. But whether or not this example is followed beyond the Western Hemisphere, an accomplishment has been registered which commits a sizable portion of the human race, and its governments, to the premise that war is obsolete, and total war, totally so.

No treaty is consummated in a vacuum; its surroundings must have their effect upon its deliberations. Likewise, the individuality and character of the participants may play a role above and beyond that of the positions they take and the statements they read. The observer remembers the solid and courtly figure of UN Ambassador Leopoldo Benitez of Ecuador, pulling together the raveling threads of thought; and the pellucid and measured Spanish of Commission President García Robles who is rightfully called the father of the treaty; the truly Latin atmosphere, the cordial abrazos and handshakings, the endless rounds of coffee, Coca-Cola and whisky passed by silent waiters, the meetings starting a full hour or two behind schedule and occasionally continuing into the early hours of the morning. ("Why are they late today?—the working sessions have concluded." "They are busy with the denuclearization of Cuernavaca!"—this on a particularly beautiful weekend.)

Outside the conference building in the Plaza de las Tres Culturas, barefooted Indian boys dash up to preoccupied delegates with eager cries of "chicle, chicle!" and ■ bright-skirted mother, aburst with child in her young years, toys with her hip-length jet braids. The high-rise glass and steel of the Foreign Ministry and a red, white and black vocational school are grouped with the yellow brick church of the Conquistadores and the ancient pyramidal Aztec ruins, a monument to both Mexico's modern dynamism and her prideful past.

In the midst of this scene a plaque commemorating Cuahtemoc, the last of the Aztec kings, who fell defending Tlatelolco against the power of Cortés, is inscribed: "No fué triunfo ni derrota . . ."—"It was neither a triumph nor a defeat" but the painful birth of the mixed people who are the Mexico of today.

And so with the treaty, negotiated and signed on the same spot four and a half centuries later: it was neither ■ triumph nor ■ defeat but a painful birth.

LETTERS (Continued from page 354)

deliberately sets out to kill civilians in the course of trying to damage its selected targets. In this context, the modern bomber is a terror weapon . . . against a civilian population. . . .

The inevitable conclusion is this: like other forms of warfare against civilians, chemical and biological, nuclear weaponry, the bomber . . . should be abolished, either by treaty, convention, or unspoken acknowledgments. For the sake of humanity, in the course of doing away with war altogether, the use of the bomber should be forbidden. We can take the first step in this direction by stopping the bombing in Vietnam; the second step would be a big-power agreement abolishing the bomber, eradicating the air forces of the world. For as was shown in World War II, as is being shown today in Vietnam, the use of the bomber is . . . simply murder. . . . Philip Siekevitz

CORRECTION

John Hatch, whose "Rhodesia: Sanctions on Trial" appeared in the issue of Feb. 6, has asked The Nation to explain that the Inter-University African Studies Program, of which he is director, is sponsored by four universities. This year, Mr. Hatch is based at Texas Southern University.

at sea

Tampa, Fla.

DEAR SIR: When Dorian J. Fliegel asserts in "Headquarters vs. the Men at Sea" [The Nation, Jan. 30] . . . that the National Maritime Union is not democratically run, he does not know what democracy is. As a retired member of the NMU, and now back in it again, I can state that at no time, in any meeting, did I see anybody denied his right to speak up. Meetings are held not only on shore but mandatory on the ships, and a new chairman is elected at every one. . . . As for patrolmen being selected, rather than being elected, that provided intelligent knowledge of the contracts necessary to discuss problems with the captains of ships who also know the contracts inside out. . . .

Louis Fritze

no time for matzohs

New York City

DEAR SIR: I have just read Desmond Smith's article, "Filming the New Revolution" [The Nation, Feb. 27]. What amused me was his reference to the Hadassah leaders, who apparently were in the Soviet Union while Mr. Smith was there. For the sake of accuracy, I should like to make the following observations: I led the Hadassah group to the USSR. We did wear our Hadassah pins, but without name plates. There was no Mrs. Shapiro among us. And no member of our group had blue hair.

As for the matzohs, we had none. You see, matzohs are eaten during the Passover, which comes in the spring. We were there in the fall—during the Succoth holiday. Additionally, the Soviet Government would probably not permit anyone to bring matzohs into the USSR. . . . But Hadassah appreciates the plug anyway.

Mrs. Mortimer Jacobson
National President, Hadassah

Michael Gold

DEAR SIR: For assistance in the preparation and editing of the memoirs of Michael Gold (Irving Granich), American radical writer, critic and publicist, I would appreciate letters, documents and personal reminiscences. I am particularly interested in learning of extant issues of The Flame, which Gold edited with Van Allison (Boston, 1916), and scripts of Gold's plays, Down the Airshaft and Ivan's Homecoming, produced at the Provincetown Playhouse in 1917.

Michael Brewster Folsom
1416 Grant, Berkeley, Calif. 94703

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Of Guilt and Resurrection

FRIENDSHIP AND FRATRICIDE: An Analysis of Whittaker Chambers and Alger Hiss. By Meyer A. Zeligs, M.D. Viking Press. 476 pp. $8.95.

DAVID CORT

Mr. Cort, a frequent Nation contributor, was a fellow student and colleague of Whittaker Chambers at Columbia University and Time, Inc.

Was the distinguished Alger Hiss of 1948 actually a marvelously masked Communist agent? Or was his accuser, Whittaker Chambers, a marvelously masked liar? The two characters in the famous "confrontation" interested a San Francisco psychoanalyst, and he spent six years attempting to check out both men on every retrievable detail of their lives. The great design that slowly unfolded was, in sum, the grandest swindle since the Piltdown man. Chambers had been a walking swindle from childhood on; the researcher could find no falsities in the life story of Hiss. Hiss was not Chambers' only victim by the same technique; he was simply his masterpiece.

To review Dr. Zeligs' book as a little exercise in psychiatric techniques, as has been done by others, is a pedantic enormity—something like reviewing Othello without Iago. It would be easy to find fault with it as literary psychoanalysis; but it is as a compilation of significant data about Chambers and Hiss that the book is important. The Chambers-Hiss case rested above all on the question of the relative honesty and integrity of the two men involved. Dr. Zeligs' facts are so shocking, so consistent, convincing and well documented as to make the psychiatry a mere distraction. The facts are of urgent interest to the American people, and have political implications of some importance. We are also given an insight into two wildly contrasting and fully drawn human beings in a plot on the edge of melodrama.

I do not blame anyone for refusing to believe that there could be such a person as the "Whittaker Chambers" Zeligs describes; the character is completely improbable. From personal knowledge, I must testify that exactly such a character did exist indeed. I also knew many of the people who believed in him.

Nor is it a count against Dr. Zeligs' work that he does not destroy the whole case against Hiss; what he set out to do was examine Chambers' contribution to it. In doing so, the facts he unearths demolish great portions of the case against Hiss.

Meyer Zeligs starts with Chambers' early life. His parents were two irreligious bourgeois, both socially mobile downward, both artistically pretentious (a big thing before World War I), neither capable of sustaining a good marriage. Out of this situation Chambers evolved his own demure fury.

Zeligs' key thesis is that Whittaker Chambers somehow conspired in his younger (and more attractive) brother's suicide, possibly because of a homosexual, incestuous relationship, and thus inaugurated a life pattern of death, guilt, resurrection. One need not accept this thesis, though it is important to Zeligs. The facts remain. Zeligs is not a prosecutor; the most telling exposures are often dropped into footnotes.

According to Chambers, he was born weighing 12 pounds and measuring 14 inches at the shoulders, in Philadelphia on April 1, 1901, in a blizzard (the record shows no precipitation of any kind on that lamentable April Fool's Day). He was christened Jay Vivian Chambers, but this identity did not suit him any more than the actual facts of his birth. He began using invented names such as Charles Adams (at 18), Charles Whittaker (at 19), Whittaker Chambers (19), John Kelly (21), and later Jay David Chambers, David Breen, George Cantwell, Lloyd Cantwell, Carl, George Crosley, David Dwyer, John Land—certainly an incomplete roster.

He had an early compulsion toward atrocity. As class prophet at his class graduation, he predicted that a nice girl would turn prostitute. He exited from Columbia, following publication in the campus bushy-tailed magazine of a sacrilegious playlet placed outside Christ's Sepulchre. He told professors he had syphilis. He somehow maintained a mouthful of appalling teeth, as if asking to be loved in spite of. His elusive charm was that of one asking for a blanket pardon, for past, present and future. Most people instinctively refused it.

His lies followed psychic patterns which Zeligs tries to define. Let us limit this bottomless subject only to his relations with Alger Hiss. The items below are distinguished as L (Lie) and F (Fact).

(L) The Hisses visited Chambers at Maxim Lieber's house on the Delaware River. (F) Lieber never saw or heard of the Hisses. (L) Hiss abominated Shakespeare. (F) Mr. and Mrs. Hiss read Shakespeare to each other at night. (L) Hiss had a total contempt for F. D. Roosevelt. (F) Hiss totally loved Roosevelt. (Aside: it was Chambers in both roles of Communist and anti-Communist who loathed Roosevelt.) (L) The Hiss lawyers impertinently called his suicide brother "Dickie." (F) They didn't. Chambers did. (L) Mrs. Hiss was "a birthright Quaker." (F) She was a Presbyterian. (L) Hiss's house was white with green shutters. (F) It was bright yellow with vivid blue shutters. A long time later it was painted as Chambers "remembered" it. (L) Chambers was put up in an upstairs bedroom. (F) There was no upstairs spare bedroom. (L) No piano. (F) Piano. And so on, interminably.

Powerful men and august bodies in this nation received these sleazy lies as significant political truth, at a time when such cobwebs nearly destroyed the American society. For Chambers' enemy was never communism; it was American democracy, you and me. He managed to set America to the task of its own destruction.

The terrible thought is that with Chambers' recipe anybody can ruin anybody else, if he will prepare ahead, and wait. It is of the utmost significance that Chambers did not seek an actual Communist as his prime victim, for there were plenty available. He wanted to bring down the whole structure of democracy. And Hiss had the democratic weaknesses of courtesy and responsibility.

If Chambers had been a simple madman, there would be no problem. But he was a master mountebank. He quickly picked up the style, tone and jargon of almost any role: conspirator, executive, assassin, poet, littérateur, genius, savior, and might have made an impressive magnate or general or judge, for a short time. For inside the imposture was a hollow man with sound effects. All the people who admired, loved, feared, or even just believed him were pitifully hoaxed. Just to know him was at best an indiscretion.

Chambers personified a rollicking satire on a wide variety of things: great men, philosophy, history, facts, Time Magazine, politics, propaganda, religion, communism, espionage, power, conservatism, conscience, friendship, etc.

Yet men of affairs, in government, the press, letters, the FBI, believed in him and staked their careers on him—men like William Buckley of the National Review, and J. Edgar Hoover. They accepted the cant, the bold front, the false credentials, as the genuine article. Well, it is now time to pick up the stakes.

Richard Nixon owes his career largely to Chambers. A typical Chambers letter to Nixon: "I do not believe for a moment that because you have been cruelly checked in the employment of what is best in you . . . that that check is final. Great character always precludes a sense of comedown."

The late Henry R. Luce was willingly deceived by Chambers for nine years. Chambers wrote Luce: "Your speech is a simple, authentic testimony of the spirit. . . . It is a voice with which I have seldom been privileged to hear you speak, and it moves me deeply. I may not intrude upon it. . . . It proceeds from the spirit, and the mode of the Christian spirit is simplicity. God bless you, Harry. Whittaker." Anyone who could toss off such rarefied sycophancy, couched as hero worship, had to go far. What a pity that Luce bought this from a farceur. He deserved better.

Of another kind was Mark Van Doren for whose infinite kindness to Chambers came a letter after the difficulties of his son Charles, enclosing a note to Charles: "You will never get over this. The world will never leave you alone until you die." Instead of a condolence, a terrible curse, and ungrammatical. Chambers' letters to Van Doren are masterpieces of seemingly profound intellectual narcissism, a quality that English professors tend to confuse with genius.

One Chambers friend who was not deceived was Lionel Trilling who put into his novel, The Middle of the Journey, a Chambers-based character, a paranoiac constantly looking for a "new existence," who finally attacks his best friend. Nevertheless, Trilling was impressed by Chambers.

My disdain of Chambers, at Columbia and then at Time, Inc., was always instinctive, that he was a repellent actor. But I seem to have been nearly alone in that company.

The Lady Vanished

THE SEARCH FOR AMELIA EARHART. By Fred Goerner. Doubleday & Company. 326 pp. $5.95.

CARL DREHER

The dust jacket contains a bit of overselling: "What happened to Amelia Earhart? The answers are here." In any conclusive sense, the answers are not here. Some of the purported answers are old stuff and some are what a learned judge called "exsufflicate and blown surmises." But in general Goerner stays within the bounds of probability and is candid with the reader. He has broken considerable new ground and gone over old ground more thoroughly than earlier detectives. Most important, his six-year investigation puts both the Japanese and American Governments under suspicion of hiding the truth, long after considerations of national security had ceased to exist. A more flagrant case of bureaucratic obstruction, principally on the part of the U.S. armed services, would be difficult to find. Of equal interest with the earlier events is Goerner's stumbling on a major Central Intelligence Agency operation while he was struggling to penetrate the curtain of official secrecy surrounding the Earhart case. This find is as illuminating as the revelations bearing on the case itself.

Goerner, a C.B.S. radio reporter in San Francisco, believes "unqualifiedly" that Miss Earhart and her navigator, Frederick J. Noonan, were engaged on a semi-official spy mission for the United States Government when they disappeared in the Pacific in 1937. Ostensibly, they were on a publicity-seeking flight around the world, from west to east. After they reached Lae, New Guinea, they were to fly to American-controlled Howland Island. The indications are that they flew over the Truk Island complex in the Japanese-

Dr. Zeligs has started something. His book, embodying material beyond the daring of the wildest novelist, will be followed by others. Alger Hiss must certainly be vindicated. The wreckage of other reputations is inevitable. And Chambers, with that cute dimpled chuckle and the sly, friendly gleam, is laughing in the grave at his "friends," the priceless butts who believed in him.

And so at last some day we can shorten the great Roman stricture to "de mortuis, nil."

held Central Carolines. Truk was the Japanese equivalent of Pearl Harbor, on a smaller scale, but a major naval and air base which was a primary objective of U.S. intelligence at the time.

Goerner's supposition is that Earhart and Noonan lost their way, crash-landed in the Japanese Marshall Islands, and died while in the hands of the Japanese. The Japanese militarists clearly could not tolerate such intrusions. For they had begun the conquest of China and army extremists had assassinated high officials of the Hirohito regime in preparation for war with the United States, which they initiated four years later with the expertly planned and executed attack on Pearl Harbor.

The evidence Goerner has collected supports his hypotheses, but proof is lacking and may never be supplied. Powerful forces continue to exert pressure for secrecy. Next to Lindbergh, Amelia Earhart was the most famous of the U.S. aviation pioneers of the twenties and thirties. She was the incarnation of feminine emancipation without loss of feminine charm. An admission that the U.S. Government had allowed this national heroine to embark on a mission so perilous would, even today, shock millions of Americans—unjustifiably, in my estimation; but in such matters sentiment is stronger than military logic. For their part, the Japanese would rather not have the world know that they secretly executed a woman so admired in all nations, including Japan. The fact that we and the Japanese are now allies tends to make the two governments cooperate in covering up incidents that might reflect discredit on either.

World War I had scarcely begun when Japanese warships seized the Mariana, Caroline and Marshall Islands from Germany. After the war the islands appearing in

THE NATION
SPRING BOOK NUMBER

New Poems by
JAMES MERRILL
RICHARD EBERHART

Coming April 24

were mandated to Japan by the League of Nations with the stipulation that no military or naval bases or fortifications were to be established. The Japanese ignored the prohibition, and in the twenties attempts were made by U.S. agents to find out how far the violations had gone.

In 1935, Japan cut off questions regarding violations of the terms of her mandate by withdrawing from the League of Nations. The assassinations followed in February, 1936. President Franklin D. Roosevelt and his military advisers were justifiably alarmed and the Earhart mission may well have been connected with their apprehensions. An airfield was constructed by Presidential order on Howland Island to enable her to refuel. Besides the reconnaissance aspects, the Army Air Corps had the four-engine B-17 bomber in a late stage of development and was eager to prove the feasibility of trans-Pacific flying by land-based aircraft. Military and commercial interests were intertwined. William Thomas Miller, then superintendent of airways of the Bureau of Air Commerce, and a key figure in the development of Pacific aviation, was associated with Miss Earhart in the preparations for the Pacific crossing. Fred Noonan had been employed by Pan American as a pilot, navigator and instructor.

According to the publicity releases, the Earhart aircraft was a modified ten-passenger, two-engine Lockheed Electra airliner with a fuel capacity of 1,200 gallons and a possible range of 4,500 miles. The engines were said to be Pratt & Whitney 550-horsepower Wasps, which would give the Electra a top speed of 150 mph. Actually, it seems they were a more powerful military type, good for a cruising speed of 200 mph and a top speed of 220 mph, capable of outrunning the average fighter plane. On the first part of the world-girdling trip the point-to-point speed was held down to 150 mph. Flying at 200 mph, the Electra could detour to Truk and make Howland not too far from the scheduled arrival time.

The flight left Lae at 12:30 P.M. on July 1, Howland time and date (July 2 at Lae). On the great-circle track Howland was 2,556 miles distant. The island is 2 miles long and half a mile wide—not an easy target. The Coast Guard cutter Itasca was stationed at Howland to serve as Earhart's homing vessel. Everything depended on radio, and the radio situation can be described in a single word: confusion. To make the situation more difficult, if she was flying via Truk she had to maintain radio silence over much of the route for fear Japanese direction finders would get a fix on her.

The Navy conducted a search operation which covered 262,000 square miles of ocean, and cost (in 1937 value) about $4 million. But it left much to be desired. The battleship Colorado was dispatched from Honolulu, some 1,700 miles distant, and twelve other surface vessels took part. The aircraft carrier Lexington was at Santa Barbara preparing for 4th of July visitors. On the night of July 3, she was ordered to proceed to the Howland area. Her aircraft were not launched until July 13, eleven days after Earhart and Noonan had vanished. The Lex searched for five days and found nothing.

Aside from the matter of engine power, the military use of the mandated islands by the Japanese, and the American interest in that use, plus the fact that President Roosevelt had an airfield built especially for Miss Earhart, Goerner presents little solid evidence that the two were on a spy mission. This conclusion is most strongly substantiated by the evasions and buck passing Goerner encountered in his investigation, and by some odds and ends that were turned up. In the thirties, as now, the Navy made a practice of entertaining influential civilians aboard naval vessels. President M. L. Brittain of the Georgia Institute of Technology was a cruise guest on the Colorado when she was ordered to join in the search for the missing pair.

Brittain, writing in the April 13, 1943, issue of the San Francisco Chronicle, said that there had been much discussion on the ship of the possibility that the "Japs" were illegally fortifying some of the Marshall Islands, and: "We got a very definite feeling that AE had some sort of understanding with officials of the government that the last part of her flight around the world would be over those Japanese Islands." As in the case of many other possible witnesses, Brittain was dead by the time Goerner began his project.

With financial and organizational support by the Columbia Broadcasting System, the Scripps League newspapers and the Associated Press, Goerner made four trips to the Pacific and did a formidable amount of research there and in the U.S. He interviewed many natives on Saipan and obtained quite convincing evidence that a man and woman, resembling Noonan and Earhart, had been brought to the island, where the Japanese had a headquarters, in 1937. Some of the evidence was firsthand, some was hearsay, but cumulative in effect. And some was contradictory or dubious.

Rear Adm. Richard B. Black, who as an employee of the Interior Department had brought a Navy direction finder to the Itasca in 1937, told Goerner in 1964: "I've thought for years that there was a great deal more to Amelia's disappearance than simply missing Howland and going into the drink." Still more apposite is the cooperation of Fleet Adm. Chester W. Nimitz, who gave Goerner unstinting support. At one point Nimitz, as quoted by Goerner, said: "I want to tell you Earhart and her navigator did go down in the Marshalls and were picked up by the Japanese." He referred Goerner to Marine Corps Gen. Harry Schmidt, who commanded the 4th Marine Division at Kwajalein and Saipan and was commander of all ground forces at Tinian Island, from which the B-29 Enola Gay took off for Hiroshima on August 6, 1945. Schmidt, after agreeing to talk if Goerner would visit him at San Diego, said he was sorry, but he could not help. Goerner put Nimitz on the telephone. Schmidt said, "I can't, Chester. I can't help them." At their next meeting, Nimitz told Goerner: "The Marine Corps is covering up for something or someone. Per-

"Brilliantly sustained analysis, scrupulously documented... indispensable to a consideration of color in human society."

—NADINE GORDIMER, The Nation

The world-wide clash of white and non-white

THE RACE WAR

by Ronald Segal

"...a big book whose broad perspective, relentless accumulation of fact, and impassioned narrative will bludgeon all but the most bigoted readers out of their complacency."

—DAVID CAUTE, Book Week

Available at all bookstores $6.50

THE VIKING PRESS
New York, N.Y. 10022

haps the State Department blocked it. The door is being closed on you for some reason."

Official obstruction abounds in Goerner's story. Here is part of a conversation between a C.B.S. vice president and a captain in the office of Adm. Daniel F. Smith, Jr., chief of naval information. The C.B.S. man telephoned to ask what was holding up permission for Goerner to visit Saipan a second time:

Captain: I'm afraid, Mr. Dundes, the permission has been denied.

Dundes: Why?

Captain: I'm sorry. I can't tell you that.

Dundes: Well, does it concern national security?

Captain: It does concern security.

Dundes: Does it concern Amelia Earhart?

Captain: No, I don't believe it does.

Dundes: Has the Navy followed up any of the leads produced by the C.B.S. expedition last year?

Captain: I'm afraid I'm not at liberty to say, Mr. Dundes.

This cat-and-mouse game went on all the time between Goerner and his sponsors and the U.S. Government. In the early part of the Navy's relations with Goerner there was some reason for reticence on the former's part. On Saipan the Navy was fronting for the CIA, which had made a $30 million installation on a restricted area of the island for training Nationalist Chinese spies to operate on the mainland. Formosa was not a suitable training area for this purpose, if only because the Communists had agents there. Saipan could be made secure. The well-trained spy was one who "would speak the language fluently, survive every menace, and accomplish any of a thousand assignments. He might slip through the barbed wire to North Korea, reach mainland China by air drop, infiltrate secretly from Hong Kong or Macao, or sail the tricky currents of the 100-mile-wide Formosa Strait in a junk. His most important mission would be establishment of a communications and espionage network for disseminating propaganda and discontent and relaying intelligence information." Between 6,000 and 7,000 such "guerrilla-spies" were trained at the Saipan school between the Korean War and 1961.

Goerner, just a radio newsman who had got himself immersed in a hot story, but personally a standard patriot, found himself wondering whether our violation of a UN trusteeship by the use of Saipan for training spies was any different from the Japanese violation of their League of Nations trusteeship with military installations. After a brief struggle of conscience, he concluded that since we had been doing our dirty work under three Presidents—Truman, Eisenhower and Kennedy—it must be regarded as necessary for national survival.

On Saipan the CIA faculty and administrators lived with their families in an American-style town, complete with night clubs, bowling alleys, libraries, swimming pools, sports facilities, schools and air-conditioned homes and offices, none of which they shared with the natives. Goerner finally got to see this plush layout, but until the CIA believed in his reliability, he had a rough time.

In the war crimes trials of 1946 and 1947, the United States accepted Japanese contentions that the airfields and bases in the mandated islands had been used for cultural purposes and for aiding fishermen to locate schools of fish. It would appear that even while the United States was prosecuting (and hanging) Japanese militarists, it was acquiescing in Japanese denials of responsibility which were known to be false by both the prosecution and defense. One expects duplicity in the actions of governments, but it is doubtful whether it ever has been carried further than in the forging of the Japanese-American entente against Red China and the Soviet Union.

Strategic duplicity was reflected tactically in the attitude of the State Department, the Navy and the Marine Corps. Except for Nimitz and a few others, Goerner was subjected to a series of acts of obstruction, evasion, concealment of records, broken appointments, surveillance and other devices of the bureaucratic run-around.

Except for a faintly soap-opera quality in some of his reproductions of conversations, Goerner writes well enough for the purposes of the book. His is an honest effort to tell a story which at one time might have aroused popular indignation, but which now suffers from the competition of an overabundance of material in that line. Doubleday has mounted the book handsomely, with excellent photographs of the participants, but a bibliography is lacking, and the index is limited to names of persons.

Interviews with some "ordinary" Vietnamese* who have extraordinarily interesting things to say about their personal relationships, about politics, and about the war.

TEN VIETNAMESE by Susan Sheehan

$4.95 • now at better bookstores
ALFRED A. KNOFF

*Among them a landlord to GI's and their concubines, a politically-active pediatrician, a peasant woman, a Buddhist monk, and soldiers from both sides.

Farming the Tundra

DIVISION STREET: AMERICA. By Studs Terkel. Pantheon Books. 381 pp. $5.95.

RICHARD STERN

Mr. Stern is a novelist who has most recently edited Honey and Wax (University of Chicago Press).

The gentle, rapid, cigar-chewing little radio man Chicagoans call "Studs" has drawn seventy "noncelebrated" fellow citizens into the sort of self-revelation that until very recently could be heard only from the mouths of poets. For most of history, the ordinary man's interior was a tundra of silence. In our century, popular analysis enables every man to see himself as a complex and fluent character. Who knows if this isn't the noblest expression of modern opulence. Or the second noblest, for in the past few years, something else has happened: self-awareness has become self-revelation. Sympathetic men with tape recorders have revealed the extraordinary ordinary man as sage and poet. And the poetry and wisdom of the endless tundra are systematically farmed and then gathered into marvelous collections like Division Street: America.

We come to "know" the people in Terkel's book—or in Danilo Dolci's and Oscar Lewis' books—as we do those in novels, in histories or in our lives, through appropriate and differing conventions of knowledge. The conventions of tape-recorded autobiography include such props to the guided monologues as self-pretense and disguise, as well as the monologist's sense of his own typicality and how far the occasion and the interviewer allow him to depart from it.

In Division Street, none of Terkel's people, no matter how violent or asocial, come within miles of saying what Joyce has the mild Bloom say to himself, let alone what Dostoevski has Peter Verhovenski say to Stavrogin. And naturally, none of these remarkable Chicagoans approaches the enchanted complex of even a good minor character in a good novel. A meal in Laperouse is one thing, a roadside apple is another; both delight.

Is Division Street more than a pile of good human apples? Is it, in other words, a real book? Once again, this is too large-holed a net for the fish. A book like this has little to do with build-up, careful collision, scenes-à-faire, brilliant climaxes, a coherence whose every line reveals a single mind. It is, though, a carefully arranged collection of selected and well-edited materials. The old, the middle-aged, the young, rich, poor, Negro, Mexican, Wasp; the broken and those who break them; city strays, John Birch cabbies, brilliant Negro businessmen; gentle Irish police and gentle victims of brutal police; teachers who save and teachers who ruin—all pour out their witness to the workings of the city, the death of neighborhoods, the threat and promise of machinery, the war, the mayor, God, buying and selling, delivering, conning, dropping out, rescuing.

Without dominating opinion into coherence, Terkel exhibits a great spectrum of distinctions. If no Chaucer, he is at least a good Harry Bailey. Social scientists will be able to organize this book's materials in numerous ways; thus, though a book itself, it is, in addition, a source for more familiar sorts of books.

The book is a treasury, not a ledger, and the treasury is of articulate human energy engaged with concrete experience. No matter where Terkel's people stand on the scale of usefulness, narcissism, triumph, defeat or despair, if they have expressive power, they triumph here.

The book is dedicated to three Chicagoans who made beautiful, useful constructions out of contemporary, local materials: Ring Lardner, Louis Sullivan and Jane Addams. The heroes of this book are those who construct their lives or opinions with power. A miserable, self-serving lout outlasts the effective, self-denying bore. It is the masters of the concrete who survive in what the Indian, Benny Bearskin, calls here the abstraction of the city. Terkel is on the side of those who love outside their own skin, but he is an honorable host and lets his guests have equal say:

Each of the subjects is, I feel, uniquely himself. Whether he is an archetypal American figure, reflecting thought and condition over and beyond himself, is for the reader to judge, calling upon his own experience, observations, and an occasional look in the mirror.

Wrote Augustine about only one archetype: "Do I then measure, O my God, and know not what I measure?" Here are some of Terkel's "subjects," taking their own and the world's measure: Kid Pharoah, 37, who is found in front of the hot dog stand he owns:

A guy goes to school, what does he want to be? A doctor? A lawyer? These are the two biggest thieves in our society. One steals legitimate, the other kills legitimate. . . . Guys like me they want to put in jail. Because I'm dedicated to one principle: taking money away from unqualified dilettantes who earn it through nepotism. I work at this and I'm good at my trade. I don't labor. Outside of being a prize-fighter, I took an oath to God I would never again labor. But there's a million people on the street that want to be taken and should be taken, and they're gonna be taken.

Sister Evelyn, 26, a Glenmary nun who works with Appalachians on the near north side:

We are not married. Is this simply an attempt to avoid the pain and ambiguity of a sustained human relationship? If so, this is a travesty of what it means to be a Christian. A Christian must be involved in sustained human relationships, because this is where Christ is found.

Lucy Jefferson, 52, who isn't going to raise her children "on Aid" because she "just don't like doles":

They call you by the first name, the students, everybody. You see, this was the policy to keep the Negro in his place. But I happened to be the kind of Negro that became controversial, because I read such things as the American Dilemma and I walk around with the book in my hand, see? I defied them in so many ways. I almost terrified 'em. . . . Let's face it. What counts is knowledge. And feeling. You see, there's such a thing as a feeling tone. One is friendly and one is hostile. And if you don't have

Mao Tse-Tung

Direct from PEKING

Handbook of the Red Guards

"QUOTATIONS
FROM
CHAIRMAN
MAO"

$1

The Original Little Red Book

300,000,000 sold in China . . .
"already topped the best seller list in France . . . Tokyo, 150,000 sold out . . . Rome, 40,000, Even in Saigon . . . not in Moscow"

N.Y. Times

PEKING REVIEW

News, analysis & commentary from the Chinese press. Read what the Chinese are saying about events in China.
Airmailed weekly, sub. $4

CHINA PUBLICATIONS
(Dept. N)
95 Fifth Avenue
New York, N.Y. 10003

..... Please send

Quotations

(Please add 15¢ postage ■ handling)

..... Enter subscription to Peking Review

Name

Address

City State

this, baby, you've had it. You're dead.

Phil Eagle, 55, who built up a large business with his wife; then, after eighteen good years, got sick and was told by her to get out and sell newspapers:

When she suggested I be eliminated, it gave me incentive. The medical profession credits my hundred per cent recovery to my will power. I latched onto an idea. The idea is contained in the book, F-O-L-K, Folk Medicine. The book is almost a hundred per cent concerned with apple cider and vinegar and honey and water and eating fish. And using Lugol. L-U-G-O-L. A solution which can be bought for pennies, enough to last for a year. . . . Which everybody should have a drop or two drops a week. Following this book and changing my diet eliminating sugar from my life and pop and orange juice, I recovered my health. That's one of the things that helped break up my home. . . . The only thing between her and all this wealth is my heartbeat.

Charlie Landesfahr, 34, a copy chief:

It takes a great deal of con to sound honest in this world.

An ex-American Nazi in jail for defaming a Negro celebrity:

To me, one of the most beautiful things in the world is an oriental rug or a flower. They're the epitome of whatever they are, the peak. I don't mean something should be perfect. I wouldn't want anything to be perfect. I like that one little flaw. . . . It's the opposite of the order I was lookin' for. It's the human touch.

Again and again, the life heart is shown by such indirection; again and again one's expectations are cracked by human energy. The energy composed itself into brilliant portraits, and the book is a gallery of these portraits of the extraordinary ordinary.

Playing It by Ear

FOUR LIVES IN THE BEBOP BUSINESS. By A. B. Spellman. Pantheon Books. 241 pp. $4.95.

BENNETT KREMEN

Mr. Kremen is a free-lance writer and an associate editor of Holiday magazine. He was both a teacher and social worker in East Harlem.

An author relying on taped interviews to assemble a book can easily use that technique as a dodge: the machine does the work, and the author becomes an editor. But in the hand of jazz critic and poet A. B. Spellman, the recording microphone acted like a literary Geiger counter, picking up what is vital in the lives of the four jazz musicians whose biographies make up Four Lives in the Bebop Business. When Ornette Coleman, Herbie Nichols, Jackie McLean and Cecil Taylor speak of themselves as artists or Negroes, the subjectivity and straightforwardness of their statements indicate that the tapes used by Spellman captured what was most important in their consciousness. But Spellman didn't avoid committing himself to the art of writing as well; large sections of his book are taken up with his own interpretations, explanations and comments.

And most often what is chronicled or analyzed by the author or those who speak in his book are the many adversities an artist must face if he chooses to express himself in jazz. Herbie Nichols and Jackie McLean suffered most from the damaging aspects of the Negro hipster revolt against white hostility or from the whims of artistic recognition. Nichols, a humble, skillful pianist, struggled mainly with the latter; at the age of 44, he died the tragic artist's death—penniless and unrecognized. While he lived, much of Nichols' energy went into a hassle to earn his keep. And all that's left of his musical efforts are notations of discontinued LPs listed in a catalogue.

McLean's story is a mixture of success and horror, frequent ingredients of an art that was born in slums, whorehouses and honky-tonks, yet has imprinted itself stunningly on the musical culture of the world. As an adolescent prodigy in the early, vigorous days of bebop, McLean was respected by the musicians he admired. And when he stood reverentially at Bud Powell's elbow with his saxophone learning the lore of bebop, and when Charlie Parker invited him up to the bandstand at Birdland, McLean was a serious artist and knew it. But the example of his hipster musical heroes and the rebellion bred in McLean by his Harlem life hooked him on drugs and sent him to jail. How he shook the habit, left prison and resumed his career without the aid of the cabaret license taken from him at his arrest reads like a heroic tale with the added sting of reality.

Equally moving is the account of Ornette Coleman's early years in Texas and Los Angeles. The trials Coleman faced in his adolescence and young adulthood are described in a narrative studded with views of Coleman honking on his saxophone in backwater Texas gut buckets where "guys got cut up" or killed. "There I was," Coleman says, "sitting up in this place in my tuxedo, crying my heart out thinking that the music I was playing was causing these people to cut each other up."

Coleman has learned since not to blame his music for the violence and desperation he witnessed so often in the formative years of his career. But this enlightenment came not from the advantages of an education but from an eccentric individualism that isolated him from his background and brought him into the company of the hip, the wise and the rebellious. Without the benefit of a sophisticated understanding of musical innovation and revolt, Coleman bungled onto a radical jazz style like a wanderer groping his way out of a desert.

Contrasting with Coleman's Texas background is the middle-class experience of pianist Cecil Taylor. This musician, whose highly evolved sense of experimentation makes him a major figure in the "new jazz," grew up in comfortable Corona, Long Island, where "there were very few Negroes." Taylor, early in his jazz career, already knew what it meant to be a part of a musical avant-garde; for he'd been trained at the New England Conservatory and had studied the effects of Stravinsky and Schoenberg on the music that followed them. What Taylor had to weave into his own music was Harlem, and the training he'd received preparing him for long-hair concert halls had to be shed. This dichotomy in Taylor's music adds complexity to it, but also, at times, isolated him from his fellow jazz musicians. However, when Taylor complains of the alienation and deprivation he's suffered for daring to be different in his music, a prima donna's lament sometimes can be detected.

These days when we read in the society pages of the activities of such former outcasts from tradition as Salvador Dali, Thelonious Monk, Norman Mailer, Igor Stravinsky or James Baldwin, the myth of the cruelly languishing creative genius subjected to rejection and hostility dissolves into an absurd fairy tale. Odd-ball painters, poets or musicians are no longer ignored because they dare to be different; rather, they're sought out in a frenzy as an antidote for boredom or as saviors from despair.

And neither Cecil Taylor nor Ornette Coleman is a stranger to this "cult of personality" in our current underground, an underground with no place to hide now that the mass media search there hungrily for madmen and adventurers. But despite their well-publicized position as leaders of new departures in jazz, Coleman and Taylor complain in Spellman's book that they are neither rich nor treated as serious artists should be treated.

No one can deny that these musicians, because they are black Americans, suffer both open and subtle abuse on the streets of their own country. But one can question the notion of injustice that makes Ornette Coleman turn down large fees because they're not equal to those received by more popular night-club performers: imagine a pouting Charlie Parker holding out for cash amounts like those received by Guy Lombardo! There was a time when avant-garde artists, white or black, knew that the price they paid for self-assertion was poverty. At least Coleman, who doesn't lack a following for his highly personal music, is in the fortunate position of being able to choose not to accept this indignity.

Taylor also complains of a lack of opportunities for work because commercial manipulators and Mafia-controlled jazz clubs find his music too pure to handle to advantage. But some who know the jazz scene well hear of Taylor's turning down jobs and offers of aid because they don't suit the specifications of "potentially the most important musician in the Western world," as he is described more than once in Spellman's book. Regardless of whether or not this evaluation is ludicrous, it might be worth Taylor's while to consider the hardships suffered by Herbie Nichols, that large but ignored talent, or by such giants as Bartók, Charlie Parker and the deaf, impoverished Beethoven. Even if the gates of glory are swinging open only slowly for Taylor, at least his music is sought after by a devoted audience, while a bevy of admiring jazz critics continually praise it.

Unfortunately, Spellman's uncritical acceptance of Taylor and Coleman's often temperamental and highly subjective viewpoint makes the author sound at times like a pamphleteer for a new but confused jazz: he seems shockingly so when he concurs with Taylor's amazement and naive conjectures on why the esoteric, highly complex music Taylor plays brought the composer a punch in the mouth rather than a standing ovation in a no-nonsense Bedford-Stuyvesant jazz bar. Taylor says of that incident and Spellman agrees: "My experience up in Brooklyn, in a ghetto community, was not the result of the fact that the music wasn't getting to them, but that the night manager was a black man who had an interest in keeping the music from getting to the community because he was committed to a certain camp in the community." Where people with traditional musical tastes gather—a Mott Street tavern, a Las Vegas night club, a Bedford-Stuyvesant jazz bar—someone sincerely singing Schoenberg or playing the piano like Taylor doesn't need the agitation of a bar's manager to elicit violence from the patrons.

When Spellman traces the development of the musicians he writes about without too close an involvement in their viewpoint, he offers an engrossing, impressionistic history of contemporary jazz; it illustrates graphically and in detail the hardships of jazz men whose talents are used in saloons to keep booze pouring. And then Spellman never lets us forget that no matter how brilliantly these musicians perform, they're often reminded that their talents never erase the stigma of their black skin.

ART / Max Kozloff

From the estate of the late Morris Louis comes a largely unexhibited suite of six giant paintings, the Aleph series, 1960 (the first letter of the Hebrew alphabet) that puts all the hesitations or qualifications of the noodling critic quite off the margin of his pleasure. In other words, they are splendid art, if that does not seem a word too modest to describe a showing (Emmerich Gallery) whose coherence is unadulterated, and whose control is an inevitable factor in its spontaneity. Yet these neat phrases pale (they are really the most ex post facto rationalizations) beside confrontation, or memory of the confrontation, with the works themselves.

The canvases can be construed, strange as it seems, as rather languorous explosions of colored shards, excruciatingly blurred at their centers, by chromatic overdrifts. They oppose such forces as cleaved prongs of spilled, heavily stained, saturated acrylic—reaching out as if they were meandering radii of a circle—with superimpositions of internal, indeterminate clouds, hovering, or burrowing back and into some formless, steamy dark cavity, transparently comprised of all the spectrum hues sifting into one another. By these means, Louis transfixes the immanence and timelessness of a momentary phenomenon, dissipates its violence, and eroticizes its fervor. Only his most devoted admirers of the formalist persuasion have continued not to see in such works the impassioned and inflated reference—indeed, enactment—of orgasm. In these paintings, climax is mimed and celebrated almost to the point of immolating the spectator with sensations that are yet more luminous than lubricious. It is not even very speculative to imagine in them some attempt to prolong the most scarlet of ecstasies, and by means of paint, to hold on to the life-giving release whose dissipation seems especially unforgivable.

PINTER'S "THE HOMECOMING"

"A MASTERFUL PLAY. PINTER IS AN ARTIST, ONE OF THE BEST TO HAVE ENTERED THE WORLD'S STAGE IN THE LAST TEN YEARS."

—Harold Clurman, The Nation

THE ROYAL SHAKESPEARE COMPANY IN THE HOMECOMING

PRICES: Mon. thru Sat. Evgs.: Orch. $7.50; Front Mezz. $6.75, 5.75; Rear Mezz. $4.75, 3.75, 3.00. Wed. & Sat. Mats.: Orch. $5.75; Front Mezz. $5.25, 4.75; Rear Mezz. $4.25, 3.25, 2.50. Please enclose stamped, self-addressed envelope with order. List several alternate dates.

MUSIC BOX THEATRE 238 W. 45 St., N.Y. 246-4636

'The habit grew on me...'

So writes a subscriber, explaining why he has been reading The Nation for the past thirty years.

In an age of hyperbole, The Nation makes few claims for itself. It will not make you rich or alluring to the opposite sex.

Some readers buy it because it carries the toughest crossword puzzle now being printed in America. More buy it because the editors have a greedy curiosity about what really happens behind the velvet curtains of public relations and the pious admonitions of government.

The truth is not often given away free—you have to dig for it. The Nation has been digging for 101 years and its readers never seem to tire of watching the editors work.

subscribe to

NATION

America's most habit-forming magazine

FREE with each NEW subscription

The Politics of Escalation in Vietnam

"This book raises vital questions about our policy of escalation in relation to peace proposals."

Senator Vance Hartke, Indiana

"A most important and revealing history, and a clear demonstration of what is wrong with the strategy of escalation."

John Kenneth Galbraith

The NATION
333 6th Avenue
New York, N.Y. 10014

Herewith my order and payment for a NEW subscription to The Nation. Please send my FREE copy of THE POLITICS OF ESCALATION IN VIETNAM.

☐ 1 Year, $10 ☐ 2 Years, $18 ☐ 6 Mos., $6
(Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 per year extra)

name

address

city state zip no.

3-20-67

But it would be unfair to say that such was consciously—or perhaps unconsciously—on his mind. The problem that presents itself to the painter is one of arriving at conventions which will hold in proper suspension the particular kind of pictorial process—in this case, analytic-synthetic—in which he is most interested. In such a context, the spills and their concomitant blurs are not so much dialectical surrogates of a male-female coming together, as an exquisite harmonizing of differentiating and blending energies, of bright probing lights along the edges, and of shadows echoing after them from the center. More than in any other recent art, the center is here the vibrant embryo, germinator of sensation. Yet, there is one anemone-like image that presents itself typically in each picture, the white, unprimed ground being crowded out or backing away from the encroaching, scalloped silhouette, whose animism, finally, is of a buoyant whole. Cobalt, azure, emerald, yellow, orange, vermillion, burningly float in and out of one another, luridly orchestrated and yet voluptuously deteriorating under the ministrations of an almost rheostatically sensitive eye.

Originating historically in Pollock, shape and gesture, though the starting point of the whole operation, are readily sacrificed in this conflagration whose outcome, of double exposures and chance drifts, is essentially multi-layered and tonal. But what is memorable about them is the vortex of surprises by which all kinds of reversals—cools over warms, for instance, or sudden halations or drainages or bleed outs—move the glance in a half-slithering, half-jolting revolution. Blotted or soaked tendrils, veiny striations, powdery deposits of stranded pigment, betray a tactile life of the paint itself, its high-strung adventures in the skin trade. Louis had previously executed infinitely more subtle, delicate paintings in his Floral series; he was, in the brief time until his death in 1962, to create far more iconic ones. But he never distilled such a radiant pictorial elixir, such a commingling of Romantic sirups, as this exhibition now commemorates.

With all the panache and scope of a huge museum retrospective, the Marlborough-Gerson Gallery has mounted a Franz Kline exhibition that for me, at least, unsettles some of my slightly willed respect for that artist, my indifferent admiration. It is not merely that his art has been installed with care and in quantity. Or that the many works previously unshown round out his development more illuminatingly than in the past. Rather, if there had

LOVE

is the unexpected ring of the Cancer Society lady on an endless Sunday afternoon when no one's supposed to be home. You put down your section of the Times and shuffle to the door and open it ■ crack, leaving the chain on:
"You're on my list!" she says, with ■ smile that makes you feel ashamed to feel ■ well.
"I'm sorry, I already gave," you answer, knowing, as you say it, that this is one who won't take no.

GERALD JONAS

been a reluctance to acknowledge Kline's qualities (not his historical position) among my contemporaries, it was surely because he had come increasingly to seem unrelated to current researches into "minimal art," the idiom of the moment. No one seemed more representative than Kline of a certain heroic stance in American painting during the 1950s. Those giant black swipes, relieved against their white grounds, those gawky scaffoldings—this was "action painting" stripped down to its rhetorical essence. But suddenly the word "essence" brings one up short as it would not have done, say, five years ago when we were considerably less sure that contemporary painting could depersonalize itself successfully, or could discover staying power in such things as emblems, repeating modular devices or symmetrical compositions. Without ignoring the characteristics that made him so nakedly, and prominently, a member of his own generation, I can now more clearly view in Kline a concern that links him with ours.

Those of his merits which an older criticism has seen in him have been most eloquently summarized in Robert Goldwater's catalogue essay: "The true scale of these canvases is not in their measurements, large as these are. It is instead generated from within, by an immense internal unit, ■ swath or ■ rectangle, a closed shape or a crossed one, that pushes and extends the perimeter until it has sufficient room to take its proper form, enough space to move and breathe. Thus these works seem to have expanded from within, and grown from the energy of opposed directions, to hold their borders at bay, creating the spaces essential to their expressive existence." But if the spectator were to concentrate more coolly (and thus probably perversely) on these "closed or crossed shapes," they would cohere in a very different way. The intervals of white that are squeezed or contracted by the blacks would emerge as disproportionately small, dispossessed of their decorative function. Rather, they might come to seem wedges (especially those along the perimeters) of forms pushing in arbitrarily from outside the picture frame. Conversely, the black images would more sharply materialize as images that hold hieratically on the ground, deactivated (except for the evidence of their slightly torn edges and slapped paint work) in their role of pictorial armature. Particularly in those paintings where black dominates, there is a heaviness, ■ lack of space that makes the form sit bulkily where it is.

Such a perspective turns aside from the estimation of Kline as ■ nervous discoverer of space relations that had to be reshaped from canvas to canvas (though this was his own view of himself). It discerns in him, instead, some rather obsessive design concerns, and the reiteration of magnified, fragmented "devices." This would also mean reinterpreting more positively the lack of illusionistic ambiguity in Kline that was so opposite to the practice of his mentor, de Kooning. Moreover, the Cubist echoes in Kline's structural operation can be minimized in favor of those compositional imbalances, those great voids, black or white, which we judge to be closer to our own taste. Of course, he was not alone among his colleagues in implying this situation. Motherwell is even now fruitfully exploring comparable impulses. The "trouble" is that when we compare these artists with the young men of today, the former provide almost an embarrassment of riches. Even more, I may find less to my liking the interests of current abstraction that are rendered more grandly (if also unwittingly) in the phraseology of Franz Kline's art. It does not detract too much from its largeness of spirit that the intrusion of color in his later efforts was not, or very probably could not be, managed very well. The sensibility displayed on the Marlborough walls has an unknowing dimension. And overall, it comprises more mystery than our tidy formulations would ordinarily permit.

THEATRE

JULIUS NOVICK

Mr. Novick recently completed ■ survey of the American National Theatre for The Nation, based on a Ford Foundation grant.

More intensely, more angrily than any other major critic, Robert Brustein believes that the Broadway theatre and all its proliferations are utterly contemptible and sterile. For the past ten years, as recorded in his book Seasons of Discontent, he has been slashing away at Broadway, and it is not necessary to agree with him all the time to acknowledge the service he has done for the theatre. He has been intemperate and he has been unfair; had he not been so, he might perhaps have been less useful.

But it must be ■ depressing business for a man who is devoted to the theatre, as Mr. Brustein unquestionably is, to see its American manifestations through Brustein's eyes. It is understandable that lately he should have grown weary of denunciations. Having proved abundantly and repeatedly that the theatre has been betrayed and prostituted by Broadway, he has lately turned to scanning

FOR WRITERS!

Enrich your style through Herbert Spencer's and Edgar Allan Poe's classic principles that have influenced many of the world's great authors. A help for writers eager to get published. Send $1.00 to

PAGEANT PRESS
101 5th Ave. N.Y. 3 Dept. ■

The Best Way To Get

THE NATION

THE NATION 3-20-67
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10011

- ☐ One Year, $10
- ☐ Two Years, $18
- ☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Foreign and Canadian Postage
$1 a year extra)

NAME _____

ADDRESS _____

CITY _____

STATE _____ ZIP NO. _____

the non-Broadway horizons with great eagerness for signs of possible redemption. It is obvious that he regards his new position as dean of the Yale School of Drama as an opportunity to participate actively in the great redemptive work, and to help bring about the "third theatre" he has written about, which will combine reality and joy. Perhaps Brustein is something of a fanatic, but the theatre has always owed a great deal to its fanatics.

For many years the Yale Drama School had stood as a temple of stagnant mediocrity; already Brustein has given it a strenuous shaking up. He is determined to run a theatre as well as a school; next season he plans to organize a repertory company at Yale that will include from eight to twelve professional actors, who will be able to show the students how it's done. (There is already a resident professional theatre struggling for its life in New Haven; Brustein studiously ignored it until last January, when its board invited Yale to move in and take it over. Then he expressed interest, but the board changed its mind.) In the meantime, he has been importing entire productions from other theatres, and bringing in professional actors and directors for shows originating at Yale.

He began his tenure last fall by presenting Beckett's Endgame in a production by the Theatre of the Living Arts, Philadelphia's resident professional company. The leading roles were played by David Hurst and Ron Leibman, who were subsequently hired by the drama school to teach acting and serve as resident actors, and who played Volpone and Mosca, respectively, in the school's recent production of Ben Jonson's Volpone, or The Fox.

Mr. Hurst and Mr. Leibman are talented actors, but they are rather odd choices as resident exemplars for students, and as leading actors in a production of Volpone, since Hurst seems unable to shake his Yiddish accent, and Leibman lisps. Through sheer technical inadequacy they made hash of Jonson's heavily gorgeous verse, and thus forfeited the play's element of grandeur—the implication of something almost heroic in the very baseness it depicts. This is not just a matter of form; when the verse is botched, the play's meaning is diminished. Hurst, moreover, was too light-weight and small-scale for his part, turning Jonson's formidable Fox into a frisky old chipmunk.

Still, the production was by no means without interest. "The world which Jonson satirized and attacked," says the director, Clifford Williams of the Royal Shakespeare Theatre, "is very much our own world; a riot of imagination and creation on the one hand—materialism gone mad and spiritual poverty on the other. Images of this confusion are all around us—the pop scene, haute couture, dolce vita, the jet groups, the trend setters. This is an ambience which we recognize, and it seems the natural one for a modern production of Volpone, if we are to appreciate the relevancy of the play to our own society." And so he put the play into modern dress, more or less.

Volpone at Yale did not look or sound as if "a riot of imagination and creation" was part of the world it dealt with. But the play is, before everything else, a scream of rage against "materialism gone mad and spiritual poverty," and that, from time to time, was reflected forcefully in the production, which brought forth some vivid images of greed, malice and hypocrisy. Leibman, looking like a cross between Paul Newman and Milton Berle, and glistening with slimy innuendo, was degeneracy incarnate. In the scene where Volpone and Mosca worship their gold, Leibman licked a large gold ball affectionately before putting it back into its shrine.

Jonson has provided Volpone with three retainers: "Nano, a Dwarf," "Castrone, an Eunuch," and "Androgyno, an Hermaphrodite"; Williams made the most of them. Nano resembled a spider; Androgyno was a leatherette-clad Warholian nonesuch who belted rock'n'roll into a hand mike (lyrics by Jonson, except for an occasional "ram sham bap shoo wa da"); Castrone was a memorably disgusting drag queen. They threaded in and out of the action as recurrent re-mindings that this society was not only evil but sick.

Perversion, disgustingness, dolce vita, and rock'n'roll are of course very fashionable nowadays, and it might be asked where cogent contemporaneity ends and mere modishness begins. It would be a hard question to answer, since even what is merely fashionable is an expression of the age. Williams' production concept looked to me like a legitimate attempt to grapple with the play, not to evade it by gimmickry. But somehow he failed to carry it far enough, and the performance gradually ran out of steam. Rumor has it that Williams came to New Haven prepared to direct the play in a more or less 17th-century context, met the actors, and only then decided to update it. The production certainly looked as if that had been the case; the settings were "period," and so were some of the costumes. And certainly the updating helped Hurst and Leibman, by providing plenty of scope for their talents (Hurst's for clowning, Leibman's for Actor's Studio-style sardonic menace), and by distracting attention from their deficiencies. I hesitate to think what these actors would have done to a more conventional Volpone.

If the production was not, on the whole, a success, it was at least not afraid of the play's enormity. It did manage, now and again, to express Jonson's colossal rage against human depravity. And it made an encouraging contrast to the sterility of the recent production of Jonson's Alchemist at poor old Lincoln Center. The next major production at Yale, opening May 9, will be the world premiere of Robert Lowell's adaptation of Aeschylus' Prometheus Bound, directed by Jonathan Miller, with Irene Worth in the cast.

Dean Brustein seems determined to make his school a significant forward-moving force in the American theatre. He has the courage and the imagination needed for the job, and he seems to have access to plenty of money. (Prometheus Bound will be partially financed by a National Arts Council grant from the federal government, and Paul Newman has offered $50,000 to get the repertory company going.) Whether he will have the necessary judgment and the necessary luck, only time will tell. But since it is important to the theatre as a whole that Yale should fulfill Brustein's hopes, it is disturbing to see him place such reliance, for the moment at least, on actors whose technical equipment is so glaringly inadequate. That is already a serious enough problem in the kind of theatre Brustein is trying to supersede.

PERSONALS

IMPOSE $30,000,000 Public Fine on U. S. Business to Protest Vietnam War. Write: DOVE, Box 1049, Jamaica, N. Y. 11431.

UNDERGROUND BUTTONS! "Belly, People Power, Vote Buddhist." 25¢ each, 5/81. Free list. SUB, Box 3365g, Midway, Washington 98031.

WHY MEEKLY PAY FOR WAR? Legally demand income tax refund. Write: TAX-PAYERS AGAINST WAR, Box 15394, San Francisco, California 94115.

INCOME TAX RETURNS PREPARED. Washington Heights-Inwood Tax Consulting Service. Specialists in returns for teachers, instructors. 914-735-5113 or SW 5-7315.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, Algonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

Advertising Rates

Classified: 74¢ a line (6 words) a line min.
Classified Display: $7.42 per inch (min.)

THE NATION, 333 Sixth Ave., N.Y. 10014
242-8400

Crossword Puzzle No. 1193

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS:

- 1 A bad loser, but with what all losers think they have? (8)
- 5 Follows to take ornaments? (6)
- 10 Rather malevolent, but still warm-hearted. (7)
- 11 and 19 Natty otherwise, as most of 17 was responsible for. (15)
- 12 Habilitment a goddess made. (5)
- 13 A rooster? Nonsense! (9)
- 14 Right little, this little island, England. (5)
- 16 Looked with confident belief, as mother did before being one. (8)
- 19 See 11 across
- 22 Valentine's twin, or offspring. (5)
- 24 The boat-racing racket? You'll probably lose in it. (5, 4)
- 26 A little slipper? (5)
- 28 An instrument dialed a different way? (7)
- 29 Omar should be brought up to date. (7)
- 30 Put out with the price on it. (6)
- 31 Inflames gums as the base of them, frequently. (8)

DOWN:

- 1 Spruce. (8)
- 2 Has a first night? (5)
- 3 Military weapon like ■ quiver, properly inflated. (9)
- 4 A bad spell that is in short in shape. (7)
- 6 The character of a villain. (5)

- 7 If such vessels strike ■ bar, they might or might not be shattered. (9)
- Refusing to work in the alley entitles one to ■ bonus. (6)
- 9 If so, it shouldn't show below the hemline as ■ mistake. (4-2)
- 15 The meeting could be a painful experience! (9)
- 17 Proving work in the bird house means you have to work together. (9)
- 18 They presumably at least start the competition. (8)
- 20 Debussy's answer to Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition"? (6)
- 21 The kind of pot a less modern poet such as Keats extolled? (7)
- 23 A particular point of view italicized? (6)
- 25 Permission to go? (5)
- 27 Hung up possibly, because your lives are disorganized? (5)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1192

ACROSS: 5 So be it; 10 and 15 Latin America; 11 Place name; 12 Tabling; 13 Exactor; 14 Tossed; 18 Passing; 21 Castle; 24 Canapes; 26 Send-off; 27 A fortiori; 28 and 1 across Extraordinary; 29 Speeds; 30 Noumeon. DOWN: 1 Of late; 2 Date books; 3 Nannies; 4 Repaged; 6 Overage; 7 Epact; ■ and 23 down The break of dawn; 9 Camera; 16 Ill-gotten; 17 Specials; 19 Imputed; 20 Gascon; 21 Cassino; 22 Sunbeam; 25 Noose.

Readers are invited to send for ■ free copy of Mr. Lewis' "ground rules." Address your request to Puzzle Department, The Nation, 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N. Y. 10014.

ART

BERKELEY BONAPARTE is an artists' cooperative and community ■ the middle of the Change.

Orders for POSTERS pay for new art, books, balloons, and in June, The Circus coming through America.

COLOR (14" x 20")—$1.—1. Mine Eyes; 2. Puff of Kief; 3. Matrix 1; 4. Matrix 2; 5. Matrix 3; 6. Matrix 4; 7. Matrix 5; 8. Acid Man; 9. Frodo; 10. Gandalf; 11. In God We Trust; 12. Pow-Wow-Be-In.

PHOTO (23" x 35")—$1.—I. Musten Baba; II. Oscar Wilde; III. Ho Chi Minh; IV. Rodin & Model; V. Allen Ginsberg; VI. Human Be-In. (18" x 23")—75c—VII. Trotsky; VIII. Lenin; IX. Dostoevsky.

Send check/money order, plus 25c handling to: BERKELEY BONAPARTE, P. O. Box 1250, Berkeley, California 94701.

ORIGINALS COST LESS THAN REPRODUCTIONS! Contemporary original signed etchings, lithographs, woodcuts, $3.50. Guarantee. Free brochure. GRAPHIC CIRCLE (NA), ■ Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10011.

KHAJURAHOS' EROTIC SCULPTURES: Thousand Year Old Temple Friezes of Hindu Arts, Carnal Love, Masterpieces Chandra Architecture. Twelve Color Slides $10. TEMPLEVIEW, Box 25101, Cincinnati, Ohio 45225.

ORIGINAL LITHOGRAPHS, ETCHINGS: Chagall, Miro, Braque. Moderately priced. Send 50c for color-illustrated catalogue. Kirschner, 90-59 56th Avenue, Elmhurst, New York 11373.

PUBLICATIONS

WORLD DEMOCRACY. By Bin Dir Woor. Self-Designated Symbolical World President. Unique. Entrancing. $2. Greenwich Book Publisher, 282 7th Avenue, New York City. Bin Dir Woor calls on the World Council of Churches, the Vatican, and the United Nations to urge President Johnson to call a CONGRESS of all elected, and other heads of all Nations, to arbitrate the Vietnam War, and all Future Wars.

"SELECTED POEMS" of George Flynn (Villiers of London $2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound."—James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at 544—82 St., Brooklyn 9, N. Y.

THE IDLER. Lively, offbeat liberal monthly. Fun to read. Send $2 for trial year's subscription. IDLER, 413B 6th Street, N.E., Washington, D.C. 20002.

AMERICAN HAIKU magazine. Subscription—$3.00 yearly. Box 73, Platteville, Wisconsin 53818.

DIRECTORY: Social Change Agencies/Experimental Communities/Psychedelic Churches—$1.00. T.M.U., Tufts U.P.O., Box 44, Medford, Mass. 02153.

$2.95 each

SAVE YOUR COPIES OF

The NATION

• Each file holds a full year's copies.

• Jesse Jones Volume Files for every publication.

• Covered in durable leather like Kivor, title embossed in 16 Kt gold.

Satisfaction guaranteed

Attractive and practical for your home or office

3 for $8.25

ORDER NOW — send check or money order.

MAGAZINE FILE CO.
520 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 36, N. Y.

FREE DESCRIPTIVE FOLDER UPON REQUEST

APPLY NOW FOR THE SUMMER 1967 CEC THREE WEEK EXCHANGE VISIT TO THE USSR

I WANT TO KNOW

HOW CITIZEN EXCHANGE CORPS WILL HELP
AMERICANS FIND OUT THIS SUMMER

WHY THEY BEHAVE LIKE RUSSIANS IN THE U.S.S.R.

Send me free reprints of N.Y. Times articles and editorials telling about CEC, a non-profit, tax-exempt foundation. Tell me how it brings together Americans and Russians of all ages and occupations to meet their counterparts in both the United States and the Soviet Union...and how I can participate in this program, which will lead eventually to exchanges of Americans and Soviets to live and work in each other's country for 6 months to 2 years as a major step toward mutual understanding and survival.

Mail to: CITIZEN EXCHANGE CORPS, 550 FIFTH AVE., DEPT. N3, N. Y., N. Y. 10036
a tax-exempt, non-profit organization

NAME _____

CITY _____

ADDRESS _____

STATE _____ ZIP _____

CON EDISON ANTHONY PRISENDORF

THE

NATION

MARCH 27, 1967 35 cents

BURLINGAME

MAR 27 1967

LIBRARY

COOK COUNTY

Making Book on Mr. Daley

EDWARD S. GILBRETH

The Siege of Cicero

BRUCE J. OUDES

Elections or Coup?

The Deadlock in Greece

STEPHEN ROUSSEAS

The Body of Norman O. Brown

KENNETH BURKE

Reforming the Universities

PETER CLECAK

'Persona' and 'Ulysses' Robert Hatch

BURLINGAME PUB LIBRARY
BURLINGAME
CALIFORNIA 94010

LETTERS

Inference denied

New York City

DEAR SIR: The Nation has drawn inferences [editorial, "The Professor and the CIA," Feb. 27] about my relationship with the USIA as a book publisher and my subsequent responsibilities as publisher of The New Republic, as follows:

"Dr. Kirkpatrick's group also O.K.'d six books which USIA then published with Robert B. Luce, Inc. Luce—better known at the time as the publisher of The New Republic—was also a member of the publishing firm, Grayson, Van Rोजन and Luce, Inc., which three months after its founding became Potomac Books, Inc."

These inferences are unwarranted.

As a book publisher, and long before joining The New Republic, I entered into an agreement with the USIA to publish an experimental series of books which we called The America Today Series. . . . It was intended, at the time of the agreement, that USIA would have editorial review privileges—but that if in the opinion of the publisher or the author, their editorial revisions were onerous, the publisher would then publish the books independent of the USIA. The only people involved in the review procedure were the personnel of the Book Development Division of the USIA. Dr. Kirkpatrick was not to my knowledge involved in this editorial review procedure.

The first six books enjoyed a modest success and the USIA offered us a second contract for an additional six books. At that point we were involved in merger negotiations with a new Washington publishing house, Potomac Books. The merger never occurred but Potomac Books did undertake to publish the second set of books.

At the point when I was serving as publisher of The New Republic, my publishing firm, Robert B. Luce, Inc., had no contract with the USIA. . . .

Robert B. Luce

doctor's shame

Beverly Hills, Calif.

DEAR SIR: The Journal of the American Medical Association stated in a recent editorial: "Perhaps most serious of all was the failure of German medical organizations and societies to express . . . their disapproval of widely known experiments. . . . That these experiments were conducted under the highest authority of the German State cannot possibly be considered in the slightest an extenuation of the failure of these physicians to act in accordance with the principles and traditions of their profession."

From the Nuremberg proceedings came a code of principles adopted by the World Medical Association in 1948. Two of the provisions were: "I will not permit considerations of religion, nationality, race, party politics, or social standing to intervene between my duty and my patient." "I will maintain the utmost respect for human life, from the time of conception; even under threat, I will not use my medical knowledge contrary to the laws of humanity. . . ."

I am ashamed that the discipline of medicine, with which I am affiliated and which is dedicated to the healing of mankind, has not risen in massive protest against the use of napalm, poison gas and herbicides in the most inhumane war we Americans have ever fought.

I am ashamed that medicine as practiced in the country which I love has allied itself to a state of barbarism which horrifies the world and which will live in infamy with such outrages of the past World War as Auschwitz, Malmédy and Hiroshima. . . .

I fear that I and my fellow physicians have defiled our sacred Hippocratic oath.

Albert Schrut, M.D.

EDITORIALS

Another Turn of the Screw

The President, James Reston reports, started the day in Nashville with a Southern-style breakfast of the kind he dotes on: country ham and an omelet filled with grits and served with beaten biscuits. Thus fortified, he proceeded to speak his mind to the Tennessee legislators. It was a tough speech, delivered, as Mr. Reston notes, in the tone of a poker player who has decided to raise the bet. The effect was to give "another, harder turn of the screw." At the same time, the President proceeded to reduce the choice to a narrow one between "honor and dishonor, fighting and quitting, saving and losing Asia." The statement of this crude, simplistic formula, we are told, "added materially to his serenity." But he gave America no cause to be serene.

The speech was designed to provide an updated rationale for the latest escalation of the policy of bombing to the north: the attack on a steel mill some 35 miles north of Hanoi. At various times, the Administration has suggested different reasons for the air raids: initially it was said that the raids would boost the morale of the South Vietnamese; at other times they were justified as inhibiting infiltration from the north. Now we are told that the steadily escalated raids are by way of punishing the North Vietnamese for their aggression.

A day or two before the President spoke in Nashville, Roger Hilsman, who served as director of intelligence in the State Department and Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs under President Kennedy, told Donald Grant of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch that the bombings to the north actually preceded the infiltration of troops. "Only after that [the bombings], did the North Vietnamese begin sending troops into South Vietnam." The President is in the habit of assuring us that he has better information than anyone else (although most of the time he is extremely reluctant to share it with us); therefore we should acquiesce in his judgments. But in this instance, Mr. Hilsman is an excellent witness; he speaks, we may be sure, from full knowledge of all the relevant information—up to the time, at least, that he left Washington. He has written a book, To Move a Nation, to be published by Doubleday next June, which is said to contain the most detailed, factual indictment of the Johnson Administration war policy yet written by anyone with inside knowledge. It should not add materially to the President's happy mood.

The President, it is safe to predict, will turn the screw even harder. No doubt he has a backlog of new target recommendations on his desk. The Joint Chiefs do not need to pressure him to adopt these recommendations; all they need do is wait. Richard Fryklund, the military expert of the Washington Star, has pointed out that the Joint Chiefs simply "wait for events in Vietnam to overtake the objections of the civilians." Now that the President has reduced the options to a crude either-or basis, the logic of his decision will force him to adopt, one after the other, the various escalations which the Joint Chiefs have in mind. Having ruled out the possibility of alternative approaches, having publicly rejected any policy options, he has made himself the captive of his military advisers. They have not pressured him unfairly; he has made himself their prisoner. Hence his serenity.

Dodd and Powell

It is becoming perfectly clear that a considerable proportion of our legislators are venal. That is surely no news, but in their efforts to improve the image of the Congress, without improving their own conduct, they are getting themselves into a political quagmire. Those Congressmen whose own hands are relatively clean, but who go along with the group that plays fast and loose with public funds, are the most foolish of all. To see the implications of this cooperation, one has only to consider the combination of temper tantrum, political expediency, fear and racism which the House manifested in deciding not to seat Adam Clayton Powell. They quailed before those of their constituents, mainly racists, who were howling for Powell's head, and got themselves into a maximum amount of trouble with a minimum of excuse.

Whatever the merits of the censure-and-restitution action recommended by Rep. Emanuel Celler's investigating committee, it was shrewdly calculated to get the House off the hook. Powell would have been punished and, had he continued to serve, he would have been discredited. As it is, the House has excluded him in a way that raises a major constitutional issue. This is the first consequence of a hasty and ill-considered action.

A second consequence is that Powell has been supported in his contention that racism is the only issue in his case. He has been joined in this gross oversimplification by leaders like Stokely Carmichael, who are as selfless and devoted to the Negro cause as Powell is irresponsible and self-seeking. Mr. Carmichael said that the members who voted against Powell were out "to get themselves a nigger." Most members were enraged because Powell broke the unwritten rule that it isn't what you do that counts but what you do openly. They feared to be tarred with the same brush that Powell was applying to himself. This does them little credit but now, viewed from a wider angle, it may have some beneficial effects. It will make it more difficult for the Senate to whitewash Senator Dodd, as most Senators would prefer.

A still broader issue is that of Congressional ethics. Every time this increasingly urgent problem comes up, Congress tries to fluff it off by talking about personal morals, the right to privacy, and similar evasions of the issue. Ethics is not concerned with a Congressman's making a pass at a secretary, or keeping a mistress, or occa-

IN THIS ISSUE

March 27, 1967

EDITORIALS

386

ARTICLES

390 Elections or Coup?

The Deadlock in Greece

Stephen Rousseas

Cook County:

395 Making Book on Mr. Daley

Edward S. Gilbreth

398 The Siege of Cicero

Bruce J. Oudes

401 Con Edison: The Arrogance of Power

Anthony Prisendorf

BOOKS & THE ARTS

405 "More Dithyrambic Than Athletic" Kenneth Burke

406 Night Watch (poem) Adrienne Rich

407 Reforming the Universities Peter Clecak

411 Off-Broadway Robert Pasolli

413 Films Robert Hatch

415 Crossword Puzzle Frank W. Lewis

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Editor
CAREY MCWILLIAMS

Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Copy Editor
MARION HESS

Theatre
HAROLD CLURMAN

Art
MAX KOZLOFF

Music
BENJAMIN BORETZ

Science
CARL DREHER

Advertising Manager
MARY SIMON

Associate Publisher
GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Associate Editor
PHIL KERBY

Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIAS

Poetry Editor
MICHAEL GOLDMAN

Washington
ROBERT G. SHERRILL

Paris
ALEXANDER WERTH

London
RAYMOND WILLIAMS

Bonn
C. AMERY

Canberra
C. P. FITZGERALD

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July and August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1967 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel.: CH 2-8400. West Coast office: 1434 Westwood Boulevard, Los Angeles, Calif. 90024. Tel.: GR 4-3547. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give four weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE
NATION
Combined with FRONTIER

Vol. 204
No. 13

sionally getting loaded. It is bad enough that such indulgences should be carried on at the taxpayers' expense, but it is of secondary importance. What is of primary importance is dereliction in the discharge of official duty. By continuing to ignore its obligation in this area, Congress is implicating itself in the steady deterioration of public respect for the legislative branch.

In this light, Dodd's offense is worse than Powell's. That Dodd was in financial trouble is undeniable, but what relevance does it have? The fact is that between 1961 and 1965 he was able to raise nearly half a million dollars through a series of barefaced solicitations, and he needed the money not only to get himself re-elected but to live like the fat cats whose admiration he courted. His stipulation shows how a large part of the proceeds of his testimonial breakfasts, luncheons, dinners and cocktail parties was spent—such items as $1,263.84 for flowers, $116.70 for purchase of tickets to a football game, $701.90 for Senate restaurant charges in a single month, $2,073.86 for a party at a Washington hotel, and over the period of his solicitations, liquor enough to float a battleship.

The larger contributors to the Dodd exchequer certainly expected favors in return. But aside from questions of conflict of interest, what are we to think of a member of the Senate who makes a profession of large-scale begging to indulge his taste for luxury? If the club tradition of the Senate lets him escape with a light penalty, that body will be disgracing itself, as Dodd is disgraced already. If Powell's conduct merited expulsion, Dodd's conduct merits it doubly. The issue before the Senate is bigger than either of these culprits.

The Rich and the Poor

P. M. S. Blackett is a Nobel Prize winner in physics and president of the Royal Society of London, but what is more impressive about him is the breadth of his interests and his ability to seize on the key factor in the most difficult socio-economic situations. In his address, "The Ever Widening Gap," at the last meeting of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, he was as cogent as usual. The gap is a familiar one, going back to the 1950s, when it became evident that the poor countries of the world were getting less poor very slowly, while the rich countries were getting richer fast. In point of fact, Blackett's address is an up-dated version of a piece he once wrote for The Nation ("The Real Split: Rich World, Poor World," February 13, 1954).

This malign process had been going on for decades but did not excite alarm until the decolonization which began after World War II. Blackett analyzes what has been happening. Without going into the details of a very complex problem, the crux of it is that in the underdeveloped countries population has been rising faster than industrialization, which has been financed in part by the rich countries. The population growth cannot be quickly arrested; it is more a matter of a decrease in mortality than an increase in birth rate. Or, as Blackett puts it, the "population explosion" in the poor, predominantly southern, countries "is the offspring of the northern compassion which exported a revolution in health but did not encourage the much more difficult revolution in wealth."

From an economic, rather than a political, standpoint, the situation is not hopeless. The aid given by the advanced countries has not been going down a rat hole. It has resulted in appreciable improvement: a growth rate of perhaps 1.5 per cent in per capita output of goods and services has been achieved overall in the poor countries. Blackett calculates that if the wealthy countries devoted 1 per cent of their income—about $14 billion annually—to help the underdeveloped, and assuming wise choice and management of projects, an economic growth rate up to 3.5 per cent a year could be achieved. In that case the outlook, while still far from rosy, would not be as ominous as it now appears.

This figure of $14 billion annually as a minimal effective contribution is significant. In the United States, Seymour Melman has estimated $20 billion, or the annual cost of the Vietnamese War at the 1966 level, for the same result. The figures are quite close, when one considers that we are dealing with a world gross national product of slightly more than $1,600 billion. The target level of foreign aid has been too low. It must be raised if disaster, engulfing the rich as well as the poor, is to be averted. An additional 1 per cent subtracted from the income of the rich countries would only reduce their present growth rate—about 3 per cent per year—and would not reduce the average level of income. But the tendency is to spend far greater sums than this on war and preparation for war, and to reduce the already meager level of foreign aid.

At a conference at the California Institute of Technology on "The Next Ninety Years," a number of commentators discussed this same dilemma. One speaker was Harrison Brown, nominally a geochemist but actually the nearest we have to an American equivalent of Blackett; another was James Bonner, a biochemist. "Science and technology," said Brown, "have given men the power to create a beautiful and bountiful civilization, but they can't seem to organize themselves to accomplish it." Bonner is even less optimistic. As the wealth gap widens, he sees less and less identification between the peoples of the wealthy nations and those of the poor nations. Eventually, he thinks, we will regard the underdeveloped as somehow subhuman, and will try to solve the problem by taking over these inferior societies in some neocolonial fashion. His preachment is the same as Blackett's: international resources must be mobilized; we must realize that in the present situation "lie the seeds of progress or unlimited disaster for the whole world."

For the whole world. That the four horsemen of the Apocalypse will ride only among the poor is a foolish dream. The widening gap between rich and poor contains the seeds of a third world war, fought with nuclear weapons and exterminating rich and poor alike. It will be a poor consolation that the rich will have brought their fate on themselves.

Dean Monro's Enormous Reward

One of the most prestigious jobs in the academic world is that of dean of Harvard College. It was news, therefore, when John U. Monro, Harvard '34 and dean for the past six years, announced that he was leaving. What made it more extraordinary was the fact that he was leaving to become director of freshman studies at Miles College, a medium-small (1,000 students; faculty of fifty), unaccredited, largely Negro, school outside Birmingham, Ala.

To those who know Monro, however, the move was not especially surprising. President Pusey remarked that the same characteristics that had led Monro to go to Miles had made him a great dean at Harvard. The only people to whom a man like Monro is incomprehensible are those whose idea of the good life is a steady rise in prestige, power and income, and a big mausoleum when it is all over. Men like Monro live by a different rule. What William Butler Yeats called the fascination of the difficult animates them. That quality, however, is not unique with them; many big businessmen have it too. On top of that characteristic Monro, as The Harvard Crimson points out in a discerning phrase, is a "do-gooder" of a particular kind—not a temporary meddler in causes, but "a permanent do-gooder, a professional."

He will have his work cut out for him in his new post. Miles College resembles the City College of New York in one respect: it has no dormitories and hardly any of the students come from outside the Birmingham area. There the resemblance tapers off. City College, and the other big municipal institutions, are noted for scholarship and attract scholars to their faculties—City has been called the proletarian Harvard. Miles is proletarian too, but in a sense that should make Birmingham ashamed. It runs on a small budget, its facilities are inadequate, and so are many of its students. A freshman class contains some 400 members, but only 110 to 140 graduate.

Despite the fact that Miles is the only four-year Negro college in Jefferson County, the largest in Alabama, and despite the fact that half of the teachers in the county's Negro schools are Miles graduates, the best Negro students in the area go elsewhere. That is one reason why Monro is going to Miles. Of course some Negro boys come to Harvard and do very well, but too often, Monro says, a tough little kid enters on a full scholarship and leaves in the middle of his freshman year. He's unhappy, the college is unhappy. "You ask yourself," Monro says, "'Did you do this for him or for yourself?' You just don't know."

Monro knows why he is taking the job at Miles. He has worked there for three summers and knows the situation. "I want to dissociate myself from any idea that this is a sacrifice," he says. "I see it as a job of enormous reward." In saying that, and meaning it, Monro is already making a major contribution to education in the United States from his new post at Miles.

The GAO Cries for Help

Recently The Nation revealed the otherwise ignored story of the successful attempt of aerospace contractors to muzzle the General Accounting Office ("The Putsch Against McNamara" by H. L. Nieburg, December 26). Early this year, the GAO issued a new report which, though blunted by crippling new guidelines, is still an indictment that cuts to the heart of the enormous negotiated cost-plus contract racket. Inflated, cushioned and fraudulent cost data are a key contracting gap big enough to drive through a whole fleet of Brinks trucks.

The report tests the impact of the 1962 Truth in Negotiation Law and finds it shamefully wanting. This law required contractors to document pricing data and to certify such data as "accurate, complete and current." It was part of the Kennedy-McNamara effort to pin down responsibility and to establish how realistic are cost estimates and determinations. The GAO found that the 1962 law has been evaded, flouted and undermined. Examination of 242 negotiated contracts awarded to eighty-four prime contractors and eighty-nine subcontractors (after October, 1964) revealed violations of the law and of Armed Forces Procurement Regulations in 89 per cent of the cases.

Under the revised rules, the GAO is forbidden to identify companies and individuals. Therefore, this last-ditch effort to indict a corrupt system lacks names (even in its citation of cases in the appendix), thereby shielding private contractors and putting the burden on the Department of Defense. Since 1962, McNamara has conducted a valiant battle to enforce contractor responsibility, only to find the lower DOD echelons are more responsive to Congress and contractors than to the chain of command.

No doubt the GAO report will force Congress (probably the House Armed Services Committee's investigating subcommittee under Porter Hardy) to study the question. The outcome promises obfuscation and window dressing and perhaps chastisement and further weakening of GAO. Frank H. Weitzel, Assistant Comptroller General, will bear the brunt of the punishment. These hearings must be carefully watched by independent legislators and citizens who are unwilling to permit the courage of Weitzel and the GAO to go undefeated. The nation may now require a popular constituency to protect public authority against the appetite and power of the military-industrial complex.

THE DEADLOCK IN GREECE

STEPHEN ROUSSEAS

Mr. Rousseas is a professor of economics at New York University. He has just returned from a five-month stay in Athens.

Greece, for the past year and a half, has been in a state of crisis that divides the political spectrum into two deeply hostile camps: pro-king and anti-king. The crisis began in July, 1965, when the young King Constantine summarily dismissed Prime Minister George Papandreou and proceeded to buy off enough of the deputies in Papandreou's party, the Center Union, to form, with the parliamentary votes of the right-wing parties, the puppet government of Premier Stephanopoulos, which lasted until December, 1966.

The stage had been set as early as 1964, when George Papandreou at the head of the Center Union coalition captured an absolute majority of the parliamentary seats. This victory was not in itself a threat to the palace and its political supporters. Papandreou was well known to be a procrastinator, a moderate, a crafty politician and basically pro-royalist. Above all, he was known to be a rabid anti-Communist. It was he, after all, who had prevented the Communist take-over of Greece in 1944 when the British rushed him back to Athens as Prime Minister. Furthermore, in 1964 he tried hard to please the royal household—he gave the powerful Queen Mother Frederika a very respectable pension and passed a law forbidding any criticism of her in the press or in public statements. Without being asked, he appointed Petros Garoufalias, a beer baron and palace favorite, Minister of Defense; and he made other conservative cabinet appointments.

It is true, he did other things less pleasing to the palace. He broke the control of the rural gendarmerie over the countryside, renegotiated contracts with large foreign monopolies on terms more favorable to Greece, reformed the educational system, and introduced an air of political freedom by severely limiting the political activities of the dossier-keeping security forces, and by proclaiming a general amnesty for political prisoners. But these pluses and minuses in George Papandreou's activities do not add up to the crisis of 1965. If anything, he was playing, or thought he was playing, a clever game of balancing the Right against the Left. The important point is that he allowed the army, long purged of its democratic elements, to remain in the hands of the palace and the extreme Right.

Things started to go wrong for him when the Cyprus situation became acute. Relations between Greece and Turkey, both members of NATO, deteriorated rapidly and began to threaten NATO's southeastern flank. The United States applied pressure on the Papandreou government to resolve its differences with Turkey along lines that would have meant political suicide for the Center Union government. Papandreou and his son, Andreas, were invited to Washington, where all of LBJ's powers of persuasion came to naught. Greece continued to take an independent stand and suspicion grew within the U.S. Embassy and State Department that Andreas Papandreou was a neutralist, that he harbored anti-NATO sentiments and favored opening relations with the Soviet Union and the Communist countries on Greece's northern borders. At the same time the Communist-front United Democratic Left (EDA) and the more liberal elements of the Center Union were pressing Papandreou to investigate the personal corruption of former Premier Caramanlis which, of course, infuriated his party, the right-wing National Radical Union (ERE). Then began the series of errors that led to Papandreou's downfall.

The Center Union government did not object that Bishop Makarios of Cyprus was negotiating with the Soviet Union for weapons. And as part of a planned squeeze on the United States and NATO, the elder Papandreou accepted an invitation to visit Moscow. This was the old political game of blackmail used so successfully in the past by small countries against the United States. But in Greece, where a bloody Communist civil war had been fought from 1945 to 1949, it was seen by substantial elements of the public as tantamount to treason. Panayiotis Canellopoulos, the leader of ERE, called for the resignation, not of the government but of Papandreou himself. He asked, in effect, that the Center Union Party replace him with another prime minister from their ranks—a most unusual interference in the internal affairs of another party. The Prime Minister retaliated by releasing the Pericles Plan (inadvertently left behind by the previous ERE government of Caramanlis) to be used by the army for rigging the elections of 1961. At the same time, he threatened to purge the army. In counter-retaliation, the army revealed the Aspida (Shield) "conspiracy," implicating Andreas Papandreou, then Alternate Minister of Coordination.

Behind this so-called revelation was General Grivas, who had led the guerrillas in Cyprus against the British and who now, as a Greek general, commanded the Cypriot army. Grivas moved counter to Bishop Makarios' policies and a struggle for control of the Cypriot army began between them—as demonstrated by the recent importation of Czechoslovak arms to transform the Cypriot police force into an independent army under the control of the bishop. When Andreas Papandreou took over the Greek handling of the Cyprus issue and supported the bishop against the general, Grivas struck back with his obviously manufactured charges of Aspida—that it was a secret organization of army officers conspiring, under the political leadership of Andreas, to take over the Greek army, throw out the King, and impose a Nasser-type dictatorship.

The King then ordered Garoufalias to investigate the Aspida conspiracy. Papandreou chose this singularly inappropriate moment to carry out a decision he had made some time earlier to dismiss his Minister of Defense who, he had been warned, was to be used by the palace to smear the Center Union government. Unfortunately for Papandreou, Garoufalias refused to resign without a writ from the King which, of course, the King refused to issue.

In this highly unusual situation where a minister refuses to resign and a "constitutional" monarch refuses to accede to the wishes of his Prime Minister, Papandreou threatened to resign. Constantine instantly accepted the threat a fact and appointed Athanasiades-Novas, then a Center Union deputy and president of the parliament, as premier designate. After Novas failed to obtain a parliamentary majority and after much rioting in the streets, the King succeeded finally in setting up the puppet government of Stephanopoulos.

The strange thing about this series of events is that the former premier had been amply warned of his impending downfall. Several months before the July, 1965, crisis, a prominent Greek businessman approached Papandreou and told him of a conversation he had had with a close American friend, a high-level CIA administrator, about a plot between the palace and Defense Minister Garoufalias to overthrow the Center Union government. It is doubtful that this was a plant. It is more likely a testament to the indiscretions that even highly placed CIA men are capable of making.

One month before the crisis, a suspected CIA agent had returned to Athens. Officially, he was connected with the State Department and he had formerly spent three years in Greece, ostensibly as a commercial attaché in the U.S. Embassy. At the time of his second visit he was with the State Department's Middle East desk, which covers Greece and is reported to be rife with CIA agents. His reappearance in Athens was explained as an informal visit to survey the Greek economic situation. It soon became known to the Prime Minister that this man had paid visits to Constantine Mitsotakis and John Tsouderos (two of the major defectors, as it subsequently turned out, from the Center Union government), and had been heard at Athenian cocktail parties making frequent and very audible references to the Prime Minister's son, Andreas, as an unreliable and dangerous leftist.

Several days before the July coup, a representative of the U.S. Embassy, mildly sympathetic to the Center Union government, approached the Prime Minister directly and warned him to leave the Ministry of Defense alone; that it could not be made a part of his ministerial portfolio. In view of these repeated warnings it seems clear that a plot existed prior to the Aspida controversy and to the actual crisis of July, 1965, and that the Prime Minister had nevertheless allowed himself to be trapped.

The details of American interference in Greek politics are not well known in Athens, but everyone believes, as a matter of course, that virtually nothing happens in Greek politics without the approval of the U.S. Embassy. However, the State Department is not that all-powerful. Both the CIA and the Pentagon play far more important and decisive roles. Military aid to Greece, for example, amounts to approximately $100 million a year. The Greek army is completely integrated into the NATO alliance, with the Greek NATO command dominated by U.S. army officers. The U.S. military, in effect, makes the important decisions regarding weaponry and the structural organization of the Greek army, and exercises, through the palace, a pronounced influence on promotions within the officer staff. Furthermore, deployment of the Greek army is geared to NATO requirements and is not designed to cope with local contingencies.

At the time of Cyprus, the Greek Government found itself in a difficult position with regard to its army. The changes it undertook alarmed the NATO command and led the United States to urge a compromise with Turkey for the sake of the alliance. When Greece refused to accede, the Prime Minister's son was designated the key troublemaker, and from this it was not difficult to take the next step and label him anti-NATO and a dangerous leftist, intent on moving Greece out of the Western orbit. However, the real issue was that Greece refused to behave as a satellite should. It sought control over its own foreign policy and generally started to take an independent stand. When the Center Union government said it would welcome Soviet assistance in preparation for a possible war with Turkey, the U.S. Embassy *demand*ed an explanation.

When, on top of all this, the Papandreou government threatened to replace the extreme right-wing officers of the army's high command with its own people, the Center Union skidded rapidly toward the debacle of July, 1965. The Greek army has traditionally been regarded as the private preserve of the palace. Indeed, the late King Paul, father of Constantine, addressed the officer staff of the Greek army one year before his death with proprietary directness: "You belong to me and I belong to you." (The royal household's attitude toward democracy is of equal interest and can be best summed up by Queen Frederika's statement in 1960 to a well-known foreign guest at a private dinner party: she would, she said, be the first to fight for democracy if she thought it had anything to offer the people other than modern bathrooms.)

Cover of a pamphlet distributed in Greece.
It says "No!" — to dictatorship.

The present King inherited the Greek army from his father. But unlike his father, he is possessed of a mystical vision of a new Byzantium and believes fervently in a holy crusade against the Communists. The King, furthermore, regards the whole Left as a gang of dangerous criminals. When the Center Union won 53 per cent of the popular vote in 1964, and the United Democratic Left 12 per cent, the King saw with alarm that 65 per cent of his subjects were politically suspect. Confronted with a direct challenge over the control of his army, he viewed it as a left-wing conspiracy to topple him from the throne.

The United States fully supported this royal view of the army. A U.S. naval attaché took it upon himself to tell a prominent and controversial Center Union minister flatly that too many young Greek officers lacked respect for the King, ending his unsolicited talk with the blunt warning that the army belongs to the King. The present U.S. assistant military attaché (who, like the former U.S. commercial attaché, arrived in Athens one month before the July coup) is often seen in Constantine's company. Some major Greek politicians are convinced that he is the principal CIA agent in Greece and have complained about his activities to embassy officials.

From July, 1965, to the downfall of the Stephanopoulos puppet government last December, the delicate, unstable equilibrium could easily have tipped in the direction of a military coup. The move was not made only because the Right (excluding the puppet government) and a few powerful members of the Center Union were quietly developing a plan for resolving the constitutional crisis which took into account the personal weaknesses of the former Prime Minister, George Papandreou. Before describing this plan and its implementation, the various personalities involved must be introduced.

Andreas Papandreou is the major protagonist in the current struggle for power. In the early 1940s, he had emigrated to America, but he renounced his U.S. citizenship and his professorship at Berkeley to enter Greek politics in the elections of 1964. The crisis of 1965 made his political reputation. He showed remarkable courage and introduced something new to Greek politics—a consistent, well-thought-out and far-reaching program for Greece. Coupling this with, at times, a strident nationalism, and profiting from the hysterical and all too frequent attacks made on him by the right-wing press, he captured the imagination of the young people and many members of the professional and intellectual classes—though the latter still regard him with suspicion as something too good to be believed.

It is common in Greece to compare the younger Papandreou with the late President Kennedy—as a man possessed of style, intellect and a program to get Greece moving again. It would be more accurate, however, to view him as caught in the unfortunate dilemma of being Robert Kennedy and Hubert Humphrey rolled into one. Andreas, like the Senator, has clearly set his eyes on his country's top political office. Like Robert Kennedy, too, he has risen very fast and has captured the imagination of the people. More important for the comparison, the former Attorney General was able to quit Johnson's Cabinet and, as Senator from New York, dissociate himself from the President's policies and failures. On the other hand, Andreas resembles Humphrey in that it is difficult for him to criticize the leader of his party, who in this case is also his father. Yet Andreas has been able to generate sympathy for his dilemma and to give the very distinct impression throughout Greece that he is far more progressive than his father.

Andreas' radicalism, however, is nothing more than a mixture of the New Deal, the New Frontier and the Great Society. In the States he was an active supporter of Adlai Stevenson and Humphrey (when Andreas was a professor of economics at the University of Minnesota). But in semi-feudal Greece, such attitudes are extreme.

The Right, moreover, is not alone in its opposition to Andreas. The extreme Left regards him as a temporary expedient, and within the Center Union Party itself there are a few influential people who look upon him as the major stumbling block to power. And this is where Christos Lambrakis comes in.

Lambrakis is a wealthy man in his middle 30s, a brilliant businessman, ambitious to pull the strings of power. He inherited from his father a publishing empire which includes the two leading newspapers of Greece (Ta Nea and To Vima), as well as a string of other publications.

Early in the constitutional crisis of 1965, Lambrakis became convinced that the King could not be forced to back down and that therefore a plan had to be devised for resolving the conflict on terms acceptable to the palace. The great fear of the palace was that if it allowed elections, the Center Union would get an even greater majority than it did in 1964, thus turning the elections into a plebiscite against the crown. One way out of this impasse was to assure the King that, though the Center Union Party would continue to be the major political force, it would receive no more than a plurality of the popular vote in any future election. The big problem, of course, was to guarantee this outcome in free elections. And this, in turn, is where Papandreou père comes in.

In a country with a government-controlled radio and without television, the elder Papandreou was necessarily dependent on the press. The Lambrakis papers gave the former premier a big play while, at the same time, enforcing a virtual blackout on his son. In addition to this powerful squeeze on the elder Papandreou, there was his known anti-communism. The elder Papandreou had stated in unequivocal terms his unwillingness to join forces with the left-wing EDA for purposes of forming a coalition government. But pressure was put on him to take a still more strident anti-Communist line—i.e., to support more repressive police measures against the Left—as one way of reassuring the Right and the business community of his good intentions.

The overall strategy of Lambrakis and his collaborators was to push the former premier into alienating the marginal but important liberal voters in Greece who, in protest and from lack of choice, had in the past voted for the left-wing EDA. In the 1964 elections many of these had switched to the Center Union. With the former premier alienating this all-important protest vote, the Center Union could be expected to fall to a plurality. And given the elder Papandreou's pledge not to join with the Left, the Center Union would be forced into a coalition government with ERE. Andreas Papandreou would be pushed into the arms of the extreme Left, and the King spared the embarrassment of having the elections interpreted as a plebiscite against his crown.

The Lambrakis plan came to fruition on December 20, 1966. Panayiotis Canellopoulos, leader of ERE, announced his withdrawal of support from the government of Premier Stephanopoulos. Stephanopoulos had no alternative but to resign, and the King appointed the governor of the National Bank of Greece, John Paraskevopoulos, as head of a caretaker government, with elections scheduled for May of 1967. George Papandreou announced support of the new government without waiting to consult his own party. This led, not unreasonably, to speculation that a deal had been made between Canellopoulos and the elder Papandreou—Canellopoulos out of fear that the extreme right wing of his party was planning to oust him and recall Caramanlis from Paris, and Papandreou out of his impatience to become prime minister once again. But apparently Papandreou was in much the weaker bargaining position. Under the constitution, elections were not scheduled to be held until March or April of 1968, by which time the elder Papandreou, whose health was already failing, would be 82.

To speed matters, therefore, George Papandreou was forced to concede on certain major points. First, he was to agree to Paraskevopoulos as head of the caretaker government. Second, parliament was not to be dissolved and elections were to be postponed for five to six months. Third, Papandreou was to give the King a free hand in appointing the ministers of the new government. Fourth, the elder Papandreou was to resolve his differences with the King, abstain from any attacks against him in the campaign, and refuse to collaborate with the Left on any terms. Fifth, the Center Union would not call for new elections in the event of its failure to obtain an absolute majority and would form a coalition government, with Canellopoulos of ERE as Vice Premier. These were stiff demands and the elder Papandreou, in his haste to become prime minister, accepted them without calling a caucus of his own party.

The terms and conditions of the elder Papandreou's capitulation became quickly known. In its bitterness, the puppet government released a transcript of meetings between Canellopoulos, Mrs. Eleni Vlachos, publisher of the two leading conservative newspapers in Athens, and a Mr. Bitsios, head of the King's political bureau. The text of their discussions was published in the January 1, 1967 issue of Eleftheria, the newspaper of the deposed government. Although Eleftheria claimed it had gotten hold of Canellopoulos' stenographic notes, it was suspected that Constantine Mitsotakis, Minister of Coordination under the puppet government and part owner of Eleftheria, had KYP (the Greek central intelligence agency) secretly tape the meetings. In any event, the text of the Eleftheria exposé contained many references to Christos Lambrakis, acting as official spokesman for George Papandreou, and to Norbert Anschuetz, Chargé d'Affaires of the U.S. Embassy.

Although libel suits have been filed, the text of the meetings as reported in Eleftheria is generally accepted as substantially accurate. And privileged information I have been able to acquire, independently of the Eleftheria revelations, support in large measure the account given of the terms and conditions imposed on George Papandreou. For the record, it should be noted that Andreas Papandreou was secretly advised of Mitsotakis' plans to publish his exposé. Through an intermediary, since father and son at that point were not on speaking terms, George Papandreou was warned that Eleftheria was in possession of the tapes and that the Center Union would be torn to shreds if the information were made public. The former Prime Minister was urged to change his policy line and repudiate the Paraskevopoulos government before it was too late. But George Papandreou was too deeply committed and the warning was ignored. His attitude was that the decision to back the caretaker government had been made by him as president of the Center Union and he demanded a personal endorsement by each member of the party.

King Constantine

A large bloc of Center Union deputies, led by Andreas Papandreou, refused to go along and announced that they would vote against the Paraskevopoulos government. The elder Papandreou immediately issued a Diktat: any deputy who either abstained or voted against the caretaker government would be summarily expelled from the Center Union Party.

An internal struggle for power was quick to develop within the Center Union. To test his strength and force the issue of leadership, the former Prime Minister called a caucus of the Center Union Party. Approximately forty, or a third, of the 122 Center Union deputies refused to attend, including Andreas. The younger Papandreou, prior to the caucus, was approached by still other Center Union deputies willing to vote against George Papandreou. In short, Andreas found himself in a position to oust his father from the party leadership. But such a defeat would have brought the elder Papandreou's forty-year career as an active politician to an ignominious end—and at the hands of his own son.

For this reason, Andreas refused the additional support. Even so, the elder Papandreou could not afford to excommunicate 30 to 40 per cent of his party. George Papandreou's attempt to impose his will after the fact had failed. Margaret Papandreou, the wife of Andreas, was then called to Castri, the home of her father-in-law. Several meetings were held and in the end Andreas and his followers agreed to go along with George Papandreou, provided one all-important condition were met: Andreas Papandreou was to have a large measure of control in designating the party's parliamentary candidates. The elder Papandreou had already pledged that the 122 deputies who had not defected during the 1965 crisis would automatically stand for elections under the Center Union banner, but under the terms of the agreement, Andreas would be able to fill many of the remaining 178 slots with his own people. In this way, the influence of Christos Lambrakis and George Mavros, a conservative and powerful member of the Center Union, would be minimized and their move to seize control of the party effectively countered.

Andreas' major objection to his father's policy, about which he had not been consulted, was the decision to accept a caretaker government for five months without the dissolution of parliament. Within this period, as had so often happened in the past, the Right would have been afforded ample time to rig the coming elections and resort to terror and political intimidation in the countryside. The ministers of the caretaker government had been recruited exclusively from the extreme Right and supporters of ERE. The terrorist activities of the rural gendarmerie had already been resumed and the para-military organization, known as the National Security Battalions (TEA) (each local battalion headed by an army officer), had covered the countryside with huge signs wishing long life to the King and warning the people of the dangers of Red fascism. Army rifles and equipment had been issued to the civilian members of TEA, who were already marching through Peloponnesian villages as an act of political intimidation. Andreas' position was that the King and his extremist followers should not be given the time to organize a new terror—that the King should have dissolved parliament and declared elections in forty-five days as required by the constitution. The feeling was that in his haste to become prime minister again, George Papandreou had sold out. And that is where matters now stand.

It might be useful to conclude this saga with an account of what went on behind the scenes just prior to the downfall of the puppet government and the role of the United States in bringing it about. The United States had one overriding goal—to make Greece and Turkey resolve the Cyprus problem and thus end the threat to NATO. The Americans felt that this could be accomplished only by bringing Papandreou and Canellopoulos together, since the puppet government in eighteen months had displayed neither the determination nor the necessary political support to do so.

The Lambrakis plan fitted in well with U.S. objectives since it envisaged a coalition government consisting of the moderates of the Center Union and the ERE parties. The more extreme members of ERE had also been taken by surprise when Canellopoulos, with the secret support of George Papandreou, moved quickly to topple the puppet government. The King was probably pressured by the United States to go along with the plan, since a union of the moderates in the two political parties was not in his interest.

The major concern of everyone involved in the plan was how Andreas Papandreou would react. It was decided to try to induce him to go along or, failing this, to get assurances from George Papandreou that he would expel his son from the party if he refused, thus neutralizing him as a political force. Subsequent events indicate that the elder Papandreou agreed to this strategy.

The first step was to solicit Andreas' support. The puppet government fell, by prearrangement, on Tuesday evening, December 20. Three days earlier, American sources discreetly sounded Andreas on the possibility of a transitional government, with elections to be postponed for at least six months. When he rejected this out of hand, it was suggested that he meet privately with the King on the ground that the King's mind was being poisoned against him, and that it would be a good idea for the two of them to talk confidentially. Andreas declined for the obvious reason that the meeting could easily be turned into a trap: even assuming the King's good intentions, the people around him could leak news of the meeting, thus making it seem that Andreas had accepted a deal with the palace. His counterproposal was for the King to invite all political leaders to an open meeting. Andreas was next asked to compromise by sending a personal representative to meet with the head of the King's political bureau, Bitsios, who at that time was already deeply involved in his discussions with Canellopoulos, Mrs. Vlachos and George Papandreou's personal representative, Christos Lambrakis. Andreas put them off by saying that he would have to think about it.

Two hours after the Stephanopoulos government fell on the following Tuesday, a Greek industrialist phoned Andreas' office on Souidias Street and asked to speak to him. Andreas signaled to his aide that he was not in. The industrialist asked the aide to make every effort to locate Andreas and said that he would call back in half an hour. Two more calls were made and on both occasions the industrialist was told that Andreas Papandreou could not be located. Finally the aide was asked to get a message to him as quickly as possible: he, the industrialist, had been authorized by the Paraskevopoulos caretaker government to ask Andreas if he would want to name two or three ministers—provided, of course, that he agreed to support the new government when it came up for a vote of confidence in parliament. It later became known that Andreas' political aide had been thoroughly investigated, well before the actual downfall of the puppet government, and his dossier placed before the King who then indicated his willingness to appoint him as a minister in the new government if this was the price to be paid for Andreas' support.

When both these attempts to implicate the younger Papandreou failed, it fell upon the father to discipline his son by threatening to expel him and his followers from the Center Union Party. And when it then became clear that his power within the party was greater than anyone had anticipated, Andreas was able to impose a compromise on his own terms—control over the party slate.

For the moment at least, Lambrakis and Canellopoulos have been stalemated and Andreas has emerged, in effect, as the de facto leader of the Center Union—thus putting things back to where they were initially, with the Center Union Party once more promising to capture an absolute majority of the parliamentary seats. One new factor, however, must be very disturbing for the palace: the de facto leadership of the Center Union has changed and yet the King is firmly committed to elections by next May at the very latest. The plan, in short, backfired by underestimating Andreas' strength.

What role the army will play in this new situation is anybody's guess; whether or not a coup will be attempted depends on too many variables. One major element will be the relative success of the extreme Right and the army either in rigging the elections or using a sufficient amount of terror in the rural areas to reduce the Center Union to a plurality, thus giving another opportunity to the palace to engineer new defections for an ERE government under Canellopoulos. If, on the other hand, Andreas should lead his party to a landslide, it is likely that the army will move. This analysis does not preclude the possibility that a coup d'état—deceptively timed to take place when the King is out of the country—may be staged before the May elections.

What all this amounts to is that by emerging as a positive political force in Greece, Andreas Papandreou has also become a destabilizing element in Greek politics. He now represents the "new" politics in Greece and has become the focus around which can be formed a strong party with a long overdue program for reform and change. And he has succeeded in achieving this in the incredibly short span of two years.

The "old" politics of Greece never threatened the traditional distribution of power. It lacked depth or commitment; it had become a surface game of musical chairs, of vying charismatic leaders filled more with pomp than with achievements. This has all been changed by a United States-educated Greek politician of very recent vintage.

Given the current stalemate and the disproportionate division of popular and military power, the United States has a critical role to play. The King is not likely to disregard any strongly represented views of the U.S. Government and it is in the long-run self-interest of the United States to support the "new" politics in Greece. But recalling Washington's role in the Dominican Republic, and its apparent acquiescence in the military coups of Brazil and Argentina, one should not entertain too much hope on this score.

COOK COUNTY

MAKING BOOK ON MR. DALEY

EDWARD S. GILBRETH

Mr. Gilbreth is a staff writer for the Chicago Daily News, specializing in state and local government.

Chicago

Richard J. Daley, the Democratic Mayor of Chicago, seeks to renew his lease on City Hall in municipal election next April 4, and almost nowhere do you hear it said that there is a serious challenge to his tenancy. What you do hear are expressions of resignation, a not-too-alarmed acceptance of the inevitable. "Well, let's face it—nobody could beat Daley."

This prevailing opinion is startlingly recent. Only a few months ago, the likelihood of Daley's early departure was being discussed with relish, in neighborhood taverns no less frequently than at cocktail parties in the new apartment high-rises that hug the lake shore.

That climate of anticipation had been produced by flighty interpretations of the November 8th election results. Similarly, the current prediction that Daley will be a shoo-in results from surface analysis of the city's February 28th aldermanic elections. That two elections, within four months of each other, could create such contrasting forecasts testifies to the gullibility of the public. It is easier to accept what you are told happened in yesterday's election than it is to make even a halfhearted attempt to reach your own conclusion.

In Chicago, perhaps more than in other big cities, the most recent election results become everybody's favorite barometer, and discourage prudent examination of issues and personalities unique to the current contest. However, the November and February elections do have a bearing on Chicago's mayoral campaign.

There is no doubt that Republicans, led by Senatorial candidate Charles H. Percy, scored spectacular gains in Illinois last November. Percy trounced the veteran liberal Sen. Paul H. Douglas by more than 420,000 votes and helped his party establish overwhelming control of both houses of the state legislature. In Cook County (where Chicago accounts for about two-thirds of the vote), GOP candidates won eight of the twelve county offices at stake and took five of the seven contested circuit court judgeships.

There is no way of softening the Democrats' humiliation in what turned out to be the Republicans' best state and county performance in twenty years. Yet for all that, twin myths emerged from that election, and public acceptance of these myths clouded the remarkable fact that, within the city of Chicago, returns did not deviate, by area or ethnic group, from the city's long-established voting behavior. The first myth had it that a white backlash vote within Chicago contributed to the Republican victories. The second myth attributed loss of Democratic strength among Negroes to the fact that many civil rights leaders had become disenchanted with City Hall. The two assertions tend to contradict each other, but this conflict is blandly resolved by reference to "the pincer movement," an ingenious piece of quick-think that lends dignity of "theory" to the whole process.

The groundwork for this analysis had been laid in pre-election punditry. The reasoning went as follows: Chicago last summer experienced civil uprisings so violent that they threatened to shred the fabric of community life; Negroes marched into all-white neighborhoods to advertise grievances against real estate practices; the city's small but growing Puerto Rican community erupted with street rioting; Martin Luther King led a spirited campaign demanding an end to discrimination against minorities in jobs and housing; Daley found himself besieged on one side by civil rights leaders who demanded more freedom of opportunity, on the other side by spokesmen for white home owners who accused him of "surrendering" to minorities. Thus: Boy, Daley and the Democrats will have an impossible time surviving this pincer movement in the election!

Pre-election polls seemed to confirm that Democratic candidates were indeed caught between property owners in all-white communities and a growing bloc of independents within Negro areas. However, when Chicagoans went to the polls on November 8, they handed Republicans precisely their traditional share of the city's vote—slightly under 45 per cent. The results showed no discernible shift from the norm among either whites or Negroes. The Democrats did slip badly in the Chicago suburbs and downstate, thus accounting for the magnitude of the Republican victory.

The city's February 28th aldermanic election, a technically "nonpartisan" affair, was held simultaneously with the Democratic and Republican mayoral primaries. However, Mayor Daley was unopposed for renomination in his primary, and the Republican-endorsed candidate, John L. Waner, a millionaire heating and air-conditioning executive, had no significant competition (two nuisance candidates, perennial also-rans, were on the ballot against him). Thus, in the absence of mayoral drama, more than usual interest focused on the race for City Council seats in each of the city's fifty wards. A peculiarity of state law prevents Chicago aldermanic candidates from being listed on the ballot under party labels, but the two political parties are not prohibited from endorsing candidates. How each party fares in electing aldermen every four years becomes a gauge of its organizational strength as it girds for the mayoral contest several weeks later.

In the council races, Republicans increased their ranks from four to seven, and the Democrats won thirty-seven. The result in six wards, where no candidate received a plurality in multiple contests, will be decided by run-off elections on April 4. After that date, the Democratic council ranks will probably number more than forty.

Surprisingly, though, public interest drained from the aldermanic campaign once the results were in, and riveted itself on the showings made by the mayoral candidates in their previously ignored primary campaigns. Mayor Daley had been renominated with a total of 422,000 votes. Mr. Waner won his party's formal nomination with only 73,000. This ratio of nearly 6 to 1 captivated the press and broadcasters no less than the public. "Daley Is Still the Champ!" "Daley Wins Big!" And in barroom conversations: "Boy, Daley and the Democrats sure bounced back from their licking in November, didn't they?"

If there is any significance in the recent aldermanic election, it is to be found by comparing it with the council races in the February that preceded Daley's 1963 vote (16 percentage points below the 71 per cent he had scored four years earlier). Here, again, the Democratic organization demonstrated that its hold on Chicago has neither faltered nor increased. In 1963, Democratic-endorsed candidates for aldermen received 446,388 votes, or 64 per cent. In the recent contest, Democrats came within 2,000 votes of that total (it is difficult to give a precise figure because in two wards both parties endorsed the same candidate), and their proportion was at least 63 per cent.

(It is worth remembering that whereas, in the 1963 mayoral primaries, Daley outpolled his Republican opponent by about 4 to 1, six weeks later, in a head-on contest with the same opponent, he won by only 6 to 5.)

Now midway through his campaign to topple Daley, Republican Waner finds himself buffeted by contradictory waves of opinion: First, by the overreaction to (and misinterpretation of) the GOP victories last November; second, by similar overreaction to (and possible misinterpretation of) the mayoral primaries. The effect on the first was to infuse GOP troops with fresh confidence that this year, for the first time since 1931, Chicago's City Hall was within their grasp. The effect of the second was to encourage the city's Republican-oriented business community to go along once more with Daley.

Even before the primary, the city's financial community, the State Street merchants and the executives of the LaSalle Street banks had lined up behind Daley, as they had done in the Mayor's two previous re-election campaigns. This liaison between a Democratic mayor and the conservative business establishment (unwaveringly Republican in state and national politics) was not a case of love at first sight. Twelve years ago, when he first ran for mayor, Daley campaigned against the city's downtown concentration of wealth which, he charged, had been gobbling up a disproportionate share of the city's resources to the detriment of outlying neighborhoods. But in the campaign now under way, it is the Republican candidate who flings the same charge, picturing Daley as the creature of the rich who drains sustenance from the "disenfranchised poor and the tax-burdened middle class."

Felix Palm, Christian Science Monitor

Mayor Richard J. Daley

It is difficult to reach conclusions in this debate. Daley does command the loyalty (and the respect) of what in the 1930s would have been denigrated as "the ruling class." Chicago's neighborhoods have eroded (with the exception of three successful experiments in urban renewal). And Daley has grown into the leadership of a monolithic political organization—the "last of the big city machines"—that wields power with arrogant abandon because of the impotence of the opposition. But Waner now, like other Republicans before him, cannot show beyond argument that Daley's loyalty to big business has hurt Chicago, or that the continued erosion of middle-class communities and the expansion of the Negro ghetto are the direct causes of this union.

After all, Daley's supporters maintain, Daley changed the topography of the city. Under his leadership, some sixty high-rises were erected in a city that had not had a change of skyline in twenty years. A labyrinth of modern expressways now winds through neighborhoods previously at the edge of decay (and therefore expendable). As for the flight of the white middle class to the suburbs and the growth of the ghetto, these are phenomena common to all big cities. Can Daley be held responsible for a national trend?

Waner, at 52 a self-made business success, is the son of Polish immigrants and rose from his own kind of ghetto. He recently popped up with a new issue, designed to give him some leverage on the elections. In a television appearance, Waner suddenly blurted out that if elected, "I will replace Police Superintendent Wilson."

Fire Orlando W. Wilson? Rid Chicago of its national symbol of reform police administration? "Wilson was handed a $100 million budget, and he has not done the job," Waner says. "The job" means curbing Chicago's growing crime rate, creating law-enforcement programs "to make our neighborhoods safe at night."

Daley let a blue-ribbon panel pick Wilson as police superintendent several years ago, when a police scandal threatened to tarnish the Mayor's image as a politician of personal integrity. Since his arrival in Chicago from the academic world in California, former law Professor Wilson has attained sacred cow status. He enjoys kid-glove treatment from the press and politicians. Waner's suggestion that he be replaced created a ripple of sensation—about the only one so far in a low-voltage campaign.

What was especially disturbing in Waner's ploy was the implication that by crying alarm at violence in the streets he courts support among white voters who attribute all such crime to the Negro. This implication gives an unfair idea of Waner, a white-thatched, jowly man whose affability is matched by previous examples of compassion for the plight of minorities. As Chicago's federal housing administrator under President Eisenhower in 1960, Waner frequently tongue-lashed the real estate interests for discriminatory housing practices. "If you don't stop this on your own," Waner warned four years before enactment of the first major civil rights bills in Congress, "the federal government will be forced to intervene."

While he has not endorsed the principle of open occupancy, Waner has shunned advice to conduct a racist campaign. The candidate was recently advised to woo Negroes by promising them jobs—"you know, simple jobs." "The Negroes know they can get menial jobs," Waner sternly replied. "Wouldn't it be better to get trade unions to open up their memberships so that Negroes have a chance at skilled jobs?"

In a campaign pitch perhaps too elevated for voters accustomed to meat-and-potatoes oratory, Waner urges designating all of Chicago as an urban-renewal area. The idea, he adds, is not to launch any massive land clearance but to make more Chicagoans eligible for mortgage guarantees under the Federal Housing Administration. One reason for the city's loss of middle-class urban housing, he says, is a dearth of available mortgage money.

Waner plots his campaign in a second-floor Loop headquarters across the street from Daley's City Hall. And while he scurries to any ward meeting or street-corner gathering he can find, Daley—King Richard to his enemies—quietly projects the image of a mayor dedicated first to running the city, second, to running for re-election.

The Mayor, whose fourth term would occupy most of his late 60s, bustles with the same energy he displayed when, at 53, he began his ascendancy. He still mangles the language ("I resent the insinuates"), but time has turned this characteristic into an endearing foible. Spectators who once jeered at the speech of this stocky, blue-eyed Irishman from Chicago's Back-o'-the-Yards district now listen to him in happy anticipation, but with little condescension. They smile at his tidbits (which some cynics say are deliberate) and at his eternal extollings of "the wunnerful people of this wunnerful city."

Efforts to depict Daley as a cultural clod are unjust. Through personal appearance as first-nighters and through public support, the Mayor and his wife are among the city's biggest boosters of the arts. If Chicago's prestigious Lyric Opera revives its canceled 1967 season, the resumption will be won primarily by Daley's skill as an arbiter between the opera company and the musicians' union. In recent months Daley proved his ability at this sort of peace making by averting the threatened strike of Chicago public schoolteachers. He was active in behind-the-scenes negotiations that last year ended a strike by public case workers, and which this year headed off a strike by public nurses at the Cook County Hospital, the largest general hospital in the world.

These day-by-day activities have a cumulative effect that far outweighs harangues about Chicago's rising tax rate, dialogues about the methodology of the local anti-poverty war, or debates about the advisability of changing mayors for the health of a two-party system.

THE SIEGE OF CICERO

BRUCE J. OUDES

Mr. Oudes, a native of Cicero, is working today as a journalist in West Africa for several American publications.

Everybody knows about Cicero. It's the town next to Chicago where the whites don't want to integrate. Is that so amazing? Plenty of towns in the North don't exactly encourage Negroes to move in next door. So what's so different about Cicero?

This question—this Cicero thing—has disturbed me for many years, ever since 1951, when some of my classmates in the freshman class at Morton High School helped to toss the furniture of a Negro bus driver out of his apartment window. Now, however, I get the feeling that I'm not alone in my preoccupation with the town. Cicero is on the lips of many people. Martin Luther King, if he doesn't yet know it, lost a major battle there last summer—a battle he chose not to fight. He called it the "Selma of the North." The name flowed easily from A. Philip Randolph's tongue when he testified before a Senate committee last fall. Just a few weeks ago Lewis Alcindor, the basketball player, said: "The South is in Montgomery, Alabama. But the South is also in Cicero, Illinois. . . ." Cicero is big news now. It has gained the reputation it overtly shunned, but subconsciously sought, for the past two decades. Cicero and race are even more synonymous these days than Cicero and Al Capone. It is quite probably the largest municipal body (70,000) in the United States that will not

Not one in twenty parents of Chicago school children is aware of the legal separation of the Chicago city government and its Board of Education. Virtually all, however, know that Daley got the credit for keeping schools open when the teachers were about to walk out.

It is fatuous at this point to maintain that any issue exists that would ride Waner into Daley's office. It is equally premature to tag Daley as an overwhelming cinch in April. The November and February results support the broad generalization that the Mayor can expect to get his fourth term with a total of from 650,000 to 700,000 votes, say, 54 to 56 per cent.

The public, now conditioned to expect a bigger victory for Daley, will again react, and Waner will become the undeserved beneficiary of the notion that he is "the man who almost beat Daley." This misdirected applause can, in turn, promote Waner into a candidacy on his party's county or state ticket in 1968.

Meanwhile, the chances are remote that anyone but O. W. Wilson will be in charge of the Police Department after April 4. And Daley, his blue eyes atwinkle, ensconced for another four years in his comfortable fifth-floor office at City Hall, will again be about the business of running the city, almost smug in his belief that what happened was, after all, inevitable.

acknowledge having a single Negro resident. Most places have made their peace with tokenism; Cicero stands proud on principle.

If Cicero is to stay at the top of the news next summer, Dr. King will have to accept the challenge he side-stepped last year. He must know that the good burghers of Cicero think him "chicken." He got into this predicament by treating Cicero as a side issue, a pawn, in his Chicago operation last year. According to one of his aides, the strategy was this: They knew and Daley knew that the Democrats would suffer from vote loss to white backlash in proportion to the amount of pressure Dr. King applied. In order to get the real estate agreement, King decided to use the threat of a march into Cicero which, in one sense, is like my threatening to sock your neighbor if you don't do what I want. Cicero is dependent on Chicago principally for water and some public transportation facilities—plus about 15,000 Negro workers who, apartheid-like, are allowed to work in Cicero but may not sleep there. Cicero even belongs to a suburban association of real estate dealers which has nothing to do directly with the Chicago association that was King's target. King's advisers knew, however, that the march threat was effective because a demonstration in Cicero, the most volatile white bastion in Cook County, would drain votes from the Democrats. Daley gave in, and King's forces got their agreement.

But King's maneuver also reinforced Cicero's belief in its invincibility. CORE's rump march on Labor Day weekend helped slightly to redress the balance, but Robert Lucas of CORE lacks the magnetism of Martin Luther King. Chicago newspapers called the march "self-serving" and "irresponsible and pointless." Not until four months later did anyone call it "dignified and impressive"—the tag used by one of the networks in its year-end review of 1966. Four months earlier this network had said, in a notable example of unbiased journalism, that Cicero had a reputation for hating Negroes, "deserved or not." The people of Cicero would be the first to say that the reputation was deserved.

As for the march being pointless, it was that without a doubt if the goal was to open Cicero real estate to Negroes. But if it was to serve world-wide notice of that community's festering social sores, it was a huge success. It just may have called enough attention to the situation so that Dr. King cannot ignore it this coming summer. If he acts, there is little doubt that his movement risks adding more martyrs to its rolls in Cicero than it has added in the course of any one operation over the past decade. For Cicero is without doubt sick to the point of criminal insanity with racial hatred and fear.

The peculiar web of Cicero's social structure makes the community a fascinating — and somewhat unusual—study in racism. It is a community too proud and ignorant to ask for the help it needs; a community predictable right down to its epitaph.

Cicero practices a very effective form of thought control. Anyone who proposes that the bars to Negro residency be lifted in Cicero—or Berwyn, its "twin" to the west—faces certain ostracism from the political life of the community. The handful of progressive teachers at Morton High express their views guardedly: they depend on the Board of Education to renew their contracts. The Cicero Life, one of a chain of suburban newspapers, speaks in editorial double talk, partly from conviction, partly from fear of losing advertising. The bulk of the Catholic clergy silently oppose the racial ecumenicism of the hierarchy.

Last summer, a small group of progressive Catholic and Protestant clergy proposed that Cicero make a modest start toward racial peace by forming a community human relations committee. The proposal—made after a Negro youth was murdered by four whites with baseball bats—was quashed by town officials. They issued this statement: "We have no human relations problems at this point and when and if the problem does arise we will step into the breach and do what we must."

The Cicero Life commented that the local clergy was "urged" into its statement by "outsiders" who were West Side Chicago churchmen. The paper offered this remarkable exercise in rhetoric and logic: "The membership of any such commission . . . would have to be in sympathy with the announced purposes of the clerical appeal or it would be subject to the recriminations of those seeking its formation. . . . The clergy could hardly be regarded as unbiased since it already has announced prejudices. . . . This is patently partisanship. Could a commission drawn from the signers of such an appeal be relied upon to educate our community fairly and honestly, weighing equally both sides of the question of race relations?"

Fear of "outsiders" has been a long-standing obsession in Cicero. It doesn't take much to become an "outsider." Even a native son who leaves the community for college becomes an "outsider" as soon as he has been exposed to "foreign" ideas. There is a strong parallel with Southern practice of considering a native white Southerner an "outsider" if he has gone North to be educated.

Cicero is in fact assimilating outsiders at a rapid rate, but the influx merely hardens the community's racist rigidity. Immigrants now come in two streams. One is from Chicago itself, where home owners are panic selling ahead of the advancing Negro ghetto. They move to Cicero in the belief that this is "safe" territory and that they won't have to sell at a loss again. The other stream consists of recent arrivals in the Chicago area from southern Illinois and Kentucky. In the popular idiom, they are "hillbillies," and their ideas on Negroes are well known. They come to Cicero for its congenial moral climate and cheap rents—$85 average for an unfurnished four-and-a-half-room apartment.

The newcomers are not readily accepted into the community which has been dominated from its founding by clannish groups, principally of Slavic extraction.

Since the total population in Cicero remains relatively constant, who is leaving? Industrious families who have grown a little prosperous are moving to the more fashionable suburbs west and north. They often retain their former homes in Cicero for income, and thus become absentee landlords—a phenomenon that used to be rare in Cicero. The other outward flow is a "brain drain" of younger people who go out to college and never return. The only young ones who stay are those who don't do too well and for whom the future is limited to punching a time clock at a local factory.

The situation then is rapidly becoming critical as the quality of the community continues to decline. Business is falling off, a victim of new shopping centers being built not far away. A specter remains, however, and it too paralyzes any progress. It is the ghost of Al Capone. "Don't buck the mob" is the community's most common alibi for inertia. One intelligent Cicero resident who doesn't want to risk having his body found in some forest preserve by speaking out publicly, told me recently: "Look, even if some people started thinking tokenism might be a solution, do you think the syndicate would let anything like that happen? They'd be afraid that businessmen might stop coming out from the Loop for girlie shows and gambling out of fear of being rolled if Cicero wasn't an all-white town."

A small item in the Cicero Life last summer summed it up: "The Star Lounge, ABG Corp., 2336 Cicero Ave., was one of three new locations which obtained federal gaming stamps for the new fiscal year . . . bringing the total for the county to 110. . . . Cicero leads the county easily with forty-six locations having gaming stamps used for the possession of pinball machines, slot machines and similar contrivances."

The Star Lounge is owned by the family of one of the town's leading officials, and the situation is essentially unchanged from thirty years ago. County police make a token raid or two at the start of each administration; Cicero cops never participate. During one raid a couple of years ago, they ticketed the county police for illegal parking.

Out of fear, the burghers of Cicero have closed their minds to the shadowy and sinister-sounding syndicate. They tend their neat, rectangular red brick bungalows and two-flats, set side by side on neat, rectangular lots. The proper compliment to pay them is to call them thrifty and hard working, adjectives they proudly repeat to one another daily. They have pulled themselves to prosperity through their unofficial motto: "God helps those who help themselves." They are America's Afrikaners. The difference is that in South Africa blacks do the physical labor; in Cicero each housewife is her own domestic. It is not unusual to see a 75-year-old grandmother scrubbing or picking weeds on hands and knees. The money saved is put into the savings and loan. To call someone in Cicero a "real Bohemian" is to attribute to him the characteristics attributed elsewhere to the Scots. A youngster must leave the community to learn that Bohemian can be spelled with a small "b" and have another meaning.

With all the prosperity and stability, one might think that Cicero would have achieved some kind of security and civic-mindedness, but it hasn't. The natives want minimal community services, and little more. I asked a long-time parish priest, a respected figure in the community, what it would take to get up public enthusiasm for a particular project. "It would take committees and meetings and organization," he said. Then, he mused, "you know these people aren't very civic-minded."

Recently, however, they have been united in one determined effort: opposition to any and all open-housing legislation, which they call "forced housing." They vote Republican because they are in the "suburbs" and people in the suburbs are supposed to be Republican. There was no white-backlash vote in Cicero last fall. The community was already so rigidly racist that there was nothing to lash back from.

The people of Cicero are even suspicious of neighboring Berwyn, though the two are almost indistinguishable. One of the reasons given for the construction of an expensive athletic plant at the Morton High branch in Cicero, when there is already one at the branch in Berwyn, is that "Cicero people don't feel at home over there." This was said to me by a school district official who holds a doctorate in education and is himself a Berwyn resident. The Human Relations Club at Morton (5,300 students) recently had but five members. The school district official could offer no insights. "Problem? What problem? We've got no problem here. Nothing's come to pass yet," he said.

Nothing and at the same time everything has come to pass. Two-thirds of the community is nominally Catholic, 10 per cent is Protestant. Five of the town's nine churches were founded in the twenties as ethnic parishes. In large part, they remain that way. One is Lithuanian to the point that Mass is said in that language, three others are more than 90 per cent Polish, and another is more than two-thirds Bohemian. They are refuges for older people who want to maintain their ties to the old country. Protestants are suspect in the general community, particularly since their ministers tend to rotate every few years and so remain forever "outsiders."

In this closed and suspicious climate, the only kind of hate that is recognized is outside hate such as in the Nazi party and the K.K.K. Community leaders know that these groups could easily do quite well recruiting in Cicero. This is evidenced by the fact that several dozen T-shirted Cicero youths, who were wearing their hair long before anyone ever heard of the Beatles, proudly waved Nazi posters during the CORE march. The Cicero Life has equated Dr. King's movement with such manifestations. "The march is . . . dictated by leaders of a hate group whose only purpose now can be to incite violence. . . . Equally vicious and unprincipled hate groups like the American Nazi Party and the Ku Klux Klan have been seeking to inflame as many as possible." The paper added that Cicero has "an undeserved reputation for racial bigotry."

However, the community cannot much longer delude itself into believing that it is not bigoted and that only the K.K.K. and the Nazis are problems. Cicero rentals are too attractive to the Negroes who in the past decade have expanded the ghetto rapidly westward until they are now at the community's door, across the railroad viaduct. There are few industrial communities in the North where Negroes comprise a third of the work force and can patronize restaurants and bars, if somewhat hesitantly, where they cannot live. Negro employment in Cicero has doubled in the past five years. The dam simply can't hold much longer. The people of Cicero aren't even thinking of such things now in the winter following the march. They see integration as a bad dream that will go away. But it won't.

However it happens, most thoughtful observers agree that when Cicero "goes"—that is to say when a half dozen Negro families move into the community and are not run out within the first few weeks of their arrival—the entire community will “go.” It will flee west, accepting the real estate loss. Except for aged and infirm whites, Cicero will rapidly become a Negro ghetto. Controlled integration stands no chance in a community that can’t even accept a human relations committee. The CORE marchers in Cicero last September set the stage not just for “blockbusting” but for “town-busting”—the transformation of an entire community.

Meanwhile, Cicero waits, proud and terribly afraid of a world it doesn’t know. The best description of this pride and defiance came from a Chicago businessman I know whose parents remain in Cicero, but who himself now lives farther west. “Look, man,” he said, “what did the march prove? It proved that Cicero maintained its reputation. The hoods did just enough to justify the Guard being there. Everybody agrees there would have been real bloodshed if the Guard weren’t around. Cicero keeps its reputation for hating Negroes. That’s what they want. They like that like they like the reputation for gangsters, Capone, bang-bang and all that. The only two times Negroes have made noises about living in Cicero—fifteen years apart—and both times the Guard comes and Negroes don’t stay. And this time—for the first time in the history of the state—the Guard was called out before trouble happens. To them, that’s somethin’.” He himself, knowing that he could get a better price for the family home from a middle-class Negro family than through a white Cicero real estate agent, will be sorely tempted to do so when the time comes. He’s a money-minded man.

There is something fascinating about Cicero all right, something gruesomely fascinating. It’s a death watch.

Con Edison: The Arrogance of Power

ANTHONY PRISENDORF

Mr. Prisen Dorf is a reporter on The New York Post.

The Consolidated Edison Company of New York is the country’s largest privately owned utility, with virtually exclusive domain over the nation’s most populous area. In attaining this prominence, and thanks to flaccid state regulatory practices, Con Edison has won a name for itself as a defiant oligarchy, relentlessly pursuing an inflexible, public-be-damned policy.

Those who have had even the slightest brush with the company have come away with a new understanding of the word “power” in Con Edison’s slogan, “Power for Progress.” The company’s attitude was perhaps best summed up last year by a Washington utility consultant, David Kosh. “I’ve been in the utilities business for thirty-four years,” Kosh told Fortune magazine, “and I can’t think of a company that goes out of its way to alienate customers the way Con Edison does. They’re so stiff-backed. I have yet to hear a Con Edison executive say: ‘Maybe you have a point.’ By definition, they always think they are right.”

Since 1882, when Thomas A. Edison opened his first electric generating plant in lower Manhattan, the company has grown phenomenally. Today it has nearly $4 billion in assets, a gross annual revenue of $869 million, twelve generating plants—one of which is the first privately owned nuclear plant in the country—and supplies electricity, gas or steam to more than 4 million customers in New York City and most of neighboring Westchester County.

Such an impregnable position of leadership might make a corporation lax, but it has not happened to Con Edison. On the contrary, throughout its recent history, the company’s officials have reinforced its position by cultivating unshakable friendships with political power structures. By law, utilities are prohibited from taking an active part in politics, but there is nothing to prevent friendships from “evolving.” Charles E. Eble, the company’s 66-year-old chairman and chief executive, makes no attempt to conceal the fact. “Over the years I struck up friendships with many politicians,” Eble was quoted as saying last spring. “It was not something that I set out to do objectively at the beginning. But, as time passed, I found that many of my friends had moved into positions of authority. I could talk to them. It was as simple as that.”

Over the years, Con Edison has “talked” to its friends with excellent results. In the state legislature, for instance, the utility’s broad scope of influence is tantamount to a veto power over legislation that would run counter to its vested interests. Samuel A. Spiegel, a former state assemblyman and now a state supreme court judge, has said that in all his years on the assembly’s public service committee: “I’ve never seen a piece of legislation come out inimical to the company’s interests.”

Rep. William F. Ryan, a Reform Democrat from Manhattan, goes much further. On November 25, 1966, the day Con Edison imposed its most recent electric rate increase, totaling $32.4 million, Representative Ryan charged that Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller, a Republican, and the all-Republican state Public Service Commission, had “conspired” with Con Edison to postpone the rate increase until after the elections. The charge was shrugged off as political cant, but a member of the Governor’s staff later confided: “We had a devil of a time persuading them [Con Edison officials] to hold off until after the election.” Since the rate increase went into effect, Representative Ryan has written twice to the Federal Power Commission, requesting a full-scale investigation of the “working relationship” between Con Edison and the Public Service Commission. The FPC has declined, Representative Ryan says, on the ground that its jurisdiction over privately owned utilities is limited to regulating the interstate sale of power.

Preserving Con Edison’s distinction as the nation’s number one public utility has been an expensive proposition for its customers, but not for its quarter of a million stockholders. While the national trend has been toward cheaper electricity for residential consumers, within the last nine years Con Edison has raised its electric rates by a total of $100 million, ostensibly to meet higher operating costs (rates are fixed on a cost-plus basis, the cost supposedly being operating expenses). As a result, Con Edison customers pay the highest residential rates in the country; 250 kilowatt-hours a month cost $9.41 in New York, $7.83 in Chicago, and $6.33 in Los Angeles. The company justifies its rates with the allegation that it costs more to generate and transmit power in heavily congested areas. And from time to time its public relations staff broadcasts the fact that Con Edison is New York City's largest real estate taxpayer. What the company neglects to say is that these taxes, like all others, are added to its operating expenses, and paid ultimately by the consumer.

Nor does the company encourage the public to recall that on February 23, 1961, the state Public Service Commission forced it to merge with its wholly owned subsidiary, the Consolidated Telegraph and Electrical Co. For years, Con Edison critics claimed, the company paid exorbitant rents to its subsidiary for the use of 8,500 miles of underground conduits. These rents increased Con Edison's operating costs, decreasing its earnings. By showing reduced earnings, the company could defend its applications for rate increases. The Owners' Committee for Electrical Rates, representing major real estate groups in the city, claimed that between 1923 and 1961 Con Edison and its stockholders made a $95 million profit through this arrangement. The subsidiary would declare annual dividends which it paid directly to Con Edison. These dividends were not applied to the parent company's operations, but distributed entirely to Con Edison stockholders. Neither the company nor the Public Service Commission considered these earnings part of operating revenue.

More recently, Con Edison has reluctantly disclosed that new customers' deposits for electric and gas service can be a source of considerable profit. A residential customer usually pays a $20 deposit before his electricity or gas is turned on. By last June the company had accumulated $29.4 million in deposits, for which it pays the consumer 4 per cent interest. However, as The New York Times pointed out on January 20, "Large amounts of money—such as the $29 million in deposits held by Con Edison—can earn roughly 5.5 percent annually when invested in certificates of deposits in major New York banks."

The little known fact that Con Edison had amassed $29 million in deposits was brought out at a PSC hearing, now under way, to determine, in retrospect, whether the company was entitled to raise its electric rates by $32.4 million last November. The procedure of defending a rate increase after it has been imposed prompted state Sen. Paul P. E. Bookson, a Manhattan Democrat, to observe that the hearings are "something out of an Alice in Wonderland trial. First comes the sentence for the consumers, and then the verdict." Although the PSC is not expected to conclude its hearings for some time, there seems to be little doubt that the verdict will hold. The increase was granted without the customary prior public hearings, the commission said in November, because a preliminary investigation indicated that the increase was warranted. Con Edison itself set the tone of the hearings at the outset by saying that far from overcharging its customers, it had asked for a rate increase that would probably be insufficient to meet higher operating expenses.

There was one notable instance, however, when Con Edison pushed its luck too far; it is still feeling the results. On July 29, 1964, the PSC approved the company's request for a $27 million rate increase, bringing to $68 million the total of rate increases since 1958. During the hearings that preceded this decision, the city's lawyers had asked to use Con Edison's books in their cross-examination of the company's "experts." The company refused, and so did the PSC. The city appealed to the courts, and on April 28, 1966—twenty months and $45 million in higher rates later—the state court of appeals upheld the city's right to look at Con Edison's books.

Accordingly, the city retained Arnold H. Hirsch, a Washington public utility consultant whom it had called on periodically during the twelve years former Mayor Wagner was in office, to make the study. Because a full-scale examination of Con Edison's books would have been prohibitively costly and time consuming, the city settled for a $20,000 "sampling examination" of the books during the 1962 calendar year and a twelve-month period ending June 30, 1963, the two test periods cited by Con Edison in its request for the 1964 rate increase. Hirsch began a six-week study on June 20, 1966, and submitted his report to the city on September 3 of that year.

In a 33-page analysis Hirsch, who is also an engineer and a lawyer, asserted that the frequency with which the company's expenses were improperly charged to ratepayers, and the "peculiar operating accounts to which they are charged," are symptomatic of Con Edison's "seemingly callous indifference toward its fundamental duty and responsibility as a public utility. The cost-plus character of its business appears to have been tortured into a license to charge whatever the traffic will bear." A full-scale examination of Con Edison's books and records, he said, "will disclose improper charges to the operating expenses of the electric ratepayers in the amount of $12 million to $15 million on an annual basis."

Specifically, Hirsch reported that Con Edison had paid two New York law firms a total of $1,840,100 during the two test periods for "an almost unbroken chain of legal services for which the expenses were improperly charged to the utility consumers." Furthermore, Hirsch said, during the same test periods the company had paid an Albany law firm $30,000 for services "admittedly legislative in character [which] should have been excluded from Con Edison's operating expense accounts for rate-making purposes."

Examining the company's expenses for institutional advertising during the test periods, Hirsch found that Con Edison spent a total of $2,925,036. Such expenses, he said, are "manifestly improvident, and constitute an unjust and unwarranted imposition on the ratepayers." Using for comparison the next two largest electric utilities in the country—California's Pacific Gas and Electric Co. and the Chicago Commonwealth Edison Co.—Hirsch calculated that Con Edison's expenses for advertising were about twenty-five times greater on the basis of electric consumers, and forty times greater on the basis of kilowatt-hours sold. He concluded that there is "not a scintilla of evidence" to show that Con Edison's "unbridled" advertising expenses "have fostered 'sound customer relations,' or have lessened the company's 'expense of doing business.'" On the contrary, he wrote, the company's advertising "is primarily a 'Pavlovian' technique designed to condition the ratepayers to a passive attitude in regard to the company's proclivity for periodic rate increases."

In addition, Hirsch found several "miscellaneous items" which were improperly charged to the consumers. Individually, these items are of inconsequential value, Hirsch said, but in the aggregate, "appreciable." Some of those expenses include $454,977 in contributions to the "Electric Power & Light Exhibit" at the 1964-65 New York World's Fair; a $573,471.15 installation cost of air conditioning in the company's executive offices; membership in private social clubs and organizations; and regular trips to Albany for "express legislative purposes" by Con Edison executives.

There was one significant fact about Con Edison's participation in the World's Fair that Hirsch missed in his report, but that has been brought out at the current PSC hearings. During his testimony Emanuel Toder, the company's vice president and controller, contradicted an earlier press statement issued by the company's president, John V. Cleary, and admitted that the company's loss of $907,500 in World's Fair bonds was passed along to the consumers. Toder defended the accounting procedures by saying that Con Edison's total investment of $1.5 million in the fair was an operating expense, intended to promote business, and that the publicity had actually lessened the need for future rate increases.

Although until now the contents of the Hirsch report have not been made public, portions have been "leaked" to the newspapers. While the company has declined to respond directly to charges in a report it has never seen, it has not refrained from attempting to discredit Hirsch's professional reputation. On January 18, Con Edison's counsel, Patrick H. Sullivan, reminded the PSC that in 1955 Hirsch was arguing before it that the New York Telephone Company's rate of return should be restricted to 4.5 per cent. Sullivan then cited portions from the transcript of that PSC hearing in which the commission stated: "How the witness [Hirsch] fell into these serious errors is not clear. It is sufficient to say that these and other matters which might be commented on tend to destroy any probative value that the witness' testimony might have. This Commission faced difficult problems and welcomes all the assistance that any . . . interested party can give it in reaching a determination. This testimony, however, is no help."

The "leak" that caused the greatest commotion at Con Edison's offices was a published statement that the Hirsch report alleges that by "improper" accounting procedures the company has overcharged its customers by $35 million since 1964. Con Edison chairman Eble promptly rejoined that his company maintains its accounts in accordance with the Uniform System of Accounts as prescribed by the PSC. Moreover, he said, Con Edison furnishes detailed reports to the Securities and Exchange Commission, the Federal Power Commission and the Internal Revenue Service. "To suggest that improper accounting procedures could result in a $35 million overcharge to Con Edison customers under this kind of scrutiny is an indictment of these organizations. . . ."

Con Edison's critics may feel that Eble could not have expressed their misgivings about the PSC more eloquently. Those who set out to chasten the company for its high-handed business tactics usually wind up condemning the politically dominated PSC for its haphazard attempts to protect the public's interests. State Senator Bookson was speaking for all such critics when he said recently: "We have a public utility which is regulated by the PSC which does no service for the public. I seriously question whether they are acting in the public interest."

If Con Edison has profited at the undue expense of its customers, it is principally by strict adherence to the first commandment of free enterprise, caveat emptor. But under the delusion that there exists in New York State a regulatory agency with the public's interest at heart, the public long ago dropped its guard. The late Arthur T. Vanderbilt, chief justice of the New Jersey supreme court, warned of this state of affairs when he said: "Nothing is so dangerous in a democracy as a safeguard which appears to be adequate but which is really a façade." This is the underlying theme of Hirsch's report, one that he emphasizes by scornful use of the word "watchdog" whenever he refers to the PSC's accountants who were supposed to catch the accounting irregularities that he came upon. Hirsch cites two major items on which the PSC accountants should have acted, but didn't. In opposing the 1964 rate increase, the city argued that the experimental production of electricity at the company's nuclear generating plant "imposed an abnormally high incremental cost" on the company of about $5.3 million in 1962 and nearly $15 million during the twelve-month period ending June 30, 1963. The PSC ruled that the costs of the Westchester County nuclear plant, "both capital and operational," were to be "excluded entirely" in the application for the rate increase. Hirsch found that during these two periods Con Edison's "atomic energy expense" account totaled $3,037,886, of which only $718,039, of "amortization of research and development costs," was excluded from the application. In view of this "omission," Hirsch said, "it is somewhat difficult to understand the functions of the commission's 'watchdog' accountants stationed regularly in the offices of Con Edison. . . ."

In the second instance, Hirsch found that the PSC "watchdogs" failed to report that General Electric had agreed to pay $5.8 million to settle a Con Edison anti-trust suit. In January, 1962, Con Edison filed suits amounting to nearly $21 million against General Electric and eighteen other manufacturers for rigging bids and fixing prices on $219 million worth of electrical equipment the utility had purchased since 1948. Con Edison announced the settlement on December 18, 1963, twelve days after the PSC had ended its hearings on the 1964 rate increase. It was then that the commission "first learned" of the settlement, Hirsch reports, although the company's records show that "this anti-trust settlement was concluded with the General Electric Company in November, 1963. . . ." Again, singling out the "watchdog" accountants, Hirsch asserts that they "should have known of this settlement, and could well have presented it in evidence before the close of the hearings on December 6, 1963." Such evidence, he maintains, "would undoubtedly have benefited the ratepayers, as they were the principal victims of the conspiracy which precipitated the anti-trust suits."

The "watchdogs" consist of twenty accountants employed by the PSC and assigned permanently to Con Edison's offices to oversee the company's bookkeeping operations. Their primary responsibility is to make certain that the company earns no more than a "fair and reasonable" rate of return, set at 6.3 per cent in 1964 by the PSC, a rate influenced by usury laws. But under an ingenious clause in the state Public Service Law, the utility under surveillance must reimburse the state for the accounting costs. In effect, then, Con Edison has been paying the salaries of the men who are assigned to keep an objective, even jaundiced, eye on the company's books. And after years of working side by side with Con Edison employees, Hirsch said in an interview, the intended "watch-dog" relationship has developed to one that he characterizes as "meretricious."

The forerunner of the country's highest paid state Public Service Commission was created in 1907 by the legislature at the instigation of Gov. Charles Evans Hughes, who wanted to correct railroad abuses. Since then, the powers of the commission have been expanded gradually so that today the agency regulates more than 3,000 corporations, municipalities and individuals dealing with utilities or commercial transportation. But despite this awesome measure of responsibility, the commission has been customarily the "dumping ground for cast-off politicians," as Representative Ryan puts it. Under Governor Rockefeller, for example, the commission's four surviving members—two have died recently—have been active in Republican politics. The chairman, James A. Lundy, was a borough president of Queens who ran unsuccessfully on Governor Rockefeller's 1958 ticket for state controller. Three months later, the Governor appointed Lundy as the $32,265-a-year chairman of the commission. The other three members, each of whom receives $29,160 annually, are a former Brooklyn assemblyman who was chairman of the assembly's public service committee from 1944 until 1960; a protégé of a former Republican state chairman, and a former assemblyman and state senator from Long Island who once headed a legislative committee investigating charitable and philanthropic organizations for possible Communist affiliations.

In a well-meaning but futile gesture, Senator Bookson introduced legislation in early January of this year that would replace the PSC with a ten-member Consumer Board of Inquiry. Recognizing that no state agency can ever be divorced entirely from politics, Senator Bookson did the next best thing. He proposes that three members be appointed by the Governor, three by the speaker of the assembly, two by the majority leader of the senate, and two by the Mayor of the city of New York. There is little chance that these elected officials would belong to the same political party at the same time. And there is little chance that the bill will ever get out of the committee into which it was shunted by the senate leadership.

There are no easy solutions, as Sen. Lee Metcalf, Democrat of Montana, rightly concludes in his book, Overcharge. Greater federal involvement, municipal competition with monopolistic utilities, closer municipal scrutiny, and independent state-level consumer agencies are some of the laudable approaches. But ultimately no effective control over Con Edison, or over any privately owned utility in the country, can be achieved until regulatory agencies, empowered to protect the consumer, begin to fulfill the public's great expectations.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

'More Dithyrambic Than Athletic'

LOVE'S BODY. By Norman O. Brown. Random House. 276 pp. $5.95.

KENNETH BURKE

Mr. Burke's most recently published book is Language as Symbolic Action (University of California Press).

According to Norman O. Brown, the suggestive nature of aphoristic, fragmentary expression makes for continual resurrection, in allowing us to be reborn with each fragment, whereas systematic thought condemns us to death. However, I assume that a reviewer should be as systematic as possible, even if it kills him; for any attempt to sum up a book's contents will necessarily require him to ask how one fragment fits with another. And there's always the paradoxical possibility that even the errors of an unsystematic book can be shown to have a systematic origin, from which they are forever born anew, thereby at least proving to that extent the author's claim for an intimate tie-up between resurrection and the fragmentary.

For instance, when we are told that "there is no literal truth," we are in the presence of a statement that on its face is in dire trouble. There would be no point in making the statement unless it is to be taken literally, as univocally "true." Yet it could be true only by being false.

Similarly, we are told that "the conflict between science and religion in the modern world stems . . . from modern literalism: Protestant literalism and Catholic scholasticism; both exterminators of symbolism." And whether or not we agree, what is the author's purpose in making the statement unless he literally means what he says? Here certainly is a kind of tangle from which many others could spring.

The book's title is accurate, so we might well proceed from there. As regards the term "body," I'd propose one premonitory observation. The more one speculates upon the paradoxes of the term "substance," the more difficult becomes the task of isolating the "individual." We all merge into our environment, the circumference or scope of which can be extended to the farthest limits of "nature" (and beyond, to the "supernatural," if you are theologically minded). Even when considered close up, the identity of the "self" or "person" becomes part of a collective texture involving language, property, family, reputation, social roles, and so on—elements not reducible to the individual. The same is true of our physical nature, but with one notable exception. Physiologically, the centrality of the nervous system is such that, although I as a person may sympathetically identify myself with other people's pleasures and pains, in my nature as a sheer body the pleasures of my food and the pains of my toothache are experienced immediately by me alone. Thus, although even as a body I merge into my environment, there is this physiological condition (in the realm of sheer "matter" or motion) that serves as a rudimentary "principle of individuation," the grounds for a purely empirical distinction whereby, however social our nature in other respects, we are born and die one by one, with certain pleasures and pains experienced immediately, bodily, or if you will, "carnally," and not identically experienceable by others.

So far, I have made two quite different moves. First, working from within the book itself, I singled out a basic statement of terministic policy that manifestly undoes itself. Next, when turning to the key word, "body," I introduced a preparatory consideration of my own. Brown says nothing about the "centrality of the nervous system." In fact, the main emphasis throughout his book is upon the respects in which the individual is rather like a drop in the ocean, though somehow divided from its fellows by a kind of primal "fall" from the ultimate oceanic oneness.

But when he says: "Love and death are altogether carnal, hence their great magic and their great terror," I would suggest that before we ever get to the "magic" and the "terror," we should try to be as explicit as we can about that word "carnal." I have explicitly proposed the need for this notion of an individual human body's susceptibility to certain sensations not thus immediately experienced by other human bodies (in the sense that, though other bodies may have physical pleasures and pains like mine, they don't have mine).

And I have suggested that, although Brown does not mention such a concept, he greatly needs it; and a concept of that sort is at least implicit in his statement about the immediately carnal nature of love and death. (True, I would want to haggle considerably about his reduction of love to nothing but carnal terms, since the norms of love and friendship are strongly modified by social factors. But in any case, there must be an ultimate bodily reference of some sort, even if it take the form of strictly ascetic dissociation.)

Even if neither the author nor the reader would consent to my proposal as regards a sheerly "material" or bodily principle of individuation, surely all can agree on this minimum basis: once a writer chooses to build a nomenclature that features the word "body," there are certain resources readily available to that term. Thus, whatever might be your definition of a "carnal" human body, it must differ considerably from the meanings implicit or explicit in references to the state as a political body, or to the Church as an ecclesiastical body. Surely, no political or ecclesiastical body can experience the carnality of sex or food as the particular members of such collective bodies can.

Further possibilities are available. There can be words for another kind of body, individually resurrected after death, though somehow not divisively. Such terms are possible, whether or not there can actually be such a state. This requires further book-keeping operations, as per the statement that "incarnation is not to be understood carnally."

A related but different set of transformations is possible. Bodies don't only sex, they also eat. In fact, without a lot of preparatory eating, there'd be no sexing. Hence, along with his pan-sexualism, Brown includes many terms connected with food. And well he might, if one can believe reports to the effect that when war prisoners are deprived of both food and sex, their dreams are not of beds but of banquets. In any case, food as well as sex provides a basic bodily terminology of appetite, plus corresponding connotations of substance, and hence of consubstantiality, in keeping with the "carnal" notion that we can all become alike by partaking of the same substance (individuals thus being made one by participation in a common body, as per the popular aphorism, "tell me what you eat and I'll tell you what you are"). This line of development allows for notions of transubstantiated body, when bread and wine are ritually transformed into the blood and body of a Divine Word shared by all believers. And although, as I tried to show in my Rhetoric of Religion, a sacrificial principle is intrinsic to the nature of the social order as such, you might (like Brown) center attention upon the purely "carnal" aspects of eating whereby one thing lives by the "sacrifice" of another.

I have suggested that you might begin with some overall term such as "appetition," under which you might include terms for food and terms for sex as subdivisions. "Desire" would be a handy synonym if we recall Spinoza's formula, "It is of the essence of man to desire," along with the etymological admonition (too often overlooked by current myth men) that desire in general is the basic meaning of the Greek word eros. Proceeding thus, you will have no difficulty in seeing how Brown's book might have chapters on both food and sex. But if you begin with the particulars of such imagery and the corresponding problems of terministic accountancy (as the book encourages you to do), you are almost sure to get lost; and you will doubtless be left vaguely wondering how you got from body to sex to person to food to sacrifice to resurrection and on finally to the culminative celebration of "Nothing."

As for the other word, the possessive, in the title: I submit that Plato's Phaedrus can serve us best, to indicate what kind of potentialities (corresponding to those implicit in Brown's word, "body") are implicit in the word "love." I have in mind the "literal" fact that the Phaedrus begins on a quite low concept of sexual dalliance, then graduates through a solemnly ecstatic view of "noble" love, to such kinds of courtship as come to fulfillment in the Socratic erotic (the whole constituting a dialectic ladder that leads from sexual seed to doctrinal insemination). In brief, the idea of communion embraces a range of meanings as wide as the differences between sheerly lustful coupling, unity in love, and such modes of persuasion, or communication or correspondence in principle, as flower in ardent rhetorical appeal to love of wisdom. (Brown's book features the sex side of such a continuum. Working at the other end of the spectrum, Marshall McLuhan's Understanding Media features some considerations to do with the sheer technology of communication.)

Brown tells us that "symbolism is mind making connections (correspondences) rather than distinctions (separations)." Here we confront the same kind of self-canceling statement with which we began. For if Brown's statement makes any sense at all, it is making a distinction. He might answer that he never intended this particular kind of sentence to be thought of as "symbolism." I would call it "symbolism" in the sense that it uses a symbol system, and thus is a kind of "symbolic action." I thought of solving the problem by reference to these remarks by Socrates, also in the Phaedrus:

I am a great lover of these processes of division and generalization; they help me to speak and think. If I find any man who is able to see unity and plurality in nature, I follow him, walking in his steps as if he were a god. And those who have this art, I usually call dialecticians.

But this possible distinction between "symbolism" and "dialectics" won't help us. For Brown also says: "Every sentence is dialectics, an act of love"; and "all intercourse is sexual intercourse"; and sex itself is "symbolic." Brown further tries to equate "union or unification" with eros, and "separation, or division" with "the death instinct," though bodies grow and reproduce by the division of cells, and metabolism involves both anabolic and catabolic processes.

Brown seems to leave no room for the sheerly technical aspects of the communication spectrum. To be sure, one may say that love (or sex) is "dialectical," in the sense that it involves both separateness and unification. But dialectics, as the use of words for unity and words for plurality, cannot be intelligibly reduced to an utterly "carnal" concept of love. Such an equation would amount to saying that the distinction between a word like "books" and a word like "library" can be adequately discussed as an "act of love." Or, if you must call it "love," then please at least admit that it's not in exactly the same "carnal" category as sedentary eating or recumbent sexing, though we might gain a certain perspective by incongruity if we transferred a term from one such realm to the other (as were we to call some beauty queen an "inviting morsel").

If you would equate "symbolism" solely with the unity side of the unity-diversity pair, no one need haggle with you, in case your scheme somewhere explicitly allows for both. But, so far as I can make out, Brown can admit such considerations only roundabout and unintentionally, as when making a distinction in the very act of outlawing distinctions, or when saying that all language is a kind of "fall" (as it unquestionably is, in the sense that it necessarily makes Brown's statement of

NIGHT WATCH

*And now, outside, the walls of black flint, eyeless.
How pale in sleep you lie.
Love: my love is just a breath blown on the pane and dissolved.
Everything, even you,
cries silently for help, the web of the spider is ripped with rain, the geese fly on into the black cloud.
What can I do for you?
What can I do for you?
Can the touch of a finger mend what a finger's touch has broken?
Blue-eyed, with yellow hair,
I stand in my old nightmare beside the track, while you, and over again and always you wearily plod into the death-cars.
Sometimes you send me a last smile,
and I — I smile back at you.
How sweet the smell of the station-master's roses!
How pure, how poster-like the colors of this dream!*

ADRIENNE RICH

his own unitary ideal undo itself, since even his word "unification" implies the unifying of a diversity).

The trick is: Where do you start, and where do you go from there? If you start with particulars, well and good. But if you try to make them do the work of generalities, the prognostications are bad. I mean: there's nothing wrong with sex as a "way in." But when, like Brown, you first reduce "love" to penis and vagina, and then imperialistically expand until you find "a penis in every convex object and a vagina in every concave one," you're necessarily out of bounds. For geometric forms must also be treated in their own right, fall or no fall. Even if you began with a purely psychoanalytic interpretation of the egg-and-dart motif, you'd have to grant that its use in Greek friezes "transcends" this "origin."

Too often Brown merely re-enacts the terministic devices we have been discussing, rather than helping to make us more conscious of their operation; in this respect his book becomes obfuscating, rather than the "apocalyptic" enterprise he apparently wants it to be. And now, after a reference to some surprising omissions, we shall have finished:

One might have expected that a stress upon the body would also entail a cult of bodily motion for its own sake. But the satisfactions of the kinetic in general are treated in keeping with the genius of the possessive in the book's title, thus: "All movement is phallic," a doctrine temperamentally more dithyrambic than athletic. A greater surprise lurks in the fact that despite urgent praise of poetry, there is no concern with such kinds of sensory response to nature as John Crowe Ransom deals with in his thoughts on the relation between poetry and the "world's body." The stress upon unity makes the book in effect even more severe than orthodox churchmen in frowning on the principle of divorce. And perhaps the dithyrambic element is also responsible for slighting the major role of body-thinking in connection with disease and the imagery of the ethically problematical: bodies sick or soiled.

Reforming the Universities

COMPULSORY MIS-EDUCATION and THE COMMUNITY OF SCHOLARS.
By Paul Goodman. Vintage Books. 339 pp. $1.95 paper.

PETER CLECAK

Mr. Clecak teaches English at the University of California (Irvine), and is at work on a book on contemporary American social criticism.

Postwar studies of education, like analyses of poverty, race relations, the breakdown of the family, and the recently publicized death of God, constitute an important branch of the flourishing American social criticism industry. This sudden and unprecedented concern over the state of education is, of course, neither touching nor mysterious. Since every major income-dispensing institution in American society—the corporation, the government, the military—requires increasing numbers of skilled and semi-skilled mental workers, everyone who aspires to full membership in the Great Society must "hold a degree" (education in America is regarded essentially as a possession, not as a state of mind). Complementary economic interests, therefore, unite buyers and sellers of brain power: together they impose irresistible external pressures on the university, at once causing and guaranteeing its ultimate transformation from a detached center of humanistic learning into an efficient instrument for creating, as well as protecting, profits and jobs.

Colleges and universities have generally responded to massive external pressures by molding themselves to the contours of a "changing society." In the accelerated interaction with dominant social institutions, the university has developed a momentum which overpowers individuals who would significantly alter its central direction. Yet in the process of expanding its scope and influence, the university has become a parasitic institution, closely bound to the social whole by the connecting tissue of relative affluence. Most administrators and professors endorse the alliance by accepting heavy doses of capital from government agencies and private foundations, and by providing in exchange, large quantities of "new knowledge" and large numbers of specialists and professionals. (Research and teaching, we are tirelessly informed, are Siamese twins.)

But the transformation from university to multiversity has been neither as coherent nor as effortless as the dominant trends toward specialization and professionalization suggest. In fact,

Can anything be done about our foreign policy? JAMES P. WARBURG says YES.

"This is the kind of sensible plain talk that the American people, Senators included, hear far too little of."

—SENATOR JOSEPH S. CLARK
(Dem.-Pa.)

"A remarkable book, to be read slowly and to be fully digested."

—Cleveland Plain Dealer

"Should be hailed as constructive criticism; its recommendations for the future should be carefully considered."

—Denver Post

"Tightly reasoned, objective and at the same time sharply critical, this is a useful and provocative book."

—Virginia Kirkus Service

"Jim Warburg is in the great tradition of the 18th-century pamphleteers who did so much to form American opinion."

—ADLAI E. STEVENSON

THE UNITED STATES IN THE POSTWAR WORLD

*What We Have Done,
What We Have Left Undone, and What We Can and Must Do*

By James P. Warburg

$6.50, now at your bookstore

the transition has created a series of varied and complex problems. For example, the threat of nearly universal higher education poses the operational difficulty of financing plant and faculty without drastically lowering the quality of instruction. And there is the more fundamental question of curriculum reform: should the modern university concentrate on teaching methodology rather than subject matter as a means of keeping pace with new knowledge? Further, the growing minority of faculty and student humanists and radicals who for personal and philosophic reasons oppose the main drift of the multiversity and the larger interests it serves must be isolated, co-opted or dropped.

Quite naturally, this rather uneven metamorphosis of the university—from an essentially decorative to a crucially functional institution—has evoked volumes of criticism and proposals for educational reform from such distinguished Americans as Henry David Aiken, Daniel Bell, James Conant, Paul Goodman, Clark Kerr, Nathan Pusey and David Riesman. Doubtless every important American university administrator, academic and intellectual has added at least one article or speech to the mushrooming pile of diagnoses and remedies.

The abundant criticism, ranging from documented studies of individual institutions to sweeping condemnations of the entire university system, serves two important integrative social functions. First, it is a substitute for effective action: the sheer rhetorical density of the critiques assures an anxious audience that both the technical and spiritual problems of an expanding network of colleges and universities are being confronted and gradually resolved. Thus, criticism, like other painkillers, momentarily relieves tension and anxiety by providing the consoling illusion of action through the medium of language. Moreover, it provides a safety valve for the writer, converting potential activist energy into rhetorical energy.

Second, some part of the critics' ideas are adopted in practice. Indeed, several major universities have institutionalized innovation by establishing small experimental colleges, laboratories for testing various proposals to improve teaching and to motivate students in order to promote learning. The interesting question is whether it is possible to construct a rough calculus of the limits of university reform, to separate the sorts of proposals which might be adopted from those which lie beyond the scope of practice and to gauge their potential social effects.

Compulsory Mis-Education and The Community of Scholars, two short volumes by Paul Goodman, provide the basis for a highly tentative answer. Goodman is one of the very few sensitive and intelligent American social critics still able to imagine fresh modes of life beyond the parameters of monopoly capitalism. And as a radical, he constitutes a limiting case: if Goodman's proposals can be adopted, so can those of such weary and sophisticated status quo critics as Daniel Bell and David Riesman.

With characteristic economy, simplicity and irony, Goodman illuminates the failure of American education from the primary grades through graduate school. At every level, he argues, the schools have "become a universal trap" where "democracy begins to look like regimentation." He considers elementary schools "a baby-sitting service," the junior and senior high schools "an arm of the police," and the colleges an instrument of a middle-class "elite that has imposed on itself a morale fit for slaves." Supplementing rather than offsetting the mass media, the schools teach "the mass of our citizens in all classes . . . that life is inevitably routine, depersonalized, venally graded; that it is

"A really impressive and magnificent selection of contributors... Many of the outstanding names of the century are here."

—RALPH MCGILL,
Book Week

100 YEARS OF THE NATION

Edited by Henry M. Christman

Introduction by CAREY McWILLIAMS

A generous selection of memorable prose and poetry that appeared in the pages of The Nation during the last century, now in a handsome Centennial Anthology published by The Macmillan Company. $7.95

Partial list of contributors:

Theodore Dreiser
H. L. Mencken • John Dos Passos
Bertolt Brecht • James Agee
Henry James • Bertrand Russell
Sherwood Anderson
Leon Trotsky • André Malraux
Thomas Mann • Robert Lowell
Wallace Stevens • Robert Frost
Norman Thomas • Harold J. Laski
I. F. Stone • William James
William Carlos Williams
William Butler Yeats
Ezra Pound • G. D. H. Cole
Fred J. Cook • Edmund Wilson
Oswald Garrison Villard
William Dean Howells
Francis Parkman
Robert C. Benchley
Benedetto Croce
William O. Douglas
Heywood Brown

THE NATION 333 6th Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014

Please send me _____ copies of 100 YEARS OF THE NATION @ $7.95. I enclose check for $ _____

NAME _____

ADDRESS _____

CITY _____ STATE _____ ZIP CODE _____

best to toe the mark and shut up; that there is no place for spontaneity, open sexuality, free spirit." Instead of serving as a transforming agency of social change, as John Dewey somewhat innocently hoped, the schools reflect and reinforce the patterns of the larger society.

Goodman's indictment is perhaps too inclusive, but as a general assessment of American education I think it is devastatingly accurate. He identifies the common bond of indifference to the classroom regimen which unites the rebellious minority and the conforming majority of college and university students. The few who cannot (or will not) play the game of assimilating fragments of information from timid men drop out, having demonstrated their unsuitability for preferred membership in the Great Society. The majority who survive the routine conditioning "go on to the same quality of jobs, culture, politics." Any teacher with a modest degree of objectivity can corroborate Goodman's general observations. But his descriptions of campus conditions, like his proposals for reform, are occasioned by a compelling radical vision of the potentialities of education in the formation of creative, spontaneous human beings. Goodman's passionate concern is to educate the "sons of the free, to be free and exercise initiative in the world they inherit."

Men who are free do not mature in prisons. Nor does their fate ultimately depend upon a revised curriculum or a new coffee lounge; these may contribute to the process of education, but they can neither ignite nor extinguish it. The desire to learn arises in a genuine "community of scholars" composed of teachers and students, "veterans" and neophytes. Teaching and learning, the main focus of Goodman's remarks, are intensely personal acts requiring mutual respect and trust. The student must live and study with men whom he admires for their experience and moral character no less than for their knowledge. The underlying comparison between a true community and the present collection of scholars at various universities gradually conveys a sense of the enormous distance between the reality of American education and its possibilities.

But the disparity between the ideal and the real does not paralyze Goodman: it intensifies his search for specific means of improving colleges and universities. In Compulsory Mis-Education he suggests two modest reforms designed to improve academic communities immediately and "importantly liberate them in relation to society." Goodman

'The habit grew on me...'

So writes a subscriber, explaining why he has been reading The Nation for the past thirty years.

In an age of hyperbole, The Nation makes few claims for itself. It will not make you rich or alluring to the opposite sex.

Some readers buy it because it carries the toughest crossword puzzle now being printed in America. More buy it because the editors have a greedy curiosity about what really happens behind the velvet curtains of public relations and the pious admonitions of government.

The truth is not often given away free—you have to dig for it. The Nation has been digging for 101 years and its readers never seem to tire of watching the editors work.

subscribe to

THE
NATION

America's most habit-forming magazine

FREE with each NEW subscription

The Fervent Years

by Harold Clurman

"Light on the forces in the theatre and in the surrounding social and economic climate of the thirties that drew this wildly assorted collection of actors, directors, writers and eager aspirants into a vociferous effort to create a unity in which they could work and through which they might also live."

Theatre Arts

The NATION
333 8th Avenue
New York, N.Y. 10014

Herewith my order and payment for a NEW subscription to The Nation. Please send my FREE copy of THE FERVENT YEARS.

☐ 1 Year, $10 ☐ 2 Years, $18 ☐ 6 Mos., $6
(Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 per year extra)

name

address

city state zip no.

3-27-67

proposes that a few first-rate liberal arts colleges—Swarthmore, Carleton, Wesleyan ■ examples—require students to spend two years “in some maturing activity” before becoming eligible for admission. Students could select from ■ wide list of possibilities, including community service, a job, the army, work in a domestic Peace Corps. This simple measure, Goodman contends, would provide students with sufficient raw experience to begin “college studies with some intrinsic motivation, and therefore perhaps assimilate something that might change” them.

The second proposal is equally uncomplicated: let several of the prestigious universities such as Harvard, Yale, Chicago, and Stanford abolish grading and employ examinations only for “pedagogic purposes as teachers see fit.” The aim of this proposal is to free students and teachers from the comparative ranking system which presently inhibits the development of ■ intrinsic will to learn. As an instrument of domination and an index of “success,” grades frequently prevent an honest, dynamic interchange between faculty and students. Teachers and students disappear behind protective masks; students quickly learn pragmatic sales techniques to “get good grades,” and teachers soon learn to use grades as both carrot and stick. Success or humiliation in college is thus measured in senseless numbers: on what meaningful basis can a 96 in Romantic literature be compared with a 92 in zoology? And long after the college graduate has forgotten the content of the courses, he recalls his GPA, the barren symbol of his academic identity.

Both limited suggestions appear to be reasonable approaches to the education of free men, to the return to “teaching-and-learning as ■ simple relation of persons.” But what are the prospects for these proposals within the existing social structure? And even if enacted, would they actually contribute to Goodman’s radical ends? Although lucid and forceful when presenting his diagnoses and prescriptions, Goodman becomes somewhat ambiguous when discussing the mechanics of social change. He clearly recognizes the dependent status of education, declaring in the preface to The Community of Scholars that “the schools are tightly involved with the performance, and even with the style, of the dominant system of society. Any significant reforms of them would involve a threat to the dominant system.” Yet he also asserts that the colleges and universities, unlike more rigidly controlled social institutions, are still flexible enough to be changed internally through social criticism. The “threat” to the status quo can presumably be mounted within university gates, where even nonradical contemporary critics of higher education have

... proposed fairly radical reforms, and have sometimes tried them out. This is a difference between the usual social criticism and the social criticism of the colleges; and proves that the colleges are still living communities, though sadly fragmented. In no other area in our society, not in urbanism, economy, popular culture, or politics, does radical criticism lead to continual efforts at remedy.

Important changes are possible within the schools, but they will “require more revolutionary courage than most of the collegiate critics seem to exude.” Goodman thus concludes that radical proposals could be adopted but probably won’t, primarily because “revolutionary courage” is in such short supply among university critics, administrators and faculty: the capacity for reform outstrips the willingness of those who manage the university system.

I think Goodman is at once too pessimistic and too optimistic about his proposals. He seriously underrates the marketability of his suggestions. Several universities, for example, are now experimenting with small, ungraded programs. The freshman year at Caltech is ungraded. The University of California at Santa Cruz has abolished letter grades, and students are permitted to take one course per quarter on a pass-fail basis on all U.C. campuses. Similarly, the idea of a two-year hiatus between high school and college has gained considerable support among parents, students and faculty, though no school has yet adopted the break as a formal admission requirement. Both proposals, however, are viable within the present social and educational structure.

In fact, I suspect that almost any radical idea can be tested on a small scale, because radical experiments properly confined to university laboratories fit quite neatly into the pluralist vision of the multiversity, a crucial point which Goodman blurs. True, the dominant administrative and research interests naturally resist radical changes affecting the entire campus, but at first-rate schools these same forces also subsidize small-time innovators who, in turn, assemble, isolate and neutralize dissident clusters of students and faculty. Furthermore, the laboratories can occasionally develop new teaching techniques applicable to the university at large.

Goodman is suggesting that radical proposals, once tried, can be contagious, spreading beyond the control of university managers. The actual relationship between university criticism and practice can be understood in terms of a much less romantic criterion: if there are virtually no restrictions on tiny, isolated radical experiments, there is only one major limitation on alterations affecting the entire university—they must not interfere with research. In Education at Berkeley, a faculty appraisal of the malfunctioning multiversity, the authors recommend many sweeping reforms to improve the quality of undergraduate education, but “nowhere,” they hastily add, “do we suggest a diminution of the research activity of the faculty.” “Research activity” not only defines the essential internal shape and movement of the multiversity but also determines its heavy dependence on the dominant economic, social and political institutions. Hence, any reform adopted on a campus-wide basis immediately loses the radical character it may have had as an idea or as an experiment, and ceases to be even a potential menace to what Goodman calls the “dominant system of society.” Moreover, some radical ideas would become oppressive social facts in contemporary America: Goodman’s suggestion that two years of life experience be a prerequisite to pursuing college studies is disturbingly similar to Robert McNamara’s recently proposed two years of military or civilian service for all youths.

The flaws in Goodman’s analysis of university reform result from an illusion about the relationship between criticism and praxis. He states that university criticism is fundamentally different from “the usual social criticism” because some radical educational reforms have been “tried . . . out,” whereas radical criticism of other major institutions—the economy, politics, popular culture—remains largely rhetorical. Goodman mistakenly assumes that controlled experiment is equivalent to real praxis and therefore that the broken circuit between radical theory and practice in American society could be repaired in the universities if only the bureaucratic inertia of administrators could be dispelled. On the contrary, experimentation in the colleges operates merely as an appendage of theory and thus threatens to strengthen, not weaken, the status quo: university criticism and the “usual social criticism” serve identical social functions. Radical means and ends seem as divorced on the campus as anywhere else in American society.

Concluding that the prospect of major reform within “the great majority of schools . . . is dim," Goodman finally proposes that "bands of scholars . . . secede and set up where they can teach and learn on their own simple conditions." He assembles statistics to demonstrate the practicality of secession. The figures add up, but the proposal remains hopelessly utopian. In this final chapter, Goodman's generally acute social criticism modulates, almost without warning, into pure wish projection: if a dozen independent centers could succeed, he projects, "the entire system would experience a profound and salutary jolt." Psychological and aesthetic considerations momentarily eclipse logic and truth with the result that the reader's vicarious experience of pain is attenuated in a pleasurable final scene.

Goodman's diagnosis, however, seems to warrant a harsher conclusion: that the multiversity cannot alter its central direction and enjoy a prosperous alliance with major American economic and political institutions. The education whose rich possibilities Goodman sketches is at least a social system away. Meanwhile, the contemporary producers and products of higher education are, in the main, competent specialists, men with narrow intellectual interests who compete laterally and comply vertically. Who else could operate an irrational society so efficiently?

it is.) One of Manhattan's largest, and predominantly Jewish, housing projects, the ILGWU, isolates Holy Apostles on three sides, while across the street a branch of the Department of Health, beyond which lies another, largely Puerto Rican, project, effectively closes it off on the fourth side. By the time the neighborhood connects with potential parishioners—some blocks south of 23rd Street, where Chelsea goes posh—St. Peter's Episcopal on 20th Street has picked them off.

St. Peter's, itself flagging with the times, was a likely home for CTC when Kalfin began work there in 1965. But the bishop soon countermanded the welcome that the church's pastor, Father Jenks, had extended to the group. Officially, the quarrel was over the propriety of a theatre group's preempting church facilities, in this case the spacious and well-equipped parish hall used at odd times for bazaars and basketball, but people found it hard to dissociate the gutter language of Shepp's play from the bishop's intervention. (A further complication was that Sidney Lanier, the minister who had founded the American Place Theatre at St. Clement's Episcopal a few years before, had recently defrocked himself and married a divorcee—an event that seemed less disruptive of APT at St. Clement's than of CTC at St. Peter's.) Kalfin scoured Chelsea for an alternate location and failed to find one; then, in a nice display of agility, he got his adversary to give him Holy Apostles, which, as a mission church, was said to be exempt from policy strictures against

OFF-BROADWAY / Robert Pasolli

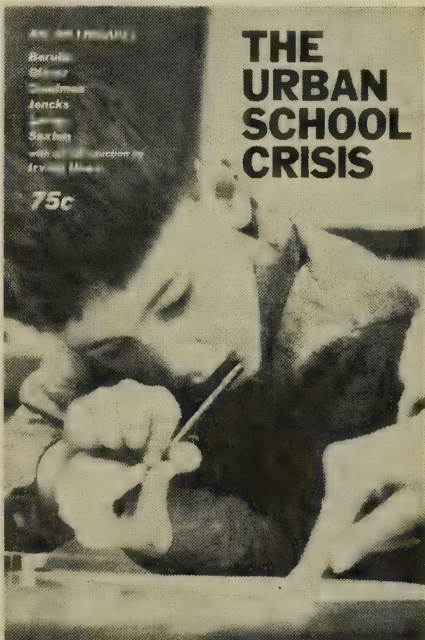

Mr. Pasolli became a free-lance writer in the theatre after working on Broadway, at Lincoln Center and, on a Ford Foundation grant, at the Tyrone Guthrie Theatre, Minneapolis.

While not fully successful as a play or as a production, Archie Shepp's Junebug Graduates Tonight! at the Chelsea Theatre Center so vibrantly fulfilled one of the theatre's chronically neglected functions that I want to call attention to the playwright, the play and the audacious production group.

Early in its career in 1965, CTC presented some scenes from Junebug, then called The Communist, as the second in a string of staged readings of twenty-three new plays. (Among the talents of Robert Kalfin, founder and artistic director of the group, is a discerning eye for original scripts of merit; contrary to the prevailing myth, they exist in some quantity among the mass of worthless material.) The series attracted a lot of attention—more from within the theatre profession than from the New York City neighborhood of Chelsea—by its intelligent and professional work, which demonstrated that CTC could run from a standing start. Since the end of the series last spring, CTC has redoubled its efforts to gain a toe hold as an artistic organization pertinent to the Chelsea community. It sent out lines of communication to neighborhood agencies and community action groups, such as Mobilization for Youth for which it is now "an approved job training site." Furthermore, CTC has displayed what must be described as muscle in obtaining grants from six foundations, including one from Rockefeller of a size ($15,000) usually reserved to more experienced organizations. Although one of the newer off-off-Broadway theatres, CTC has moved the fastest and most deftly toward securing a solid institutional footing.

CTC is housed at present in one of those handsome and moribund Episcopal churches which have taken a new lease on life by opening their doors to drama groups. The Church of the Holy Apostles, on Ninth Avenue at 28th Street, is both particularly handsome and particularly moribund: I used to pass it when I lived in Chelsea and always its locked gates would prevent me from seeing whether the magnificent Lafever exterior was matched on the inside. (Thanks to CTC, I have discovered that

THE URBAN SCHOOL CRISIS

75c

LEAGUE FOR INDUSTRIAL DEMOCRACY
 112 East 19th Street, New York, N. Y. 10003

☐ Enclosed please find my check for $..... for..... copy(s) of THE URBAN SCHOOL CRISIS @ 75c.

☐ Please send me information about the LID.

Name

Address

City State Zip Code

pre-emptive theatre groups. Also, it was noticeably closer than St. Peter's to departing this life. Holy Apostles lacks a suitable parish hall, so it was in the sanctuary itself that Archie Shepp's dirty words were to be heard in the full production of his play at the end of February.

Mr. Shepp is a Negro jazz saxophonist, who has been associated with John Coltrane and Bill Dixon, both in recording and personal appearances. Not the least of the merits of Junebug, called "a jazz allegory," is its series of songs, at once cool and tuneful.

Perhaps out of the habitudes of jazz composition, Shepp as a dramatist tends to write in bursts. Bright ideas are colorfully unfurled, then folded away. Frequent interpolations, while often interesting in themselves, break up and attenuate the play's line of thought and action. Although Kalfin did a capable and occasionally inspired job of direction, and while he presented a generally strong cast, he was unable to make Shepp's undisciplined statements cohere dramatically. A major loss was any definition of the play's attitude, which swung back and forth from anger to mockery to maliciousness to hokum.

But I think this separateness of disparate elements, which gave the impression of sallies, was responsible in large part for the assaultive and provocative thrust of the play. Junebug is a young Negro, about to graduate from high school as valedictorian of his class, who is profoundly troubled to decide what he should say in his address. The terms of his confusion devolve from his mother, who welcomes his advancement as a gift from the white world (tokenism); from his father, who angrily rejects all accommodation (black supremacy); and from his sister, who cynically cooperates with whites for her own ends (opportunism). Junebug gropes toward his own position in a few long scenes with his girl friend, a white Southern girlie named America, and with his new pal, a dissolute old man named Uncle Sam. The boy's attitude toward them alternates between acceptance and rejection until the final scene, the graduation exercises, where Junebug chooses positive feelings over negative ideas and embraces America. For this Uncle Sam, presiding as the school principal, mercilessly shoots him down, and down comes America with him. In an epilogue, which I understand was created by the company during rehearsal, Junebug and Sam exhort each other "to call to [America] in a loud voice."

For all their vehement response to the play's indictment of white America, the Negroes in the audience at CTC did not seem to regard the ending as a cop-out—a factor which indicates that Shepp's distinction between felt and thought impulses is based in reality. As for the white sector of the audience, the play's conciliatory ending seemed a welcome emollient.

Junebug is an activist play that a liberal management infiltrated into a complacent milieu. Some elements of the play, like direct address and street language, and elements of the production, like flashy use of color and boisterous staging, jabbed and poked at the whites, while they energized and enspirited the Negroes. Junebug is really an inflammatory play, voicing to felt effect the point of view of a shunted and disprized minority. Just how felt was indicated by the New York Times' dismissal of the play as one-sided and non-contributive to dialogue, an attribute which one might take for granted on encounter but which the Times seems to have raised in self-defense. I sympathize with the paper's white reviewer; had I lacked the leisure of weekly journalism I am not at all certain I could have overcome my own impulse to block the play's provocation. Junebug put one on the spot; that was its value. It did so with verve, color and spirit; that was its worth.

Fortune and Men's Eyes, at the Actors Playhouse, is too good a show for its own good. Its subject is the quick corruption of the innocent in the homosexual currents of prison life. The hero, a new prisoner, is a good-boy-up-on-a-bum-rap and straight as an arrow when the action begins. When it ends three months later, he has passed in succession through several of the permutations of sexual exercise as practiced in that particular prison: he has let himself be appropriated by an "old man"; he has formed an alliance with one of the "queens"; he has even attempted to impose himself as an "old man" on another inmate. This last might be an impulse of real love, the twisted expression of which has been conditioned by the circumstances—quite a different thing from the cold-hearted sexuality of the scene, which expresses cynicism rather than affection.

That possibility is underscored by the title reference to Shakespeare's Sonnet XXIX ("When, in disgrace with fortune and men's eyes,"), which is about redemptive love. However, the play does not develop the possibility, nor does the production emphasize it. The sexual hurly-burly of prison events cancels out any implication of an affirmative awakening in the hero, and the play ends in a climax of its thesis: as his friend is carried off to be beaten, the hero collapses in a fit of weeping cum laughter that bespeaks the dehumanization that prison life has practiced on him.

In its audacious display of one of the less publicly acknowledged aspects of our social setup, Fortune and Men's Eyes serves as a kind of social document. (Written from personal experience by a Canadian named John Herbert, the play posits a degree of homosexual concentration that might be artistic rather than documentary.) And as drama it is respectable in its solid construction and vivid characterization; Herbert knows how to write a play, as they say. But both drama and social documentation are

For SPECIAL Teen-Agers

ASSOCIATED Y CAMPS

CAMP POYNTELLE-LEWIS, Poyntelle, Pa.

CAMPER-WORKER AND PERFORMING ARTS PROGRAM

Unique work experience in learning new skills while building expanded facilities.

Music (instrument and choral). Dance (folk and modern).

Drama, Film-making, Sculpture and Painting. Auditions for instruments and drama.

Plus all sports: Swimming, sailing, canoe trips down the Delaware. Trips to colleges (as part of career guidance program); to concerts, summer stock theater and historical places of interest.

Boys 15-17 — Girls 14-16

Supervised by highly skilled, mature staff

9-week program. Nonprofit. Supported by Jewish Philanthropies (interracial, interreligious)

Tuition $425. Several scholarships still open submerged in the current New York production by the impulse of showmanship.

33 West 60 Street, New York City 10023

Phone: CO 5-0616

Sassy and rambunctious, the production by Mitchell Nestor swings back and forth from its vibrantly physicalized tensions to its high-spirited comedy. Nestor's direction is tight and powerful—more a matter of sinew than of muscle—and he underlines values in the play with inspired stage business, such as the switching of mattresses from bed to bed according to which of the cell's occupants enjoys the upper hand sexually. Terry Kiser, Bill Moor, Robert Christian and Victor Arnold as the inmates create strongly contrasted and infectious characters. So far, so good.

One of the actors, however, is encouraged to go too far. Bill Moor, who plays Queenie, the strutting, primping girl of the cell, takes a strong lead at the opening of the play with a full ten minutes of bitchy rallery during which I began to wonder when Fortune would get down to business. The lead is never quite relinquished, and Queenie's stage business frequently interrupts the concentration of the play. The trouble isn't that Queenie is not entertaining; it's that he is. Moor's performance is intelligent, skillful and blissfully non-sniggering, but it goes far beyond what is necessary to create and maintain a characterization, beyond even what is needed to establish that Queenie is the apotheosis of the milieu. Queenie in this production amounts to a spirited divertissement, establishing false premises for the play, so that when Fortune becomes serious it doesn't take; its point goes past almost unnoticed. It is pandemonium, you realize finally, that has grabbed your attention, not meaningful action. As Tennessee Williams said to everyone in general on his way up the aisle for intermission, "It ain't Genet." No, it ain't; it's a great show—and less of a play for it.

FILMS / Robert Hatch

Bergman's Persona offers the bifocal pleasures and surprises of multilevel dramatic communication. It can be read, somewhat mystically, as a tale of the transposition of souls; or, more prosaically, it can be understood as demonstrating that muteness is a form of aggression, that a person capable of implacable silence can fracture and distort the personality of another who offers contact through speech. On other terms, the picture is at once relentlessly clinical and a figment of pure cinema—which latter reading Bergman encourages by introducing the work literally from within the projector, by equating dream with reality, past with present, by interrupting his narrative with clips of other movies from other times, and by allowing his venture to run down at the close like some clockwork coming to the end of its spring.

All this is accomplished with the casual necromancy that has made Bergman a Prospero of the camera, and one leaves the theatre almost physically done in by the film's demands on one's wits. At the same time, there is a letdown in retrospect. For one thing, although its cinematic nature is so deliberately emphasized, the work advances in a series of almost static tableaux, and fails to develop the flexibility and flow that almost invariably form the structure of rewarding movies. Since one of the two main characters refuses to speak and the other speaks compulsively, the picture becomes focused on words, and an audience dependent on subtitles finds itself reading almost as much as it is watching or listening.

Further, Bergman here carries the main burden of his tale in close-ups, using them to such excess that the technique takes on moral overtones. To close in so persistently on people is itself a form of aggression, and the device achieves a semblance of emotional intensity by means as inherently suspect as the use of blood-stirring music to support dramatic peaks. At a distance of two inches, eyes invariably start and lips invariably become sensual cushions of flesh. The context may justify such melodrama, but the effect is so mechanically achieved that the burden of congruity is on the director. And as with most mechanical stimulants, the close-up rather quickly creates a dependence, so that unless you use it with great discipline—only in moments, as it were, of the most severe need—it becomes a habit replacing more valid ranges of communication. It looked to me as though Bergman had become addicted in Persona.

The film pivots on two long speeches. A prominent actress, who one night has faltered in her lines, lapses during the next day or so into a state of silent passivity which her doctor can-

appearing in

THE NATION

SPRING BOOK NUMBER

LOUIS SIMPSON

on the old New Critics and the new New Poetry

Coming April 24

not penetrate. In some desperation the physician packs her off with a sensitive nurse to a lonely spot on the shore, hoping that the peace and the enforced intimacy will break the spell. There thrown on her own resources, the young nurse (Bibi Andersson) chatters through the idle, healthy days on a slowly rising note of anxiety and with disturbing suggestions of physical attraction. One night, after wine, she regales her patient (Liv Ullmann) with a detailed account of an afternoon of sexual abandon she and another woman had once enjoyed with two young boys encountered on a secret beach. This long speech, offered perhaps as a seduction, is followed by Lesbian embraces which may very well be dreams, but which in any case signal that the nurse-patient relationship is shifting, with dominance passing to the older woman. The nurse's vulnerability accelerates when she acci-

The Best Way
To Get

THE NATION

THE NATION 3-27-67
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

- ☐ One Year, $10
- ☐ Two Years, $18
- ☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Foreign and Canadian Postage
$1 a year extra)

NAME _____

ADDRESS _____

CITY _____

STATE _____ ZIP NO. _____

dentally discovers that her impassive charge is in fact observing her with indulgent amusement. She deteriorates rapidly through bouts of hysteria and physical passion to the level of her second pivotal speech.

On this occasion, the nurse subjects the woman to a diatribe of accusation, attributing her condition to guilt of shocking proportions, and pouring out a flood of detail she could not command except by identification with her patient's psyche. Bergman runs this scene twice, the second time focusing on Miss Andersson's face, which undergoes kaleidoscopic malformations as she rants. From moment to moment she takes on a vagrant resemblance to her listener, an effect a little too pat to be compelling, particularly when it has been foreshadowed by a reference to the fact that they look alike. This second turning point also collapses into a scene of ambiguous violence. The next morning the patient packs up and leaves (still speechless) and the nurse, having put the house away, presently follows. The film runs out.

Life deals this way in inconclusions, and I don't object to Bergman's pretense that the camera sees what it sees and keeps its counsel. I am prepared to spin my own hypotheses as long as I feel I can trust the premises. In this case, though, I'm not certain I do trust them. Bergman takes liberties with these women that are permissible only to a lover or a doctor, but it isn't clear that he is sufficiently committed to them to play either role. He seems to be up to some game.

This comes back to method. One is forced to spend much more time in examining these women than in getting to understand them. They are treated as objects not subjects—an attitude which, whether intentionally or not, is relevant to contemporary corruption. And in all probability a film so disproportionately verbal loses much in export. The emphases of speech and subtle discriminations of words are lost when you lack the language; subtitles convey data, but very little of the color of dialogue. In fact, the device is possible only because the cinema is primarily a visual art. To a considerable degree, I think, Persona fights its medium.

The bright, particular triumph that Joseph Strick has achieved in his screen version of Joyce's Ulysses is the casting. I have no doubt that it was the most difficult part of the venture. Where does one lay hands on Stephen Dedalus, on Bloom, on Blazes Boylan, on the whole boiling company of that day in Dublin? I have not learned how in fact Strick did his recruiting, but the cast is at a level that makes you want to break out in cheers.

It is not that they are exactly what one expects, though in this respect the presence and comportment of Maurice Roeves as Stephen and Barbara Jefford as Molly Bloom seem to me extraordinary. Milo O'Shea's Bloom is perhaps a little more mercurial than one would have expected; Buck Mulligan (T. P. McKenna) a little less significant; Blazes Boylan (Joe Lynch) falling just short of his prototype's animal swagger. But the adjustments are of the kind one is forever making on meeting somebody of whom one has heard a lot; I would confidently call any of the film's people by the names Joyce gave them.

Of course none of the actors can reveal in their brief time on the screen the depth of character that Joyce provided. The film does not pretend to supplant Ulysses; it takes bold, responsible and joyous advantage of the fact that the book exists. You may read into the picture a great deal from your own memory; the important thing is that there is almost nothing that you must read out.

Dublin is the great character in the novel and that was a problem. It would probably not have been possible, even if it had been wise, to build contemporary sets, and Dublin has changed since Joyce was a student. But perhaps its temper has changed less than that of any other major city; at any rate, the film was shot—most beautifully—in today's streets, and there is no jar.

With these problems out of the way, the picture required only understanding and taste—easy prerequisites when you have them, and Mr. Strick has. He covers the whole book, from Bloom's scorched kidney to Molly's final "Yes." Inevitably, he leaves out more than he includes, but the narrative—which is what concerns a film—is only a fragment of the book, and Strick includes a surprising lot of it. I regretted the omissions I noticed, but less because they were essential to the form of the picture than because the included passages were so successful that I was jealous to see how Strick would have handled the others.

As you might expect, the first half of the book provides the best segments of the script. Early morning in the Martello Tower, Stephen's soliloquy on the front (fending off that snapping dog), Bloom in the pub, the drive to the cemetery, the newspaper office and the ribald young doctors, Stephen instructing young Sargent, Bloom's vertigo of lust turning to compassion for the lame girl, the tip on Throwaway, Stephen rejecting his sister, the bookstalls—on and on, and through it all the sustained pattern of Stephen and Bloom and Boylan intersecting one another's paths through the streets of Dublin.

The fantasy of the nightmare section seemed to me less successful. Bloom's penny-arcade dreams of shame and glory are staged responsibly enough, but the very process of staging them, with its requirements of quick props and shallow disguises, imposes an atmosphere of fun and games on a rainy afternoon that drains the magic. However, it is in this section that Bloom fully converts his love for his dead son into protecting the drunk and vulnerable Stephen, and the two actors play the relationship with sure recognition and rewarding restraint.

And in the end the film comes back to its full power with the Blooms in bed, head to foot, and Molly half dreaming the memories that kept the book out of our hands for so many years. Miss Jefford speaks the monologue with a frank yearning that lilts almost into song, and the scenes that come and go at her bidding evoke a transient joy that catches your throat. For a wonder, the screen finally portrays sex in terms of what adults know instead of what adolescents imagine. The result is extremely erotic and utterly clean.

I don't know why the distributors have limited the present run of Ulysses. They have a public obligation to put it on general view.

PERSONALS

INCOME TAX RETURNS PREPARED. Washington Heights-Inwood Tax Consulting Service. Specialists in returns for teachers, instructors. 914-735-5113 or SW 5-7315.

NON-PROFIT CAMP (interracial, interreligious) desperately needs donation of pianos. Tax deductible. Will pick up. Box 600, c/o The Nation.

USE LAWFUL DIRECT ACTION to repeal all abortion laws. LEGALIZE ABORTION. POB 24163, Los Angeles, Calif. 90024.

IMMEDIATE withdrawal referendum refused place on ballot by City Council. Ann Arbor Citizens for New Politics placing referendum ballot boxes on election day and campaigning for withdrawal position. Need funds for this and other uncompromising anti-war activities. P. O. Box 1466, Ann Arbor, Michigan.

WHY MEEKLY PAY FOR WAR? Legally demand income tax refund. Write: TAX-PAYERS AGAINST WAR, Box 15394, San Francisco, California 94115.

IMPOSE $30,000,000 Public Fine on U. S. Business to Protest Vietnam War. Write: DOVE, Box 1049, Jamaica, N. Y. 11431.

BUY YOUR BOOKS through The Nation. Nation readers can avail themselves of our offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S., at the regular retail price post-free. When ordering, please give name and author and publisher, if possible. Remittance must accompany order. Make checks payable to: The Nation, 333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1194

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS:

- 1 R.p.m. to shout about in town! (10)
- 6 A man who can do more than just pull teeth joins so as to increase in importance. (4)
- 10, 9 down and 15 Part of the retirement ceremony, for some. (3, 1, 3, 2, 4, 2, 5)
- 11 Could be a bloomer, or mean one in translation. (7)
- 12 Were such towns in such spaces at one time? (4-4)
- 13 Nothing to blow back but stones, possibly. (5)
- 15 See 10 across
- 17 They call themselves "Sons of the Eagle." (9)
- 19 They might not stop shows by opinion. (9)
- 21 Could be outer limits are passed by such. (5)
- 23 See 1 down
- 24, 5 down and 28 across Implying such as 19 were held up as a good example of early film fare? (3, 5, 5, 7)
- 27 Proves how some college students spend their time towards end of term. (7)
- 28 See 24 across
- 29 Separate kind? (4)
- 30 By normal standards, it should be valuable. (6, 4)

DOWN:

- 1 and 23 across Sticks to what people call nonsense, but suiting. (9)

- 2 Struggle upwards to conceal what might be dressed later. (7)
- 3 It might mollify the old greeting. (5)
- 4 Ye gods! Another name for them! (9)
- 5 See 24 across
- 7 Designer with a degree of 3D involved in a picturesque way. (7)
- 8 Pretty relative? Far from it for Cinderella. (10)
- 9 See 10 across
- 14 The German town I last confused with the most important ingredients. (10)
- 16 Make-believe. (8)
- 18 Those who indulge in mud-slinging are likely to. (9)
- 20 One who might use oil to make the boat fast? (7)
- 22 A flying one for one who reputedly dares to act. (7)
- 24 An Italian literary figure sat up thus. (5)
- 25 A layer of blue, as a color standard. (5)
- 26 Town, now part of the Brooklyn Navy yard. (4)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1193

ACROSS: 1. Troubles; 5 Chases; 10 Thermal; 11 and 19 Leatherstocking; 12 Vesta; 13 Poppycock; 14 Tight; 16 Expected; 22 Orson; 24 Shell game; 26 Elver; 28 Alidade; 29 Iranian; 30 Tagged; 31 Incenses. DOWN: 1 Titivate; 2 Opens; 3 Bombastic; 4 Ellipse; 6 Heavy; 7 Schooners; 8 Strike; 9 Slip-up; 15 Gathering; 17 Cooperate; 18 Entrants; 20 Images; 21 Grecian; 23 Aslant; 25 Leave; 27 Veils.

PUBLICATIONS

THE ACCOMPLICE, written by a Salemite, publishes—verbatim—the RANTOUL PROTEST of the Knapp judicial murder and Hawthorne's (11-12-1830) defense of the Crownshields. Rantoul, supported by Hawthorne's novels, vanquished 1830 prosecutor, Webster, on Compromise of 1850 and 1830, RESUSCITATED. Later, Melville, Dickens reworked Hawthorne's 1830, 1850-51 materials.

THE ACCOMPLICE (in White murder) publishes key, 12-25-48 and 9-17-50 letters by Hawthorne. It relates Judges Shaw and Story to Billy Budd by C. Sumner's (submerged) defense of Somers murders. Material on Garrison, Come-Outers, Selfridge murder—A break-through to sources. By author-publisher, Thomas Allen, 304 Essex St., Salem, Mass. 01970—Paper—$2.50.

SECULAR PASSOVER HAGGADAH FOR PEACE AND HUMAN RIGHTS, beautiful illustrations enrich story of the Exodus and the Seder Ceremony. A rewarding item for each member of the family. $1.00 Editor, Lewis M. Moroze, 364 South 12th Street, Newark, New Jersey 07103.

"SELECTED POEMS" of George Flynn (Villiers of London $2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound."—James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at 544—82 St., Brooklyn 9, N.Y.

THE IDLER. Lively, offbeat liberal monthly. Fun to read. Send $2 for trial year's subscription. IDLER, 413B 6th Street, N.E., Washington, D.C. 20002.

ART

KHAJURAHO'S EROTIC SCULPTURES; Thousand Year Old Temple Friezes of Hindu Arts, Carnal Love, Masterpieces Chandel Architecture, Twelve Color Slides $10. TEMPLE VIEWS, Box 25101, Cincinnati, Ohio 45225.

ORIGINALS COST LESS THAN REPRODUCTIONS! Contemporary original signed etchings, lithographs, woodcuts, $3.50. Guarantee. Free brochure. GRAPHIC CIRCLE (NA), 58 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10011.

TRAVEL

The OTHER Israel—a three-week summer program for young people 21 to 35—a dialogue with young Israeli socialists—meet farmers, workers, Arabs, labor leaders, peace groups, parliament members—live and work in a kibbutz—tour the country. $25.00. For details write: Young Americans for Progressive Israel, 150 Fifth Avenue, Room 700, New York, N.Y. 10011.

VACATION

CARIBBEAN HIWAY: Cool, quiet privacy. Near beach. Special deal entire summer. Write: Sassman, Box 757, Carolina, Puerto Rico.

APARTMENTS—UNFURNISHED

Live in a Mies van der Rohe Apartment . . . adjacent to Branch Brook Park . . . 25 minutes from Manhattan. Community activities: Little Theatre, newspaper, classes, clubs. Rentals from $99. Request brochure: COLONNADE, Dept. N, 381 Broad, Newark, N.J.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

Advertising Rates

CLASSIFIED

74¢ a line (6 words) Three-line minimum

CLASSIFIED DISPLAY
$7.42 per inch (minimum)

The NATION

333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014
242-8400

I Want To Know

how citizen exchange corps will help
americans find out this summer

Why They Behave Like Russians in the U.S.S.R.

Inquire Now About Summer 1967 CEC Three Week Exchange Visits To The USSR

Send me free reprints of N.Y. Times articles and editorials telling about CEC, a non-profit, tax-exempt foundation. Tell me how it brings together Americans and Russians of all ages and occupations to meet their counterparts in both the United States and the Soviet Union...and how I can participate in this program, which will lead eventually to exchanges of Americans and Soviets to live and work in each other's country for 6 months to 2 years as a major step toward mutual understanding and survival.

NAME _____
CITY _____
ADDRESS _____
STATE _____ ZIP _____

Mail to:
CITIZEN EXCHANGE CORPS,
550 FIFTH AVE.,
DEPT. N3-27, N.Y., N.Y. 10036
■ tax-exempt, non-profit organization

THE FRENCH VOTE ALEXANDER WERTH

THE
NATION

APRIL 3, 1967 35 cents

BURLINGAME
APR 6 1967
LIBRARY

WINNING HEARTS IN VIETNAM

Instructing the Peasants KARL H. PURNELL

Country Fair EDWARD LAMB

THE DOMINION OF KNOW-HOW

Wealth Attracts Talent RUTH JORRIN
Old Worlds To Conquer HOWE MARTIN

WHERE THE ELITE MEET

MENTS OF THE DISESTABLISHMENT / GEORGE DANGERFIELD
IN THE WASPS' NEST / VERNON K. DIBBLE

BURLINGAME
BURLINGAME
CALIFORNIA 94010
-07
-01
PUB LIBRARY

LETTERS

the only force

Concord, Calif.

DEAR SIR: It must now be clear to most people that the Vietnamese War is not going to be terminated due to the efforts of the "doves" in or out of Congress. . . . There is only one force which can bring this senseless carnage to a halt and that force is the voters of this country . . . albeit the prospects of the electorate taking this stand under the present two political parties seem remote. Most people are mesmerized by the steady propaganda that . . . "we stand ready to go anywhere at any time to negotiate."

This writer would welcome a national ticket in 1968 of Democrat New York Senator Robert Kennedy and Republican Oregon Senator, and former Governor Mark Hatfield or Republican Illinois Senator Charles Percy. Kennedy is without doubt the most popular political leader in the country today, and he has put forth a reasonable approach for a negotiated Vietnamese settlement. Hatfield and Percy are both young, vigorous, able and genuine influential peace advocates. . . . The hour is late. Peaceniks Unite! We have nothing to lose but our war parties.

M. C. Belknap

Civil Service rebuttal

Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: A comprehensive point-by-point commentary on Robert Sherrill's myths ["Washington's Bland Bondage," The Nation, Feb. 20] would take too much of your space and my time, so let me limit myself to those incidents involving the Civil Service Commission's personnel investigations activities:

(1) Sherrill says a young Ph.D. "was asked to explain his presence, eight years previously, at a couple of meetings held by the Labor Youth League and by the Student Socialist Society in Philadelphia. . . . Though he was cleared, he packed up his Ph.D. and quit in a rage." The fact is the man told us he had decided to resign for professional and scientific reasons many weeks before receiving our interrogatory. He asked for rapid disposition of our investigation so as not to resign with a mark on his name. Our decision was favorable to him; his resignation was effective several weeks later.

(2) Sherrill cites the case of a young woman who was "invited to attend (she wasn't accused of attending) a forum sponsored by the Socialist Workers Party of Philadelphia" and of "being on the mailing list of the Socialist Party." He omits the fact that in the young woman's formative years her parents and other close relatives were notorious and active members of the Communist Party and that some of her activities had reflected possible influence of these family members. Contrary to the implication in Sherrill's article, we did not ask her to give an "exposé of her whole family"—rather we recited their extensive Communist activity and asked her to explain the nature and extent of her support thereof.

(3) In citing the case of William X, Sherrill says the "super-patriotism of the Civil Service Commission drives it into comically embarrassing corners." Mr. X was charged with having falsified his application when he stated he had never been a member of the Communist Party, which Sherrill calls "a bizarre accusation considering X's background." He then implies that because X was employed by the House Committee on Un-American Activities for seven years, the charge of membership in the Communist Party was ridiculous. On the contrary, the alleged membership was well established. Because of the remoteness in time of this activity, the original adverse finding was reversed by our Board of Appeals and Review.

(4) Sherrill charges the commission "has so keen an in-

(Continued on page 436)

EDITORIALS

Ky Stole the Show

The Guam conference was a puzzle to many of the best-informed officials and newsmen in Washington. It was called in a slapdash fashion, with no clue as to its purpose. The most plausible explanation is that the motivation was political—as with everything that the President does.

In the Guam episode he apparently came to the conclusion that Robert Kennedy is out to unseat him in 1968. The remedy? A big show across the sea, with the usual amalgam of peace talk and military intensification. Coming just before Easter, it would serve as a launching platform for a spring peace offensive, coupled with further violence on the grand scale which American technology has made possible. A cover story was also available: Mr. Johnson would introduce the new diplomatic team to the big wheels in the South Vietnamese government, and get the credit if the latest measures to subjugate the Vietcong and the North Vietnamese worked, or could be made to seem as if they might work.

So Air Force One took off for Guam, followed by the usual retinue of officials and reporters. But the script was not followed in the subsequent events. The President preached to the South Vietnamese strongmen, commending to them the great task of conducting a national election and making South Vietnam look like a democracy, while power remained in the hands of former collaborators with the French, landlords, profiteers and other members of the old elite. General Thieu and Marshal-Premier Ky harkened. Then Ky sounded off on his own.

Ky is no small-time opportunist. He has come a long way since he was noted only as the foremost Vietnamese clotheshorse and flyboy. The original plan did not even call for his presence in Guam, but once he got himself invited he played his role effectively. In terms of real power he is a puppet of the United States, but for the moment he seemed to be pulling the strings. Negotiate with the Vietcong? Never! Allow Hanoi to go unbombed? Enough of such womanly weakness! He called for war on Cambodia, a blockade or equivalent action to stop the flow of supplies through Haiphong, an invasion of Laos—escalations of his own atop the escalations previously put into effect by Johnson.

One must give Ky credit for gall. He holds power only through command of an air arm furnished by the United States, his army has been relegated to a rural "pacification" role while Americans do the major part of the fighting, but he does not hesitate to lay down the strategic blueprint for which Americans must pay, fight and die.

The following day Ky assumed the role of the moderate man. Hitler, whom he once said he admired, may have been his model. Hitler could suggest that the Ukraine should belong to Germany and vow simultaneously that no German mother would weep for the loss of her son. Ky took cognizance of the Johnson habiliments of peace and threw a few such rags about himself, just to maintain amity among allies and reassure the American public, in case it was beginning to wonder who runs this war.

Arriving back in Washington, the President was described by reporters at the airport as the leader of an exhausted and perplexed team. No one, including Mr. Johnson himself, seemed to know why the Guam meeting had been arranged. The outstanding fact of the conference, he said, was Ky's presentation of a constitution "that is really in being." Probably not one newsman present believed that this document would lead to a transfer of power from the military to a civilian government which might conceivably negotiate with the National Liberation Front. But it is unthinkable to laugh out loud at a Presidential press conference.

What Next?

After the events of the past few weeks, peace in Vietnam seems further away than ever. The prospect is for an indefinite prolongation of the struggle. North Vietnam demands a cessation of bombing and other acts of war before it will talk. The United States, through President Johnson, demands prior proof that all infiltration from the North has stopped before it will agree to stop bombing the North and adding to its troop strength in the South. As Sen. Robert Kennedy points out, Mr. Johnson has raised the ante repeatedly as U.S. military strength in the South has increased. But neither the Democratic Republic of Vietnam (the North) nor the National Liberation Front shows any signs of caving in. What, then, will be Mr. Johnson's next move?

It is not difficult to forecast. Bombing the North has not brought victory and shows no signs of subduing the enemy. All that remains, then, is to invade North Vietnam, as Korea was invaded at Inchon.

All Washington is talking along these lines. Sen. Mike Mansfield brings the question to the fore while cautiously advising against such a venture. He points out that three of the four elements of an invasion are already present. We are extending the bombing of North Vietnam by dropping mines into the rivers in the southern part of the country, we are shooting across the now misnamed demilitarized zone with 175-millimeter artillery, and elements of the Seventh Fleet are shelling the coast of North Vietnam. The probable invasion site would be somewhat north of the 17th Parallel, and some reports of North Vietnamese troop movements indicate that Hanoi expects an incursion in that neighborhood.

Rep. George Brown of California made a valiant effort to forestall such an eventuality. He offered an amendment to the supplemental appropriations bill, providing additional billions for the prosecution of the war: "None of the funds appropriated in this act shall be available

IN THIS ISSUE

April 3, 1967

EDITORIALS

418

ARTICLES

422 French Vote: Why Be Surprised?

Alexander Werth

The Dominion of Know-How:

425 Wealth Attracts Talent

Ruth Jorrin

427 Old Worlds To Conquer

Howe Martyn

429 Mississippi: Starving by the Rule Book

*Richard A. Cloward
and Frances Fox Piven*

Winning Hearts in Vietnam:

434 Instructing the Peasants

Karl H. Purnell

435 Country Fair

Edward Lamb

BOOKS & THE ARTS

437 Gents of the Disestablishment George Dangerfield

438 The Red House (poem) John Haines

439 In the Wasps' Nest Vernon K. Dibble

441 America Absurd Elmer Bendiner

442 A Representative Lowell Calvin Bedient

444 Theatre Harold Clurman

444 The Exchange (poem) David Ignatow

445 Music Benjamin Boretz

447 Crossword Puzzle Frank W. Lewis

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Copy Editor
MARION HESS

Theatre
HAROLD CLURMAN

Art
MAX KOZLOFF

Music
BENJAMIN BORETZ

Science
CARL DREHER

Advertising Manager
MARY SIMON

Associate Publisher
GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Associate Editor
PHIL KERBY

Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIAS

Poetry Editor
MICHAEL GOLDMAN

Washington
ROBERT G. SHERRILL

Paris
ALEXANDER WERTH

London
RAYMOND WILLIAMS

Bonn
C. AMERY

Canberra
C. P. FITZGERALD

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July and August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1967 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel.: CH 2-8400. West Coast office: 1434 Westwood Boulevard, Los Angeles, Calif. 90024. Tel.: GR 4-3547. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give four weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE
NATION
Combined with FRONTIER

Vol. 204
No. 14

for the implementation of any plan to invade North Vietnam with ground forces of the United States, except in time of war." The amendment was defeated, 123 to 2, and the funds were appropriated unconditionally, 385 to 11, with thirty-six abstentions.

If the President decides on an invasion of North Vietnam, he might be willing to request a declaration of war. The present undeclared war is unpopular. Politically it is a millstone around Mr. Johnson's neck, and one may be sure that he will be reluctant to go into the campaign of 1968 thus handicapped. With a declaration in his hands, he can run as a war President, calling on the nation to rally around the flag (which he will have wrapped about his ample frame). Dissent will become not merely unpopular but dangerous. Opponents will no longer be Nervous Nellies but something not far removed from traitors.

Senator Mansfield warned that even a limited invasion of North Vietnam (which is no doubt the way it would begin) might bring China into the war. It might result in a papering over of the split between the Soviet Union and China. MacArthur thought he could approach the Yalu without bringing China's armies down into Korea; he proved to be mistaken. Those military strategists who counsel an invasion may likewise prove to be mistaken, but they are willing to take a chance.

A majority of the American people have submitted with scarcely a murmur to repeated escalations of the war, each seemingly insignificant in itself but bulking large in cumulative effect. Unless they rally soon, their option in the 1968 election may be foreclosed. If they realize then what they have let themselves in for, it will be too late.

Twenty Years Later

Marking the twentieth anniversary of the Truman Doctrine, the University of Salonika recently conferred an honorary degree on former President Truman. At almost the same time, the Senate finally ratified the Consular Treaty which we had signed with the Soviet Union in 1964. The vote was 66 to 28—just three votes more than the required two-thirds majority. It seems hard to believe, but it is apparently a fact, that this is the first bilateral treaty entered into between the U.S. and the USSR. So at last we have taken—half-heartedly, timidly—■ first step that should have been taken twenty years ago.

Was this long delay necessary? We shall never know, but what we do know is that the more closely the record is examined, the clearer it becomes that the fault was by no means all on the Russian side. A series of recent studies, of which Martin F. Herz's Beginnings of the Cold War is the latest, strongly suggest that a re-evaluation of the attitudes and assumptions on which the cold war was projected should have top priority on today's political agenda. We debate Vietnam but Vietnam is an incident—the ghastliest yet, but still only an incident in the pursuit of cold-war policies. In a recent speech, Philip Klutznick, who served at the United Nations during Adlai Stevenson's ambassadorship, urged the nation to reassess its "political motivations" in Vietnam. Mr. Klutznick declared: "To those who say, 'But we can't quit Vietnam now,' I must ask, 'if it is in our national interest, why not?' We have permitted our Vietnam commitment to control our foreign policy instead of foreign policy determining the extent of our Vietnam commitment."

The tragedy of our position in Vietnam is that we are waging war there as though our main purpose were to demonstrate the awesome military power we command. This is not a policy; waging war is the best evidence that policy has failed. In proclaiming the Truman Doctrine, Mr. Truman did not intend that we should become the world's policeman, but the military distortion was always latent in a policy which assumed that we must "fight," by cold-war techniques, forces in the postwar world that we regard as threatening. After twenty years it should be possible to see that there might have been a quite different approach to the problem we then faced. "The problem of our age," Conor Cruise O'Brien wrote recently (Commonweal, March 3), "is not how to stop, fight or eradicate communism. It is how to cope with its challenges and its appeals in such a way that the competing systems on the planet may produce more benefits to mankind than threats and sufferings." It is for the want of such a policy that we are at war in Vietnam.

Saying 'No' to Power

Lord Acton's maxim has not only been quoted to the point of no response, it is also probably not a remark of the first relevance. Power tends to corrupt, but so do hunger, passion, terror, frustration. Indeed, for those who are susceptible, life itself is a corrupting experience. Perhaps new force can be gained for the old saying by eliding it: power tends to become absolute. And men meanwhile do not tend to become omniscient.

That is the plight into which we have fallen. It avails us nothing, it only makes us miserable, to consider whether, and to what degree, Messrs. Johnson, Rusk and McNamara have become corrupt. The crux is that they have now attained to absolute power without receiving the grace of absolute wisdom.

It is not likely that the men in question see matters in this light; it is much more probable that they view themselves as public servants spending themselves without stint in the nation's service. It is notable, for example, that Secretary Rusk not long ago was willing to meet with a group of college students to discuss with them misgivings about the Vietnamese War that they had expressed in a letter to the President. But what was the effect of this encounter? According to Gregory Craig, president of the Harvard Undergraduate Council, who was there, the students entered the meeting, many of them, willing and eager to be convinced that their country's acts were motivated by reason; without exception, he says, they left the room in a state of shock. They had not met a man, they had witnessed a presence; they had not been informed, they had been checked. It was not just that Rusk repeated what they had heard before, it was that what they said Rusk appeared not to hear at all. They had tried to communicate with power, which is like exchanging confidences with a dynamo.

The voice of power—flat, implacable, uninflected by the course of events or the outcries of dissidents—is now heard in Congressional committees, in the press, in diplomatic letters and official statements. It cannot be answered, it cannot be refuted, it cannot even be asked to explain itself. Power is not equipped with receptors.

The conduct of our foreign affairs by the agents of absolute power has produced in others a spirit of dissent for dissent's sake, what Crosby Noyes in the Washington Star has called "compulsive opposition." The obvious danger of this reaction, as he points out, is that dissent is valued more for its dramatic effect than for its responsibility, and confirms the President and his aides in their conviction that the truth resides in them alone.

Still, good men, wise men, compassionate men without number have testified to the evil and the futility of the war in Vietnam. Skillful tacticians have suggested ways to end it. Their cause is futile because they are attacking a symptom of power, when they should be throwing themselves at power itself. No man in power today created the situation: it is an accident of the nuclear bomb, our oath of allegiance to an explosive device. Some Presidents back, we equipped the White House with a button to push, and all else has followed.

The logistics of ballistic warfare, we thought, rendered the process of democratic government obsolete. But nuclear-headed missiles are not at issue in Vietnam, and were not at issue in Santo Domingo, and will not be at issue in the other of the world's "trouble spots" that Mr. Rusk recently marked for our future attention. Yet due process has disappeared from our behavior in all these areas, and power is our only gesture. There is no honor in it and there will be no honor in our national policy until government unseats power. In the first place that is the task of Congress, and ultimately it is the task of the people. Only a democracy can say no to power—and that only while democracy survives.

Kidding the Consumer

In Europe, as Rep. Benjamin S. Rosenthal (D., N.Y.) has recently pointed out (Congressional Record, March 8), businessmen generally accept the idea that "the efficient functioning of a free economy is facilitated by governmental efforts to inform consumers and protect their interests." In Sweden and Norway, consumers are represented by cabinet-level departments, and in the field of consumer information almost every European government engages in product testing and publicizes the results, or subsidizes consumer organizations to do the work. A Swedish government-sponsored program engages in product testing, informative labeling, household research and consumer education, and receives complaints regarding below-standard goods. Britain is adopting the "Teltag" labeling system to enable people to buy intelligently. Only in this country are such programs regarded as aimed at the destruction of the free-enterprise system.

Miss Betty Furness, queen of the TV commercials and the President's new adviser on consumer affairs, is not likely to urge him to adopt Teltag or anything else that would antagonize business. But for make-believe consumer protection Mr. Johnson could hardly have made a better selection, and Miss Furness will no doubt contribute to his popularity among soap opera devotees. It is unlikely that housewives' strikes will be encouraged, or that prices will go down, or quality up. It is just another case of image making, only a bit more blatant than anything of the kind that Johnson has done lately.

Bugging the Press

The following dispatch, published on page 3 of The New York Times, March 2, is reprinted in full:

Special to The New York Times, ATHENS, March 1. Two United States diplomats walked out of a foreign press luncheon here today minutes before Andreas Papandreou, Greece's most controversial leftist politician, made a sharp attack on the U.S.

A spokesman for the American embassy said the two officials, John G. Day, a political officer, and Richard W. Helgerson, information officer, had left after reading the text of Mr. Papandreou's address distributed shortly before he spoke.

The spokesman said the text contained "uncalled-for criticism of American domestic and foreign policy."

A Reuters agency dispatch on the same story filled in the glaring gaps in the New York Times dispatch:

ATHENS, March 1 (Reuters). Two United States diplomats walked out today on a luncheon meeting during which Mr. Andreas Papandreou attacked American policy in Vietnam.

Mr. Papandreou, speaking to foreign correspondents, said the CIA, in essence, has embarked on an independently parallel foreign policy for the United States. At one point in his speech, Mr. Papandreou said that for American youth the U.S. presence in Vietnam represented a first class error. And he said the United States has always looked forward to the establishment of complete control over the affairs of its allies.

In addition, Mr. Papandreou said the CIA takes on responsibilities and missions far beyond the basic purposes for which it was established and is now free of government control. . . .

CONSTANTINE POULOS

French Vote: Why Be Surprised?

ALEXANDER WERTH

Paris

What I find particularly surprising is the enormous surprise that the near defeat of the Gaullists has caused almost everywhere abroad. The French press today is recalling with some irony American, British and other foreign comments, only a few days before the second round of elections, to the effect that France is, and always will be, Gaullist, that "we've got to live with de Gaulle, whether we like it or not," and so on, and so on. One must conclude that with rare exceptions the foreign press has for several years now been mesmerized by de Gaulle; that it has assumed that France is Gaullist, without troubling to look closely at France.

Correspondents here have also tended to identify de Gaulle with the Gaullists—that is, with all those hundreds of parliamentary candidates who ran under the "Fifth Republic" label—and that too was a mistake. This election was not a plebiscite for or against de Gaulle; to put it in the simplest possible terms, it was just a traditional French contest between Right and Left. It would not be accurate to say that all the people who fought under the Left "Federation" label were good leftists, or that those who figured as "Fifth Republic" men, or "Gaullists" were all dyed-in-the-wool conservatives or reactionaries in the usual sense. It is more complicated than that but, by and large, the Right-vs.-Left alignment covers the situation.

It is true, of course, that in the 1962 election the Gaullists did much better in terms of seats than they did this time; but, even then, together with their allies (notably the Giscard d'Estaing conservatives), they polled no more than 45 per cent of the total votes in the run-off round. And that was at a time when the Algerian War had just ended, when right-wing terrorism was still rife (only a few weeks earlier, de Gaulle had narrowly escaped assassination), and when a strong hand at the helm was considered more indispensable than ever. But it is also worth recalling that in the first round of that same election, the Gaullists proper secured only 32 per cent of the votes. If, in the second round, the Gaullist vote rose steeply, it was because there was a genuine desire for law and order, after months of bomb throwing. Moreover, there still remained in the country a general distaste for the impotence of the Fourth Republic, which had died only four years before. When de Gaulle warned the electorate against the danger of a return to "the old instability," it was bound to make an impression.

Moreover, in the Presidential election of December, 1965, de Gaulle secured less than 44 per cent of the votes in the first round, the "Left" and Communist-supported Mitterrand closely following with 32 per cent, and the "European" Jean Lecanuet with nearly 16 per cent. Even in the straight de Gaulle-Mitterrand run-off, the General got only 55 per cent. Add to this various local elections, such as those of February, 1965 (in which foreign policy was no issue), and in which the Gaullists did remarkably badly, and it is clear that in home affairs there has always been a strong and consistent opposition to the Gaullists, if not so much to de Gaulle himself.

In examining the results of the recent election, one must distinguish between votes and seats. The number of votes cast for the Gaullists and their immediate allies in the first round was about 38 per cent, or almost exactly the same as in 1962; in the second round it was about 43 per cent, or slightly lower than in 1962. This last figure applies, of course, only to those constituencies where no one was elected in the first round, and where, very often, the Gaullists were not in a favored position. Some of the safest Gaullist seats had been secured in the first round, when sixty-three of the seventy-nine deputies who won majorities were Gaullists. This seemingly triumphal first round was what encouraged superficial commentators to imagine that a Gaullist victory in the second round was a foregone conclusion.

This supposition ignored many important facts. Not only has there been a growing interest in political affairs—the real "awakening" dates back to the Presidential election of 1965, with its lively and often violent disputes on radio and television—but also this time the left-wing forces were organized much better than previously to pool their resources in the second round.

It would be exaggerating to say that the general public was passionately interested in the late election—as it was, for example, in the 1936 election which resulted in a victory of the Popular Front. All the same, in a number of "test" constituencies the battles were of more than just local significance. Thus, the whole nation watched Grenoble, where Mendès-France opposed the Gaullist candidate, and there was similar interest in the fight of the leftist journalist, Claude Estier, in Montmartre against "strong man" Sanguinetti, de Gaulle's Minister for War Veterans. There was also a considerable audience all over the country for the election speeches made by the various leaders on radio and TV.

But the most significant aspect of the election was the pact for the second round made among all the "left-wing" forces. I put "left wing" in quotes deliberately, for some altogether improbable people found themselves inside the left-wing Federation, there to benefit from Communist support in the second round. Among them were such recent ultra-colonialist "Socialists" as Guy Mollet, Max Lejeune and Robert Lacoste (the guiltiest of all the Guilty Men of the Algerian War); even that "radical" fossil, the nearly 80-year-old Georges Bonnet, France's inglorious Foreign Minister of the Munich days, was on the bandwagon. Many of the local Communists in his Dordogne constituency thought that voting for Bonnet in the name of "republican discipline" was really going rather far, and abstained; enough, however, went to the polls to get him elected. Another important feature in this election was the position taken up by many followers of M. Lecanuet, the "Atlantic," "European" and "pro-American" leader. Most of these supporters of his "Democratic Center" were Christian-Democrat (MRP) people; and in the second round many of them supported the "Left," rather than the Gaullist, candidate. This was one of the relatively rare instances when considerations of foreign policy determined the voter's choice, the Lecanuet people (despite their anti-communism) often supporting the potentially more "European" Left. But—and this is important—Lecanuet's "pro-American" and "European" poll now dropped from 16 per cent in the Presidential election to 13 per cent in the first round, and 7 per cent in the second.

Le Canard Enchaîné

De Gaulle's Ministers Scavenging for a Majority. From the Left: Frey, Debré, Pompidou, Malraux

On the whole, the alliance between the Left Federation (Socialists, some radicals and other nominally left-of-Center groups) on the one hand, and the Communists on the other, worked very well—though it would be untrue to say that the voters everywhere closely followed the "instructions" from the leaders who had made the pact: many Left or left-of-Center voters still had inhibitions about voting for a Communist in the second round; some Communists undoubtedly preferred to vote for the Gaullist rather than for a "phony leftist." Still, thanks to this pact, the Communists increased their seats in the new Assembly from forty-one to seventy-three, and the Left Federation rose from eighty-nine to 116.

What is historically interesting is the re-emergence of the Communists from the political ghetto into which they had been driven in 1947, in the days of the Truman Doctrine and the Marshall Plan. Now they are once again a "respectable" political party, entering into explicit alliances with Socialists and other "democratic" forces. The Communists in France, with more than 5 million votes, now represent about 23 per cent of the French electorate, a rise from 22 per cent in 1962 and from 18.5 per cent (their all-time postwar low) in 1958.

There are several reasons for the Communist success. First, de Gaulle himself has helped to make them respectable by establishing highly friendly relations with the Soviet Union, which he considers in a way a natural ally of France and a "national," rather than a "revolutionary" country. Second, the French Communists themselves have greatly changed since the days of Maurice Thorez when they persisted in their stand as the most sectarian and "Stalinist" Communist Party in the West. Today, under Waldeck-Rochet, who succeeded to leadership when Thorez died in 1964, the Communists have become an increasingly "national" party, adopting a polycentrist line not unlike that of Togliatti in Italy. Waldeck-Rochet speaks with a broad Burgundy accent which makes him sound like a French equivalent of a Kansas City politician. When he says, in that accent: "Sure, we are a revolutionary party, but in France we seek revolution only by democratic means." everybody—or nearly everybody—is greatly reassured, and well prepared to believe that the French Communists have chosen the "French way," and that 23 per cent of the electorate can't possibly be agents of Moscow. And even Moscow no longer scares anybody; as one commentator remarked at the time of Kossygin's visit: "The most reassuring thing about it is to see Mr. Kossygin wear a hat like Mr. Eden's."

Altogether, in the first round (the best indication of the voters' real wishes), the Communist and other Left forces got nearly 10 million votes among them; the Gaullists, 8.5 million; the Lecanuet "Center" nearly 3 million, and "others" (mostly right-wing) about 1 million. In the second round—that is, in the 404 constituencies where no one had been elected—the Communist and other Left forces got more than 8.5 million votes; the Gaullists (who had made big gains in the first round) nearly 8 million votes; the Center only 1.3 million, and "other" rightists about 0.8 million.

In many constituencies victories were won (mostly by the Left) by very narrow margins of a few hundred or even a few dozen votes. Thus, Couve de Murville lost by a handful of votes to a "centrist" candidate. These numerous "accidents" were one of the imponderable factors in this election; they also helped make the opinion polls look particularly foolish. But the net result of the election is still fairly clear: at least a small majority of the French electorate is not satisfied with the Gaullists' domestic policy—not satisfied with the social conservatism, the shortage of teachers and school buildings, hospitals, etc. There is today a glut of luxury apartments in Paris and a shortage of low-rent houses. And if the accidental defeat of Couve de Murville cannot in any sense be regarded as a vote against de Gaulle's foreign policy, the defeat of M. Messmer, the Minister of Defense, may be regarded at least partly as a vote against the expensive and not perhaps very effective force de frappe, which the Left would like to scrap.

The new Assembly will look rather different from the last one where, with 282 seats, the Gaullists and their allies had a large majority. Now they have only 244, the most precarious majority imaginable. It is too early to say what other right-wing or Center members they may win or buy over to increase their working effectiveness. In any case, there seems no alternative to a Gaullist government; the Left, Communists included, certainly hasn't enough deputies to form a cabinet. A more important question is whether this election marks the beginning of a long-term disintegration of the Gaullists as the government party. What really holds together this strange assortment of first- second- and third-generation Gaullists is the General himself; will the peculiar "technocratic" style of the young Gaullists and the historic mystique of the older Gaullists survive the General—who is now in his 77th year?

De Gaulle is clearly fed up with the election results. The "parties," whom he has so consistently despised, have made a rather impressive comeback. It is too early to say what will happen when the new Assembly meets. It is possible that de Gaulle may seek a convenient opportunity or pretext for holding a new election, which might be more favorable to the Gaullists, but that is not likely to happen in the very near future.

An issue that is apt to be settled sooner is whether de Gaulle, impressed by the support given to the Left, will embark on a more generous social policy—which alone might now improve the Gaullists' long-term prospects—or whether, on the contrary, he contemplates turning the present relatively liberal, live-and-let-live regime into a much tougher one. Although there are, especially among the older Gaullists, quite a few near-Fascist thugs (one of them, M. Sanguinetti, was well beaten), my own guess is that de Gaulle will decide for a more generous social policy. His economic conservatism and social stinginess are the real reasons for the Gaullists' election setback (not to say defeat). In the area of foreign policy, the French people have no quarrel with de Gaulle. On some questions, like Vietnam, they are, one might even say, 100 per cent with him. However, Vietnam was not an election issue; schools, houses and hospitals were. And so also—though perhaps to only a minor extent—was the force de frappe. The French love prestige, provided it doesn't cost too much. One can, however, be sure that whatever concessions de Gaulle makes, he will not budge one inch on the national deterrent issue. Apart from that, one can be sure that his next moves will be made with his eyes fixed on History.

THE DOMINION OF KNOW-HOW

The most fashionable subject of discussion in Europe at the moment, reports Thomas W. Ottenad in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, is the "technology gap." But the "technology gap" and its twin, the "brain drain," are merely two closely related aspects of a many-faceted subject. Both are related to the overseas expansion of American investment capital and the problem of "development" in the underdeveloped world. In one sense, it can be plausibly argued (as in New Society, London, February 9, 1967) that the quickest way for Britain to overcome the "technology gap" would be to encourage the invasion of American investment capital. But there is more to the problem than relative technological advantage. No country likes to feel that it is in process of surrendering effective control of its economy. Despite voluntary restraints which Washington has been urging on industry, U.S. investment in Europe has been growing at the rate of $11 million a day or $4 billion a year, a process which Newsweek has labeled "The Great American Purchase."

Superior technology and know-how have been key factors in fueling this remarkable expansion. In civilian research, we outspend the European nations in the ratio of about 1.5 to 1, but in military and space research we spend four times more than they do. And those who have studied the matter contend that there is a definite "spinoff" to the civilian economy from military and space research, particularly from the latter. German Finance Minister Franz Josef Strauss estimates that every dollar spent on space research ten years ago is worth four times as much in economic value today. Heavy spending on military and space research—in effect an aspect of our foreign policy—stimulates the "brain drain" not only from European nations to this country but from the underdeveloped nations to this country and to Europe. And nowadays there is also a "patent drain": Europe pays $500 million a year more for American patent rights than the United States pays for European rights—a deficit, as Newsweek reports, twice as big as it was five years ago. In a sense what is under discussion is not so much the "free flow of capital" or the problem of adjusting currencies or technologies; the real phenomenon at issue is the functioning of the New American Imperium.

We discuss here the "brain drain" and "technology gap." In a subsequent issue, James Boyd will report on how these matters are viewed at the United Nations and what the UN specialized agencies are doing about them. For the associated problems relate not merely to the upsurge of American power but to the widening gap between rich and poor countries about which we have commented so often, for so many years. As Fred Hoyle points out in the John Danz lectures (published as Of Men and Galaxies, University of Washington Press): "The Communist-anti-Communist theme, so easily whipped up in this country, is not going to be one of the issues that will affect the future of the world in any real marked degree. The real issues, I believe, rest on the impossibility of a long-term favorable future for the human species if different parts of the earth remain in grossly different stages of development. On a long-term basis it simply is not possible to contemplate a life of prosperity and luxury in a few favorable cases on earth existing permanently alongside poverty and starvation everywhere else." The Editors

Wealth Attracts Talent

RUTH JORRIN

Mrs. Jorrin is a free-lance writer from England who has lived in this country for the past seven years.

We are in an age when education has become a necessity for survival rather than a privilege of the elite. And we are on the threshold of an era when learning will be extended to the whole of human society. The effects of this extension are already beginning to be felt.

Throughout the world the opportunity for a secondary education is expanding, and with this development comes the demand from individuals for education beyond the high school level. What happens when a person in, say, India, Korea, Argentina or Iran wishes to pursue his studies in the arts, the natural and social sciences or medicine? He finds in his own country overcrowded, understaffed and underequipped universities, and is forced to look elsewhere for his training. He turns to the scientifically and technologically advanced countries; in most cases he turns to the United States.

According to figures compiled by the National Science Foundation from 1952 to 1961, more than 30,000 trained engineers, 9,000 scientists and 14,000 physicians and surgeons came from other countries to settle permanently in the United States. The immigration of these 53,000 trained persons has been estimated as a net saving to the United States of about $2 billion, which would have been spent to train a corresponding number of domestic talent.

In 1965, furthermore, changes in the immigration laws put an end to the "national-origins" quota system and gave priority on the basis of skills instead of ancestry. The effect is that, while exporting to the underdeveloped countries the materials with which they may build their bridges, schools and hospitals, we take from them the creative talent essential to a growing society.

It is a hard decision to cut oneself off from the ties and traditions of one's native environment and adopt new and alien ways. The motives may be as personal as the desire to see one's children grow up in a healthy social climate, free from discrimination of race, religion or politics; they may be the desire for equal professional opportunity, for political and economic stability. Above all, the student returning home from training abroad requires to be assured that there is a place for him. He wants assurance that his new knowledge will be valued, that he can contribute to the improvement of the standards of his country, and receive adequate compensation for his work.

Unfortunately, the majority of students returning to the less developed countries find their newly acquired knowledge of little use to themselves or to their country because the relevant working conditions and facilities are not available. A graduate student returning to India may be one of the lucky 10 per cent who find employment in his field. More probably, he will find himself among the other 90 per cent who work at such obscure jobs as clerk-typists in the various ministries.

Another factor that makes exiles of these students—the absence of a scientific tradition at home—has been commented upon by Dr. Stevan Dedijer, formerly director of the Boris Kidrich Institute of Nuclear Sciences in Belgrade:

It is frequently, and on the whole correctly, asserted that a tradition of scientific research is lacking in underdeveloped countries. . . . It is a matter of attitudes towards discovery, capacities to perceive problems, to sense the relevance of theories and observations, and vice versa. It is in part a frame of mind, which emanates from one person, which is received, perhaps through identification, by another person and which is constantly renewed and revised. If scientific policy is to be made effectively it must take into account the necessity of implanting and continuously reproducing the tradition of science, that paradoxical combination of continuity and innovation which is at the centre of scientific growth. . . .

Thus scientific talent tends to stay in an environment where it can function productively instead of returning home with a pocketful of dreams. And, in effect, the prescience cultures suffer a "brain drain" of their highly trained people. For the emerging countries this situation is termed a "national catastrophe" by Dr. Charles V. Kidd of the United States Council for Science and Technology: "Not only are the talents of the individuals as scientists lost, but the nucleus of people who alone can build an indigenous base for science is dissipated."

Punch

"Actually, We're Over Here To Recruit Doctors, Nurses and Trained Scientists."

The effect of a skilled person's departure from the local scene can also be measured by the extent of his co-workers' dependency on his particular skills, and by the length of time required to train his replacement. An engineer may leave many workers idle until his successor is trained. Between 1957 and 1961, South America lost 1,556 engineers, 213 chemists, 21 physicists and 47 biologists to the United States. The Asian migration to the United States for the same period was 1,810 engineers, 231 chemists, 61 physicists and 40 biologists. Out of 4,757 Taiwan students in all fields at present studying in the United States, only 46 returned home in 1961, and out of the total of 10,000 students studying abroad it is estimated that less than 10 per cent return. One must remember that these figures date from the period before the United States immigration laws were changed to favor the admittance of highly trained persons.

The picture is hardly more reassuring in the field of medicine. The Philippines, where the ratio is one doctor for every 12,000 inhabitants, provide hospitals in the United States (where the ratio is 750 inhabitants per doctor) with 2,108 residents and interns. For Nigeria's 30 million population, there are approximately 540 physicians and a ratio of one physician for every 56,000 inhabitants. Yet in 1963, sixteen Nigerian doctors were serving as residents or interns in United States hospitals.

The Educational Council for Foreign Medical Graduates estimates that almost 11,000 of the 41,102 residents and interns serving in American hospitals are graduates of foreign medical schools, three-quarters of them from the developing countries. But then, as Dr. Howard A. Rusk of the Bellevue Medical Center states, "we simply do not have enough U.S. physicians to meet our hospitals' needs."

The Advisory Committee on Medical Research of the Pan-American Health Organization met in Washington in June, 1966, and on the subject of the migration of Latin American physicians to the United States, stated:

The gain by the United States is substantial. Even ignoring the Cuban migration, it would take three academic medical centers of average size to produce this many physicians (300 per year). To say nothing of the cost of building three teaching medical centers, it would cost more than $15 million annually to operate them. The dollar value of this manpower approximately equals the cost of all U.S. medical assistance to Latin America.

It could be argued that student immigration to the United States is not a loss to the source country at all, since at home these trained people would have been unable to make an effective contribution. Abroad, they may follow scholarly and scientific pursuits of eventual benefit to society as a whole. In the same vein it could be argued that science in the United States has been invigorated by the migration of European scientists, that science as a whole is stimulated by the movement of people. But the technological revolution that we are now experiencing emphasizes dramatically that the economic health of a nation depends upon the use it makes of its intellectual power. The regions that fail intellectually will surely fail economically and remain poor and dependent upon those that are intellectually advanced.

Prof. Paul Ritterband of the Department of Sociology,

Britain simply cannot afford to train doctors who leave Britain afterwards—HEALTH MINISTER'S WARNING

Daily Mirror (England)

"Never Mind About Why I Haven't Emigrated . . . Just Undress and Shut Up!"

Columbia University, gives the example of the illiterate raggicker in the United States who "will have a higher real income than a man with a similar job in India precisely because of the contribution of the nonilliterates to the United States economy. Both men perform the same task, yet they are differentially compensated based upon the greater affluence of one country." It therefore seems essential that some brake be placed on the movement of talent away from the very countries needing it most, and that these countries should at least have a more nearly equal chance of keeping their skilled persons.

The migration of talent, especially in the field of science and technology, reduces the effectiveness of the talent that remains. In the words of Dr. Kidd, "A scientist is typically not only a producer of scientific findings. He is generally also a teacher and a provider of services of various kinds. . . . Scientists in poor countries bear a heavy responsibility for changing basic cultural values and for establishing and changing institutions."

The accusation has been made that some American corporations, talent scouting abroad, are taking on the image of the old army recruitment posters with Uncle Sam pointing that accusing finger at whatever bright young foreign student happens to be passing. This sort of campaigning does not sit well with the powers that be in Delhi or Dakar. The day may be near when the strain of the brain drain will be felt in American foreign policy.

The European case differs from the Asian, African or Latin American in that the skilled and experienced manpower is there and has a tradition to work in. After the destruction and chaos of World War II, in the words of Cornell President James A. Perkins, "Europe did not have to be invented; it only had to be remembered." But despite Europe's advantage over the less developed areas, it too begins to feel the pinch of lost brain power. A recent survey indicated that almost half the male upper-classmen at Cambridge University were seriously considering emigration, and more than 10 per cent had definitely decided to leave Great Britain permanently. In a technologically advanced country like Great Britain this loss of trained manpower leaves an immediate gap, as opposed to the potential one left in a pre-science culture.

We live in a rich world, but for most it is still a distressingly poor world. The 1960s were designated as the Development Decade by the United Nations. During the three remaining years some 9 million human beings will die of starvation and malnutrition. The time is at hand when measures must be taken to narrow the margin between backward and advanced countries. The rising resentment that developing countries feel on discovering that they are losing their talent is a healthy sign of the growing awareness that priority must be given to this problem. These countries are coming to see that they must sacrifice present needs in other areas of the economy to devote maximum resources for the big scientific and technological jump forward. One way to achieve this is to build regional scientific centers in underdeveloped areas. Such joint research projects would create facilities whose cost would otherwise be prohibitive for individual countries. Although this task is difficult and politically delicate, the potential rewards are enormous.

Last October, Sen. Walter Mondale of Minnesota introduced a bill in Congress which included a proposal to authorize grants in the amount of $5 million to United States institutions of higher education for programs involving students for developing countries. These programs would relate specifically to the needs of the home country and to the professional and occupational problems of the returning students. They would avoid an education which admirably fits graduates to become engineers for IBM or professors at American institutions, but causes them to lose contact with their homelands. Another proposal in the bill would make $5 million available in grants or loans to developing countries for the promotion of experimental projects and operations designed to provide returning students with improved opportunities to carry on their careers.

Other steps in the right direction would be the education of scientists to the highest possible level at home before sending them abroad (the earlier they leave their countries the easier it is for them to become expatriates); closer contact between students abroad and their home countries through recruiting programs and the publicizing of employment opportunities abroad; stricter control of visas through bilateral agreements, although minimum reliance should be placed upon direct prohibitions on the movement of people. The goal sought is that local talent should have a free choice between staying or going, and should not be forced into migration by lack of stimulation and the feelings of isolation and frustration that arise from inadequate opportunities to create and serve.

Old Worlds To Conquer

HOWE MARTYN

Mr. Martyn is professor of international business and director of the International Business Research Laboratory, The American University. He is the author of International Business (Free Press).

The power and the profits obtainable from knowledge are being pursued in our era as 300 years ago the Spanish conquerors pursued Aztec and Inca gold. The profits from knowledge benefit the people, thus serving a government purpose, and they strengthen governments by increasing their tax revenues. Knowledge also makes direct contributions to the power of governments, ranging from more efficient administration to more deadly weapons.

The phase of knowledge that yields power and profits is technology. This involves practice as well as study, and conditions of opportunity and incentive which have been found more frequently thus far in private enterprise than in governmental institutions. Many governments complain that their nations are handicapped in the pursuit of prosperity and security by a technology gap between them and the most advanced countries, particularly the United States, and that this gap is growing. There is, however, another, deeper gap. This is between pure and applied knowledge, between the universities and industry, between research and development. The superiority of the United States is attributable to closing this gap by creating research and development in the innovational company. The needs of other countries can be met only by activity at a deeper level than that of governments or inter-governmental agencies. The most successful existing medium for spreading and plowing in technology is the multinational firm with its affiliated companies in many countries.

National governments, impressed by the power of knowledge shown in aerospace, and by its profits shown in automation, food processing, synthetics and pharmaceuticals (from penicillin to the birth-control pill), have become deeply concerned about their knowledge resources. Access to technology has become as important as access to petroleum in the strategies and struggles of national governments. They are crying alarm that the "technology gap" is placing even comparatively advanced Britain, Canada, France and West Germany at a grave disadvantage in competition with the United States and the USSR. Prime Minister Harold Wilson has cited a threat of "domination, or in the last resort subjugation," by American industrial technology as a reason for joining the Common Market.

Governments are seeking political solutions for this problem, both in national policies to promote technology and in demands for inter-governmental assistance. Canadian Trade Minister Robert Winters has included support for Canadian research in a list of "Guiding Principles of Good Corporate Behaviour" in a letter addressed to foreign company subsidiaries. President de Gaulle backs talk with action, using French economic planning to foster domestic industry and restrain foreign investment. The subject has reached the conference table of the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development. In an apparent effort to mollify allied governments, President Johnson has directed a committee (established December 2, 1966) under his science adviser, Dr. Donald F. Hornig, to investigate the "technology gap."

Paradoxically, the alarm of national governments appears to arise in part because the "technology gap" is being rapidly filled. Their objections turn from the gap itself to the way it is being met—by subsidiaries of companies owned abroad, and with technology that appears, therefore, to be of foreign origin. There are two reasons for political distrust of this imported technology. One is that the springs of knowledge threaten to become concentrated in a very few countries. Possible sources at home dry up; exploration ceases; the best brains are drawn off to Boston or Berkeley. The Canadian Minister of Industry, C. M. Drury, has said: "Undue reliance on imported technology can impose definite limitations on the future viability and growth of Canadian industry. Any industry which is dependent on licensed or imported technology will lag behind the current state of the art and hence forfeit the rewards which stem from technical leadership. Moreover, it is generally accepted that industry must actively engage in research and development in order to assimilate and successfully exploit new technology." This same theme has been expressed by Robert Marjolin, president of the European Economic Community Commission.

The other fear is that a foreign subsidiary may be used

Padry, Aux Ecoutes (Paris): Ben Roth

"No . . . No . . . the Sign Is Not Meant for You."

as a Trojan horse. Grounds for this suspicion have been gratuitously supplied by shortsighted and clumsy efforts of the State Department and the CIA to obtain political ends under cover of commercial activities. A tactical error with the gravest consequences was the State Department obstruction of the sale by IBM through its French subsidiary of an advanced design computer, because of its possible use in the independent French nuclear effort. Most parent companies have been drawing out reasonable dividends from their foreign subsidiaries, and charging modest fees and royalties, while reinvesting heavily for capital gains from growth. That was, however, before the U.S. Government demanded maximum repatriation, in the guise of "voluntary restraint on foreign [re] investment," to help finance its Vietnamese venture. The present position is that the price paid by foreign countries for American technology has been raised to include contributions to Vietnam. This is not in accord with the national policies of some of the countries affected, and it is a hidden factor in their desire to find other ways to obtain technology. Subsidiaries of American companies get the blame, though they are only carrying out orders dictated to their parent companies, over the objections of farsighted American business leaders.

Nationalistic reactions to the "technology gap" are not unfamiliar; the question is whether they are suitable for modern conditions and needs. In 1666, Colbert established the Académie des Sciences in Paris as part of a program of economic nationalism which made the France of Louis XIV rich and powerful. Bismarck's tariff protection helped close the 19th-century gap between German industry and Britain, especially with new chemicals. A "national policy" instituted by Sir John A. Macdonald in 1871 stimulated the transfer of manufacturing for the Canadian market from the United States to American subsidiaries which were then established in Canada. More recently, the alleged missile gap between the United States and Russia, given credibility by the sputniks, provoked a great American effort, at levels from "new math" in the public schools to "operations research" in the Pentagon.

There can surely be some question, however, as to whether the 400-year-old system of national rivalries is the only way to promote the growth and spread of modern industrial technology. Nationalistic solutions for the technology gap involve the waste of duplication. This is rising steeply with the cost of modern research and development, as instanced by the burden on France of its nuclear effort. There is also reason to doubt that technological progress can continue without a broad international basis for exchanging ideas and experience. Germans have designed rockets for both the United States and the Soviet Union.

If it is to survive, the private enterprise firm must provide benefits for customers from the development and use of technology, though profits for the firm are the immediate motive and measure of accomplishment. Customers are not limited by nationality. A method of pursuing mutual benefits that has been tremendously successful in the postwar years is the interchange of technology with subsidiary companies organized or purchased in foreign countries. Objections are made, even by the few people and governments that understand the role of the firm, that the price is too high, that only the use of technology is supplied, and not participation in its creation. It is within the power of companies to answer these objections, and much has been done to answer them.

It is true that primary research cannot be fragmented so far as to give a crumb to every country where a multinational company may operate. It is spread, however, to countries where scientists find the right conditions, and companies in aggregate spread research widely. IBM has a new laboratory on the Riviera. The Eli Lilly drug firm sponsors an international network of research outside the United States—on mumps in Argentina, diabetes in West Germany, leprosy in Liberia, cancer in Canada. The president of American Cyanamid, Kenneth H. Klipstein, has said: "Our Cyanamid European Research Institute, located in Geneva, is staffed entirely with top European scientists and devoted to long-range inquiry into the chemical and physical sciences."

However, what companies are doing to bridge technology gaps is failing to allay suspicion and quiet criticism. While companies are becoming more adaptable to the needs of different nations, the accusations of imperialism are becoming sharper, notably from our closest associates, Britain and Canada. What other influences can there be to cause this serious threat to the capability for economic and social progress offered by international companies? A superficial answer is nationalism, but this is a defensive reaction in countries like Canada. Another influence is foreign distrust of the U.S. Department of State, which is suspected of aiming to commandeer the potential political influence of subsidiaries in other countries, as Britain previously used its export-import domination, and as Russia seeks to exploit social-reform movements. Only the State Department can answer this criticism—and at the moment it is handicapped by a credibility gap.

MISSISSIPPI

STARVING BY THE RULE BOOK

RICHARD A. CLOWARD
and FRANCES FOX PIVEN

Mr. Cloward and Mrs. Piven are members of the faculty of the Columbia University School of Social Work.

It is now widely proclaimed that the civil rights movement in the South is dead. Newspaper reports say that only a handful of workers remain on the payrolls of established organizations; mass confrontations of Negroes with Southern whites seem things of the past. But these were only the dramatic outward signs of the movement; protest can be less visible and yet spread and mount. This seems to be happening in the South. Many of the civil rights activists are still there: they have settled into the communities for a long struggle, often supporting themselves with conventional jobs. They are still organizing, except that the goals have gone beyond public accommodations, school desegregation and voting rights. The new issues are economic—bred of starvation and of governmental policies that keep people in abysmal poverty. Impelled by these, a new movement is beginning to surface.

On February 17 and 18, the Mississippi State Advisory Committee to the United States Commission on Civil Rights, aided by commission staff members, convened informal hearings at Jackson to consider public welfare as it is administered under the laws and rules of Mississippi. As the grand ballroom of the King Edward Hotel filled with 800 Negro poor, committee members were confronted by the first manifestations of the new movement.

The proceeding began with the committee hearing formal complaints from a number of welfare recipients. Many receive much less than the maximum public-assistance grant. The average payment to a family of four is $36 a month; the legal maximum is $50. Many others are eligible, but benefits are arbitrarily denied. In some cases grants are erratically reduced; a family receives $38 one month, $20 the next and then, perhaps, nothing at all. Each instance of aid denied implies a family close to starvation and then cast into it. The committee seemed incredulous; one member asked: "How is it they don't die?" A young law student—one of dozens in the South working with the welfare recipients' movement—replied, "They do die, slowly."

Tales spilled out of intimidation and harassment by welfare officials. A woman said that in her county the welfare administrator sends the monthly checks to the local storekeeper (who is also his wife), presumably as payment against recipients' accounts. People who protest this practice are cut off the rolls. Other women claimed that they are threatened with loss of their meager checks if they "consort" with men.

People are also kept from getting benefits by a host of rules. Under the "employable mother" rule—formally ensconced in Georgia's regulations but followed informally in Mississippi and elsewhere—welfare administrators deny aid to any woman whom they deem able to work, whether or not a job is available, and regardless of the number or age of her children. No supplement is given if her wages are less than the scheduled welfare grants, as they often are. Georgia's rule is now being challenged in the federal courts. If the challenge is successful, as seems likely, tens of thousands of people will become eligible under the law. By contesting these and similar practices, the emerging grass-roots movement assists people to get on the rolls.

Much testimony was elicited at the hearings on Mississippi's "work-experience" program, ostensibly designed to fit the welfare poor for profitable employment. The welfare department approaches this goal simply by assigning people to private entrepreneurs, who are told to "use them any way you can." As a result, work experience is provided in dishwashing and heavy cleaning; women are "trained" to cut grass and to haul sacks of building material. Since the program is fully reimbursed by the federal government, participants are paid full subsistence during their few months of training, and that may amount to as much as $250 a month. Then they go back on the relief rolls (if they can get on), and to a dole of not more than one-fifth of the training allowance. They are scarcely equipped by their stint of training for decent employment, nor is such employment available for many in Mississippi.

The State Advisory Committee, composed mainly of middle-class Negroes, seemed confused by these recitals, unable to order the issues or to grasp their significance. Thus a member would interrupt a tale of physical brutality on the part of a welfare worker to ask whether the worker used "courtesy titles." Testimony about the work-experience programs elicited a question about how many Negroes were employed by the state department of social welfare (which could proudly claim three or four).

The second day's session opened with testimony from two officials of the state department of social welfare. Challenged about evidence given of welfare abuses, they explained that the system was in general lawful and just, that some mishaps were inevitable in a department with 1,500 employees. (In Mississippi each case worker has a load of 300 clients. This works as an unintended benefit for recipients—investigators have little time for snooping under the guise of counseling and rehabilitation.) The officials promised that the evidence would be looked into and errors quickly corrected. Pressed on the question of whether investigators use courtesy titles, one official replied that he himself had been a case worker, and he knew that courtesy titles were sometimes appropriate and sometimes inappropriate; it depends on the degree of warmth and informality that exists between worker and recipient.

The second official, speaking in the booming tones of the Southern politician, was more forthright. The problem was money, and he was caught between "the devil and the deep blue sea." Mississippi, he noted, is the poorest state in the nation, but it ranks far from the bottom in the proportion of the state budget that goes for welfare. He had to deal with the legislature, and the legislature didn't like promiscuity. He knew that only 20 per cent of the children on welfare were illegitimate, but the legislature didn't.

To the demand that recipients be given access to welfare manuals specifying criteria of eligibility, the officials replied that the rules were extremely complex and could not be simplified; that they were set forth in nine manuals which could be distributed only at prohibitive cost, and that changes were continually being made, so that any manuals given to recipients would quickly become obsolete. In any event, recipients wouldn't be able to understand the manuals: even when the rules were explained to them again and again, they couldn't get them straight. The manuals would only compound this confusion. Recipients, the officials said, should have greater confidence in the skill and good faith of welfare personnel.

Neither the commission staff nor the committee members appeared to know much about the welfare apparatus. It remained for Edward Sparer, head of the Center on Law and Social Welfare, sponsored by the Columbia University School of Social Work, to correct ambiguous and sometimes false testimony by officials regarding laws, administrative rules and actual practices in Mississippi. Sparer, called as an expert witness, pointed out, for example, that only one of the nine volumes of the welfare code, and a small section of another, dealt with eligibility for public assistance. He offered to compile a simplified manual if the welfare department would reproduce and distribute it. The officials demurred. (Actually, Sparer has already produced such a manual, and it is being distributed by the NAACP Legal Defense Fund.)

The chief of the federal Bureau of Family Services also testified. His opening statement was bland, appeasing: "Progress is being made," he assured the committee. When asked to describe what federal authorities were doing to oversee welfare practices in Mississippi, he referred to federal "quality-control" programs under which a sampling of cases is reviewed—but by state personnel! Did he deny the evidence presented thus far? He evaded and reassured: everyone makes mistakes; the cases would be looked into.

Local organizers had scheduled a rally for the second day of the hearings to protest recent policy changes in food-distribution programs, which are forcing many people toward starvation. Under Department of Agriculture regulations, two food-distribution programs are available to localities, both administered by the state welfare department. In one program, surplus commodities are distributed free to those declared eligible. Under the other, recipients can buy food stamps, with a graduated bonus provided according to income level. Thus a family of four with a monthly income of $60 can purchase food stamps for $26 which are worth $60 in a store. The size of the dollar spread decreases as income increases. According to the Food Stamp Act of 1964, a locality must choose between these programs; it cannot have both. The food-stamp program is superior in principle, for stamps can be used to buy a variety of products, whereas participants in the direct-distribution program are limited to the commodities available in surplus. But many people lack money to buy the stamps, some because they are arbitrarily excluded from the welfare rolls, and others because they get so little.

The surplus-commodities program has sustained 400,000 people in Mississippi with free corn, meal, flour and lard (the answer to the mystery of why they don't die). But this program is now being suspended in one county after another in favor of the food-stamp program. When a county switches to stamps, participation typically falls off by about 75 per cent. The poor are given a desperate choice: starve or leave. Regular welfare policies, together with federal agricultural subsidies which reward mechanization by large landholders, drove 2 million Negroes from Southern rural areas between 1960 and 1965 alone. The recent changes in food-distribution programs will add to the pressure for flight. (See editorial: "Off the Land," The Nation, February 27.)

When the time came for the scheduled rally, the crowd would not leave the hearings. People milled about during the luncheon recess, talking angrily. At that point, George Wiley, director of the Poverty/Rights Action Center in Washington (which is working to develop a national movement of welfare recipients), took the microphone to urge people to tell their stories. A struggle over the mike ensued with commission staff members, but by then the people were aroused. One after another, they moved up to give their version of the food-stamp catastrophe, each story echoing the others. When the meeting was officially reconvened at 2 P.M., it was clear that the hearings themselves had become the rally. One committee member, presumably a white "moderate," demanded that the Jackson police be called.

Formal testimony was finally resumed, and the crowd quieted temporarily as Sparer gave a step-by-step account of what the federal government could do under existing statutes to compel changes in Mississippi's practices. Wiley then testified, charging that the inactivity of the federal government was a form of collusion with Mississippi to starve the people out. When he turned to the crowd and said that nothing would change unless people organized, they applauded wildly. Then the hearings ended.

There's a new scene on the New Left. The culture wing is taking over with a battle style all its own. Like a small band of guerillas, they hit and run with slashing spontaneous poems, quick committed journalism, underground films, propaganda wrapped in folk-rock music, and savage satire unleashed from Off-Broadway launching sites.

This is Jack Newfield's view of the New Left in the current issue of Evergreen Review. It's typical of the bold, significant, and explosive editorial approach that has made Evergreen Review the most vital magazine on the contemporary scene.

In this issue you'll also find new works by William Burroughs and Allen Ginsberg; Dragtime and Drugtime, a witty essay by Parker Tyler on the Films a la Warhol and the Underground Cinema; a startling full-color photographic presentation of the new Ep(idermal) Art where the girls wear paint instead of mini-skirts; a recently rediscovered portfolio of full-color reproductions of the posters that flourished during the Russian Revolution; another thrilling chapter of the adventures of Phoebe Zeit-Geist, the comic strip definitely not for kids; three remarkable short stories whose frankness will shock you, and whose quality will delight you.

Evergreen Review and its publisher, Grove Press, have consistently provided a platform for the new, exciting and most controversial literature and art being produced today.

If this is what you want, you'll find it in Evergreen Review. That's why we're making it as easy as possible for you to subscribe.

If you agree to subscribe to Evergreen Review at the regular subscription price of $9.00 for two years (12 bi-monthly issues), you automatically become a member of the fast growing Evergreen Club, the new book club for adults. With your subscription and membership comes a gift of any two of the following books or records.

Select any two of these free! Story of O, Pauline Réage's novel that's possibly the most famous underground classic of the 20th century.

Another free choice is Games People Play, Eric Berne's extraordinary book that has been on the bestseller lists for almost two years.

Or select Ecce Homo, a brilliant collection of the works of artist George Grosz, and a magnificently corrosive portrait of politically and sexually decadent Germany in the 'twenties.

Or select the first American edition of the startling French novel, The Image. An unusual love story that's similar in many respects to Story of O, including the mystery of the author's identity.

Or select the newly-published second volume of major selections from the writings of the Marquis de Sade, 120 Days of Sodom.

Still another book free is the new paperback edition of the remarkable, erotic autobiography of an unknown Victorian, My Secret Life. Complete, unabridged, all 2,432 pages and 11 volumes, in one giant 9 3/4" by 13" paperback.

The seventh choice is an unusual LP recording (two records) of the original stage version of Barbara Garson's devastating political satire, MacBird. Also included in this offer is Grove's new paperback edition of the play.

Your membership in the Evergreen Club does not obligate you to buy another book. Honest, not another book.

Membership, however, does make available to you every month the best contemporary books at substantial savings.

Each month our editors will select a book they feel is worth owning and reading, and we'll send you a monthly news bulletin telling you about the book.

If you want the book you don't have to do anything. If you don't, just send back the self-addressed card that will be included.

But please remember, you don't ever have to buy any of them, as long as you live. How can you lose? You can't.

Fill out the coupon right now, and welcome to the Underground.

Evergreen Club, 315 Hudson Street
New York, New York 10013

NA/3/7

Gentlemen: I want to take advantage of your offer of a two-year subscription to Evergreen Review, a membership in your Evergreen Club and two of the items listed below, all for only $9. I understand that as a member of the club, I need not buy another book, ever.

- ☐ Enclosed is my $9 check. ☐ Please bill me.
I have checked my selections below.
- ☐ Story of O (Free, $6.00 value)
 - ☐ Games People Play (Free, $5.00 value)
 - ☐ The Image (Free, $5.00 value)
 - ☐ 120 Days of Sodom (Free, $15.00 value)
 - ☐ My Secret Life, Unabridged paperback (Free, $9.50 value)
 - ☐ Olympia Reader (Free, $12.50 value)
 - ☐ MacBird, 2-record set of original stage version, plus paperback edition (Free, $9.50 value)
 - ☐ Ecce Homo (Free, $15.00 value)

NAME _____

ADDRESS _____

CITY _____ STATE _____ ZIP _____

EVERGREEN REVIEW, YOUR TICKET TO THE UNDERGROUND

WINNING HEARTS IN VIETNAM

Instructing the Peasants

KARL H. PURNELL

Mr. Purnell is a former member of the Pennsylvania legislature and publisher of The Union County Journal of Lewisburg, Pa.

Saigon

The reconnaissance plane skimmed across the village at treetop level. Standing knee deep in the rice fields, the farmers looked up from their work, tipping their white conical hats forward and reflecting angry surprise at the small silver plane roaring by just above them. Then a shot sounded from behind the plane, a loud crack easily heard through the wind rushing by the open windows of the plane. Pressing the small intercom button, I called to the pilot. "Somebody's shooting at us."

He too had heard the shot and was pulling back on the stick, sending the single-engine plane into a steep climb.

"You see where that came from?" he asked.

"No idea." It was indeed impossible to tell where the sniper was located. He might have fired from one of the small, thatched huts in the village or he might have been concealed in one of the many tree lines which had flashed by as we buzzed the area.

"I sure don't like getting shot at," the pilot muttered. Then, almost as an afterthought, "I'm wondering whether to call an air strike on that village."

The wind was still blowing through the windows of the plane as we circled high above the village. Far off to the east, the South China Sea glistened like a silver bowl under the warm afternoon sun.

Until the shot was fired, it had been a routine mission. We had flown down the coast, looking for enemy troop movements or suspicious constructions that might signal a new Vietcong bunker or trench system. Many of the villages had recently been burned out by the troops operating in the area. The huts were little more than black skeletons of bamboo sticks protruding lifelessly into the sky; the trees and shrubbery were scorched brown and gray. Endless parallel tracks, interlaced among the fields and into the villages, showed where tanks and armored personnel carriers had smashed and ploughed their way through the area.

The green rice stalks, ready for harvesting, rippled in the breeze like a field of rich Iowa wheat. However, the fields were not being harvested. The peasants had scattered for the mountains or to the teeming refugee camps miles to the north. The area had been designated a "fire free zone" where anything that moved was fair game for troops, artillery and airplanes.

But the village below had somehow been spared. Either it was not "hard-core VC" or the enemy had decided not to fight from the nearby trenches and bunkers, so the troops had not bothered to destroy it. The fields were being worked and the people were moving back and forth along the paths to the long rows of huts. As we swept overhead, I had noticed that whole families were busy shelling and drying rice in front of the small mud and thatch houses.

This is a familiar sight in Vietnam during the rice-harvesting season. Everyone pitches in. Men, women and children help pour the brown rice kernels from one round basket to another as they squat on the hard, dirt patio in front of the huts. Old women, with teeth stained red from betel nut, quack like ducks in their high-pitched voices as their gnarled fingers rub the shells from the small grains of rice. The smaller children run in and out of the huts, sometimes playing hide-and-seek behind the trees, then running down to the paddies to splash about naked in the cool water.

The plane circled two more times and then the pilot's voice sounded over the intercom.

"You know, I'm going to teach those folks a lesson. I'm calling for an air strike."

Having made the decision, he began calling for his radio operator, stationed back at the air base and ready to relay information to the central control headquarters.

"This is Green Marker to Alpha."

A young, tense voice acknowledged the message.

"This is Alpha, go ahead Green Marker, over."

"This is Green Marker. I am calling air strike in a village down here where someone just shot at me. It was probably a .30 or .50 caliber weapon. Here are the coordinates of the village."

The pilot read off the exact location of the area below. Then there were a few moments of silence as the operator cleared the strike through higher channels.

"I sure don't like hitting villages, but they gotta learn to quit shooting at us," the pilot said over the intercom.

Then the radio operator came back on. The strike had been cleared through American and Vietnamese authorities. A call for jet bombers had been placed.

"Probably take fifteen to twenty minutes before we can get the planes," the operator said.

Below, the villagers were unaware of the fate being organized for them. The jets would surprise them. They would appear on the horizon, dark and slim against the blue sky. There would be a primary pass for observation. Before the roar of the engines had settled across the village, the planes would do a climbing turn. Then they would level out and swoop in a neat arc toward the village. As they reached the bottom of the dive, two bright silver cylinders would drop from the planes's wings and drift toward the village. There would be a flash of brilliant orange and red fire, then a billow of smoke. Seconds later, the low "whrmmp" of the explosion would echo through the air. Then, as the planes straightened for a second pass, the rubble of the huts would still be smoking.

When it was over, only twisted trees and smoldering sticks would mark the spot where the village had stood. I had been through villages where this had happened. It was easy to imagine what it would be like in those huts below after the air strike.

After the wounded had been sorted out and placed in litters for the long hike to either a Vietcong camp or an American base, the dead would be prepared for burial. They would be placed in rough coffins and the women would wail and cry, clawing at the coffins and spreading tears across the white, unpainted boards.

The radio crackled again. It was a small stroke of luck for the village.

"Sir," said Alpha, "there don't seem to be any planes available right now. However, there is an ARVN artillery battery within range."

The pilot checked the map and located the Vietnamese artillery unit which was located at the base of a small mountain only 3 miles away.

"I guess we'll go ahead with that. Not the same as an air strike," he muttered over the intercom.

The pilot told the operator that he would call the artillery. Then, switching the frequency of the radio, he called the American adviser to the battery. The plane moved slightly to the north to avoid the incoming shells as the artillery unit lined up its direction of fire.

Suddenly, the artillery officer half whispered over the radio "On the way, over."

The first round was short of the village. A spout of water leaped skyward as the shell exploded in a rice field. By now, the villagers realized what was happening. They had disappeared from the paths and the fields.

The village was as deserted as the burned-out hamlets we had seen earlier in the afternoon. What was a bustling village only twenty minutes before was now an empty series of brown huts and green fields.

The pilot radioed corrections and a few minutes later the artillery officer said again: "On the way, over."

The second time, four shells landed simultaneously as the entire battery fired from the mountain base. Two rounds scored directly. A flash of fire and cloud of smoke rose up from the spot where a hut had stood. The other two shells burst in a nearby field.

In the next ten minutes, the artillery unit poured thirty-five rounds of the high explosive 105mm. shells into the village. Many of the shells exploded in nearby fields and only three or four huts were destroyed.

Finally the pilot called over the radio. "Okay, that will do it."

On the intercom, he muttered, "This ARVN artillery isn't worth a damn. With an air strike I could have put bombs within 20 feet of any spot in the village."

When the artillery had finished, the pilot circled once more over the village. Then in a final dive to 1,000 feet, he released two small rockets attached to the plane's wings.

The small plane shuddered from the shock as the rockets were fired, then climbed steeply.

"Hey, I got a haystack; no, two of them." Sure enough, each rocket had hit a stack of dry, brown grass and both were burning brightly a few yards from a hut.

As he started back toward the airfield, the sun was beginning to settle across the distant mountain. The pilot called his radio operator. "How about running over to the mess hall and tell them to hold up something to eat. We'll be back in about fifteen minutes."

"I sure am hungry," he added over the intercom.

Country Fair

EDWARD LAMB

Mr. Lamb is the Toledo industrialist and author of No Lamb for Slaughter (Harcourt Brace & World).

Saigon

The United States Army, First Division, has a giant military base at Lai Khe, some hundred miles north of Saigon. It was from this heavily armed position that the Big Red Division cleared and flattened the Iron Triangle. And when I was there it was the scene of operations described as Country Fairs—a Madison Avenue approach to the conversion of the Vietcong in several hostile neighboring villages.

Just 8 miles north, we moved in with the American troops as they staged the spectacle for the hamlet of Am Loi. It is a typical town of some 500 inhabitants who had lived under the VC for many years. U.S. and South Vietnamese troops surrounded the village at four in the morning—a cordon of mortars, tanks and more than a battalion of heavily armed troops. The town having been effectively sealed, a company of Americans and a sizable number of South Vietnamese, including defectors and informers from the village, surprised the sleeping villagers. ■ tagged along as the troops searched every hut and interviewed every villager.

Seventy-seven suspected members of the Vietcong were herded into a quickly roped-off compound, to be held there in the broiling sun for some eight hours. They were joined by six or seven "guerrillas" captured on the outskirts of the hamlet. There were some eight draft dodgers but no one from North Vietnam. The hard core from Hanoi usually stay out of town both day and night. During the entire time of the "Country Fair" operation, the old men of the hamlet were confined to their huts, ostensibly to guard their belongings from the South Vietnamese soldiers, who are pretty much hated by the villagers.

Tents were erected. Food, including beans and hot dogs, as well as balloons and candy, was distributed. Another tent housed doctors and dentists, who accepted volunteer but very scared patients. All the time, a jazz band played.

The American soldiers who went into town remained quietly on the outskirts. The captured men were questioned in a darkened room. Each suspect came in and faced his accuser, hiding behind a black-face mask. U.S. Maj. Robert Sweitzer said that at least 10 per cent of the men would admit their membership at the outset, another 10 per cent would "come clean" when hauled away to the military base camp. The balance would be returned to their homes in the hamlet.

After several hours the fair ended, since it was necessary to get away from the village well before dark. The prisoners were marched down the road to the waiting helicopters. We passed dead Vietcong. Our soldiers leave the dead where they find them. Land mines were all over the place, and Major Sweitzer ordered the draft dodgers to precede us. At least a dozen bamboo booby traps were unearthed. Several dozen 5-gallon cans of concentrated sugar were captured in the village and destroyed. Sixty bags of rice were hauled away.

The alleged VCs were torn away from their tearful families. Rations were packed and loaded aboard military transports. The carnival was over. Some political indoctrination had been attempted and the troops were safely out of the hamlet.

I talked to dozens of Americans about this hit-and-run tactic. Many believe it may be a good promotional stunt, but not of much permanent social significance. For good or ill, the Country Fair technique is hitting about a dozen villages in South Vietnam every week.

LETTERS (continued from page 418)

terest in the amours of its employees that it will, if necessary, act as matchmaker to deliver its wards from a sinful life." He supports this with a colored account of a young woman who was warned "that she would be fired if she didn't come up with a very good explanation for having spent a weekend in a Virginia motel with her boy friend." The fact is that the commission came into the case only when the employing agency requested an investigation of her arrest on charges of destruction of property and cohabitation as the climax of that "weekend." Moreover, the tone of Sherrill's statement is in no measure justified by the language actually used by the commission. In transmitting the interrogatory to the employee, it was stated: "Your appointment to the above position was made subject to investigation to determine your suitability for that position. We invite your comments or explanation on the information in the attached statement which was disclosed by this investigation."

(5) We are unable to identify the fifth case cited in the article, allegedly involving a former Presbyterian minister.

(6) The last case cited the Scott case which is now pending appellate court action. Sherrill alleges that the commission released information in this case to the county of Fairfax, Va. He is in error. The shoe was on the other foot: the county provided the commission with some information.

John W. Macy, Jr., Chairman
U.S. Civil Service Commission

Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The material on which I based my two reports is to be found in the files of Senator Ervin, in the files of the American Civil Liberties Union in Washington, and in the files of the American Federation of Government Employees. It included letters from employees and from the USCS, and official case histories. I also talked with several USCS officials and did research in the USCS library. For further details about working conditions under USCS, I call attention to the 32 pages of complaints and criticism inserted into the Congressional Record of Feb. 21, 1967, beginning with page 2348. Although it is Mr. Macy's practice to deny everything, I was encouraged to see that he was willing to admit the harassment in items 1, 2, 3, 4, although, of course, he insists on different interpretations. When you can get a hyper-defensive bureaucrat to admit that much, reform may indeed be possible.

Robert G. Sherrill

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Gents of the Disestablishment

DIARIES AND LETTERS: 1930-1939. By Harold Nicolson. Edited by Nigel Nicolson. Atheneum Publishers. 448 pp. $7.50.

WINDS OF CHANGE: 1914-1939. By Harold Macmillan. Harper & Row. 584 pp. $10.

GEORGE DANGERFIELD

Mr. Dangerfield is the author, most recently, of The Awakening of American Nationalism, 1815-1828 (Harper & Row). His other books include Chancellor Robert R. Livingston of New York and The Era of Good Feelings (both Harcourt, Brace).

There are not many points of contact between these two most dissimilar but complementary books: a spontaneous, various diary; a formal political memoir. The connections which are made are quite accidental and usually refreshing. For example, in Winds of Change, one finds a mysterious reference to Stanley Baldwin: "He looked worried but very calm on the whole I thought. He licked and smelt a good many things but that was his only sign of inward strain." In Diaries and Letters, this becomes: "There is something very strange about Stanley Baldwin. At first sight he is a solid English gentleman, but then one observes odd nervous tricks. He has an extraordinarily unpleasant habit of smelling his notes and licking the edges slightly as if they were the flap of an envelope. . . ." This composite vignette is certainly memorable. Again, in the Diaries, Nicolson writes that he had delivered his maiden speech in the Commons and that it had gone off well, but "the matter was too thin." It is Macmillan who tells us, in Winds, that Nicolson on this occasion "declared frankly that he had spent sleepless nights wondering whether in all honesty he could retain his seat." Surely one of the oddest maiden speeches uttered in that House.

In spite of these sleepless nights, however, Nicolson did retain his seat—for ten years. And this brings me to what is complementary in these two books. Both are first volumes in works which come temporarily to rest in 1939, and both gather political momentum as they approach that fatal year. Both authors were in rebellion against Neville Chamberlain, their ostensible leader; and each represents—one as an amateur, the other as a professional—a familiar form of political dissent.

One might say that each is a member of the social establishment and the political disestablishment. "Disestablishment," specifically, refers to the "withdrawal of especial State patronage and control from a Church" (Oxford English Dictionary). In English history, it recalls some violent political battles, but it also constellates a substantial agreement: for while its champions succeeded in disestablishing the Church of Ireland and the Church of Wales, they refrained from performing this feat with the Church of England. And a member of the disestablishment, if one removes from the term its specifically ecclesiastical meaning, can be described as someone who nibbles or knocks away at the outworks of an establishment, but never seriously menaces its central structure. In America, one might call this "consensus."

In order to be a disestablishmentarian, one must first consider oneself as belonging by right to the establishment. Let us glance at the career of Harold Nicolson, as it is revealed in these Diaries. In 1930 he had resigned from the Foreign Service (where his father, Lord Carnock, had preceded him) in order to become a journalist, in the pay of Lord Beaverbrook. Although more than competent at this trade, he grew dissatisfied and made up his mind to enter politics: first through Sir Oswald Mosley's New Party, which disillusioned him because it was Fascist and not (as he seems to have hoped) a Keynesian revival of Young England; then by joining his fortunes to the predominantly Conservative government, as a member of something called National Labour.

National Labour was a tiny rump of M.P.s, gathered around Ramsay MacDonald, after he had defected from the Labour Party. In order to win his seat for National Labour at West Leicester in 1935, which he did by a margin of eighty-seven votes over the regular Labour candidate, Nicolson had to command the unanimous support of the Conservatives. Thus he entered the political establishment, which Baldwin and Chamberlain were leading to the right and downhill, with the comfortably Hegelian air of being both there and not there.

He began the writing of his diaries in 1930, and he continued making entries until 1964: they are about 3 million words long, and the editor, Nigel Nicolson (the diarist's son), says that he has selected for publication one-twentieth of the whole. There are also some letters, usually written to Nicolson's wife, Victoria Sackville-West, the poet and novelist. Composed in haste and never revised, both diaries and letters are wonderfully readable, particularly if you accept them as pure genre—a series of unstudied landscapes and interiors, revealing the environment and pursuits of a well-bred, fashionable, slightly bohemian Englishman.

Nicolson protested that his daily jottings did not constitute "a work of literature or self-revelation but a mere record of activity." Yet his self is patently not of the kind which, confronted with a sheet of blank paper, is likely to go into hiding. What kind of self then is it? Amiable, certainly; amusing, affectionate, vivid—all these, and something else. In the course of his introduction, Nigel Nicolson offers the following sketch:

[Harold Nicolson] knew that he belonged to an elite, an elite more of intelligence than of birth, and he tended to feel that people outside that elite had something wrong with them: business men, for example, the humbler type of schoolmaster or clergyman, most women, actors, most Americans, Jews, all coloured or Levantine peoples, and the great mass of the middle and working classes. Dullness or duplicity of mind irritated him. He felt sorry for them, but he had no wish to understand them, and a single false note in their conversation or even their pronunciation, an ugly ornament on the mantelpiece, a doily under the plate or a grapefruit on it, were enough to render them uninteresting to him. . . .

These sentences are certainly baffling. How can dullness or duplicity of mind put a doily under a plate or a grapefruit on it? How could a person, possessed of all these unamiable characteristics belong to any elite? Or could this be an attempt at describing the historical morgue anglaise, the freezing blank stare turned upon outsiders, such as Lady Catharine de Bourgh employed when she visited Elizabeth's home in Pride and Prejudice?

Nothing of the kind. If you take the sensible precaution of reading the text before tackling the introduction, you will find that Nigel Nicolson has contrived (unwittingly) a somewhat cruel caricature of his father, the diarist. Harold Nicolson does not stare or glare. Confronted with the unfamiliar, he draws in his horns like a snail, or rolls up like a hedgehog. "If we opened the [foreign] service, it might be flooded by clever Jews"; "I loathe the dark races"; "Every American is more or less as vulgar as any other American"; "He looked like an assistant master at an inferior private school." These remarks, taken out of context, descend in scale from the detestable to the nasty: but really they are all on the same level; they are relatively shallow, prickly, sticky, merely petulant. The man who wrote them is (as the Diaries prove) conventionally democratic and humane. His deepest and most ineradicable prejudices are not anti-Semitic or anti-Negro: they are anti-doily and anti-grapefruit.

England is a forcing bed for snobs, and I do Harold Nicolson no injustice if I say that he is a snob too. Here the Diaries provide a clue to what is lacking in his work—that is to say, the open mind. A serious professional writer, he has produced some distinguished books. Amusing, instructive, intelligent, they are never quite original. A certain caution holds him back: the door of the aviary is open but the bird does not want to fly out into a vulgar colliding world. To examine him at his most characteristic, one should read The Congress of Vienna (1945). It is a witty, lucid and informed book; it can still be read with pleasure and with profit, and I have long admired it. And yet one keeps asking oneself: is he organizing a fragment of the past or just making it presentable? Is he interpreting or tidying up? For the Congress does at times read like an aide-mémoire for the Vienna statesmen, in case (which does not seem unlikely) they should need some expert prompting on the Day of Judgment. It might have been written by a permanent Under Secretary of State in a fit of discreet inspiration. And how often one hears in these sociable Diaries the reproving voice of the born official: how often one feels that if only his engagements had permitted it, the Foreign Office would have provided a spiritual refuge for Harold Nicolson.

Instead, he entered politics, where he was never more than a gifted amateur, and where, even as the scene darkens and his situation grows more poignant, cheerfulness keeps breaking through. What fun life is might be inscribed on his banner; whereas Excelsior is the ambiguous device for Harold Macmillan's. The Winds of Change, so full of pleasantries and platitudes, is stylistically an artless work; but this should not blind

THE RED HOUSE

Horned, with a collar of snow, a Stone Age hunter is standing beside his kill.

As he bends over the still-warm body, his face is smeared with blood, like a cave where the sun-god is sleeping.

JOHN HAINES

us to the fact that the author is a very intelligent man, and that he may be artful. There seem to be two personalities in this book, one open, one imperfectly hidden; so that when Macmillan tells us that he was "more 'with it' (as the phrase goes) than some who regarded me with so much disapproval," we are tempted to ask: more with what? It is this question which makes the book so interesting.

Eton, Balliol, the Brigade of Guards, an honorable and nearly mortal wound in World War I, marriage into one of England's great political and ducal families—such were Macmillan's early steps. Once they had been taken he headed straight for Parliament. As Conservative member for Stockton-on-Tees, in one of England's notorious "distressed areas," he became more and more involved in the problem of unemployment. The Diaries rather suggest that Nicolson would not have recognized an unemployed worker if (to borrow a phrase from P. G. Wodehouse) you had handed him one on a plate with watercress around it; but Macmillan was a good mixer. He was fond of the People, though conspicuously not of them. As time went on, he began to write and speak very forcibly about central planning, public spending, government control of industry. This was commendable and courageous discourse for a Conservative; but the leadership of MacDonald and Baldwin was undisturbed, because it knew that radical solutions, in those weary days, were not required of men who wished to retain power. It was only when Macmillan, at long last, began to perceive a connection between complacent domestic policies and timid foreign ones that his situation became unpleasant.

Here then is the practical idealist, pursuing a noble, selfless and somewhat lonely course on the leftward fringes of Conservatism. However, he is capable of his own kind of double talk:

Naturally, I did not know when the Parliament of 1924 began, that it would be sixteen years before I left the back benches for a junior post in a Ministry. It was a long spell. But I must be fair. Lack of promotion was my own fault and the result of my deliberate determination, as the years passed, to pursue my own plans and purposes. This long and sometimes frustrating exclusion from the centre of power did not prove in the end a bad training.

One man, an affable knight-errant, deliberately takes a course which will leave him on the outside; the other, a professional politician, is frustrated because he does not get in. We are not surprised to learn that Benjamin Disraeli was one of Macmillan's heroes, for if the time is long since passed when people regarded "Dizzy" as a mere opportunist, one still remembers what he said when he first became Prime Minister in 1868: "I have climbed to the top of the greasy pole." In his Prologue, Macmillan tells how, in later years, when he and Churchill were discussing Hitler, he remarked: "At any rate, you and I owe him something. He made you Prime Minister and me an Under-Secretary. No power on earth, except Hitler, could have done that." The greasy pole is not, I think, an object to which Macmillan wishes to call our attention; but it is there, lurking coily in the background.

As the Diaries and the Winds come closer to Munich, they give us a telling picture of what it was like to be caught in a system which could select or extrude such leadership as Chamberlain's, but from which, while dissenting, neither man was truly alienated. Nicolson's jottings are contemporary, and one sees why he belonged to the Eden rather than to the Churchill group of rebels. In Diaries, Churchill appears as brilliant, orotund, drunkish, bitter, not solid: even in the late thirties his chameleon past made him a distrusted figure. Winds, in retrospect, naturally calls him "the great statesman"; it was to this, however, still wobbly, star that Macmillan hitched his chariot. We sincerely applaud him for doing so, while remarking that it paid off.

Toward the end of each book we get a version of that scene in Parliament, when Chamberlain shuffled out on his way to Munich, and all the members rose to applaud him. They thought (as did so many others in the Western world) that the old charlatan was about to perform a genuine miracle. Macmillan writes, regretfully, that he found himself standing and cheering with the rest; that he looked round; that Eden had disappeared, and that just two members remained seated. One was Churchill, with his head in his hands; the other was Harold Nicolson. The Diaries tell us that a Conservative M.P. behind Nicolson growled: "Stand up, you brute." But he wouldn't. Book for book, the Diaries may have the last word.

In the Wasps' Nest

THE PROTESTANT ESTABLISHMENT: Aristocracy and Caste in America. By E. Digby Baltzell. Vintage Books. 429 pp. $1.95 paper.

VERNON K. DIBBLE

Mr. Dibble is assistant professor of sociology at Columbia University.

In Professor Baltzell's ideal society ■ "ruling class or . . . establishment" leads "the community as a whole." It responds to popular aspirations. In return, as it were, the populace legitimates its power. Its rule, therefore, rests not on coercion or manipulation but on moral authority.

Prestige, kinship and associational ties such as membership in exclusive clubs—not simply positions of power in politics or business—define who is in the ruling class and who is not. In Baltzell's terminology, Bernard Baruch, Fiorello La Guardia, Al Smith and Joseph Kennedy were in the elite. But they were never in the ruling class.

A ruling class is not legitimated unless it represents the elite. In a democracy, however, "men of ability and ambition, regardless of background, are allowed to rise into the elite." Hence, "in order for an upper class to maintain a continuity of power and authority . . . its membership must, in the long run, be representative of the society as a whole." In the United States the ruling class must not be ■ caste. It must not keep out Jews, Catholics and Negroes who have risen to the elite. It must, instead, be an "aristocracy."

As the author uses the term, an "aristocracy" is ■ "community of upper-class families whose members are born to positions of high prestige . . . because their ancestors have been leaders (elite members) for one generation or more." In his earlier work, especially in Philadelphia Gentlemen: The Making of A National Upper Class (published in paperback as An American Business Aristocracy), he has documented the existence of such groups in American society. But that is not all. An "aristocracy" does not simply rest on its laurels. It justifies its authority "by contributing its share of community leaders" and "by continuing to assimilate, in each generation, the families of new members of the elite."

Baltzell contends that the American ruling class during most of the 19th century was, in this sense, an aristocracy. He uses the history of the Lincoln family—from President Lincoln's barely literate father to Robert Todd Lincoln, graduate of Exeter and Harvard, successful corporation lawyer, and "typical Victorian aristocrat"—to illustrate that fact; he also cites the few wealthy Catholics and Jews who were apparently full members of a predominantly Protestant ruling class.

That "aristocracy" became more like ■ caste toward the end of the 19th century. "While sporadic and idiosyncratic anti-Semitism had been characteristic of the gentile gentleman's code since Colonial times, it was only in the 1880's, when the flood of immigration began to rise, that upper-class anti-Semitism became rigid and institutionalized." The founders and early officers of Philadelphia's Union League Club included Jews; by the end of the century, Jews were kept out.

These castelike tendencies in the ruling class did not deprive it of moral authority until well into the 20th century. For until the 1920s or 1930s, local political machines that the immigrants controlled were subservient nationally to older-stock Protestants, such as Nelson Aldrich, Mark Hanna and Boies Penrose. In business, there were

THE RADICAL PAPERS

Edited with an introduction by Irving Howe

Michael Harrington, Bayard Rustin, Harvey Swados, Paul Goodman, Christopher Jencks, Daniel Bell, George Lichtheim, and fifteen other Americans call for radical social reforms as they write on education, urban renewal, civil rights, and poverty. $1.45

FROM RACE RIOT TO SIT-IN: 1919 and the 1960's

A Study in the Connections Between Conflict and Violence

Arthur I. Waskow

An analysis of the race riots of 1919 and the recent movement of "creative disorder," offering entirely new evidence and new "inventions" by which racial justice can be achieved without national catastrophe. "Brilliant and creative."—Washington Star $1.45

URBAN RENEWAL: PEOPLE, POLITICS, AND PLANNING

Edited by Jewel Bellush and Murray Hausknecht

This reader on the political controversies and sociological realities of revitalizing the American city deals with such topics as constitutional questions, slum clearance, leadership problems, citizen participation, and the effects of public housing. An Anchor Original. $1.95

THE COLLECTIVE FAMILY

A Handbook for Russian Parents

A. S. Makarenko; Introduction by Urie Bronfenbrenner

If the most widely read books in ■ society provide a key to the character of that society, then this volume—a practical guide to child-rearing which has been the Russian "Dr. Spock" since 1937—should be ■ major source for understanding the U.S.S.R. An Anchor Original. $1.45

THE GUARANTEED INCOME

Edited by Robert Theobald

Ten exciting essays, by Marshall McLuhan, Erich Fromm, Conrad Arensberg and others, on the implications of the increasingly recognized concept of a negative income tax. "Valuable on several counts, aside from being readable throughout . . . economic and related social policies are too important to be left . . . to economists alone."—Leon M. Keyserling, front page, New York Times Book Review. $1.25

WHERE IS VIETNAM?

American Poets Respond

Edited by Walter Lowenfels

A strong and stunning anthology of recent work that gathers together for the first time a wide spectrum of response to the Vietnam experience from 87 American poets. Included are poems by Bly, Dickey, Ferlinghetti, Ginsberg, Kunitz, Levertov, and Lowell, as well as the work of young campus poets and the best poems from the Vietnam Read-ins. An unforgettable and controversial collection of historic significance. An Anchor Original. $1.25 few elite Catholics and Jews. But as members of minority groups rose in increasing numbers to elite positions during this century, the castelike ruling class became not only unrepresentative of the whole society but unrepresentative of the elites as well.

In the United States today the "position of the Jews . . . best illustrates the nature of the conflict between the social forces of caste and aristocracy," and stories of gentlemanly anti-Semitism in clubs, on golf courses, at debutante balls, in college fraternities, and among directors of large corporations are plentiful in the book.

But there is also "a small but growing minority of old-stock aristocrats, following the Whig tradition in England," who are willing "to share their privileges with distinguished members of minority groups in order to maintain their traditional power and authority within the ranks of some sort of new heterogenous establishment." These "aristocrats," Baltzell tells us, supported Progressivism and Teddy Roosevelt, Woodrow Wilson, and finally joined the Democratic Party after 1929. Their sons "were inspired by the aristocratic styles of the New Frontier."

Baltzell hopes that such men are the wave of the future. He points out that many young men from the ruling class lost their castelike attitudes as officers during the Second World War. Anti-Semitism is out of vogue at elite colleges, and many will not want to join clubs that keep out their old college friends. The New Frontier had old-stock patricians, elite Catholics and elite Jews working together.

But the future is not clear. "At this time [1963] it is hard to see how the dynamic tension between the pressure of caste exclusion and of aristocratic assimilation which is characteristic of the nation's leadership today will be resolved." On that question the moral authority of the ruling class, and therefore the health of the society, depend.

Though Baltzell has studied important problems with intelligence and civic concern, it is by no means clear that letting in elite Jews and others would enhance the position of the ruling class; or that the American ruling class, from its point of view, needs or wants moral authority: or—to pass from social analysis to political judgments—that it deserves moral authority.

Baltzell suggests a number of reasons why admitting Jews and Catholics into the ruling class would enhance its moral authority and otherwise strengthen it. First, he claims that exclusion means loss of talent. But talent and specialized skills can always be bought. On the highest levels, reliability, predictability and trust are more important than talent. And reliability and trust are maximized by keeping out people who are not of one's own kind.

Second, ruling class families cannot command authority unless "they represent the aspirations of both the elite and the rest of the population" and are not likely to do that if they keep out people from ethnic and religious minorities. But that assumes the possibility in the United States today for the existing ruling class to represent the aspirations of the whole society, to be active "in leading the community as a whole." Is there such a possibility?

The war in Vietnam has helped some industries and hurt or severely strained others (such as housing, and men's clothing). That fact exemplifies the difference between corporations that have a direct stake in this country's imperial position, and firms with largely domestic markets whose stake is indirect, if it exists at all.

Between businessmen and the rest of the population the gulf is wider. The vast middle market—families whose incomes are, say, between $5,000 and $15,000 a year—makes it unnecessary for consumer industries to worry about the very poor. And the executives of armament firms that depend upon what Baltzell calls American world "leadership" and the American "moral mission in the world"—as that leadership and as that moral mission are exercised, for example, in the skies and villages of Vietnam—have no aspirations in common with the citizens of Watts. Executives of multi-national corporations who have increased direct American investment abroad by roughly 45 per cent from 1960 through 1965, instead of investing in much less profitable fields at home (such as low-income housing) have no fate in common with people who dwell among rats.

Baltzell's third suggestion, that exclusive castes are preoccupied with privileges instead of duties, and do not produce leaders of the entire community whose services justify the position of their class, does not reveal exactly what our "aristocratic" leaders are supposed to lead us toward. The only specific goal he mentions is a crusade against political corruption. He cannot give content to the abstract notion of "leading the community as a whole," because there is no "community as a whole" to lead.

America in the 19th century was quite different. It is clear what Victorian aristocrats led their society toward—big business and the corporate economy. In many of their aims, if not their methods, they represented the aspirations of the whole society. For at that time there was a great overlap between the goals that businessmen chose by their criteria of profit and those that would have been chosen if the criterion had been the commonweal.

Any kind of Socialist, or Populist, or people's capitalist regime in 19th-century America would have done many things that American capitalists actually did do: built transcontinental railroads, exploited the Mesabi range, brought new technology to industry, created an industrial working class, kept a small military establishment, and abolished slavery.

Today, however, the solution of obvious social problems—air pollution, housing, urban transportation, the chronically unemployed, and all the rest—requires much more money than corporate capitalism can possibly spend for such purposes. (Prof. Seymour Melman estimates that well over $70 billion per year over a period of years is needed.) A corporation is not free to take on a few thousand uneducated, marginal workers whose production is worth less than their wages; or to invest in a bankrupt commuter railroad that will not show a profit for decades, if ever. Getting the job done requires either confiscatory rates of taxation or direct political control over

appearing in

THE NATION

SPRING BOOK NUMBER — Coming April 24

Reviews by

SANDRA HOCHMAN on MARIANNE MOORE

DAVID IGNATOW on HARVEY SHAPIRO

JOHN LOGAN on A. R. AMMONS

the flow of investments. The most "aristocratic" leaders, gentile or Jew, are not going to lead American society in that direction.

"Aristocrats" are not doing the job, and "leadership" of the whole community no longer has any meaning. These are two good reasons for the Establishment's loss of moral authority that Baltzell deplures. But I do not quite see why Baltzell thinks that the ruling class has to worry about its moral authority. Instead of an "aristocratic" ruling class that produces leaders of the whole community, it is possible to have a class that is "coercive and authoritarian." If rulers do not justify their power, then subjects do not legitimize power. And "power which is not legitimized tends to be either coercive or manipulative."

If the alternative to doing the jobs that need to be done is coercive and manipulative power; and if doing the needed jobs requires, if not full-scale socialism, then at the very least some fundamental breach in corporate property rights; then, clearly, coercive and manipulative power is the more desirable alternative. Baltzell does not like that kind of power; but he has not shown why the American ruling class should dislike it as much as he.

He assumes that the ruling class dislikes coercive power, and that its members are sensitive to the problems he poses, because his model is Whiggish England. (There is even the curious sentence: "But in the years since Victoria's death, American society has been transformed.") He might have taken his major themes from Lord Melbourne, who said in 1831 that political power must be based on "authority, consent, reputation and opinion." But, he added:

If we find that the columns of that support are sapped and failing—if we find that, instead of authority there is disrespect for all authority—if we find that instead of consensus there is dis-sensus . . . it is then our duty to look about us, and to consider the dangerous situation in which we are placed . . . that we may repair the edifice which is tottering and crumbling around us.

That is, Whig aristocrats supported reform which brought new classes into the British political system. But the executives and directors of American corporations are not Whig aristocrats. They are businessmen, who expect legitimation through their performance in the market, not through "authority, consent, reputation and opinion," the notion of a business aristocracy is a contradiction in terms.

Further, since 1945, from Hiroshima to Vietnam, men in the "Protestant establishment" have failed to demonstrate that they place any upper limit to the degree of terror and brutality that they are willing to condone, if terror and brutality are needed to protect American interests in the world, as they define them. They are not doing the job at home, and the kind of job they do abroad is only too obvious. They do not deserve moral authority.

America Absurd

HELL'S ANGELS: A Strange and Terrible Saga. By Hunter S. Thompson. Random House. 278 pp. $4.95.

ELMER BENDINER

Mr. Bendiner, writer and editor, is the author of The Bowery Man (Thomas Nelson).

In November, 1965, a moment occurred which fittingly sums up the American absurdity. Ralph Barger, Jr., president of Hell's Angels, a group of pathetic young men who act out lurid juvenile fantasies astride their roaring motorcycles, addressed the following letter to President Johnson:

"On behalf of myself and my associates I volunteer a group of loyal Americans for behind the lines duty in Viet Nam. We feel that a crack group of trained gorillas [sic] would demoralize the Viet Cong and advance the cause of freedom. We are available for training and duty immediately."

President Barger took this action after unexpectedly calling off a pitched battle with Berkeley students who had scheduled a march to protest the war. At a formal press conference, embellished with the microphones of major networks, Barger explained that "in the interest of public safety and the protection of the good name of Oakland," Hell's Angels would not take on "this mob of traitors."

Up to that point the Angels had shown a positive zeal for mayhem, sadistic assault and rape. They had been talked out of the confrontation with student demonstrators by Allen Ginsberg, that poet of peace, pot, vulgarized Buddhism and bland love, but it was plain that they had not been won over, only befuddled. The letter to the White House followed.

So far as is known, President Johnson did not reply to Barger's offer of a military pact—a fact that may reassure those who sometimes are fearful that all of us are inhabiting a comic book.

That solemn moment when the captain of free-wheeling, pill-chewing, hippy lost souls—the very models of pop art—offered his hand to the arch-square in the White House forms the climax of Hunter S. Thompson's report on Hell's Angels, which began as an article in The Nation and grew into a full-length book.

Thompson spent a year riding and drinking with the Angels as a more or less accredited correspondent. His credentials were finally withdrawn in a wordless ceremony that left him stomped to a bloody mess. Nevertheless, Thompson's point of view remains eminently sane and honest. He does not weep for the Angels or romanticize them or glorify them. Neither does he despise them.

Instead, he views them as creatures of an irresponsible society, given their image by an irresponsible press, embodying the nation's puerile fantasy life. He sees the menace not so much in the Hell's Angels themselves, as in the poverty of spirit and perennial adolescence that spawned them. On the other hand, Thompson is not blind to the possible uses to which such young men may be put.

Although they play at life as if it were a movie set, the Angels are inordinately fond of swastikas and Iron Crosses; they idolize their leaders; they would rather jump an unarmed enemy than have a fair fight; and they hate Negroes.

The one charm the Angels originally possessed seemed to be a rough and ready anti-Establishment fervor. They were rebels, disowned by a system, outlawed and fighting back. But perhaps

The shocking story of America's Concentration Camps

by Allan R. Bosworth

How hysteria and greed combined to thrust 110,000 Americans of Japanese ancestry behind barbed wire during World War II—a shameful episode bluntly recounted in "an important, thoroughly documented, angry book."—San Francisco Chronicle. Illustrated.

$5.95 at all bookstores

NORTON

liberals and radicals may discern in them a sad truth: that roars of romantic rebellion come not only from those who refuse to sell out but also from some who have never had an offer.

As soon as the press magnified the Angels into celebrities and they found themselves issuing communiqués as potential anti-Communist heroes, they jumped eagerly at the bait, found a press agent and began to dicker with publishers.

A Representative Lowell

JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL. By Martin Duberman. Houghton Mifflin Co. 516 pp. $8.

CALVIN BEDIENT

Mr. Bedient teaches literature at Emory University, Atlanta, Ga.

The colors have washed out of James Russell Lowell's reputation, leaving a blank sheet, a ghost. Lowell is no longer important; yet look back and he is there, in the very center of 19th-century American culture, holding the crowd, gesticulating blithely, high-spirited and handsome, good-natured and gracious, patriotic, wholesome, enormously cultivated and boyishly humorous—sitting in his library of 7,000 volumes in pastoral Cambridge, reading Tom Jones; now writing second-hand lyrics—so it seems today—for dreamy youths and overdomesticated ladies; now teaching Dante brilliantly and humanely to undergraduates at Harvard, where he replaced Longfellow as professor of modern languages; now out of pocket but writing promissory notes to Negroes who have come to his door, pathetically and perhaps fraudulently, to beg money to buy their wives or children from the South; or wittily slashing at war and slavery, as in the Biglow Papers; or talking with "indescribable" brilliance at the famous Saturday Club; or as the first editor of The Atlantic Monthly, carrying home contributions in his coat pocket and leaving them in the closet, only to wonder what became of them, yet succeeding, succeeding splendidly; encouraging Howells and Bret Harte, while ignoring Melville and taking care to keep that "evil" book, Leaves of Grass, out of the hands of Harvard students; reviving the North American Review; and publishing volumes of literary criticism with titles redolent of a sipping, large-chaired, fire-lit literary culture: Among My Books and My

The Angels set no precedent in the nation's history. A century ago Bowery thugs, organized into ferocious gangs calling themselves "Knights of the Golden Circle," became a fifth column for the Confederacy and gave New York the draft riots—the city's most ghastly lynch-ing spree.

Hunter Thompson's book may serve to remind us of the swift metamorphosis from rebel-without-a-cause to man-on-the-make.

Study Windows. Despite the death of two wives and three children, it was a charmed life, enviable. So attractive were Lowell's abilities, so easy his ascendancy, that even in England he was acclaimed a genius—compared to Juvenal for his satire, to Sainte-Beuve for his criticism. And the Hayes administration, needing luster, borrowed the pearl of Lowell's unique, his incomparable reputation, sending him first as Minister to Spain, then on to England, where he became, as Henry James said, with pride in his countryman, the first of after-dinner speakers—an American, yet the lion of London!

Great writers change and expand through the ages, small writers become more themselves, and Lowell has been reduced almost savagely by time. The glamour is gone; we see merely the man, the facility, the "failure." And this is a cause for regret.

If Lowell continues to survive at all, it is because he is "representative." But representative of what? "Completely representative," said James in 1892, of "the dominion of style"; but James believed in Lowell's genius and thought he might become a classic. In 1915, Van Wyck Brooks notes Lowell's demise; but Brooks is scarcely less credulous than James ("No American writer appears to have been more naturally gifted than Lowell") and—overgenerously, romantically—charges America with Lowell's now representative failure: it denied him a "social background," the prod of ideas. Leon Howard—to skip ahead to 1952—turns Brooks's formula on its head: if it is still Lowell's failure that is representative, the fault now lies with Lowell himself—in "yielding to his cultural environment rather than striving against it." But this reading is equally romantic. What has happened to the old "metaphysical" idea of the gift, the calling? We are too prepared to believe in "failure," when often there is no question of success.

One cannot bloom except from a bud, and there was no bud of genius in Lowell. When out of thousands of lines not one tingles all through—when no words are lamps or switch blades, and no rhythms are as absolute as the sound of a hard rain—why talk of failure? Talk, rather, of a false vocation. "One feels at moments," James wrote of Lowell, "that he speaks in verse mainly because he is penetrated with what verse has achieved." But, indeed, one feels this everywhere in Lowell. Somewhat insecurely, Martin Duberman, in this fine new biography, detects a "failure of authenticity" in Lowell's more earnest verse—Lowell attempted "to squeeze a joyous temperament into the fashionable prophetic mold." But to me, the unauthenticity lies in Lowell's choice of the medium. Even where Lowell is most successful—as in parts of the Biglow Papers—he succeeds because he is witty and not because he is poetic. Lowell wrote a journalism of verse—and, overawed by the very idea of poetry, his contemporaries loved it. In an age when even the records of the Harvard Hasty Pudding Club were kept in meter, perhaps poetry was actually held too cheap; too familiar, at least in form, its real rarity and difficulty were underestimated.

Now Duberman has come along to give us another representative Lowell. And his Lowell is a surprise: neither a lord of style nor an interesting failure, nor significant as a man of letters at all. This new book makes no rousing claims for Lowell's work. It is plain that, while reading the poems, Duberman has smelled formaldehyde, and if he praises the Biglow Papers and A Fable for Critics, it is not with much heart. He does seem rather anxious, though, about the literary criticism: it has been—he says in a puzzling phrase—"too completely" ignored. Yet in urging "above all" Lowell's "ability to appreciate a wide variety of excellence," he is asking us to warm our hands in advance of the fire: it is only in a first-rate critic that catholicity matters; it is nothing without illumination.

And Lowell is not a first-rate critic; his strengths, as Mr. Duberman says, are overbalanced by his defects. His essays—on Shakespeare, Cervantes, Keats and other great names—contain the excellent commonplaces of cultivation. They lap and flow, pleasant and undisturbing. But it is true that now and then a bird will rise from the waters and take the sun: a truth is illumined, unforgettably, as when Lowell observes:

"The grand loneliness of Milton in his latter years . . . is reflected . . . in his maturer poems by a sublime independence of human sympathy like that with which mountains fascinate and rebuff us." And—exhilaratingly—a whole flock is let loose, one by one, in the notorious essay on Thoreau. For me, this essay is the one most alive today. It is a fillip to the subject. It gives Thoreau a hearty good shaking, then drops its hands, bows its head, and worships. It puts forward some of the best things ever said about Thoreau—or about the dubious preference of nature to civilization. An impassioned, witty defense of social life, it is both entirely right and entirely irrelevant: if Thoreau had been more social, he would indeed have been a more lovable man and a more reasonable writer; but he would not have been Thoreau, and it is Thoreau that we value.

Duberman's Lowell is representative not as a man of letters but as a man. And not merely representative but exemplary—a man for our times. Certainly Lowell was lovable. But if readers search in the book for what makes Lowell's character attractive—or why Lowell should be held up as an inspiring example when there is William Lloyd Garrison (that great, unattractive man), or Samuel Gridley Howe or half a dozen others of Lowell's time who, unlike Lowell, can indeed shame us in our moral mediocrity—they will go hungry. There are hints in Duberman's Introduction: loyalty, probity—but these are not explicitly pursued. Perhaps we are meant to infer the full extent of Lowell's excellence; but the job would seem to devolve on Duberman. You get in at the first page and are let out at the last, and do not know where you are. You have spent your time with a genial, gracious Lowell, a man perhaps better than most of us, but not so much better that it hurts. It was worth it, this trip, but one had been led to expect more.

Duberman is nothing if not professional and thorough, and he tells us exactly what is wrong with earlier biographies of Lowell. By implication, his own study makes good their limitations, and this is true. For, all pretenses to unearned importance aside, this book is easily the best life of Lowell. Duberman quotes well from Lowell's charming letters—and makes one wish for a slim, carefully selected new edition of them (the age of Collected Letters is too much with us). He works with just the right amount of detail, looking over the facts with a sleepless intelligence. His portrait of Lowell is strangely without shadows, but perhaps there were none to be found. One is grateful for Duberman's book, despite the bleached quality of the prose and of the approach.

But it is not the personal life of Lowell—as Duberman suggests—that is most relevant today. His life was essentially commonplace—a little luckier, more noticed than most, but lacking the stir and spasm of heroism. Lowell was blessed with a happy disposition, but this was an accident of nature, not an accomplishment. And in commending Lowell for not having an obsession with achievement, Duberman deprecates greatness. For genius is always obsessive, and if this means that very often it is selfish, still it is genius and not mediocrity that needs our study, our reverence, our defense.

The most valuable Lowell is still the Lowell of the Biglow Papers—and, I would add, of The Anti-Slavery Papers, their more readable prose counterpart. Lowell was not one of the great abolitionists, and in his own definition of talent—faculties used glibly to produce results—he was merely talented in morals and politics. But this clever abolitionist can be telling. The Anti-Slavery Papers, especially, are a lesson and a delight: "It has been a matter of controversy whether the New Testament should be one of the books read by pupils in our public schools. As one chief object of these institutions is to fit the youth of our country for their duties and responsibilities as American citizens, we cannot but think that the habitual perusal of such a book would be likely to produce mental confusion and be the cause of error in after life."

It is this Lowell who is most tonic today. And not only because he was capable of moral passion but because he knew that moral passion is a power in politics: press hard enough, be "fanatical" enough, and the "respectable"—as Lowell scornfully called the opponents of abolition—the timid and the corrupt and the complacent will give in: after how much agony and sweat it is always impossible to measure, as it is often almost unbearable to contemplate. And the Lowell of both the Biglow and Anti-Slavery Papers is no less bracing because he believed in democracy—giving it all three cheers. He makes us realize how much faith in it we have lost, how bored with it we really are. Yet read him and it seems a great idea, one worth being "fanatical" about—fervent but not foolish. And though the divine halo Lowell saw encircling this idea has burned out, he can help us a little in our unbelief.

CELEBRATE AND HONOR
THE COURAGE, INTEGRITY AND VITALITY OF

Morton Sobell

50th Birthday Meeting

Hear Nobel Scientist

DR. HAROLD C. UREY

"The Rosenberg-Sobell trial has troubled me for a long time. I do not believe that any of these people were guilty of the crimes charged against them."

Hear Atomic Scientist

DR. PHILIP MORRISON

"... I assisted also in the assembly of the combat bomb that was flown and dropped on Nagasaki . . . The entire testimony of Greenglass . . . is both qualitatively and quantitatively incorrect and misleading."

Hear RABBI J. J. WEINSTEIN

President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity.

Hear MRS. MORTON SOBELL

"For 17 years my innocent husband has been in prison. Neither he nor the Rosenbergs ever transmitted any material."

Hunter College Assembly Hall
69th bet. Park & Lex. Aves., New York City

TUESDAY, APRIL 11, 1967

7 to 10 P.M.

Contribution: $1.00

FOR MORE INFORMATION and for a copy of "Invitation to an Inquest" by Walter and Miriam Schneir (Doubleday) $5.95, write to
COMMITTEE TO FREE MORTON SOBELL
150 Fifth Ave., N.Y.C. 10011 - Tel. 243-6030

FOR WRITERS!

Enrich your style through Herbert Spencer's and Edgar Allan Poe's classic principles that have influenced many of the world's great authors. A help for writers eager to get published. Send $1.00 to

PAGEANT PRESS

101 5th Ave. N.Y. 3 Dept. N

The Best Way
To Get

THE NATION

THE NATION 4-3-67
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

- ☐ One Year, $10
- ☐ Two Years, $18
- ☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed
(Foreign and Canadian Postage
$1 a year extra)

NAME _____

ADDRESS _____

CITY _____

STATE _____ ZIP NO. _____

THEATRE / Harold Clurman

Those who seek entertainment on Broadway will probably find Robert Anderson's four one-act plays collectively entitled You Know I Can't Hear You When the Water's Running gratifying (Ambassador Theatre). Its sexual emphasis is constant, it is frequently funny, and its acting is excellent. It provoked me to thought, accompanied by puzzled irritation.

None of the plays was wholly about what it appeared to be about. The theme of the first segment of the quartet, called "The Shock of Recognition," is the disparity between our professed acceptance of bold spectacle and language in regard to subjects once held to be publicly taboo, and our real reaction to these new liberties. The argument concerns a playwright who plans to open his first scene with the entrance of a man in full and unabashed nakedness. He does not propose to arouse libidinous scandal but to awake the audience with "the shock of recognition," a sense of our common nature. The point of Anderson's skit is the discomfort everyone experiences at the possibility of an actual confrontation with the event: the rationale breaks down (even for the playwright) in view of the fact.

The audience titters or laughs at the notion in semi-acknowledgment of its own divided sentiments (at once a kind of prurience and inhibition), but the cream of the jest lies in something else entirely, something which has nothing to do with Anderson's apparent subject. An actor is brought in by the producer to prove that no player would consent to perform the described action. Pathetic comedy issues from the sight of the actor's eagerness to do everything or anything, no matter how personally embarrassing, to get the part.

The second "panel" of the series, "The Footsteps of Doves," is a slighter and more obvious bit, taking place in a showroom where beds are sold. The choice of a bed reveals the state of waning desire in the middle years of marriage. The audience's laughter in this instance is both sly and shamefaced: it is giggling with the titillation of recognition.

The third piece (which opens the second and better half of the evening) begins with a discussion between husband and wife about the sex education of their children. The college boy son masturbates; the daughter, the wife contends, should be instructed in the use of contraceptives. The wife is crudely "realistic" in the modern mode; her salesman husband is sensible in his gentle humor and regard for his children's privacy.

A good moment in this episode is one in which we see the hurt the husband suffers when he realizes that his wife, not in the least perturbed, takes for granted that he "cheats" on her every time he goes on the road. Then there is a sudden and rather touching shift of theme at the close when one learns that their son has decided to quit college and (possibly) home because he can no longer bear the stuffy mediocrity of the parental environment. This motif—the misunderstanding or break between the generations—should have been made central to the play's meaning. Instead it bobs up as though an afterthought and thus renders the "daring" of the parents' early colloquy dubiously provocative.

The final and most succinct "movement" (called "I'm Herbert") might be described as a memory of sex. An aged couple are no longer able to remember where and what they did with whom in their several past marriages; they even have some difficulty in knowing whom they are married to now. Having a distinctly melancholy side, "I'm Herbert" is the purest comedy of the lot. It reduces sex to an absurdity, a fleeting and illusory sensation among many which wither and decay along with everything else in the course of time.

I have detailed the four plots to convey the sense of ambiguity the evening creates. Its mental and moral disposition is, I believe, typical of the ordinary middle-class American. (This explains in large measure its undoubted audience appeal.) Its sophistication veils a puerile fascination with sex, a determination to be free and frank in talk about it, together with an equal degree of embarrassment. There is some uncertainty as to whether sex is to be embraced on a biologic level or to be ridiculed as something less significant than what we romantically suppose it to be. There is above all a stubbornly lingering, though now bewildered and apologetic, Puritanism in the attitude. Behind all this is an element of honesty and truthfulness. One feels oneself in the presence of something still unborn, certainly juvenile and consequently somewhat annoying, perhaps even boring, which one still hesitates utterly to reject (much less to condemn) since it does exist on a far wider scale than one assumes. The unbalance in the construction of the four playlets (except for the last rueful farce) reflects a tussle in the playwright's spirit.

There can be no quibble whatever about the acting. Martin Balsam is first rate in the humor of the first two sketches, and moving as the decent father of the third. His is the best sort of simple naturalistic acting. George Grizzard too is fine in the innuendo of the bed salesman in the second piece, both sharp and relaxed in the characterization of senility in the finale. Eileen Heckart is equally good in this, and as always dryly and efficiently to the point in the rest. As performance (under Alan Schneider's direction) the whole evening functions admirably.

There is nothing ambivalent or indecisive about Charles Schulz's musical entertainment You're A Good Man, Charlie Brown at Theatre 80 St. Marks: it is wholly childish. We can absorb it without qualm, enjoy it without shame or leave it without discontent. If predictions are in order, it will go on and on like The Fantasticks. It appeals to the simple heart.

Based on the comic strip "Peanuts," You're A Good Man, Charlie Brown preserves an artless comic-strip discontinuity, each bit leading to a kindly smile or a happy chuckle. It reminded me of what Van Wyck Brooks said

THE EXCHANGE (For David)

*You tell me how helpless you are to leave.
I listen, detached as you prefer me.
I hear screams from the building across the grass, and laughter.
I scan your face as calm as mine.
We continue to sit under a shady tree.*

*I blotted him out with a drop of ink,
I absorbed him in my blotter.
Now when I look I find him under a scratched out word under the influence of the x mark, eyes lowered, smiling,
finding in himself that pleasure that was crossed out for him, his face calm and good.
He has his dream and will not raise his eyes to give it up.*

I stretch out a hand, a warding off of evil, and it is grasped limply as you smile, your eyes still averted. We get up from the grass and go for coffee at the Exchange.

DAVID IGNATOW

about Huckleberry Finn: when Mark Twain, a representative of the America of his day, produced his masterpiece it turned out to be a novel of adolescence. (I can't remember now whether the eminent critic also pointed out that the fun in Huckleberry masks much savagery and sadness.) The Charles Schulz miniature offers consolation by its benign acceptance of basic human inadequacy and repeated failure. It celebrates in friendly laughter all our frustrations at not being something bigger, better and more glorious than we are.

Here at long last is an affirmative statement in the contemporary theatre: it forgives all our shortcomings and tells us we are all good because we are all schmoes! Even the dog Snoopy is a perpetually disappointed and only mildly resentful character. But it is just for that and for his resignation at being forever unable to advance beyond dogdom, that we love him. There is withal a philosophy to the show. "Happiness is finding a pencil. . . . Happiness is two kinds of ice cream, etc., etc." We settle for peanuts: it is enough. The greatest failure, Charlie Brown, is still a good man.

The cast is endearing. The actors impersonate little children and a tiny dog, but their ages do not matter. We take them at their word and applaud them for their charm. Among his other attributes Gary Burghoff as Charlie Brown has a most winning countenance. Bill Hinnant as Snoopy is the most expert player. Everyone satisfies. The evening is delightfully brief.

musically cognitive and relevant terms. Terms, that is, that would not do equally well to describe any musical context (such as the definition of "serial" music as that which "manipulates various materials" to be found in the Times review of the Carter), that would not create false perceptual normatives (such as, in the same review, the use of "dissonance" as though it meant a universally identifiable kind of sound rather than a function not present in the context at hand), that do not use non-cognitive nouns as if they were cognitive ("music of this kind seldom has charm"), and that do not define traditional musical terms in new and confusing ways that have no references to any existing musical compositions (as, in a letter by the Times critic responding to a complainant: "whether or not [it] is a row it sounds like a row, with its disjunct leaps, etc.," even though a "row" not only in no sense defines a way of articulating a presented pitch succession but does not even define any given presented pitch succession at all, only the structural basis for pitch succession). For the poor listener in the dark, even a simple prohibition on the misuse of technical and adjectival terms in journalistic reports of musical events would surely be an enormous stride toward enlightenment, if only because the noninformativeness might become transparent.

And in the absence of such red herrings, perhaps one could observe without fear of misinterpretation that the Carter Concerto does represent a rather extraordinary culmination of ideas inherent in his earlier music, and that it does constitute the most definitively developed instance thus far of a compositional approach that is one of the significant polarities of contemporary American work. In this context, moreover, comparisons with Babbitt's Relata, the most highly developed work at the other pole, continually suggest themselves as illuminations of the special qualities of the Carter Concerto: just as many aspects of Relata itself en-

MUSIC / Benjamin Boretz

The one historicist observation that seems relevant in contemplating the new Piano Concerto by Elliott Carter (performed this season by the Boston Symphony with the pianist Jacob Lateiner) is of one's extraordinary good fortune in living at a musical time, in a musical culture, that can produce within a single year two major works of such manifest mastery and originality, and yet of such nearly diametric disparity, as this concerto and Milton Babbitt's Relata I (see The Nation, April 11, 1966). For none of those other issues of conflicts or tendencies in "style" and "technique" that has been journalistically raised, once again, in connection with Carter's work has the slightest relevance to the principal musical "issues," which are typically ignored: the nature and quality of the musical events the Concerto contains, and, beyond these, the avenues of perception and thought that it powerfully and uniquely reveals. The contentious multi-chotomies of the journalist's historical dialectic are simply unrecognizable as a relevant picture of the compositional world to those who inhabit it, absorbed as they are in the unique and fascinating particularities of actual musical relation.

Thus, the principal objective of a public discussion of a work of the obvious importance, scope and complexity of thought and surface of the Carter Concerto is that its existence be made known to the interested musical public, and hence the opportunity created for its further audition. Beyond that, one would hope to provide those listeners who lack the opportunity for multiple listening and score study needed to become intimately acquainted with this difficult new work, with some advance idea of the kinds of events, conjunctions and continuities it presents. The prospect of providing such a framework is, I confess, a little dismaying; serious musicians know how long and intensive our study will have to be before works like Carter's and Babbitt's are adequately understood. Yet on the other hand we also know that their immensely valuable content is available—in varying degrees—even to "technically" untrained and relatively inexperienced listeners, given the right combination of awareness and assiduity.

In this context, it is hard to see what abstract and largely erroneous discussions of "serialism" as a compositional "doctrine" can possibly signify to the listener who has never been told either what a simple musical relation is, or what any of the events in the works under discussion sound or act like in

CELEBRATE

50th USSR Anniversary in Moscow, Leningrad, Kiev, Sochi on the Black Sea, Erevan, Armenia, Tbilisi, Georgia and Berlin with Soviet people and Partisans of Peace.

VISIT 4 Soviet Republics, 6 Capital Cities, 9 major world centers. Meet the Soviet people at home for informal friendly discussions arranged by Prof. Holland Roberts, Tour Leader, President of the American Russian Institute and Member of the World Peace Council.

Leaving New York, Tuesday, July 11, 3 week all expense tour — $995

Write for 50th Anniversary Tour information to Sponsors:

AMERICAN RUSSIAN INSTITUTE AND FRIENDSHIP SOCIETY
90 McAllister Street, San Francisco, Calif. 94102

gendered comparisons with the Carter Orchestral Variations and Double Concerto. For—just to show how complex the situation really is—with respect to “serialism” (the constructive interior), Carter would have to be described as a “Stravinsky-early-Schoenbergian,” and Babbitt as a “Webern-late-Schoenbergian”; but as far as articulative surface and continuity are concerned, Babbitt is surely a “Stravinsky-Webernian” and Carter a “Berg-Ives-Schoenbergian.” What this principally indicates, I hope, is that at this stage of their highly developed maturity, these composers can no longer be fruitfully discussed as “products” of previous “influences,” for the individual terms that their compositions represent are both unmistakable as perceptual qualities in themselves, and evident in the vast range of music by their younger contemporaries in which their influence is manifest.

But it might still be useful to note that, like the “serialism” of Stravinsky and early Schoenberg, Carter’s Concerto is pre-eminently “harmonic”; that is, it involves delimited pitch constellations that, from the very opening in the piano alone, are presented as the multiply unfolded sonority of a given event; whereas in Relata the unfolding is continuous and the successional ordering of pitches is critical. This “harmonic” idea, moreover, is one of the most striking respects in which the new Concerto develops earlier Carter qualities; for whereas his “multi-dimensional” works from the First Quartet through the Orchestral Variations, the Second Quartet and the Double Concerto developed the ideas of juxtaposed, highly differentiated sonic strata on the one hand, and a filmically intercut tempo-relational development on the other, the Concerto brilliantly combines these concepts.

Thus in the first movement, a sharply demarcated alternation of tempo-events is articulated by the association, with each “tempo,” of a particular “harmony” (defined by three-note constellations), whose “non-blending” with adjacent harmonies creates a constant sense of event change without an obvious jolt in the articulative surface. And this strong “pitch-content” orientation of the interiors of these sections—which recalls the pitch-matching ideas of the 1954 Sonata for flute, oboe, cello and harpsichord—provides a framework within which a remarkable multiplicity of long, wide-arched “legato” lines is clearly perceptible within a texture of frequently maximal density and dispersion. Yet the strikingly different senses in which a “long line” is projected by the piano, percussion, woodwinds and strings is a remarkably subtle aspect of the work’s development; the piano’s presence is almost continuous, but the articulative identities of—particularly—the bass clarinet, flute and oboe are sustained with extraordinary delicacy even in the most massive surroundings.

In the second movement, this idea of multiplicity is further extended into the juxtaposition of multiple articulations simultaneously, each again retaining its identity. Thus one finds short, sharp, isolated attacks counterpointed with long, arching lines, compressed articulative bursts and dense sustained chordal masses (a simplistic “effect” of the young Polish primitives here given functional meaning as a single element of the multi-faceted texture). The extreme of this “dramatized” situation is in the movement’s “cadenza,” where the piano’s pitch-dense figuration is gradually “absorbed” by a swelling string-sonority wave that ultimately overflows the entire perceptual field, stripping the piano first to a two-pitch conjection that directly associates with an important passage near the beginning of the first movement, then to a single pitch reiterated at registral dead center.

Here as elsewhere, a highly individual aspect of Carter’s compositional personality—and the quality that perhaps mainly defines the polarity of his work with that of Babbitt—is the evident “gestural” sense that these conjunctions project. For in Carter’s work, all the layers upon layers of differentiated, highly individuated articulations contribute invariably to a single function, a unitary perceptual contour; whereas in Babbitt’s work, Relata as elsewhere, the inflections extended along and within a highly unitary surface, texture and articulative continuity project an ever-widening and maximally dense multiplicity of functional interrelations, simultaneously and successively. And where Carter takes “patches” of traditionally associative kinds of continuity (“long-lined” melodic successions, “cadenza” figurations, etc.) and creates by the “pressure” of their individual manner of succession and conjection a wholly new sense of continuity, Babbitt “reconstructs” traditional continuity by fragmenting its components into individually quite “untraditional” articulations whose conjunction produces a new multi-faceted, dimensionally expanded, coherence.

It is in this respect, too, that Carter’s “gestural” language is most clearly counterpoised to Babbitt’s nonchalant, radically anti-gestural surface. For the unitary perceptual “curve” that arises from all the complexities in Carter’s Concerto is like a phraseological rhetoric that accompanies, surrounds, “coats” and insinuates into the substantive relational body of the work, while in Babbitt it is the very “closeness” of the surface to the relational interior that gives it its special sonority as well. The presence of a gestural stratum in Carter’s work, too, provides a perceptual “signal” to sustain the listener, giving him a path far easier to follow than the multi-furcated interior, providing perhaps also a secure earhold to retain coherence between (one hopes) ever clearer and broader glimpses of the really significant ideas being developed and explored within. And my impression is, upon hearing what appeared to be an unusually adequate first performance by the Boston Symphony and Mr. Lateiner under Erich Leinsdorf, that—especially in its first movement—this Concerto has discovered new paths of perception, and new possibilities of coherent articulation under conditions of unprecedented complexity through structural “dramatization” of music-relational situations, that will be a treasured source of profound musical idea for a large part of the musical history to come.

ART

KHAJURAHOS' EROTIC SCULPTURES: Thousand Year Old Temple Friezes of Hindu Arts, Carnal Love, Masterpieces, Chandra Architecture. Twelve Color Slides $10. TEMPLE VIEWS, Box 25101, Cincinnati, Ohio 45225.

ORIGINALS COST LESS THAN REPRODUCTIONS! Contemporary original signed etchings, lithographs, woodcuts, $3.50. Guarantee. Free brochure. GRAPHIC CIRCLE (NA), 58 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10011.

PERSONALS

MOVING TO CHICAGO? CONSIDER LIVING IN INTEGRATED MARYNOOK—Chicago’s nationally famous interracial community. Modern houses are set along tree-lined, winding streets, adjoining a large, beautiful park, near the University of Chicago. For information write 8560 Dorchester, Chicago, Illinois, or phone 312-731-9384.

USE LAWFUL DIRECT ACTION to repeal all abortion laws. LEGALIZE ABORTION, POB 24163, Los Angeles, Calif. 90024.

NON-PROFIT CAMP (interracial, interreligious) desperately needs donation of pianos. Tax deductible. Will pick up. Box 600, c/o The Nation.

Buy Your Books through The Nation

Nation readers can avail themselves of our offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S., at the regular retail price post-free. When ordering, please give name and author and publisher, if possible. Remittance must accompany order. Make checks payable to:

THE NATION
Reader’s Service Division

333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

Crossword Puzzle No. 1195

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS:

- 1 A children's novel of the harvestman. (5-4-4)
- 9 April in "As You Like It"? That's what such a man might be. (5)
- 10 Being a Texan, the man has something like smallpox or measles! (9)
- 11 One who makes an affidavit, rather than a hooked 9. (7)
- 12 Here begins the Latin version. (7)
- 13 17 has so many banks! (5)
- 14 Complains, as one might to the television repair man? (6, 3)
- 16 Come about. (9)
- 18 Would one be equipped to 7 through the sky? (5)
- 19 Taking a spin in the race? (7)
- 21 To take it easy around here in Paris, would be to make things more worldly. (7)
- 22 Leadbelly is more familiar, but this is conducted with more skill. (9)
- 23 His widow was hardly the morose type. (5)
- 24 Picture the one with the luminous dial? (3, 5, 5)

DOWN:

- 1 Where spurs are not an expression of affluence. (4, 2, 3, 5)
- 2 Just a little drink to fabricate by false imitation: Smith might be used to it. (4, 5)

- 3 Some fight for this on down, first or last. (7)
- 4 Overtaken at first, it's plain. (5)
- 5 Thanksgiving should symbolize it. (9)
- 6 Possibly net result, being almost frozen, yet drawn on by hope. (7)
- 7 All the tricks? Look for mine, perhaps. (5)
- 8 Not a sailor turned farmer—like the best people. (4, 2, 3, 5)
- 14 It's the gap that fills us up, at least for a time! (9)
- 15 Be more clever than a great success? Say what you mean! (3, 4, 2)
- 17 Where they sat down in a row, while others fought? (7)
- 18 This is likely to be extremely painful. (7)
- 20 Not a pure strain of dog to find waiting for him on the stage. (5)
- 21 Helpless plight, found in sudden inclination. (5)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 1194

ACROSS: 1 Portsmouth; 6 Adds; 10, 9 down and 15 Now I lay me down to sleep; 11 Anemone; 12 Wide-open; 13 Opals; 17 Albanians; 19 Expresses; 21 Ouvre; 24, 5 and 28 The Great Train Robbery; 27 Attests; 29 Sort; 30 Golden mean. DOWN: 1 and 23 across Pinstripe; 2 Rawhide; 3 Salve; 4 Olympians; 7 Diorama; 8 Stepsister; 14 Essentials; 16 Pretense; 18 Besmeared; 20 Painter; 22 Trapeze; 24 Tasso; 25 Robin; 26 Lynn.

SAVE YOUR COPIES OF
The NATION

• Each file holds a full year's copies.

• Jesse Jones Volume Files for every publication.

• Covered in durable leather like Kivar, title embossed in 16 Kt gold.

Satisfaction guaranteed

Attractive and practical for your home or office

3 for $8.25

ORDER NOW — send check or money order.

MAGAZINE FILE CO.
520 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 36, N. Y.

FREE DESCRIPTIVE FOLDER
UPON REQUEST

PUBLICATIONS

WORLD DEMOCRACY. By Bin Dir Woor. Self-Designated Symbolical World President. Unique. Entrancing. $2. Greenwich Book Publishers, 282 7th Avenue, New York City. Bin Dir Woor, as the first of an endless line of Symbolical World Presidents, calls on President Johnson, and the leaders on the "Other Side" to call a congress of the elected and other heads of every nation to arbitrate the Vietnam War, and all future wars.

"SELECTED POEMS" of George Flynn (Villiers of London $2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound." — James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at 344—82 St., Brooklyn 9, N.Y.

THE IDLER. Lively, offbeat liberal monthly. Fun to read. Send $2 for trial year's subscription. IDLER, 413B 6th Street, N.E., Washington, D.C. 20002.

AMERICAN HAIKU magazine. Subscription — $3.00 yearly. Box 73, Platteville, Wisconsin 53818.

THE ACCOMPLICE, written by a Salemite, publishes — verbatim — the RANTOUL PROTEST of the Knapp judicial murder and Hawthorne's (11-12-1830) defense of the Crown-in-shields. Rantoul, supported by Hawthorne's novels, vanquished 1830 prosecutor, Webster, on Compromise of 1850 and 1830, RESCUED. Later, Melville, Dickens reworked Hawthorne's 1830, 1850-51 materials.

THE ACCOMPLICE (in White murder) publishes key 12-25-48 and 9-17-50 letters by Hawthorne. It relates Judges Shaw and Story to Billy Budd by C. Sumner's (submerged) defense of Somers murders. Material on Garrison, Come-Outers, Selfridge murder — A break-through to sources. By author-publisher, Thomas Allen, 304 Essex St., Salem, Mass. 01970—Paper—$2.50.

TRAVEL

The OTHER Israel—a three-week summer program for young people 21 to 35—a dialogue with young Israeli socialists—meet farmers, workers, Arabs, labor leaders, peace groups, parliament members—live and work in a kibbutz—tour of the country. $625.00. For details write: Young Americans for Progressive Israel, 150 Fifth Avenue, Room 700, New York, N.Y. 10011.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

Advertising Rates

Classified: 74c a line (6 words) 3 line min.

Classified Display: $7.42 per inch (min.)

THE NATION, 333 Sixth Ave., N.Y. 10014
212-8400

'The habit grew on me...'

So writes a subscriber, explaining why he has been reading The Nation for the past thirty years.

In an age of hyperbole, The Nation makes few claims for itself. It will not make you rich or alluring to the opposite sex.

Some readers buy it because it carries the toughest crossword puzzle now being printed in America. More buy it because the editors have a greedy curiosity about what really happens behind the velvet curtains of public relations and the pious admonitions of government.

The truth is not often given away free — you have to dig for it. The Nation has been digging for 101 years and its readers never seem to tire of watching the editors work.

subscribe to

THE NATION

America's most habit-forming magazine

VIETNAM: The Logic of Withdrawal

by Howard Zinn

This is a studied rebuke by Howard Zinn (ex-bombardier, historian, civil rights activist) to America's continued military presence in what he calls "a theatre of the absurd." The price of that presence (primarily in lives, but also in national honor and in money needed to build America's own "Great Society" and help with the economic development of Southeast Asia) is calculated, weighed, and found indefensible.

To those who argue that our international reputation would suffer, that there is an analogy from Munich, or that we must contain communism or lose the game of dominoes — The Logic of Withdrawal as Zinn develops it is both forthright and persuasive.

FREE with each NEW subscription

THE NATION
333 6th Avenue
New York, N.Y. 10014

Herewith my order and payment for a NEW subscription to The Nation. Please send my FREE copy of VIETNAM: THE LOGIC OF WITHDRAWAL.

☐ 1 Year, $10 ☐ 2 Years, $18 ☐ 6 Months, $6
(Foreign and Canadian Postage, $1 per year extra)

name
address
city state zip no.

WHAT FRIENDLY LEAVES OUT JOHN HORN

THE NATION

APRIL 10, 1967 35 cents

BURLINGAME
APR 10 1967
LIBRARY

Question for Punta del Este

IS THERE A LATIN AMERICA?

RONALD HILTON

Forgotten History of the Draft

DORIAN J. FLIEGEL

Britain's Press Crisis

RAYMOND WILLIAMS

FORMS OF SINOLOGY

JONATHAN NIRSKY

THE GAUDY HORSESHOE

ERVIN GALANTAY

EE-67 PLS-801
BURLINGAME PUB LIBRARY
BURLINGAME
CALIFORNIA 94010

PAPER N

LETTERS

and gratefully received

Freeport, Me.

DEAR SIR: Of all the recent articles on the CIA . . . the best appeared in The Nation. I refer to Smith Simpson's "How Foggy Bottom Lost Its Spies," Jan. 9. Never have I encountered a clearer, more dispassionate account of the CIA, its origins, its growth and its menace to our society.

And congratulations also for John McDermott's "Vietnam Is No Mistake," Feb. 13. This goes perhaps a shade further in pinning the Vietnamese War on the present Administration than the facts warrant (as Professor Schuman pointed out in a recent letter), but it has certainly pulled enlightened thinking on the war in the right direction, namely: in pinning full responsibility for the continuation of the war on the Administration's determination, not its stupidity or helplessness.

In any case, McDermott's article is a milestone in anti-war thinking, although I still find it somewhat difficult to reconcile his latest conclusions with his previous position in "Welfare Imperialism in Vietnam" [The Nation, July 25, 1966]. His letter in your Mar. 6 issue did not, as far as I am concerned, reconcile the incompatibility—although both articles contained brilliant flashes of scholarship and insight, and I am extremely grateful to The Nation for publishing both of them.

David L. Graham

just so

Los Angeles, Calif.

DEAR SIR: Of the many theories advanced by scholars delving into the subject of crime, the one Michael Fooner has come up with ["The Case of the Culpable Victim," The Nation, Mar. 6]—that "carelessness in handling cash" (equated as a "natural habit") serves as encouragement and invitation to crime—strikes me as far-fetched bordering on nonsense. The inference is that if Mr. Citizen would make sure to lock his valuables and cash more securely it would somehow reduce the rate of crime. I wonder whether this alleged carelessness also applies to "unwise" investments or to legal fleecing of investors?

Irwin Shappin

no American presence

New York City

DEAR SIR: I have discussed the question of objectives at some length with officials of both the North Vietnamese government and the National Liberation Front in Western Europe, Cambodia and Hanoi. . . . I have spoken with Prof. Nguyen Van Hieu, a member of the Central Committee of the National Liberation Front, and with President Ho Chi Minh. On the basis of my own understanding of the position of the two parties . . . I should like to take issue with your Mar. 13 editorial, "War and Peace."

You state: "Apparently the Front would accede to an American presence in South Vietnam to prevent a renewal of hostilities." Such speculation cannot possibly stem from an informed source: it must be regarded as sheer fantasy. The NLF is broadly composed, exceedingly tolerant and impressively flexible; but it would never consider ratifying a foreign presence in South Vietnam. The Front contemplates participating in a postwar coalition government which would include elements which are today among its political opponents. But NLF spokesmen emphasize that this is an internal problem; it can only be settled after the United States has withdrawn its troops. . . . In the interests of a fair and just settlement, it is imperative that we be scrupulously accurate in representing the views of the North Vietnamese government and the National Liberation Front.

Russell Stetler, Executive Secretary
Bertrand Russell Peace Foundation

EDITORIALS

Resurrection '67

The Easter just past reminded Americans of the Resurrection, but in some of the cities there were lower-case resurrections of a character not easily defined. The Be-In in New York's Central Park, where 10,000 "hippies" crowded the Sheep Meadow, was the farthest out, with pink paint on foreheads, a great display of bananas (some Village pharmacologists have discovered that the skins are a legal and inexpensive substitute for "pot"), fantastic costumes, and chants of LOVE, LOVE, LOVE. Interviewed by bemused reporters, some complained that New Yorkers don't look at one another, and explained that the purpose of the Be-In was to dispel fear and glorify life. They were showing that they were not afraid of the stares of the conformists who came on the spectacle and were properly appalled.

Did the celebration in the Sheep Meadow have anything to do with religion? Hippies versed in theology could make out a case. The eminent theologian, Paul Tillich, defined religious belief as "ground of being." Presumably the celebrants were asserting both their state of being and the fact that they had something to be for, even though it seemed a little nebulous.

The Be-In is not peculiar to New York. It is said to have originated in San Francisco, where thousands of hippies paid homage to life and love last January.

In a New York church the minister, dressed in a green sports coat, delivered an Easter sermon consisting mainly of readings from the works of Dylan Thomas and Bob Dylan. Three dancers then skipped up the aisle to what used to be the altar, where they jumped about while the congregation sang, "Give me your hand, give me your hand. All I want is to love our God, oh." The worshipers then pinned small squares of felt onto a yellow banner hanging opposite the pulpit. "We're creating—weaving in a sense—our own Easter banner," the clergyman explained. It was aggiornamento in Washington Square.

In front of St. Patrick's Cathedral pickets demonstrated for peace in Vietnam. They were surrounded by policemen with bull horns and walkie-talkies, but the crowds were more friendly than in the past. Either it was the spirit of Easter, or the Vietnamese War has become so unpopular that protests are viewed sympathetically. A veteran picket in a coolie hat inclined to the latter view. "People don't make nasty remarks any more," he said. "They're beginning to understand."

Rebellion on the day of the Resurrection was not confined to the hippies and their subculture. An Air Force Academy instructor, Capt. Dale E. Noyd, filed suit in federal court in Denver, through the Civil Liberties Union, to enjoin the Air Force from sending him to Vietnam. "I must stand on what I am and what I believe."

Captain Noyd told his superiors. "The war in Vietnam is unjust and immoral, and if ordered to do so, I shall refuse to fight in that war." In England, when serving with an F-100 squadron, he received a medal for landing a badly damaged plane. He is a career officer—what could be more square? But you never can tell.

The Ultimate Escalation

The quarterly New University Thought has published a special issue, "Decisions for America," incorporating the papers delivered at the conference on "The National Priorities Problem" organized by Prof. Seymour Melman and some of his colleagues at Columbia University. Nation readers are familiar with Mr. Melman's thesis, expressed in Our Depleted Society and in numerous articles and speeches. What is not yet generally realized, however, is that the problem is not only one of guns versus butter, or Vietnam versus the Great Society, or whether electronics engineers, for instance, should be working on devices for continuous monitoring of critically sick hospital patients or on anti-missile-missile radar guidance. The real question is how much longer there are going to be people. The way things are going, thermonuclear war may erupt, not in a comfortably distant future but in the final stages of the Vietnamese War, now entering its most crucial phase since Lyndon B. Johnson double-crossed the electorate in 1964.

On a longer time scale, the outlook is examined in the paper on "Humanizing Modern Technology," by Stephen Unger, like Mr. Melman a professor of engineering at Columbia. Mr. Unger has brought together the certain effects on human beings of the use of thermonuclear weapons, the futility of all proposed means of protection, and the flaws in the argument that mutual deterrence will avert a showdown. Much of this we have heard before (which is added reason for taking it seriously), but Mr. Unger also offers a new and pertinent analysis of the possible transition from conventional to nuclear warfare. As casualties mount on both sides, national "honor" becomes a paramount issue. When the foe still refuses to submit to our "honorable" terms, and all conventional escalations have been exhausted, and both the military and civilian populations are becoming dangerously restive, a quick finish may be sought by application of "small" tactical nuclear weapons. Thus—assuming that both sides have such weapons at their disposal—the escalation process will once more be set in motion, at a higher level. The bigger the war, the greater the accumulation of casualties, the more difficult it will be for the weaker side to give in and the stronger side to stop escalating. Or, if the two sides are equally matched, Mr. Unger suggests that there will always be highly placed people in both countries who will advocate "getting it over with," and eventually the "grand annihilation" will be brought about.

Mr. Unger does not apply this prognosis to Vietnam,

IN THIS ISSUE

April 10, 1967

EDITORIALS

450

ARTICLES

454 The Façade of Equity:

Forgotten History of the Draft

Dorian J. Fliegel

457 Question for Punta del Este:

Is There a Latin America?

Ronald Hilton

463 Coleman Report:

Why the Schools Flunk Out

Charles S. Benson

466 Britain's Press Crisis

Raymond Williams

BOOKS & THE ARTS

468 Forms of Modern Sinology

Jonathan Mirsky

472 Star of Paris

Harold Clurman

473 Architecture

Ervin Galantay

476 Television

John Horn

477 Art

Max Kozloff

479 Crossword Puzzle

Frank W. Lewis

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Copy Editor
MARION HESS

Theatre
HAROLD CLURMAN

Art
MAX KOZLOFF

Music
BENJAMIN BORETZ

Science
CARL DREHER

Advertising Manager
MARY SIMON

Associate Publisher
GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Associate Editor
PHIL KERBY

Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIAS

Poetry Editor
MICHAEL GOLDMAN

Washington
ROBERT G. SHERRILL

Paris
ALEXANDER WERTH

London
RAYMOND WILLIAMS

Bonn
C. AMERY

Canberra
C. P. FITZGERALD

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July and August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1967 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N. Y. 10014. Tel.: CH 2-8400. West Coast office: 1434 Westwood Boulevard, Los Angeles, Calif. 90024. Tel.: GR 4-3547. Second class postage paid at New York, N. Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give four weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE
NATION
Combined with FRONTIER

Vol. 204

No. 15

but one can readily conceive of circumstances in which the war will take some such course. A land invasion of North Vietnam appears to be in the works: the advent of Gen. Creighton D. Abrams, a proven ground-gainer of World War II, is the most recent augury. As long as only General Giap's divisions oppose the American advance, TNT, gunpowder and napalm may suffice, but suppose, when we are on the brink of "victory," the Chinese hordes should be thrown into the fray, as in Korea when MacArthur came to the Yalu River. Will America, still short of 200 million population, be expected to stand up against the manpower of 700 million Chinese? Secretary McNamara has been quoted as saying that the United States will use nuclear weapons "in any situation in the world when we believe it is desirable to use them in our own interest." If not then, when?

New University Thought appeals for conferences to be held on every campus, with the papers in its special issue as a springboard. This is a fine idea, but it would be well for the participants to be awakened to a new sense of urgency. It is perfectly possible that events will overtake the question of whether technology can be humanized.

Evasion by Definition

With his customary insensitivity to principle, President Johnson has implemented a piously expedient report on CIA support of private institutions prepared for him by Under Secretary of State Katzenbach. To reassure our friends abroad, the report states, the CIA is enjoined in future from this type of subversion—except when in the judgment of the Secretaries of State and Defense the practice is necessary to the national welfare. The men so designated are Messrs. Rusk and McNamara, and our allies will have to decide, in the light of policies this pair has previously endorsed in the name of security, how much assurance they have in fact been given.

The recommendation bans without qualification CIA influence upon the overseas activities of "educational or private voluntary organizations," but one requires no unusual capacity for reading between lines to see that this careful wording need not be held to include labor unions, corporations with international interests or professional societies. Indeed, given the Administration's proved talent for evasion by definition, it is doubtful that it would cover any group that Mr. Rusk and Mr. McNamara wished to buy with covert funds.

The Katzenbach report does not put an end forthwith to the practice it pretends to deplore, but urges a phasing out as rapidly as "clean" money can be found for the ongoing activities. The Under Secretary does not tell us what groups are still being so benefited; instead, according to The New York Times, he describes their number as "very, very, very small." The paper wisely ascribes no figure to this adverbial triplication. In brief, the new policy states that the Administration, acknowledging the error of having been found out, will continue to subvert American citizens for as long and under such circumstances as it sees fit.

The report justifies the practice of turning private groups into secret government agencies on the ground that Communist countries exercise such control. This excuse is consistent with the general blunting of our democratic principles. We are prepared to fight anywhere, any time, in defense of the "open society," and we employ the techniques of totalitarianism whenever we think we detect a temporary advantage in doing so. Indeed, it might be held that today a country like Russia is the more "open." One assumes that its citizens are the servants of national policy; by our traditions, that is not liberty, but neither is it duplicity. Mr. Johnson's ringing slogan, The Great Society, begins to sound like one of the more cynical utterances of the Bourbon monarchs.

Senator Brooke and Dr. King

Anyone reading the headlines of March 24 might conclude that history was a plot. One read, "Dr. King to Press Antiwar Stand"; another, "Brooke Shifts War View and Supports President." No doubt the timing was accidental, but accidents can be politically important. In this instance, what would have been a setback for the President turned into a day of triumph. He had, as the papers put it, won a prize convert whose timely conversion offset Dr. King's renewed attack on the Administration's war policy, which he first launched at the Nation Institute conference in Los Angeles on February 25.

Aside from the fact that a switch in position is inherently newsworthy—even when, as in this instance, it is carefully qualified—Senator Brooke's maiden speech was bound to attract public attention. He is important in his own right, by virtue of past achievements; he is also the first Negro to sit in the Senate since Reconstruction. Even if he had reiterated his earlier view that we should cease bombing North Vietnam without demanding a quid pro quo, he would have got the headlines. But his general conclusion that the "direction of our present military efforts is necessary," gave the hawks a field day and made the President a happy man. While Senator Brooke did have some sensible things to say about American policy in Southeast Asia—points which the press did not emphasize—the general effect of the speech was to strengthen the hawk position. Not only did the speech take the edge off Dr. King's important and cogently reasoned statement but it will, to some extent, further divide the already divided Negro civil rights movement on the crucial war question. More important, Senator Brooke's endorsement of present military policies can work mischief in the Republican ranks. The front-runner, George Romney, has been trying to avoid making the general endorsement of the Administration's conduct of the war which Senator Brooke has now made. With Governor Rockefeller, who supports the President without reservation, already urging Romney to take a hawk position, this added pressure from still another "liberal-moderate" Republican will offset the kind of counterpressure that Senator Javits has been attempting to exert on the unhappy and hesitant Romney. During the '66 campaign, Mark Hatfield, Charles Percy and Senator Brooke were in fairly close agreement and were stressing, in varying degrees, a critical line. The election victories of these three held some promise of moving the GOP into a position less belligerent than that adopted by the Administration, but this promise is fading. For months the columnists and commentators have been saying that Vietnam will be the dominant issue in the 1968 election, if the war is still on. But given a few more defections such as Senator Brooke's, the issue may degenerate into a competition in hawkishness.

More surprising than the fact that the Senator decided to shift his position on the war is his failure to counter the thrust of Dr. King's criticism. On the C.B.S. program, Face the Nation, Martin Agronsky, Alex Kendrick and Robert Novak, in some of the best questioning of an interviewee in years, forced Senator Brooke to acknowledge that the war in Vietnam had brought the civil rights movement to a dead halt. The Senator, of course, said that "survival" came first—and, besides, there are only so many dollars to disburse. The argument is evasive on its face. With a proper allocation of resources—with tough wage and price controls—it would not be necessary to cut back Great Society programs. But to hold conservative support, the Administration has elected to jettison social reform while steadily increasing military spending. In endorsing the President's direction of the war, Senator Brooke has not merely let the peace movement down, he has left American Negroes in the lurch.

Kill Cong

Hollywood, usually quick to produce films showing American wars to be holy wars, appears to have lost interest in Vietnam after the tentative The Green Berets. Is this because the Hollywood formula of the good-guy, underdog Americans against the wickedly aggressive Nazis does not fit? In any reasonable facsimile of this war it would be difficult to portray as saviors the heavily equipped Americans who have come 8,000 miles to assault lightly armed, underfed, pajama-clad natives in their straw villages.

In earlier wars it was the Germans, Japanese or Chinese who were held responsible for the deaths of women and children in flaming villages; in this war, if our own dispatches and newsreels are to be believed, the Americans are playing this role. In earlier wars the local populace was subjugated by a puppet government set up by Germans or Japanese, and the Americans appeared as the liberators. In South Vietnam the puppet government is established by the Americans, whose forces range the countryside like so many Germans or Japanese. The underground is opposed to the Americans, not on their side as in Italy and France.

Ingenious though they are, the script writers are evidently baffled by the intractability of the material. They are joined in this by the writers of comic books who, according to National Periodical Publications, Inc., have not found a formula for Vietnam that the kiddies will buy. In the picture books, the GIs are still back on the beaches of Normandy and Okinawa and in the hills of Korea.

Spilled Milk

It is distressing to see milk being spilled—and the dairy farmers are spilling millions of dollars' worth. But it is not they who are to blame. They are caught in a squeeze that goes back many years and their patience is at an end. In a familiar agricultural situation, the cost of what they buy keeps going up and the price of their product remains the same. What can they do but dump the milk? Under the circumstances, it is the best tactic available to them. It is spectacular—the TV stations show it every night—and nonviolent. There has been little disorder, largely because dumping is the preferred technique.

But the odds are against the embattled dairymen. As always, the farmer is the farmer's worst enemy. Raised in the tradition of rugged individualism, farmers tend to go their own way. Those who are making a profit sell their milk, while those who are in financial straits—and can least afford it—are dumping theirs. Some big farms are active in the dumping program, but it is doubtful that enough milk will be wasted to bring the distributors to terms. There has been some support from organized labor but, again, hardly enough to affect the outcome.

Collective bargaining should be encouraged by every possible means among the farmers themselves. Until they are well enough organized to protect their own interest, in a society like ours they will always be in trouble and sporadic revolts will not get them out of it. The only redeeming feature of the present situation is that, while the Vietnamese War is not the only factor in the farmers' difficulties, the milk-wasting program does give some evidence that the war is beginning to trigger significant economic discontent on the home front. In the long-term outlook, another favorable factor is stressed by the News Letter of Business and Industry (October 24, 1966) of the New Jersey Bank. Discussing "Our Dwindling Farm Surpluses," the News Letter says that "U.S. policy must shift from its long fight against food surpluses to a fight against world famine." And: "The priority given scientists and engineers in our military and space programs is having adverse effects on the supply of agricultural scientists and farm engineers turned out by the universities." When these facts sink in, the farmers, adequately organized, may be able to improve their lot.

Forgotten History of the Draft

DORIAN J. FLIEGEL

Mr. Fliegel is studying in the field of contemporary American social problems at Amherst College.

Whatever popular opinion as to draft reform may be, the fundamental issues have been decided: there is going to be a lottery, 19 year olds will be eligible first, and there will be no nonmedical graduate deferments. Congress need only ritually extend the Selective Service Act another four years and Johnson's proposals will be law by Executive order.

The new draft machinery may indeed be more equitable, but the surprising fact that emerges from a consideration of the President's specific proposals is that the primary consideration was not fairness but the course of American foreign policy, and the means by which that policy might best be advanced. We are witnessing the transformation of the draft from a temporary to a permanent system of military procurement; from an expedient devised to meet the threat of a national emergency requiring a conventional mass army, to a streamlined system intended to meet the long-range needs of a continuing policy of intervention and occupation within the context of limited warfare.

In the name of democratizing the draft, Americans are militarizing their society and foreign policy. All aspects of the draft reform movement—its initial motivation, the rhetoric in which it is couched, the basic structural consequences—reflect the degree to which our society is increasingly subject to military pressures and priorities.

The principal factor in the draft debate is not the Selective Service System itself. Dissension over the Vietnamese War and the fact that hundreds of thousands of draftees are being sent to Vietnam have initiated the controversy over the fairness and wisdom of the draft. The most common early criticism of the draft concerned inequities resulting from the difference in local board procedures and the general disruption and uncertainty injected into the lives of young men. But with the escalation of the war in 1965, criticism both escalated and shifted. Suddenly the one glaring injustice became the 1.7 million college and graduate students who possess the II-S deferment, some until the age of 26 when they become virtually exempt. In point of fact, students who parlay deferments into exemptions are only a fraction of the more than 50 per cent of the manpower pool who never render military service, including more than 3.5 million men exempt as fathers or with other dependents, and more than 5 million exempt for failing to meet mental and physical standards. Nevertheless, the students, partly because they dramatize the difference in fortune between a minority who face death abroad and a majority who can pursue their private lives at home, and partly because of their prominence in dissenting from the government's policies in Vietnam, became the single major popular target of draft reform. Mr. Johnson's proposals reflect the popular attitude, and no matter what their final form, no student hereafter will be able to escape exposure to army call-up.

Yet, oddly enough, just before 1965 we appeared to be heading toward a conviction that the draft was obsolete. Prior to the Vietnamese build-up, official studies pointed to the waste involved in the draft system and to the advisability of attracting the necessary manpower on a voluntary basis by offering sufficient inducements. As recently as 1964, a minority report to the House on the military manpower procurement system indicated that voluntary enlistment was feasible and recommended that the approach should be studied in detail.

As a result of pressure arising from the report, President Johnson, in April, 1964, ordered a Defense Department study of the draft law and military manpower program which was to include the "possibility of meeting our requirements on a voluntary basis for the next decade." During the elections of that year, when Johnson ran as the peace candidate, there were clear indications that he was seriously considering abolition of the draft. The study was completed on schedule and did, it appears, foresee an end to compulsory service, but it came at the wrong time. The President and the Joint Chiefs of Staff were by then planning the massive Vietnamese offensive, and rumors of a volunteer system would have utterly confused the country and raised intolerable questions as to our plans. Consequently, the study was not released until June, 1966, and was thoroughly altered to exclude any possibility that conscription might be scrapped. As finally presented to the House Armed Services Committee at that time by Assistant Secretary of Defense Thomas D. Morris, it concluded that the extremely high cost of a professional army, estimated at anywhere from $4 billion to $17 billion annually, was prohibitive.

Congressmen severely attacked the Defense Department for intentionally delaying the study, and for conducting private hearings with no published testimony. It was said that the figures were so imprecise as to settle nothing. Critics pointed out that only inadequate attempts had been made to determine the savings which would result from the reduced turnover and training cycles, elimination of Selective Service bureaucracy, and greater overall effectiveness.

In the midst of this furor President Johnson announced in July that he was appointing a National Advisory Commission on Selective Service to report on all aspects of the draft and to make recommendations for its improvement. Concerning the narrow range of official alternatives, Hanson Baldwin, a man usually tolerant of military priorities, wrote in The New York Times Magazine of November 20:

Much more spadework needs to be done before either the Presidential commission or Congress can reasonably recommend new legislation. The Pentagon's failure, for instance, to give an adequate accounting of the savings and costs of a long-term professional volunteer force needs rectification.

From the start, however, it was clear that the abolition of the draft was not to get serious consideration by the commission. The Defense Department alteration of its study successfully torpedoed the immediate prospects of abolishing conscription and may even have permanently killed the possibility of a voluntary army.

One of the remarkable and important aspects of the discussion surrounding draft reform is that it reveals over the last fifteen years, and especially since the Vietnamese War, a complete reversal of popular attitude toward conscription and the original intentions of the law.

The present draft law, officially known as the Universal Military Training and Service Act, is essentially the act signed by President Truman in 1951. That law was the result of the last great national debate on the subject, which also took place in the midst of a war. Two facts about the original intention of the law are crucial: first, it is selective because it was meant to be temporary; second, it is temporary because it was specifically meant to serve as a counterbalance to the growing power of the American military establishment.

In the context of the Korean crisis and with the draft law of 1948 about to expire, the Pentagon had been routinely given the task of writing renewal legislation. But when the proposed bill emerged, it was found that the Pentagon had included a provision for Universal Military Training (UMT), a program which would compel all males to undergo six months of training and eight years in the reserves, and which was to replace Selective Service as a permanent peacetime policy. Public opinion was outraged and a large civilian coalition came into existence to oppose a universal and permanent draft, which a broad segment of the country considered to be a militarization of the society beyond demonstrable military need. Critics of UMT charged that the military was exploiting the hysteria of the Korean crisis.

The military argument was weak because the generals could not show convincingly that there was a strategic necessity for the program. It was not required for the Korean effort, and proponents of UMT had increasingly to invoke amorphous moral and social benefits which they alleged would accrue to the general society from the equity of universal military training. In the end, UMT was separated from Selective Service and soundly defeated. This rejection and the adoption of a temporary and selective draft were meant to check the growth of military power and to dispose of the notion that conscription should serve anything other than a strictly military purpose. In 1951-52, inequity was accepted as an unavoidable part of such a system and as a secondary issue. The real question was whether measures would be taken to make the draft more permanent or to insure that it remained temporary. On this ground, the deferments built into Selective Service were justified as a guarantee of liberty.

The irony of the present movement to do away with student deferments is that no military justification whatsoever has been put forward. Last summer before the House Armed Services Committee, Secretary Morris defended student deferment on the ground that the military relies on the civilian educational system for 90 per cent of its new officers. Gen. Lewis B. Hershey, director of Selective Service, supported the policy by reminding the committee that 56 per cent of college students serve, as opposed to 46 per cent of noncollege youths, that the policy is invaluable in channeling students into training for positions which are essential to the national economy and defense, and that even with the Vietnamese build-up the I-A pool would not have to be expanded by the reclassification of college students.

Thus, from a military point of view, it is not necessary to abolish student deferments. Yet, unable to do away with the draft in the context of Vietnam, and impatient to deal with what appear to be glaring inequities, proponents of draft reform have turned toward greater universalization of service as the solution.

Not that true equality is attainable by the method proposed. A national lottery will guarantee that no one will escape exposure to the draft by turning a deferment into an exemption, but it will not remove the basic inequity between the minority who will be condemned to two years of service by lot, and the lucky majority who will be effectively exempt. The army, by exempting more than 5 million men as unfit for service, has worked more inequities than Selective Service deferments. The poor, who are disproportionately unable to meet these standards, will now become the outstanding exempt group. This fact especially reveals the superficiality of the draft reform and the hypocrisy of a society which meets the problems of structural inequality by exposing the educated and better off to the draft to fight a war which is waged at the direct expense of the poverty program, and the burden of which is borne by the poor through inflation and an inequitable tax structure.

But since universalization appears to make the draft more just, it will no doubt make it more acceptable on a permanent basis. Fifteen years ago the primary concern was the justice of the system; today the primary concern is justice within the system.

The more society becomes committed to the maintenance of the military, the more the issues which relate to the military, especially in the realm of foreign affairs, will be removed from political debate. The more we accept and rely upon a large and expensive military establishment, the more will military needs take priority over domestic social problems. Furthermore, with a military establishment whose actions are legitimized in advance by the legitimization of the system, democratic public debate will inevitably be constricted.

But the full importance of the changes in social attitude implied by greater legitimization of conscription becomes apparent only by considering the structural changes taking place in the draft system and how they relate to our foreign policy.

The trouble with the present draft system is that it was developed in the post World War II world on the assumption that we faced a national emergency which would require the mass mobilization of manpower. Thus, in 1951, the purpose of the Selective Service by law was to select as expediently as possible men who were essential for military service. But the military, on the other hand, recognized that it would have to take as many men as possible to justify the need for the draft, and that therefore it would have to distribute the burden of service as widely as possible.

Working against the intentions of both groups over the last fifteen years has been the growth of the manpower pool. The result has been that an increasingly smaller percentage of the available manpower has been needed for military service. Prior to 1965, the military requirement was only 400,000 men per year of the 12 million who were eligible. As a result, the Selective Service has granted increasingly liberal deferments and the military has raised standards to curtail eligibility. Congressmen have charged that the military has also padded its roster to create unnecessary positions and refused to accept voluntary enlistments beyond the point where they would threaten the need for a draft law.

That President Johnson's proposals are aimed primarily at streamlining the draft rather than at wiping out inequities is indicated by the equally important proposals he has made for turning 70,000 military positions over to civilians in fiscal 1967, for tightening up the standards for mental and physical exemption, and for converting the more than 4,000 local boards into from 300 to 500 area centers.

A policy of limited war demands that the society remain largely unruffled and give bipartisan support to the adventure. War may always be an extension of politics, but limited warfare is most transparently an extension of the political arm. The Administration must be in full control and be assured that its policy is fully sanctioned. To be effective, limited war must be fast and efficient and thus not dependent upon the checks of democratic political debate.

Secretary of Defense Robert McNamara and policy makers like Bundy and Rostow have already predicted a "thirty-year series of little wars." Prof. Seymour Melman reported recently that McNamara has already named ten world trouble spots where we can expect the need for military intervention in the near future. The Defense Department has proposed the building of eighteen to twenty giant FDL (Fast Deployment Logistics) ships at a cost of $1 billion. These vessels would be continually maintained at sea and would be fully loaded with heavy equipment and supplies to maintain troops who would presumably go into action by air.

In such perspective, the Vietnamese War is no accident, but part of a new long-range policy of intervention aimed at fighting limited wars to secure political ends. If the draft seems a bungling mess, that is primarily because it is out of gear with the nature of the policy.

McNamara has said privately, according to an article in The Atlantic in March:

The greatest contribution Vietnam is making—right or wrong beside the point—is that it is developing an ability in the United States to fight a limited war, to go to war without the necessity of arousing the public ire. In that sense, Vietnam is almost a necessity in our history, because that is the kind of war we'll most likely be facing for the next fifty years.

It seems clear, then, that the proposal of the lottery and the abolition of deferments is a move toward creating a procurement system which meets the needs of a policy based upon intervention and occupation. Such a program would ideally be fast, responsive, flexible, and cause the minimum amount of disturbance to the civilian economy and society. It would demand that the policy be in effect presanctioned, with financial and manpower support committed in advance. Hence the importance of a system which is socially legitimate because it is as fair as luck itself.

Constitutionally, civilians have checks upon the military through the power of Congress to appropriate funds, to declare war, and to raise an army; and by the fact that the President as Commander in Chief is a civilian. But these checks have grown increasingly meaningless as the military has become a direct offshoot of administrative policy.

The one major alternative which could have recaptured democratic control of the new politico-military policy would have been the establishment of a professional army. A highly trained and technically skilled professional army restricted in size and budget would place obvious limitations on the ability of the Executive and the military to involve this country in wars of intervention and occupation without Congressional and popular approval.

By contrast, the lottery enlarges, perhaps by as much as 50 per cent, the immediately available manpower pool and facilitates immediate call-ups by eliminating the check of deferments. It eliminates even the checks which the present system places on how quickly and to how large an extent the Administration can involve us in a war without first securing widespread popular support. The new system will be as flexible as an accordion, and the politico-military policy makers, not the people, will play the tune.

IS THERE A LATIN AMERICA?

RONALD HILTON

Mr. Hilton is executive director of The California Institute of International Studies at Stanford. He has just returned from a year in Latin America.

On April 12, President Johnson will represent the Colossus of the North at a meeting in Punta del Este which will celebrate the birth of the Colossus of the South. At least, we are told that a colossus is being born: a unified Latin America. The curtain raiser for the Punta del Este summit has just concluded at Montevideo, where twenty nations endorsed in principle the creation of a common market by unified efforts to be made between 1970 and 1985.

Sen. Wayne Morse, who does not very often display enthusiasm for President Johnson's activities, has described the meeting as "the most important conference we have yet had on Latin America." The precise aim of the conference, as the United States sees it, is to organize a common market—i.e., a common tariff barrier for all member nations—in 1970. It is hoped that within a decade this common market will be fully organized. The Latin American advocates of integration hope in addition for a much broader union which will end the unpleasant dictum about "the Disunited States of Latin America."

The aspiration of some Latin American intellectuals is not surprising. The vision of a united Latin America which could speak to the United States on a basis of equality is an old one. The surprise is the reversal in attitude of the United States, which hitherto has backed a Pan American system in which it was the kingpin. It has in the past proposed, unsuccessfully, a Pan American common market. Latin America has rejected this plan, which would open up the southern republics to U.S. enterprise and kill many of the fledgling industries there. Two questions must now be asked: Why has the United States changed its tune? How far can Latin America unite?

Regarding the first, one cannot help suspecting that in some measure our endorsement of Latin American unity is a gimmick. Anyone familiar with Washington knows the propensities of administrations to think up grandiose schemes and phrases which give the impression of a great leap forward. Undoubtedly, there is an element of this, and Johnson's trip is in considerable measure a public relations gesture. (Ten days before the Punta del Este meeting, the President entertained a large Latin American diplomatic party at his Texas ranch, supplying a barbecue dinner and ten-gallon hats to the visiting envoys.) Yet there is substance in the U.S. support of a Latin American common market. Essentially, the United States has given up hope of creating a Pan American common market. Moreover, taking into account the disparity of wages and other facts of life, our business elite has discovered that it can make money from foreign subsidiaries, provided they command a large enough market. Few individual republics offer a market of the required size, but a unified Latin America would do so.

In addition, a Latin American common market would spare Washington a recurring embarrassment. When a republic like Honduras demands that the United States facilitate its anti-economical acquisition of a steel mill or a jet airline simply for national prestige, Washington could refer to the master planning of the common market.

How far can Latin America unite? This highly technical question is scarcely broached in the enthusiastic statements supporting President Johnson's mission. There is a general feeling that the small nation state is an anachronism in the modern world and that larger groupings should be encouraged. Sometimes large groupings succeed; the European Common Market is the most conspicuous case. More frequently they fail. The Federation of the West Indies failed pathetically, and we are now left with an assortment of mini-states which no one knows what to do with. Will a unified Latin America succeed like the European Common Market, or will it fail like the Caribbean federation? A major international conference to be held in Palo Alto in April, 1968, under the auspices of the California Institute of International Studies, will attempt to provide a detailed answer. Meanwhile, I offer on the eve of the conference my own tentative assessment.

There is unmistakably a move away from Pan Americanism. Disillusioned with it, the governments of Latin America are groping toward unity. They sense that Latin America has a low priority in the concerns of the Johnson Administration and believe that by forming a unified front they would have a louder voice not only in their dealings with Washington and the other capitals of the world but also with international organizations such as the European Common Market. There are many signs of this trend. In December, 1964, a Latin American parliament was established at a conference held in Lima, Peru. More recently, the emphasis has been economic. President Eduardo Frei of Chile and, following his lead, many other Latin American Presidents have stressed the need for Latin American unity.

No Longer a Back Yard

After World War II the United States created around the world a series of alliances, systems or spheres of influence in which it would be the dominating force. These systems are breaking down because one or more of the other powers involved does not wish to be a junior partner. It is easy to denounce this dissolution as Communist-inspired, but in fact the regimes which are defying the United States are rightist, centrist or leftist, and they often proclaim their friendship for the United States while they undermine the U.S.-controlled systems. De Gaulle immediately comes to mind. The government of Pakistan is conservative, but by befriending Communist China it is diminishing U.S. influence in Southeast Asia and weakening the American-blessed SEATO and CENTO pacts. The Philippine Islands has a moderate government, but it is loosening its bonds to the United States: asserting its personality by abandoning July 4 as its Independence Day, dropping the American names of streets, and even stressing its Hispanic as well as native tradition.

We smugly regard Latin America as our back yard, but the same phenomenon is occurring there. We assumed that the Pact of Bogotá, which transformed the Pan American Union into the Organization of American States, would rejuvenate the inter-American system, but the OAS has failed to spark the enthusiasm of Latin Americans. It would be foolish to see in this the hand of Castro's Cuba, however much Castro may despise the OAS. The fact is that Latin America is asserting its identity and in the process trying to find unity. Indeed, Castro's revolution was primarily a revolt against a corrupt regime closely associated with the United States. Castro was seeking the mystical ideal of cubanidad, and only well after the revolution had triumphed did he ally himself with the Communists. The Cuban Government today is still primarily nationalist; at heart, it wants to be assimilated into the Sino-Soviet systems no more than it wished to be integrated into the U.S. bloc. The assertion of Latin America's identity is an old story, and it is only by distorting history that we can make Bolívar or Martí out to be heralds of the Pan American system.

In appearance, all of Latin America is being Americanized. It might be assumed that this will make Latin Americans understand and like the United States. The more prosperity and the more gadgets, the more love of the United States from which these blessings flow. Unfortunately, this is a non sequitur, as is proved by the example of Cuba, which was the most Americanized, gadgetized and televised country in Latin America. Guatemala, for example, spends freely on automobiles, TV sets and transistor radios. But the apparent prosperity is enjoyed by only 27 per cent of the population, who receive 78 per cent of the GNP, while the remaining 73 per cent of the population receive a bare 22 per cent. Even the peasant who has managed to buy a transistor radio on credit will be envious of the "oligarch" who has an automobile and a TV set. The intellectuals and the students, who usually have neither of the latter, will see in this hateful disparity the familiar result of alliance between the United States, big business and a military dictatorship.

To what degree is Latin America within the financial orbit of the United States? The rate of U.S. investment in Latin America varies considerably according to the business climate. In Cuba it is zero. In Brazil, which is now the enfant gâté of the United States, vigorous attempts are being made to attract U.S. capital. Yet it does not follow that growth of U.S. investments will bring about a sense of solidarity with the United States. It has not in Cuba, France or even Canada. The U.S. Government has developed mixed feelings about increasing U.S. investments in other parts of the world, but it is actively encouraging investment in Latin America as a means of insuring that the area remains in the U.S. orbit, and the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 was intended primarily to encourage investment in the southern republics.

The prosperity of the urban elite brought about by American-style capitalism is not viewed as a panacea in Latin America except by the minority which profits from it. Although we hear about advanced social security in Latin America, in no country is there adequate unemployment compensation, and yet unemployment and underemployment are the continent's most serious problem. In Mexico they probably run as high as 30 per cent (the official figures disguise this fact), but the Instituto Mexicano del Seguro Social, which provides cradle-to-grave medical care for those it covers, does nothing for the unemployed. Officials of the institute admit that the problem is too big for the government. It is hard to sell Latin Americans an economic system which seems to have a built-in high unemployment rate.

The People and the Bankers

Linked with unemployment is grinding poverty, which an apparent trade boom may help to hide. We are told that the Mexican economy is prospering, and the boast is made that Mexico has now become an exporter of — mirabile dictu! — wheat, to the tune of about 3 million bushels a year. The cruel fact is that wheat is exported because the mass of Mexicans are too poor to buy all the wheat products they want. Let us not forget the resentment aroused in Mexico by the export to the United States of cattle — and men — for whom there was no place in the Mexican economy.

The Latin American press pays scant attention to the fate of the peasants. The Mexico City papers report little of the deep unrest in the Mexican countryside, although President Díaz Ordaz felt compelled to refer to it in his inaugural address. The local power elite usually resents land reform, but the U.S. Administration has made its concern clear. The example of Cuba has aroused deep anxiety in the U.S. Government. Well it may, for in addition to the threat of Castroism, the new Institute of Latin American Studies in the Academy of Sciences in Moscow is showing a special interest in Latin American peasant movements. Only Heaven and perhaps the CIA know what the Chinese Communists are up to. The preoccupation of the United States is reflected in the Dominican Republic, where there is popular sympathy in the countryside for the regime of nearby Cuba. The Ford Foundation and the U.S. Agency for International Development have assisted a group of Santiago de los Caballeros businessmen to found an agricultural school, and are in general trying to relieve the strains among the peasantry. This is but one example of the peaceful transformation with which the United States hopes to avoid a violent change in the social structure of Latin America.

The Alliance for Progress was launched amid great hopes at the 1961 conference at Punta del Este. Since then, widespread disillusionment has set in. Colombia, which was to be the showcase of the Alliance, presents one of the most discouraging spectacles in Latin America. Although we are assured that the corner has been turned, in general the Alliance has apparently failed to stimulate the 2.5 per cent annual economic growth which was its minimum goal. Too many people thought the Alliance would help them promote their own peculiar projects.

In the struggle between the structuralists, who want rapid social reform in Latin America regardless of its effect on financial stability, and the monetarists, who think that only a stable currency and fiscal responsibility will make substantial, albeit slow, progress possible, Latin America tends to side with the structuralists, the United States and the various international banks with the monetarists. Despite its alluring name, the Alliance for Progress represents a victory for the monetarists, while the Brazilian-sponsored Operação Panamericana, which the U.S.-sponsored Alliance displaced, would have been carried out in the spirit of the structuralists. At the insistence of the United States, the Alliance for Progress is being used as an instrument to impose fiscal reform. This may appear admirable, but Latin Americans do not like to be told that they must tighten their belts, and it seems cruel for well-fed Americans to exhort impoverished Latin Americans to do so. It is startling, for example, to read in an advertisement published in the United States this proud boast by the Venezuelan Government about its accomplishments under the Alliance for Progress: "In the field of fiscal reform, Venezuela started taking necessary measures early in 1961. Salaries of public employees were reduced." Featherbedding is one thing, but the lowering of moderate government salaries seems a strange form of progress. Some confidence in the Alliance for Progress developed as a result of the creation in 1964 of the Inter-American Committee for the Alliance for Progress, but in general, enthusiasm for the Alliance has waned markedly.

Financial activities in Latin America of U.S. investors and U.S.-sponsored banks give a false impression of hemispheric unity. Even Latin American businessmen dislike playing second fiddle to U.S. capitalism, although they will accept foreign capital as a catalyst for their own activities. The Communists wish to assert the personality of Latin America by fighting U.S. capitalism, the entrepreneurs by slowly usurping it or reducing it to a minor role.

Most Latin Americans are embarrassed by inter-American military cooperation. There was something noble about it during the crusade against Nazism, but now it is primarily concerned with counterinsurgency and aimed at bolstering the status quo. The U.S. armed forces are seen as potentially playing the invidious role they have assumed in South Vietnam. Operation Ayacucho, the combined military maneuvers held each December in Peru, provides a grotesque contrast between the wastefulness of the armies and the crushing poverty of the Indians of the Andes. It is hard to wax Homeric about Arms and the Businessman. In sum, Latin Americans do not feel solidarity with the United States. Is the alternative a united Latin America?

Cultural Unity of Latin America

First of all, does "Latin America" exist? There are doubts, and even the name has been widely questioned. Is there a psychological basis without which unification of Latin America will be an illusion? Does Latin America have cultural unity? After all, "Africa," divided as it is into three ethnic worlds, is little more than a geographical expression, and for this reason the Organization for African Unity is a paper elephant.

Many conservative Latin Americans have proclaimed that the southern republics are united in race, language and religion. Racially, Latin America has more variety than any other area in the world except Africa—from the white population of Argentina and Uruguay to the Negro population of Haiti and the heavily Indian population of Ecuador, Peru and Bolivia. However, there is not the sharp split between two racial groups which characterizes the United States, and the process of mestizaje is slowly bringing about what José Vasconcelos called "the cosmic race," the first synthesis of the white, yellow and Negro races in the world. Argentines seldom boast any longer of their racial purity, while the romantic cult of the pure Indian seems to have been dismissed as unrealistic.

Although mulattos and Negroes still occupy the lowest stratum in Latin American society, they are no longer viewed with the scorn implicit in earlier Argentinian references to "the monkeys of Brazil." Gilberto Freyre's thesis of "Luso-Tropicalism" dovetails with Vasconcelos' proclamation of "the cosmic race," since it maintains that the Portuguese in Brazil showed an unusual ability to mingle with the Negroes and the Indians and to interbreed with them. A few years ago Salvador de Madariaga's thesis that Bolívar was part Negro aroused violent resentment in Spanish America. I recently put this suggestion to a group of young Colombian conservatives. They showed no sign of irritation, calmly admitting that it was possible. In short, Latin America is moving toward racial unity.

Does Latin America have linguistic unity? Anthropologists exaggerate the role of Indian languages. In an attempt to reach the Indian population, Cornell University and the University of California at Berkeley have been encouraged to develop the study of such languages as Quechua and Guaraní. In southern Mexico and Central America ■ surprising number of Indian dialects survive, and the Summer Institute of Linguistics has been studying them assiduously for missionary purposes. How fast these dialects will disappear is not certain, but there is no doubt that the number of monolingual Indians is declining rapidly. Mass communications are spreading a knowledge of Spanish and Portuguese, and the futile attempts to revive Nahuatl in Mexico have the support neither of the Right nor the Left. Admittedly, the differences between Spanish and Portuguese are such that the ordinary Spanish American does not understand Portuguese, although the reverse is not true. This division is sufficient to contribute to the lack of empathy between Brazil and Spanish America. French, English and Dutch are spoken in Middle America by relatively small numbers of people. Despite these qualifications, it may be said that in comparison with other continents Latin America enjoys linguistic unity.

The National Observer

There is then the question of religion. It is easy to assert, as conservatives do, that Latin America is Roman Catholic. It is true that the Jews and the Protestants are minority groups, but much of Latin America is agnostic, having kept only the forms of Catholicism, and the old antagonism between clericals and anticlericals is still felt. Anticlericalism is just below the surface in Argentina, the success of President Frei is stimulating anticlericalism in Chile, while in Guatemala the military government allied itself with the Church and sponsored a law to introduce religious education in the schools, thus undoing the historic work of President Justo Rufino Barrios (1873-85), who effected the separation of church and state. The Church may thus have won a temporary victory in Guatemala, but the military no longer controls the government and there is trouble ahead. It is, therefore, untrue to say flatly that Latin America is Catholic, but certainly there is not in Latin America the religious divergence and lack of unity which one finds in, say, Africa or Asia. Except for Australasia, Latin America is in religion the least disunited continent in the world.

It is difficult to bring psychological unity to a continent marked by extremes of poverty and wealth. The wealth of Argentina used to be in sharp contrast with the poverty of the rest of Latin America and was the principal cause of its neighbors' resentment. Today Venezuela has the highest per capita income in Latin America—$1,120 per annum, as compared with less than $100 in Bolivia. This was why Venezuela was slow to join LAFTA (Latin American Free Trade Association), but there is enough misery and confusion, and incidentally enough race mixture, in Venezuela, to make it less an object of envy than Argentina used to be. Economic differences cause disunity within the countries of Latin America, but no longer set one country against another.

Latin America is a land of youth. About 40 per cent of the people are under the age of 15. This youth is less concerned than were its elders with the bitter nationalistic rivalries which once divided Latin America. Although they do not formulate the attitude clearly, they feel themselves increasingly Latin American, or at least set apart from the United States. This is so even though the youth is the most Americanized sector of the population. There is strength in this unity, at least potential strength, since the population is already considerably more than that of Anglo-America, and the disparity is increasing. It is true that Brazil with its 80 million people still feels scornful of the republiquetas of Middle America, but a similar disparity has in fact facilitated the unity of the USSR. In its relationship with the United States, Latin America stresses its manpower just as China does vis-à-vis Russia. Indeed, the relationship between the United States and Latin America has marked similarities with the earlier relationship between the USSR and Communist China. It is not a very encouraging thought.

All in all, it may be said that Latin America has a considerable degree of cultural unity.

Geography and the Economy

The United States, Russia and Continental Europe have a kind of geographical solidity which facilitates union. Not so Latin America. It is divided into Portuguese America, i.e., Brazil, which does have geographical solidity, and Spanish America. Spanish America stretches 5,000 miles from Mexico to Cape Horn and is only 30 miles wide in Panama. Brazil has geographical unity, and so does South America, but Spanish America and Latin America do not. Middle America (Mexico, Central America and the Caribbean) includes in addition a medley of islands, some of which are part of Spanish America, while others represent different cultural and political traditions and have only a mild, albeit growing, interest in Latin America. It might be argued that Puerto Rico is slowly moving back into the Spanish American orbit, and that the British, Dutch and French territories will have to find their place within the Middle American system. This would enhance the geographical unity of "Latin" America.

Economically, Latin America may be divided into Middle and South America, the former being clearly within the United States sphere, the latter leading a more independent economic life, with important ties to Europe and the Orient. Mexico is the United States' best customer. The United States exports to Mexico far more than it imports. Invisible exports such as tourism have more than made up the difference; the United States takes some 75 per cent of the exports of Central America.

The Caribbean islands look toward the United States and Europe and are disgregated from Latin America proper. Venezuela and the Guianas are not effectively a part of South America, since their ties likewise are with the United States and Europe, and they should, at least for the present, be included in Middle America.

In South America the picture is different. Peru is perhaps the country most closely tied to the United States commercially, but even there U.S. imports were rather less than 50 per cent of total imports. All the countries of South America wish to break the economic hold of the United States, and increased trade with Europe, the Soviet bloc, even China is seen as a means. The present favorable attitude of the Brazilian military government toward U.S. investment does not invalidate this trend.

LAFTA has its headquarters in Montevideo, the South American capital farthest away from Middle America. It was chosen because of its location between the two principal trading nations of South America, Brazil and Argentina, whose economies are complementary. Mexico is the only non-South American country belonging to LAFTA, and its affiliation has few practical consequences. Mexico simply hoped that LAFTA would provide an easy entry to the markets of South America. The Central American Common Market has made substantial progress, but it is at present independent of LAFTA, and much more under U.S. influence. The treaty creating the Central American Common Market was signed by Guatemala, El Salvador, Honduras and Nicaragua in August, 1961. Costa Rica joined in 1963.

Vadillo, La Prensa (Mexico): Ben Roth

Excellent research on the economic problems of Latin America is being done by ECLA, the Economic Commission for Latin America, a regional office of the United Nations with headquarters in Santiago de Chile. It operates in the theoretical field, while LAFTA is a practical organization. Under Raúl Prebisch, ECLA became a focus of Latin American structuralist doctrine. There is an ECLA center for Middle America in Mexico City, so that in practice the Santiago office devotes its efforts to the study of South America.

How far is South America, excluding perhaps Venezuela and the Guianas, a united continent? Brazil looks toward the Atlantic and turns its back on Spanish America, for which it feels little cordiality or respect. More and more, Brazil regards itself as a great power in its own right, belonging to a different league from the Spanish American countries, even those of South America. It claims a population of more than 85 million, which will rise to 100 million by 1970 and to 200 million by the year 2000. Sao Paulo is said to have 6 million inhabitants and to be not only South America's largest but also the world's fastest growing city. To equate numbers with progress and greatness may be naive and shortsighted, but like most other Latin American countries, Brazil has not yet learned that a large population is not necessarily the first goal. Yet, with half the population of South America, Brazil is bound to be a Gulliver surrounded by Lilliputians.

South America has always been a hollow continent. The bulk of the population was, for a series of historic reasons, located close to the coast or in highlands relatively near the coast. In different ways, the governments of Brazil, Bolivia, Peru, Colombia and Venezuela are attempting to move into the heartland. When the process is completed, South America will have a sense of unity which the fragmented occupation of today does not permit. The lofty Andes separate Peruvian Amazonas from the coastal area where Lima is located, and the Peruvians have long feared that as Brazil moves westward it will absorb the vast area belonging to Peru, which in reality is a continuation of Brazilian Amazonas. The possible presence of oil deposits in the area has only increased Peruvian anxiety. Brazil, which needs oil badly, has historically expanded its boundaries by astute diplomacy into the area of Spanish America. Hence, President Belaúnde's dream of opening up the eastern two-thirds of Peru as part of the country's economic system. He hopes, with the assistance of the Alliance for Progress, to provide the communications necessary to link coastal Peru with Amazonas, and foreign capital is offered a ten-year tax holiday to establish new enterprises there. The American road-machine manufacturer, Le Tourneau, opened the way, but the silence surrounding his impressive efforts to settle parts of Peruvian Amazonas suggests that they have not been conspicuously successful. However, though this colonization process is bound to be slow, there is little doubt that it will take place.

Despite fears and animosities, time is on the side of Brazil. It seems clear that eventually this colossus will have strung around its neck, like beads, a series of lesser countries from the Guianas to Uruguay. Although there is a lack of warmth, South American unity will be achieved willy-nilly around Brazil. Once more we see a continent divided into Middle and South America, with the Guianas, Venezuela and Colombia having the dual status of borderlands. It is unlikely that there will be complete economic integration of both Middle and South America.

Politics Down the Middle

While Castrophobia is not a widespread phenomenon in Latin America, admiration for present-day Cuba seems to be waning. First, the novelty of Castro has worn off, and everyone is slightly bored by the continuing impasse between Cuba and the United States. While the failure of Cuba to make a great leap forward may be explained in part by the fact that international sugar prices have fallen sharply, the hard truth is that the Castro regime has not fulfilled the hopes so many Latin Americans placed in it. They tend to feel that it will be some time before prosperity shines on Cuba. The Castro regime is supposedly some $900 million in debt to the Soviet bloc, and its reserves of Western currencies are diminishing.

The power elite in Latin America, through its control of press and radio, constantly attempts to discredit any regime or system to the left of Center. Cuba's difficulties are played up, with no mention of its achievements and no reference to the fact that, whatever the evils of communism, the principal problem has been a new decline in the price of sugar. The "dance of the millions" in the twenties was followed by the depression of the thirties, under capitalism, so it is misleading to attribute all of Cuba's woes to Castro. The problems of tropical agriculture have affected other areas. The Dominican Republic, Costa Rica and even Haiti are all regarded as politically and economically reliable, yet in all three countries the GNP is rising more slowly than the population—i.e., the standard of living is falling.

American capitalism has accepted the success of the Christian Democratic movement in Chile as the lesser of two evils, preferring President Frei's "Revolution with Freedom" to the Castro-type revolution promoted by Salvador Allende. Had Allende won, it is probable that the United States would have done everything in its power to bring about his overthrow. The Frei administration wants good relations with Washington, and the Ambassador to the United States, Radomiro Tomic, is trying to live down his anti-American reputation. While Frei is not as acceptable to U.S. business as was President Alessandri, the agreement he reached with the copper companies seems to satisfy both sides. By "Chileanizing" their subsidiaries and accepting a minority role in them, the U.S. companies will improve their image and actually gain financially. Their taxes have been reduced, and the nationalized companies are free to sell copper to the Communist countries, something which as U.S. companies they were forbidden to do. It is, however, doubtful that Frei can carry out his plan to double copper output by 1970, making Chile the world's leading producer. The euphoria which surrounds the Christian Democratic movement in Chile should not infect our judgment. In Europe the movement has passed its peak, and it is doubtful that in Latin America it will have wide success. Latin America today, like most of the Western world, is largely an agnostic society, and it is difficult to provide unity on the basis of Christianity—even of Christian Socialism.

The simple fact is that the United States likes military regimes in Latin America. They are good for business—or at least they appear to be. For example, the recent Ecuadorian military junta performed admirably from the viewpoint of U.S. business. The sucre remained stable at about 18.5 to the dollar. The Ecuadorian Government signed all three investment guaranty programs of the U.S. Government. The American business community loves Paraguay. That Paraguay is the focal point for large-scale smuggling operations is regarded as irrelevant. All the economic indicators show that business is good, and the guaraní has remained pegged at a stable rate. New roads built with the help of the World Bank and the Inter-American Development Bank are strengthening the economic infra-structure of the country. The triumph of the military in Brazil and Argentina was also welcomed by the North American business community, which is little concerned with the fate of Latin American democracy.

A number of countries have middle-of-the-road governments. Uruguay is still one of them, despite the fact that its Swiss council-type government has been abolished and a general is now president. Mexico, Costa Rica, Panama, Venezuela, Colombia and Peru have moderate governments, economically attuned to the United States.

The political systems of Latin America are clearly extremely variegated. Is there beneath the surface a trend toward political unity? If so, what is the common denominator? Despite recent victories of the pro-United States military, the deep trend seems to be toward a "third position," following the lead neither of the United States nor of Russia but rather the example of the Labour government in England and the moderate governments of Scandinavia. Even the military may assert their independence à la de Gaulle. This desire for a Latin America which will be politically equidistant from the United States and Europe is especially evident in South America, whose geographical position (it should be called Southeast America) will be reflected in a political rapprochement with Europe. Some countries will seek also a rapprochement with Africa. Brazil initiated this trend under President Goulart.

What steps are being taken to unify Latin America? A parliamentary union is projected and, in view of the historical belief of Alianza Popular Revolucionaria Americana (APRA) that it was a party destined to lead a united Latin America toward moderate socialism, it is significant that the parliamentary union is sponsored by Peru and that the Aprista Party has assumed the leadership. Sen. Luis Alberto Sánchez and Deputy Andrés Townsend were the organizers of a conference held in Lima in December, 1964, where sessions were devoted to three topics: the economic, social and political integration of Latin America. The committee studying the last topic considered procedures for the formation of a permanent "Latin American Parliament," and a committee headed by Luis Beltrán Prieto of Venezuela was appointed to coordinate plans for its creation. The new organization has its headquarters in Lima, and Andrés Townsend has been elected secretary general. Mexico sent only observers to the conference, apparently not wishing to become integrated into a parliamentary system with headquarters in Lima. The new organization hopes to stimulate the unification of South America on the basis of parliamentary democracy. The triumph of the military in Brazil and Argentina has at least temporarily shattered these hopes, and it is doubtful that there will ever be more than a token adherence from Middle America.

The Capitals of Confederation

LAFTA should succeed in unifying South America economically, at least to some degree, but political unification remains in suspense. Middle America will probably continue to function outside the system. Before it can become integrated with South America, it must integrate itself, and this process is slow to the point of being interminable. Emotionally, much of Middle America will be attuned to South America; politically and economically, it is inexorably in the sphere of the United States. The distinction between Middle and South America was already recognized by President Theodore Roosevelt. He reserved the Big Stick policy for the Middle American countries, and wished to treat the South American countries as partners. This was evident in his sponsorship of the Pan American Conference held at Rio de Janeiro in 1906.

In conclusion, the long-term outlook is for an Anglo-American bloc in North America, a Luso-Hispanic system in South America, with the lands of Middle America forming bridges between the two foci. Mexico, Central America and the Caribbean will face both north and south. The South American system will have three "capitals." Montevideo, the seat of LAFTA, will perform a role similar to that of Brussels in the European Common Market; Santiago de Chile will be the center for technical studies in economics and sociology; Lima will be the seat of the parliamentary union, the Strasbourg of South America. South America will be a confederation rather than a federation, somewhat like the Europe envisaged by de Gaulle.

This does not mean that the Pan American system will disappear. It may even be strengthened as a multilateral vehicle for relations between the United States and Latin America. No one in Washington wants the inter-American system weakened and its place usurped by a Latin American union. Yet the inter-American system and the Latin American union will in the long run have to reach a working compromise, just as NATO will have to learn to live with de Gaulle's Europe.

The road to Latin American unity will be long and rough; the terrain must be carefully mapped. This task has been entrusted to the Institute for Latin American Integration, which the Inter-American Development Bank has established in Buenos Aires. After the sweeping generalizations one must expect from President Johnson and his fellow politicians at Punta del Este, this institute, working with such organizations at LAFTA and ECLA, will have to give meaning and substance to the oratory.

COLEMAN REPORT

WHY THE SCHOOLS FLUNK OUT

CHARLES S. BENSON

Mr. Benson is associate professor of education, University of California. He is the author of The Economics of Public Education (Houghton Mifflin) and other books in the field.

In July of 1966 the U.S. Office of Education issued Equality of Educational Opportunity (Government Printing Office, 737 pp., $4.25), known now as the Coleman Report. The principal authors and research directors of this report are Profs. James S. Coleman (Johns Hopkins) and Ernest Q. Campbell (Vanderbilt), and Alexander Mood, Assistant Commissioner for Educational Statistics, USOE. The report, dealing with a massive social science investigation, was prepared in response to the 1964 Civil Rights Act, which reads in one section: "The Commissioner [of Education] shall conduct a survey . . . concerning the lack of availability of equal educational opportunities for individuals by reasons of race, color, religion, or national origin in public educational institutions. . . ." Presumably, the research was to assist in shaping national educational policy; however, in my opinion, the report will have an influence on state and local policy far exceeding its effects at the national level. Further, the report will intensify efforts to improve the school performance of children coming from the lower socioeconomic strata, regardless of their racial, ethnic or religious origin.

The Coleman study involved nearly 60,000 school-teachers and 645,000 students in a statistical sample of schools broadly representative of public education in this country. Information was obtained about the school plant (conditions of classrooms, class size, equipment, books, libraries, etc.), about teachers (education, father's education and occupation, attitudes toward teaching children of different abilities, etc.), and about principals and superintendents. Aptitude and achievement tests were given to pupils in the sample schools, and teachers were given a short test for verbal facility. The study group obtained information about the family background of the students (size of family, education of parents, occupation, use of leisure hours, and so on). Lastly, the students were questioned on their educational aspirations—how they felt about school, how much control they felt they had over their destinies, their occupational goals.

Because the Coleman Report appeared some nine months ago and has been extensively reviewed (e.g., Science, December 9, 1966), I shall confine myself here to an important question that stems directly from perhaps the three least disputed conclusions of the study. The first of these is that in school achievement, "The differences between whites and other social and ethnic groups (excluding Orientals) is great indeed. . . . The Negroes' averages tend to be about one standard deviation below those of the whites, which means that about 85 per cent of the Negro scores are below the white average." The second conclusion is that "Observing the nationwide averages . . . it appears that school children of all groups differ relatively little in the physical school facilities available." And speaking of teachers: "There is clearly no tendency for the teachers of one group of pupils to be either more mature or more recently trained." And the third conclusion is that differences which are observed in school environment have relatively little effect on the achievement of the pupils. These three conclusions can be reduced to two statements (in economists' jargon): (1) School outputs are variable; (2) in determining school outputs, pupil inputs dominate school inputs. The question I want to raise is why this second statement should be characteristic of American education in the late 1960s.

Why is it still true that the performance of students is shaped primarily by what they themselves bring to the schools, out of their family background, when at least ten years ago any alert social observer could see that our economy was rapidly reducing both the relative and the absolute number of unskilled jobs? I think a non-educator might look at the matter this way. "For all kinds of reasons, children from poor homes have a hard time doing school work. Once they fall behind in the elementary grades, there is little in the home to give them that extra push they need to catch up and stay up with the class. If these young people leave school without being able to read and do numbers at about the eighth grade level, they are going to have a poor chance of getting a job and holding it. So it would make sense to give these children some extra care in school, in order that they can lead decent, productive and independent lives."

Humanity calls for this approach, because a school failure is a cripple in our high speed, verbal and mathematically oriented modern world. And the coldest economic considerations call for this approach because the school failures of today are the welfare cases of tomorrow and the parents of the next generation of welfare cases. Yet I would estimate that the schools in the United States are producing about 500,000 "graduates" a year who lack eighth grade skills in the basic subjects.

Our country excels all others in the rate at which it is dispensing with unskilled labor. The effect of the new $1.50 minimum wage in New York in knocking boot-blacks out of work is simply a recent example of a pervasive social movement. At the same time, our school system seems utterly unable to serve pupils who have environmental handicaps. The scope of the problem was indicated by the U.S. Department of Commerce, when it pointed out in the January issue of Survey of Current Business that one out of three unemployed persons is a teen-ager, though teen-agers represent only 10 per cent of the labor force. The department added: "This trend points up the difficulties teen-agers are experiencing in securing employment in our expanding economy when a premium is placed on skill and experience."

A brief discussion—I can do no more than open the topic—of why the American educational system is so unaccommodating to the difficulties of lower-class youth may offer clues as to what can be done to make their school years effective.

The place to start is with the classroom teacher, and the first point to note is that the elementary teacher (and it is in the elementary grades that learning retardation can be most effectively prevented or checked) has to teach a large number of subjects each day. Often this requirement is expressed in state law, which sometimes even specifies a minimum number of minutes each day that must be devoted to a given subject. When one takes account of the time required for opening exercises, recess, lunch and various announcements and the time that goes into dealing with six to eight required subjects, one can see that the teacher has not the flexibility in her working day to bring a certain group of children over the hurdles, for example, in reading and arithmetic. The teacher cannot spend the better part of two weeks, say, in intensive instruction to make sure that all her pupils are ready for the next stage in reading instruction. We assume that our schools evolved from English models, but the proliferation of subjects and the inflexibility of the elementary school day in this country remind one more of Latin American practice—and Latin American schools are notorious for wastage in the primary grades.

Apparently, these rigid requirements for the use of the teachers' time have been established in response to pressure from teachers' groups, organized along subject lines: reading, mathematics, foreign language, physical education, music, social studies, etc. Temperance and patriotic groups have also had a hand in fracturing the school day. The situation, in my view, does not represent caprice by state legislators, though the legislators might be charged with giving in too handily to the pressure from the various interest groups. Some confirmation of my point of view is afforded by the National Advisory Council on the Education of Disadvantaged Children, which in two reports (November 25, 1966, and January 31, 1967) has emphasized the remarkable gains in pupil achievement that take place in summer schools. In its November report the council stated "... teachers were able to depart from prescribed texts and try new materials that encouraged student participation and progress at one's own pace. Perhaps it is simply the more relaxed atmosphere that melted barriers between teachers and pupils."

A second point to note about the classroom teacher's work is that the function of teaching is downgraded in our academic society. In higher education, research and publication are more highly valued than teaching; in the lower schools, teaching plays second fiddle to administration. Among experienced teachers in a given district, the salary differential between the least trained teacher and the most highly trained will be in the order of $1,500 to $2,000 (in actual figures—the "salary schedule" may indicate otherwise). But the differential between the most highly trained teacher and a middle-level school administrator, e.g., a principal, will be in the order of $4,000 to $6,000. The gap in status between teacher and administrator is even wider than the pay scales would indicate. An ambitious young recruit to the district can easily figure where to place his bets.

As far as I know, the favored position of the administrator may be characteristic of education throughout the world, but the American practice is special in one regard: good teaching, based on advanced knowledge of one's subject and of pedagogy, is not the route to the middle-management positions. Some principals are ex-coaches, some are men who get the nod for their skills in public relations, but in any case their course work after the B.A. has been in the study of administration, not in the study of subject or pedagogy. In the United States, unlike other countries, the principal is not the "principal teacher" or headmaster, a symbol of pedagogical excellence who continues to serve part time in the schoolroom. In any decent sized school in our country he is purely an office manager. State certification requirements see to this.

This downgrading of the teaching function destroys the incentive of teachers to become aware of the new and growing body of evidence about how best to instruct children who display blocks to learning. More fundamentally, it destroys the incentive to maintain the contact with academic disciplines that is necessary for the teacher who would retain a vital, energetic and contagious interest in the learning process.

Another peculiar and significant feature of American education is the vulnerability of the teacher to parental criticism. It is not, of course, a matter of the teacher's having his job at stake—he usually has tenure—but simply that after a day's work the teacher does not enjoy facing the caustic, sarcastic tongue of irate parents—and in our country irate parents have direct access to the classroom. Teachers feel that if they were to devote an unusual amount of their energy to helping lower-class children keep up in their school work, they would be criticized by middle-class parents—or by any parent whose child manages to do well—on the ground that such special attention is unfair. Teachers thus bend to the majority and take the position that in public education each child is entitled to the same amount of service. (Almost the only exceptions to this notion that our society has genuinely accepted are the special provisions made for the seriously handicapped and for the very gifted.)

There is another way to go about the problem of allocating educational resources, and I think it is a better way. (1) Establish minimum learning objectives for various ages of children. (2) Allocate resources sufficient to assure that these objectives are fulfilled. (3) Then, use the remaining resources (there would be some left over) to discover and develop talent in whatever class of society it can be found.

Why does not the school superintendent seek such a definition of operational objectives and thus provide himself with the power to stand between the teacher and the overzealous parent? An example might work out along these lines. The superintendent might discover that in the such and so school, 60 per cent of the third graders fell below the first quartile in a state-wide test of reading comprehension. He might then establish the operational objective of reducing the percentage of first quartile third grade readers in that school to, say, 30 per cent. And so on for other subjects and other grades.

But the definition of operational objectives implies that awful thing: comparisons of schools and districts on measures of output (achievement). On January 9 of this year, the American Association of School Administrators came out flat-footed against the Carnegie Foundation's National Assessment of Educational Progress, even though that program was deliberately designed to forestall invidious comparisons. It was also designed to place no pressure on teachers to "teach for the test" (Science Education, April, 1966). If the AASA succeeds in blocking this project, the prospects are dim for resolving some of the pedagogical and policy issues raised by the Coleman Report.

The superintendent in American education is himself in a vulnerable position. He is appointed in the ordinary case by an elected board. He has little control over his pupil clientele. Next year's crop of first graders may be poorer pupils than this year's. He has little effective control over the quality of faculty his district employs, and in almost all districts annual recruitment needs are high. He has limited control over his teachers' class loads, beyond the statutory minimum of hours. If he tries to assign his best teachers to disadvantaged schools, he may be in hot water with the unions. Comparisons of achievement test scores over time, or between one school district and another, could quickly turn to the disadvantage of a superintendent. It's his job, not that of the teachers or principals, that's at stake. In these circumstances, one cannot expect superintendents to welcome quantitative assessment of school performance.

I have mentioned teachers, principals and superintendents. Can one expect school boards to take the lead in improving education for the disadvantaged? These boards are really volunteer groups, except in the large cities. That is, one volunteers, more or less, to run for the office and do one's duty. In suburbs or large cities, the boards are overworked—in the cities for bona fide reasons and in the suburbs by the fact that superintendents know very well how to crowd the agenda with trivial items of fiscal administration.

Until operational objectives for our schools are defined, and until school outputs come to be measured against operational objectives, we shall continue to be in the dark about what models of educational programs should be copied in districts across the land. Further, school boards themselves will have little incentive to take advantage of the opportunities given them to minimize school failure. In its 1965 session, the California legislature passed a forward-looking act whereby the state shares costs with local districts in freeing exceptionally qualified teachers to work full time in a single school on reading instruction of pupils in the first three grades. By September, 1966, only forty-four districts out of some 1,200 in the state had chosen to participate in the program, and none of these was a large district. There has been no sense of urgency about school failure, in spite of its tragic private and social consequences.

Will education of the disadvantaged be improved? Yes. How? Slowly. But the helm has been put over in the great hulk that is our educational system, and a new direction of emphasis has been established. For this, the Coleman Report should receive a large part of the credit. Various policy proposals have been associated with the report: educational parks and central city-suburb sharing of pupils are two that come to mind. I have proposed (Phi Delta Kappan, March, 1967) that the instruction of the disadvantaged be combined with on-the-job training of teachers, using the analogy of the teaching hospital. Other things need to be done. State laws that fracture the elementary school day could be repealed. School districts could place greater rewards before the trained and competent teacher, approximating the rewards received by the administrator. Most important of all, states could insist that there be quantitative assessment of student progress in all elementary and secondary schools, to the end that the educational fraternity begin to think seriously about defining its operational objectives.

BRITAIN'S PRESS CRISIS

RAYMOND WILLIAMS

London

It has been a difficult winter for British newspapers. In the worst moments, it seemed possible that only four or five of the nine surviving national daily papers would be able to continue publication for more than another year. This forecast may have been unduly pessimistic, and there is now some feeling that the situation has eased. Yet it is a fact that the formerly independent Times has passed into the control of the combine owned by Lord Thomson, and that our other leading newspaper, The Guardian, has been for some months in acute financial difficulties. Among the other papers, only The Telegraph, the Mirror and the Express seem certain of a commercial future. The future of the Sun, which replaced the old Labour Herald, is particularly doubtful, and there are question marks over the Mail and the Sketch. The ninth paper, the Morning Star (formerly the Worker) is in a position of its own, with a small circulation outside the ordinary conditions of commercial publication. What are the causes of this crisis, and what is revealed about the social condition of the British press?

The immediate causes are clear. The July measures of the Wilson government, freezing prices and wages to assist the balance of payments, had the effect of depressing economic activity and led to a decline in advertising revenue. Moreover, there has been for some years a decline in circulations from the very high figures of the fifties. The two most serious papers, The Times and The Guardian, each with a circulation between 250,000 and 300,000, depend on advertising for about two-thirds of their revenue. Most of the other papers get about half their income from advertising. The decline of advertising has had immediate effects, especially on those papers which were already relatively weak. A situation well known to students of the press is suddenly a national issue.

Some special features of the British press need emphasis. It is of course normal for newspapers in capitalist societies to depend quite heavily on advertising. But in Britain the relationship between circulation and commercial viability is unusual. The daily press is dominated by the eight or nine national papers; the regional or provincial dailies are comparatively unimportant. Papers like The Times and The Guardian, with generally affluent and influential readers, can approach commercial survival on relatively small circulations by charging very high rates for rather specialized kinds of advertising. Even so, they cannot hope to break even, and must look to support from associated enterprises. In the popular field, a viable circulation is well in excess of 1 million, and may be approaching 2 million. The last national daily paper to close, the News Chronicle, had sales beyond 1 million, and one Sunday paper that closed had more than 2 million. As advertising concentrates in the really high-circulation papers—the Mirror, nearly 5 million, and the Express, more than 4 million—the other popular papers feel the draft. The Telegraph, a middle paper at about 1,300,000, is secured by its share of specialized advertising, but the Sun, at about the same figure but with only a popular readership, and the Sketch, with about 800,000, are very exposed. Even the Mail, at better than 2 million, seems to many people insecure.

It is then obvious that this particular British ratio, in which the circulation figure for survival gets higher and higher, raises special problems. It is directly related to an increasing concentration of control. Already some seven out of eight copies of all national morning papers are controlled by three groups, while two of these same groups, with another, control seven out of eight copies of Sunday papers. There are extensive associated holdings, and some other powerful combines, in the provincial evening and weekly press, and in magazine publishing, where at the commercial level the largest newspaper group (Cecil King's International Publishing Corporation, which controls the Mirror and the Sun) holds a near monopoly.

Some of us have been pointing to the political implications of this development for some time. In 1961, after the last wave of closures, and when it was evident that many of these same newspaper interests had holdings in the majority service of the commercial television companies, I wrote a book, Communications, which got some discussion. It was reissued this winter, by coincidence, just as the renewed crisis became apparent, and it was interesting to see how journalists and politicians who had agreed to let the issues ride, in the intervening years, suddenly came on the telephone. There were the makings of a useful discussion, and for the first time in years I got some support for the only proposals which seemed to me to meet the problem: public ownership of the newsprint industry; government intervention to own certain printing works, which would be leased on contract to threatened newspapers outside the big combines; these papers to be reorganized as nonprofit trusts or public companies under the democratic control of the journalists themselves. There was even a moment when some members of the Labour government, to whom the ideas should not, after all, have been unfamiliar, showed interest. Meanwhile, however, a different exercise in persuasion has been under way, and with vastly greater resources. The real cause of the crisis, we are repeatedly told, is the rapacious demands of the printers' unions.

Jensen, Sunday Telegraph (London): Ben Roth

The Labour government, as it always does these days, came to accept, substantially, this absurd explanation. The government's only effective diagnosis of weakness anywhere in the society is the greed and impatience of the working men who built its party and put it into office. In a period of rapid technical change, there are certainly real problems about manpower in the whole printing industry. It is moreover widely agreed that many newspaper managements are inefficient. But this kind of isolated explanation of the general crisis is very shortsighted. The printing unions, defending their members' interests, are fully aware of the degree of monopoly in ownership, and of the drive to technical rationalization, with dismissals, that it produces. The new printing techniques are being introduced in a precise economic structure and in a known social climate. It is then impossible to persuade the unions that the national interest requires them to cooperate in this kind of change. The only interest that can be served, on present lines, is that of the owners. If all the existing papers were made viable by this kind of cost reduction, the social problem would still remain: that in a democratic society there is a totally unacceptable concentration of control over news and opinion.

In fact, the unions are making limited local agreements; in the short term they must. The costs of The Guardian have been reduced, after a difficult negotiation, but no sooner did this occur than the price of newsprint was allowed to rise, by an amount that would just about cancel the saving. All the real elements of the crisis are still present, and it can be expected to erupt again. That there is now a policy on the Left, based on public ownership of newsprint and a state printing corporation, is one welcome result. But it must then be added that in this, as in every other field, the Left no longer includes the Labour government.

Beyond the special features of the British situation, the communications crisis is now general in every capitalist society. Advertising has passed from being a convenient support to its present position as the form of communication on which all other major forms have come to depend. England had a similar fight about local broadcasting and only just won, preserving the public-service principle, by a difficult crash campaign which was supported by the musicians' union and which eventually (it is said) reversed a cabinet decision in favor of commercialism. It is almost a full-time job to work for democratic communications against the now fantastic economic and political pressures of managed capitalism. It does not help that the only Socialist communications policy that most people know about is the Russian and other Communist experiences of state monopoly and control. But for a time, this winter, as liberal papers like The Guardian felt the real pressures of this society, something like a democratic Socialist alternative began to emerge at a fully public level. Now it is quiet again, but since by the end of this decade Britain will probably have only three or four national morning papers, with no corresponding revival of an independent regional press, we have evidently not heard the last of the crisis in communications.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Forms of Modern Sinology

STUDENT NATIONALISM IN CHINA 1927-1937. By John Israel. Stanford University Press. 253 pp. $7.50.

WHEN CHINA WAKES. By Robert Guillain. Walker & Co. 268 pp. $5.95.

PEKING AND PEOPLE'S WARS. By Brig. General Samuel B. Griffith II, USMC (Ret.). Frederick A. Praeger. 142 pp. $4.95.

JONATHAN MIRSKY

Mr. Mirsky teaches Chinese at Dartmouth College. He is one of the contributors to Peace in Vietnam: A New Approach in Southeast Asia (Hill and Wang).

These books illustrate three of the most common forms of modern Sinology. Thus they are not merely useful (or useless) for the information they do (or do not) contain but for the impulses and predilections they expose; China is an absorbing subject and the market for books is wide. Let us deal first with the study which is most valuable and will sell least well.

John Israel teaches Chinese history at Claremont Men's College. Student Nationalism in China, 1927-1937, is a detailed, dissertation-like study of the development of student political awareness, which focused on Japanese threats to Chinese national integrity. Professor Israel's book was completed long before 1966, when the students of Peking, Shanghai and Nanking poured into the streets, and it is not part of the book's intention to create any false analogies between earlier student demonstrations and the present Red Guard movement. But certain parallels are astonishing.

The streets of these cities had witnessed wild student demonstrations as early as 1919, when the Versailles powers acquiesced to Japanese demands in north China. This was the beginning of the celebrated May 4 Movement. "The salient features of the student movement in subsequent years—the countrywide unity, the slogans denouncing Japanese imperialists and Chinese traitors, the demonstrations, the use of modern propaganda methods, the crusades to educate and indoctrinate workers and peasants, can be traced back to May Fourth."

From then on, Israel writes, it was "common to see thousands of high school and college youths surging through the streets demanding resistance to imperial-ist insults or an end to unpopular policies in their own government."

When one reads with mounting bewilderment accounts of Red Guard activity in China today, certain questions invariably recur: Who are the demonstrators? What do they want? Is their activity spontaneous? There is very little to go on since most sources, either Chinese or Western, are special pleading. But history is often illuminating, and here again the past comes to our aid.

The student movements throughout the twenties and thirties were uncoordinated, and often fluctuated madly in their momentum. Nationalism alone provided cohesion: save China from Japanese aggression and stiffen the resolve of the government. During the period between 1921 and 1939, the Communist movement developed and so did Chiang Kai-shek's Kuomintang (KMT). Each party competed for the allegiance of the students.

Mao Tse-tung, who began his political life as a middle school agitator, realized very early the importance of giving leadership to students and exploiting their fervor. So did Chiang Kai-shek. A significant difference from Chinese students of today is that the youths between the two wars were from an economic elite. But Chinese young people in school today, although usually from poor families, take on "student" attitudes much as they always have. Mao finds this disturbing, for another class is formed irrespective of income. A quick awareness develops among students of the gulf between themselves and the peasants. In absolute numbers, although there are vastly more now, upper-level students still form a tiny minority in the population.

The mood of these students before 1930, as described by themselves, was "pessimistic," "drifting" and "romantic." Public service was a despised profession, since civil war, poverty and bottomless KMT corruption continuously dashed the spirits of the young. But in 1931 further Japanese incursions in north China galvanized the students. Scenes familiar to China watchers today ensued as:

Students felt duty bound to alert their less sophisticated countrymen to the gravity of the national crisis. . . . Scores of . . . volunteers were analyzing the causes of the Manchurian situation for the uncultured masses of Peiping (not then China's capital) and its environs. In the Yangtze delta, even grammar school children enlisted in the crusade. A Christian missionary was surprised to see some fifty primary school pupils all wearing red crepe armbands board his train . . . they had cut classes to barnstorm the countryside delivering impassioned speeches and distributing pamphlets.

As in today's China, such activity posed a considerable problem for the government: it could either encourage and guide the movement or attempt to suppress it. Over the next year both courses were tried. Chiang Kai-shek was unsuccessful in controlling the students who in Shanghai, for instance, struck for a week against government orders. On September 28, 1931, thousands of youths marched on the Foreign Ministry, eventually broke in, and nearly beat to death the Foreign Minister whom they accused of being a traitor for not resisting Japan. (This should be remembered by those who maintain that current public humiliation of high officials is unprecedented.)

Thereafter, waves of student petitioners rolled for months through the streets of Nanking. Although trains were commandeered and students traveled into the capital from Shanghai and Peking, the government became increasingly adept at handling the mobs:

Many accepted official hospitality. After a group had been fed and lodged under close surveillance its leaders would be summoned to the Kuomintang's Ministry of Propaganda for an intimate talk. . . . High level party and government officials would speak to the assembled students. . . . Chiang Kai-shek would usually appear to say a few words. . . . Their trip had been a success: they had been well fed, they had seen the capital, and Chairman Chiang had spoken to them in person.

On another occasion students waited all night freezing in the snow outside KMT party headquarters. "They refused to leave until they had seen the Chairman." When he finally appeared, he said: "I am deeply pleased to see you, motivated by patriotic ardor, coming to the capital to petition. I resolved long ago to devote my life to the party and the nation." Then, like a modern Chou En-lai, he added: "You students can fulfill your duties as citizens by calmly studying and supporting the government."

(On November 26, 1966, according to Peking Review: "Although temperatures were almost sub-zero on the 25th, the happy news that Chairman Mao was going to receive them warmed the hearts of our young fighters.")

Further crises ensued in Peking. In December, 1931, "Peiping's universities were completely disorganized. Several presidents had resigned, and classrooms were empty." In Nanking, students forced government officials into hiding. The government could stand it no longer. Students were ordered to stay off trains. Airplanes dropped leaflets cautioning them that Nanking's patience was stretching.

(On January 9, 1967, a message was sent by the Communist Central Committee to "revolutionaries" in Shanghai urging those "who are exchanging revolutionary experiences in other parts of the country to return to Shanghai immediately so that the great cultural revolution in their own units can be fulfilled.")

By 1935, Japanese threats and demands mounted, accompanied by an escalating student activity. The student unions in Peking resolved to "rally the oppressed masses" against the enemy. Students in Peking and Tientsin divided themselves into small units and marched into the countryside in long columns to talk to the peasants. "Patriotic songs, didactic plays and impassioned speeches in a babel of dialects filled the air of the winter-bound villages."

(Peking Review of November 25, 1966, reports: "In the last few months, revolutionary students and teachers of higher educational institutes and middle schools throughout the country have made extensive contacts to exchange revolutionary experience. . . . The revolutionary young fighters spread Mao Tse-tung's thought along the way, distributed handbills printed with quotations from Chairman Mao, and helped people's communes and production teams to put out blackboard newspapers. . . .")

An important lesson had been learned. According to Israel: "Although their endeavors had rendered the area (Hopei) more susceptible to wartime guerrilla activities, the strongest impact had undoubtedly been not on the peasants but on the students who gained first-hand knowledge of the life and thought of China's masses and became aware of the enormous problems of communication. This was a unique preparation for war and revolution."

(Peking Review of November 25, 1966: "These wide contacts with the masses have helped the long marchers to understand profoundly the boundless love, faith in, and veneration for Chairman Mao . . . on the part of the masses. . . .")

Israel stresses the confusion in the minds of China's youth in the decades after World War I. They were educated, often Western-oriented, and always Chinese. The Communists pulled at them from one side: from the other came the pull of "grandfathers who still smoked opium and fathers who maintained concubines." What moved these students was nationalism, an independent China "neither traditionalistic nor aggressive." Like the students of China today, they were at odds with their teachers and leaders, men who feared and admired the West, but who were only courageous enough to inch their country into the 20th century. Leninism, very gradually, came to appear progressive, revolutionary and, most important, as the road to national salvation.

When China Wakes goes on from where Israel leaves us. Without the historical framework provided by painstaking research such as Israel's, much of what Guillain says would be nothing but assertion, to be taken on faith.

Guillain is an experienced traveler in Asia, and a profound analyst, much in the style of Jean Lacouture. Such French journalists, though they sometimes over-write, seem to get nearer the heart of the matter than do their American counterparts. This is an account of Guillain's 1964 trip to China, his first in nine years. He uses trips to large cities, communes and industrial sites as springboards into speculation. Even a non-visit to Lanchow, the center of atomic research, gives rise to an illuminating chapter on China's nuclear weapons, made possible, he feels, by enforced backwardness elsewhere in the country which the Chinese, mindful of Russian "softness," term a virtue.

Guillain's most interesting flights of imagination come in his last chapter,

PROPHETIC

.....

...on Democracy's rocky road (1896)

PROBLEMS OF MODERN DEMOCRACY

Political and Economic Essays

By Edwin Lawrence Godkin

Edited by Morton Keller

"To my generation," wrote William James, "Godkin's was certainly the towering influence in all thought concerning public affairs." He was The Nation's first editor and later editor-in-chief of the New York Evening Post. This book drew on thirty years of his thought and concern over "the unhappy course of American democracy." A dissenter in his own time, Godkin single-handedly established the tradition of intellectual involvement in government and of sustained, ironic criticism of public institutions that are dear to so many today. $5.95

...on the political process (1908)

THE PROCESS OF GOVERNMENT

By Arthur F. Bentley

Edited by Peter H. Odegard

A devastating indictment of the political science of its time, this is still, as Mr. Odegard's penetrating commentary shows, one of the few indispensable books in the literature of behavioral science. It was a startling breakthrough in the study of political behavior, showing that government is essentially an operation of "process, action, change," and that as such it can be analyzed objectively. Largely ignored in its day, it is now generally regarded as a seminal contribution to modern political analysis and its author one of the field's most creative pioneers.

$6.95

...on the American vision (1909)

THE PROMISE OF AMERICAN LIFE

By Herbert Croly

Edited by Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr.

The Promise of American Life stirred the greatest minds of its time. In 1914, its author was persuaded to create The New Republic. In 1929, Felix Frankfurter called this book "a reservoir for all political writing after its publication." Today it remains as swift, pointed, clear, often prophetic analysis of the American dream — the idea that is America — from the standpoint of her education, labor, business, individuality, technology, reform, foreign policy, and leadership. $5.95

The John Harvard Library
BELKNAP/HARVARD

appearing in

THE NATION

SPRING BOOK NUMBER

AKNA AKHMATOVA

translated by

STANLEY KUNITZ

among a distinguished group of contributors to a special poetry issue

Coming April 24

"The New Generation and China After Mao." The Chinese, he is sure, are determined that those who expect a relaxation after Mao dies, will be proved wrong: "Post-Mao China is also planned by Mao. The master has finished his life work."

It is revisionism which is the enemy and when the younger generation takes over, its mind must be pure. At this point Guillain makes his only serious error—and a year ago such a prophecy could be made safely: "In today's China organized opposition to the regime would be unthinkable, and any opposition as such has been eliminated." (He affirms that it is "risky" to make such a guess.) But his other insights are important. He speaks, for instance, of the "loathing for agricultural work" among young intellectuals, and of how being sent to the land is a "catastrophe." As reported in Peking Review, one of the recent charges brought against the Shanghai Municipal Party Committee is that it tried to "stir up dissatisfaction" by obstructing "the inevitable road" of "integration of students with peasants and workers." (The particular crime, in this instance, was "paying the students relatively high wages for labor.")

DIRECT FROM PEKING

The original 'little red book'

QUOTATIONS FROM MAO TSE-TUNG

800,000,000 people — 1/5 of the world — live according to the tenets of this official handbook of the Red Guards. Shouldn't you know what's in the original, official English version of what has become the world's bestselling book?

Only $1.00

At your bookstore now, or add 15¢ shipping and order direct from CHINA PUBLICATIONS,
95 Fifth Ave., New York 10003.

The question which bothers Guillain and many others—and which he repeatedly sought the answer to in China—is how can revisionists still exist after years of revolution. He makes the interesting speculation that, as in Russia, it is among the contented that opposition to Mao tends to form, "among those whom the beginnings of comfort and wealth have caused to place . . . personal interest above the common good." Thus, Guillain points out that bourgeois concepts such as "well-being," "love," "a good life" and "happiness" are constantly denounced, since they distract young people from a vision of perhaps centuries of toil during which not only China but all the downtrodden will have to be lifted from oppression and backwardness. Guillain was told that eight generations might be required for such a task!

For Brig. Gen. Samuel B. Griffith II, USMC (Ret.), the task as envisaged by Mao will require terrible deeds: "The Chinese are masters of espionage, propaganda, agitation, subversion, bribery, blackmail and selective terror," and they will apply these methods in target countries to create "storm centers of world revolution."

This is not the raving of an unsophisticated thug. Griffith's Oxford doctoral dissertation was published as The Art of War. It is a careful and fascinating study of a 4th century B.C. Chinese military strategist whose ideas on guerrilla-type warfare plainly underlie those of Mao Tse-tung, on whose military outlook Griffith has also written with authority. It is therefore very sad to see that Praeger has seen fit to commission such a slapdash and vulgar polemic. Is the hand of the CIA (which sponsors this publisher) or of the USIA (which commissioned the manuscript itself) showing a little too plainly?

Griffith's essay is attached to the now famous Lin Piao speech, "Long Live the Victory of the People's War," and to another by Lo Jui-ching, the now disgraced chief of the General Staff. Griffith is badly caught off base by the recent Rand study (and an earlier one in the Quaker Peace in Vietnam) which shows that, though verbally bellicose, Lin is actually counseling independence for revolutionary movements. Even McNamara might have trouble finding in Lin Piao's speech a justification for Griffith's assertion that: "The Chinese Communists will not permit the idea of individualism in nations." What Lin Piao actually says is: "To make a revolution and to fight a people's war and be victorious, it is imperative to adhere to the policy of self-reliance, rely on the strength of the masses in one's own country, and to prepare to carry on the fight independently even when all material aid is cut off." It is no mistake that this speech was delivered on the twentieth birthday of the People's Republic of Vietnam. Hanoi and the NLF were being warned to tighten their belts.

But this is surely, by now, a well-known analysis. How much can we still rely on Griffith's scholarship? On page 5, for instance, we find that in 1927 Mao was: ". . . a minor figure in the councils of the Chinese Communist Party. We may doubt that the Russian members of the International had even heard of him. . . ."

What is the point of this assertion? To debunk some kind of false legend? The fact of the matter is that the "minor figure" was one of the twelve delegates at the first congress of the Chinese Communist Party on July 1, 1921. Mao was elected secretary of this congress which was attended by two Russians. In 1924, at the first national congress of the KMT which included Communists, Mao was again a delegate and one of six Communist alternate members to the General Executive Committee. As for the Comintern never having heard of Mao in 1927, in his excellent biography Jerome Ch'en says of Mao that his famous "Report of an Investigation into the Peasant Movement in Hunan," attracted the attention and unqualified praise of the Chairman of the Comintern, Bukharin, who was then Stalin's close ally . . . he described it as excellent and interesting." In the same year the article was translated into Russian and English. Such is anonymity!

Griffith, in his desire to remove any notion that the Chinese Communists might have appealed to the peasantry, falls into his own snares. On page 8, in describing the "standard . . . regimentation and militarization of the population," he says: "There was no escaping the omnipresent Party . . . to live, it was mandatory to conform." But on page 9 he describes Chinese "of all classes, particularly the professors and the students, many of whom deserted lecture halls and classrooms and set out to join the Communists." On page 31 we find that the Communist army in "its relationships with the peasants . . . was generally impeccable."

Griffith tells us too that the Chinese are impossible to deal with on the international scene, that "gestures of amity" and "objective diplomatic discussions" are useless when dealing with Peking. Forgetting for a moment that the United States has for years brought ridicule on the (stressed thē; unstressed before a consonant thə; unstressed before a vowel thē), definite article. 1. (used, esp. before a noun, with a specifying or particularizing effect, as opposed to the indefinite or generalizing force of the indefinite article a or an): the book you gave me; Come into the house. 2. (used to mark a proper noun, natural phenomenon, ship, building, time, point of the compass, branch of endeavor, or field of study as something well-known or unique): the Alps; the Queen Elizabeth; the past; the West. 3. (used with or as part of a title): the Duke of Wellington; the Reverend John Smith. 4. (used to mark a noun indicating the best-known, most approved, most important, most satisfying, etc.): the skiing center of the U.S.; If you're going to work hard, now is the time. 5. (used to mark a noun as being used generically): The dog is a quadruped. 6. (used in place of a possessive pronoun, to note a part of the body or a personal belonging): He wouldn't be able to play football until the leg mended. 7. (used before adjectives that are used substantively, to note an individual, a class or number of individuals, or an abstract idea): to visit the sick; from the sublime to the ridiculous. 8. (used before a modifying adjective to specify or limit its modifying effect): He took the wrong road and drove miles out of his way. 9. (used to indicate one particular decade of a lifetime or of a century): the gay nineties and the roaring twenties. 10. (one of many of a class or type, as of a manufactured item, as opposed to an individual one): Did you listen to the radio last night? 11. enough: He saved until he had the money for a new car. She didn't have the courage to leave. 12. (used distributively, to note any one separately); for, to, or in each; a or an: at one dollar the pound. [ME, OE, uninflected var. of demonstrative pronoun. See THAT] na-tion (nā'shən), n. 1. a body of people, associated with a particular territory, that is sufficiently conscious of its unity to seek or to possess a government peculiarly its own. 2. the territory or country itself. 3. a member tribe of an Indian confederation. 4. an aggregation of persons of the same ethnic family, often speaking the same language or cognate languages. [ME < L nātiōn- (s. of nātiō) birth, tribe, equiv. to nāt(us) born (ptp. of nāscī) + -iōn- -iōn] —na'tion-hood, n. —na'tion-less, adj. —Syn. 2. state, commonwealth, kingdom, realm. See race.

We have the last word on The Nation.

Just as you had some kind words about us:

"Random House's type is clear and legible; it never strains your eyes. Its definitions are, on the whole, understandable. Its etymologies, though perhaps too brief to suit a language specialist, are generally correct. Its system of transcription to indicate pronunciation is far more accessible to the layman than is that of Webster III. Its linguistic philosophy will prove far more acceptable to all those who questioned Webster III's doctrine of usage. . . The RHD is an excellent buy and will prove a good and faithful servant both to the layman and the specialist."—MARIO PEI, The Nation

Always has the last word.
$25.

itself for pretending the government in "Peiping" does not exist and that Taipei is the capital of China, it would be well to remember that the Chinese have recently concluded treaties on mutually favorable terms with, among others, Pakistan, Burma, Cambodia and Nepal, and that they trade with nearly 100 countries, including West Germany. The Chinese are currently going through an internal upheaval the results of which cannot be foretold; useless generalizations about their actual behavior are surely not an aid to American understanding.

Reading this book is like listening to Secretary Rusk on a bad day. "The purpose of the American presence in South Vietnam . . . [is] to put a stop to a Communist aggression directed against the legitimate government and the people of South Vietnam." It is surprising to find reputable scholars still able to make that statement. Almost everyone is now willing to concede that the United States is participating in a civil/anti-colonial war. Indeed, Griffith himself, referring to Asian "xenophobic nationalism," admits on an earlier page that "in the North Vietnamese struggle against the French this appeal was credible . . . foreign troops were present. The slogans of 'anti-imperialism' and 'anti-colonialism' found responses simply because in both instances it was clear that the 'foreign devils' were attempting to conquer the country and exploit and oppress the people. The consequence was that thousands participated actively with the communist party operating within broadly based patriotic fronts." Considering the American role in supporting the French, it is hard to see why Griffith assumes that the Vietnamese should now regard us as saviors.

But Griffith, despite a long career of practical affairs, and a record of serious Chinese scholarship, is now so oblivious to the realities of the world in which we and the Chinese live, that he can assert that the enmity of the United States toward China is only a figment of Peking's tortured imagination and cunning. "It is essential to keep revolutionary fervor at a high pitch. This can be done if an external enemy is postulated that threatens the lives and livelihood of the people. If no such demonic figure exists, it is necessary to create one. In China, this Satan is the United States."

Israel and Guillaing tell us that Chinese fears are historic and real.

tion," as Cornelia Otis Skinner says, "only a few."

James Agate, "dean" of English drama critics between 1907 and 1947, called Bernhardt "the great workwoman." Miss Skinner substantiates this designation by remarking that "at sixty-five Madame Sarah continued to spend twelve, sometimes fourteen hours a day in her theatre, rehearsing her repertory, auditioning players, teaching her pupils, reading scripts." In 1891, on a two-year tour which took her halfway around the world, Bernhardt's luggage (apart from theatre equipment) "consisted of forty-five costume crates and some seventy-five trunks for her off-stage dresses, coats, hats, furs and two hundred and fifty pairs of shoes."

I begin with this data to suggest that Madame Sarah is not a book about acting but about an actress; and not so much about an actress as about a dazzling personality. And that personality is an emblem for Miss Skinner of something even more fascinating to her, something which I shall name after we have taken a closer look at the evidence on Bernhardt as actress.

Notable appreciations by contemporary French critics are generously strewn through Miss Skinner's biography. Most of them are ecstatic: they assure us that Bernhardt was an unforgettable phenomenon to those who attended her performances. (When I saw her in my student days in Paris, in the next to last play in which she appeared, I was impressed by the fact that though I sat in the gallery and was still unaccustomed to hearing French spoken from the stage, I understood every word she uttered, while the rest of the cast was wholly unintelligible to me.) I nevertheless remain skeptical about most French criticism of acting: it tends to be effusively impressionistic, a kind of literary swoon adjusted to erotic and visceral reactions, rather than to ideas and scrupulous observation.

Henry James and Shaw, both of whom were well aware of Bernhardt's magnetism, are much more reliable witnesses. Here is what Shaw said about the "divine" Sarah in 1895: ". . . her acting which is not the art of making you think more highly or feel more deeply, but the art of making you admire her, pity her, champion her, weep with her, laugh at her jokes, follow her fortunes breathlessly, and applaud her wildly when the curtain falls. And it is always Sarah Bernhardt in her own capacity who does this to you . . . the woman is always the same. She does not enter the leading character, she substitutes herself for it."

"There is no better book on the subject. No other book can go as far in clarification of the confusion. The authors have done a service to the whole discussion."

—BOSTON GLOBE

THE UNITED STATES IN VIETNAM

by GEORGE MCTURNAN KAHIN (Professor of Government, Cornell University, and Director of Cornell's Southeast Asia Program) and JOHN W. LEWIS (Associate Professor of Government, Cornell University, and Director of the London-Cornell Project) • Complete text of pertinent documents • 6 maps • Clothbound $5.95 Delta Paperback $2.95 Now at your bookstore

THE DIAL PRESS

Star of Paris

MADAME SARAH. By Cornelia Otis Skinner. Houghton Mifflin Co. 346 pp. $6.95.

HAROLD CLURMAN

Sarah Bernhardt (born 1844 in Paris, where she died in 1923) played 183 parts during a career which began in 1862. She played Marguerite Gautier in The Lady of the Camellias more than 3,000 times. She performed in Paris, London, New York, Albany, Denver, Texas, San Francisco, Mobile, Amsterdam, Zurich, St. Petersburg, Warsaw, Moscow, Bologna, Florence, Rio de Janeiro, Athens, Constantinople, etc., etc.

She was a sensational success everywhere. Her name became a byword. By the nature of the medium it is a simple matter for a film star to achieve universal renown. Bernhardt attained greater fame and notoriety than any other actor in history—with the possible exception of Chaplin—by personal appearances. Among her friends and admirers were Victor Hugo, Emile Zola, Alexandre Dumas fils, Gambetta, Flaubert, Pasteur, Renan, Gounod, D'Annunzio and Oscar Wilde, "to men-

In 1879, after pointing out the excellent reasons for her prodigious vogue, Henry James added: "She has to a supreme degree . . . the advertising genius; she may, indeed, be called the muse of the newspaper. . . . I strongly suspect that she will find a triumphant career in the Western World. She is too American not to succeed in America. The people who have brought to the highest development the arts and graces of publicity will recognize a kindred spirit in a figure so admirably adapted for conspicuousity."

Miss Skinner recognizes the trickery and vulgarity of some of Madame Sarah's effects. She has surely read the critics I have just cited; she quotes a complimentary passage from the Shaw review cited above, a review which is on the whole rather devastating. But she is not really interested in weighing the merits and debits of her heroine's art. She does not love Madame Sarah for herself alone (though no doubt the woman's energy, courage, impetuosity and theatrical effulgence deserve her adulation); she loves Sarah as the archetype of la belle époque, that glorious time which the French lived from the mid-19th century through the early years of the 20th.

Historians can detail and diagnose the sores and wounds, the poverty, corruption, follies, diseases, wars, rebellions and sieges, but the fact remains that France danced in those days to tunes, verses, words, arts of fabulous resilience, verve and excitement of the mind and the senses.

Miss Skinner's book, which possesses the twinkling, old-fashioned, discreetly naughty humor of an essentially genteel lady, is a record of fond nostalgia. She who in one paragraph describes "the dear, the wonderful, the glorious comedian Constant Coquelin," and adds that he was "a modest, adorable person," enjoys everything that has to do with the customs, habits, even the vices of the period. Miss Skinner tells us that Bernhardt told countless lies, both in writing and in personal interviews, but she gushes over this too. It is all part of the glamour, the glitter, the bravado. Sarah made lovers of all her leading men and most of her authors: in this too Miss Skinner rejoices, not because she is a lusty lady but because Sarah and France were. They swung.

In her imagination Miss Skinner sits in the dressing rooms, in the wings of the auditoriums, goes to all the parties and outings where great artists and mountebanks, seers and courtesans, duelists and drug addicts, radicals and reactionaries commingle, and she can't get over the rapture of it all. Her book is therefore bound to be a bestseller. For we have mechanized everything including our passions and pleasures so that very little of either remains. In the age of conformity we must idealize a time when signal achievements and lurid sins were hardly distinguishable from each other because both were part of the ebullient experience of life. So now we have folk like Cornelia Otis Skinner on the one hand and hipsters on the other, each in their own way seeking release from the dull savagery of our Great Society.

ARCHITECTURE / ERVIN GALANTAY

The architects of Lincoln Center have thoughtfully provided two different approaches to the Metropolitan Opera. The first, serving the lucky few who arrive by taxicab, passes the fountain in the focus of the three major buildings which squat like constipated frogs around a water lily. This approach is quite satisfactory except in rain, snow or slush, conditions which often perversely coincide with the coveted performances.

But even in balmy weather the bulk of the audience arrives in the underground parking garage and alights from cars and limousines to an overture of engine noise. Then—satin shoes tip-toeing on oil-smeared concrete, delicate noses dipped in fur stoles to fend off the poisonous exhaust—the procession files toward the escalators and the de-partmentalized consumption of Performing Arts. Searching for the right door in the tiled tunnels scented with disinfectant, I often recall with considerable feeling the memory of arriving at Venice's La Fenice by silent gondola, with torches lighting the canal.

Of course, access to the old Met was never quite that pleasant, but the design of the new house might at least have emulated the dignified carriage entrances of the Paris Opera which connect directly with ornate and spacious lobbies. As it is, one pushes through a last glass door to enter a space low-ceilinged and mean of proportions, but lavish in its exotic finishes. Moving up to the lounge one follows the spatial contortions of the grand staircase—interesting in itself but an element borrowed

A major book, modest in its presentation — overwhelming in its implications

THE HUMAN DIMENSION:

EXPERIENCES IN POLICY RESEARCH

by Hadley Cantril

In simple, narrative form, this book describes the author's attempts over many years to inject consideration of psychological factors into the making of crucial government decisions. If full use had been made of the polls conducted by the Institute for International Social Research, which Dr. Cantril heads, the United States might have avoided our 1960 catastrophe in Cuba. Had action been taken on the information acquired by the polls of 1962 in Santo Domingo, the violence of 1965 might well have been prevented.

The book is an urgent invitation to top policy-makers to look at the peoples of the world—through the eyes of the people themselves—by means of a constant and sympathetic use, at all levels of policy-making, of the easily applied techniques he demonstrates.

DR. CANTRIL has been psychological advisor to all but one of the last five administrations. During World War II, he was an expert consultant to the Secretary of War and of the Office of War Information.

$7.50 at bookstores or from

RUTGERS UNIVERSITY PRESS
New Brunswick, New Jersey 08903

from Eero Saarinen's TWA-Kennedy Airport idiom and totally unrelated to the Harrison firm's own design vocabulary. As though to underline this discord, the heavy concrete edge of the stairs abruptly stops behind a column and a slim wooden handrail takes over. Such discontinuities abound: marble shafts of uncertain purpose rise with polished vigor to be chopped off short of the concrete vaults of the ceiling.

Writing in The Nation two years ago, Walter McQuade expressed the hope that Philharmonic Hall would remain Lincoln Center's architectural nadir. With respect to the new Met he must have assumed that the design of a traditional horseshoe auditorium with a red-and-gold color scheme is a foolproof proposition. But is it? Entering the grand space one is overwhelmed by the most astonishing potpourri of decorative devices, to wit: the proscenium frame is cut into folded surfaces covered with gilded warts and other excrescences; the boxes are shaped as doubly curved surfaces, some striped, some adorned with crystals; and, most striking, the design of the ceiling is an orgy of two-dimensional ovulation. "Stalinist decorative" is not my favorite style, but by comparison the designers of the Moscow Metro showed greater artistic "finesse" in the development of a coherent decorative theme. During a performance of Il Trovatore, beautifully designed and costumed by Motley, I could not help thinking that the interiors would have been infinitely better executed by a gifted stage designer.

It is hard to swallow the proffered excuse that the awkward decoration of the Met "designed itself" as the dependent variable of the acoustic requirements. The acoustics are indeed good, and the credit is primarily due to Cyril Harris, the acoustical consultant. Harris likes to point out that music capriciously calls for varied, broken surfaces, once admirably provided by the cheeks and buttocks of baroque putti, by stucco ceilings and chandeliers. The search for adequate ersatz patterns is what overtakes the formal inventiveness of modern architects. The design of ceilings is especially trying: Abramovitz's shields at the Philharmonic are as embarrassing as Johnson's intersecting curlicues radiating from an oversize crystal ball at the State Theater. Yet Johnson at least deployed a fairly well coordinated set of decorative elements, while at the Met textures and material crowd one another in hapless juxtaposition.

Above the center of the Met's proscenium (where in royal theatres the ruler's coat of arms is displayed) there curls an enigmatic bundle of perforated strips and gilded noodles. Apart from this sculptural emblem, there is no work of art in the auditorium. In baroque theatres the ceiling was often the primary object of artistic attention, and in view of the awkward alternative provided in the new opera, it is a pity that its ceiling was not painted. Perhaps the directors of the project hesitated to copy the Paris Opera where Chagall repainted the flat cupola beautifully, although somewhat out of tune with the color key of Garnier's mellow decoration. Instead of a ceiling, the Met presented Chagall with two blank surfaces in the lounge for which the aging master produced two enormous canvases. Inside the building, these paintings can be viewed only from a skewed angle, which makes me suspect that the paintings were not conceived as part of the original design. Chagall's two "lyric fantasies" can be better seen from the plaza where they beckon from behind the large glass walls. Their light, dreamlike quality might have softened the maladroitness of the lounge, were it not for heavy box frames and huge draperies that entirely divorce the paintings from the architecture. They are degraded to "lobby art," a genre much in favor with New York's commercial architecture. I once heard a local realtor advising his design team to cut the expense of architecture and compensate for adequate space by "jazzing up" the lobby: "throw in a couple of colors, buy some plants and some art," he said.

This "art appliqué," art applied to architecture as a sop and an afterthought, is characteristic of much that can be seen at Lincoln Center. To be sure, some of the art work has been donated, was gratefully received and now demands prominent display. But even the commissioned pieces do little to upgrade the architecture. There are exceptions: the big Moore in front of the Beaumont Theater completes the space with its black pool. The State Theater's pair of Nadelmans—gaped at from the lacy galleries as though they were white belugas in an aquarium—are at least partly convincing. One senses that the space was conceived to contain two contrapuntal heroic sculptures, and their presence is essential for spatial balance. This cannot be said of Lippold's tangled metal strips in Philharmonic Hall; the artist obviously could not "swing" with Abramovitz's architecture as well as he did with Johnson's Four Seasons Restaurant, one of the few spaces in New York where a comfortable relation is established between art work and architecture.

Despite all the talk about the essential unity of architecture and the "sister arts," our time has created a wider gap between architects and artists than ever existed before. Under the Gothic or the Baroque, art and architecture formed an inseparable entity; even the 19th century produced a synthesis of architecture and decoration, a comprehensive modulation from vast volume to graspable small scale. Since then, Soviet "social realism" has discredited any view of art as servant of a stated social philosophy and strengthened the narcissistic individualism of Western artists. The modern painter or sculptor, in his self-appointed role as a sort of "early-warning system" of McLuhanian pretension, no longer cares to consort with architects.

Edgar Kaufman, Jr., a leading theoretician of architecture, feels that the take-it-or-leave-it pose of modern artists is justifiable, since the essence of modern art is a search for unlimited freedom of expression which would be negated by collaboration. John Gordon, a curator of the Whitney, confirms that this indifference is real. The best artists are reluctant to become involved with "lobby art," the lesser ones accept commissions with a cynically commercial shrug. Of the three museums recently built in New York for modern art, none provides any fixed place for a major art work: the buildings are mainly storehouses for art objects. Neither curators nor architects seem sufficiently assured of their judgment to select art for permanent placement. This is a pity, because abstract art can assume increased meaning when integrated with architecture, and the discipline imposed by

The Best Way
To Get

THE NATION

THE NATION 4-10-67
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed
(Foreign and Canadian Postage $1 a year extra)

NAME _____

ADDRESS _____

CITY _____

STATE _____ ZIP NO. _____

NATIONAL MASS MOBILIZATION TO END THE WAR IN VIETNAM NOW!

NEW YORK

ASSEMBLE 11:00 a.m. Central Park Sheep Meadow (66 St.)
RAIN OR SHINE

MARCH at noon through midtown to the UN
RALLY at the UN at 3 p.m.

HEAR: Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., Dr. Benjamin Spock, Stokely Carmichael, Dave Dellinger, Rev. James Bevel

SAN FRANCISCO

ASSEMBLE 10 a.m. Second and Market Streets
RAIN OR SHINE

MARCH to Kezar Stadium via Market Street
RALLY at Kezar Stadium, 1:00 p.m.

HEAR: Julian Bond, Judy Collins, Rabbi Abraham Feinberg, Mrs. Martin Luther King, Jr., Malvina Reynolds, Robert Vaughn

As the war cruelly destroys in Vietnam, so it denies hope to millions in the United States. The need for decent homes, quality education, jobs and fair employment are brushed aside. Our cities smother in smoke and grime, strangle in traffic. Our slums continue to rot. Streams and rivers are polluted, and the very air we breathe is fouled. Our vast wealth could in a short time eliminate these ills. It goes instead to murder and destroy. War contracts and the draft corrupt our campuses and laboratories. And, as the war continues, the ultimate danger of nuclear holocaust hangs over all.

To launch this movement, we call for a mass march and rally at the United Nations in New York and at the birthplace of the UN in San Francisco, on Saturday, April 15, 1967. We march to the UN to affirm our respect for the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples, acclaimed by mankind and embodied in the UN Charter, but violated by the United States. We march to dramatize the world-wide hope that the United States remove its troops from Vietnam so that the Vietnamese can determine their own future in their own way.

SPONSORS (PARTIAL LIST)

Harry Belafonte	Allen Ginsberg	William Pepper
Fr. Philip Berrigan, S.S.J.	Paul Goodman	Prof. Anatol Rapaport
Paul Booth	Nat Hentoff	Philip Roth
Kay Boyle	Paul Krassner	Muriel Rukeyser
Fr. William H. DuBay	Sidney Lens	Robert Scheer
Dr. Morton Deutsch	Dwight MacDonald	Prof. Franz Schurmann
James Farmer	Norman Mailer	Stanley K. Sheinbaum
Jules Feiffer	Arthur Miller	Paul M. Sweezy
W. H. Ferry	Floyd McKissick	Dr. Albert Szent-Györgyi
Prof. D. F. Fleming	Michael Maccoby	Louis Untermeyer
Simon Casady	Stewart Meacham	Dr. Ernest Wolff
Rev. Milton Galamison	Carl Oglesby	Prof. Howard Zinn
John Gerassi	Dr. Linus Pauling

SPRING MOBILIZATION COMMITTEE TO END THE WAR IN VIETNAM

Officers:	Founding Chairman:	Vice-Chairmen:
	A. J. Muste (1885-1967)	Rev. Ralph Abernathy
		Dave Dellinger
		Robert Greenblatt
		Edward Keating
		Sidney Peck
		Cleveland Robinson
		Dagmar Wilson
	National Director: James Bevel
	West Coast Director: Kipp Dawson

SATURDAY, APRIL 15, 1967 NEW YORK SAN FRANCISCO

We Address a Call for Action to All Americans Whose Lives Are Twisted by This War:

- To the mothers and fathers whose sons are taken;
- To the GIs who face death;
- To the youth, filled with the love of life, drafted to take the lives of others;
- To the black people and other minorities, who are tired of fighting for a "democracy" they have never enjoyed;
- To labor, facing higher taxes and prices while war profits soar and pressures are applied against wage increases and the right to strike;
- To the farmers caught in the "cost-price" squeeze and being taxed off their land;
- To professionals, businessmen and others who are disturbed about the war and are anxious to see it end;
- To the clergy who call all men to be brothers and who are mocked by this slaughter.

Please Clip and Mail to:

National Office:	West Coast Office:
Spring Mobilization Committee	Spring Mobilization Committee
857 Broadway	55 Colton Street
New York N.Y. 10003	San Francisco, Calif. 94103
Phone: (212) 675-4606	Phone: (415) 431-4584

- ☐ I will attend the mobilization April 15 in N. Y.
In San Francisco
- ☐ I will help mobilize against the war in my local area.
- ☐ I enclose a contribution of $..... to help pay the cost of the national mobilization.

Name Phone

Address

City State Zip

the architectural context need not cripple artistic self-expression. Although successful collaboration between artists and architects is not frequent in this city, there are many good examples abroad. In the new municipal theatre of the small German town of Ingolstadt, forthright modern architecture integrates the work of congenial artists: reliefs cast in the very structural walls, gold-leaf paintings applied directly to the concrete surface. In Takamatsu, Japan, the abstract murals of Genichiro Inokuma, an artist who lives in New York, are imbedded in the concrete of architect Tange's city hall to form a spatial entity in perfect spiritual consonance. Other examples are architect Villanueva's Central University in Caracas, Venezuela, or the buildings of the new University of St. Gall, Switzerland, by Forderer. In both cases artists were consulted during the formative stage of architectural design and a give-and-take developed between the architects and the artists—among them, Léger, Arp, Pevsner, Laurens, Vasarely, Miró and Penalba.

Lincoln Center, alas, does not deliver what it promised with so much fanfare: an "orchestra" of the visual arts to serve as an inspiration to the performing artists; a "bold . . . statement to the enduring values of art as a true measure of civilization. . . ." Corbusier once said: "In architectural space a piece of art is either priceless or worthless." In this spatial sense, there is little "priceless" art at Lincoln Center—perhaps because there is so little architecture of sufficient "worth" to call for it.

TELEVISION / John Horn

Mr. Horn covers television daily for the Publishers Newspaper Syndicate, and theatre and popular entertainment for the weekly Rockland Independent. He has been television critic-reporter for the New York Herald Tribune, Variety and the New York Star, and a field producer on Edward R. Murrow's Person to Person.

If Fred W. Friendly had written a candid account, a true history, of his sixteen-year tenure at C.B.S., what a book it could have been!

It would have contained a real appreciation of the late Edward R. Murrow, ~~with~~ whom Friendly spent most of his C.B.S. time in harness, and to whom he still owes a considerable debt. Perhaps not the Murrow of before and during World War II, Murrow at his best, alerting America to Nazism (without granting equal time) from amid the bomb fires of London, when as one of radio's news pioneers he set broadcast journalism's standards for integrity, courage, responsibility and crisp reporting. But possibly Murrow the man, the quixotic mixture of poet and peasant, of thinker and doer, the shy man in the public eye.

The book that Friendly did not write might also have followed the growth of C.B.S. News—fountainhead of news broadcasting—from a handful of friends to a corporate division, and recorded the transition from radio to television, a far more cumbersome method of communication.

It would have charted the radical change of television from a journalistic tool of incalculable service and influence to a money-making machine of fantasy entertainment and advertising. In this context, Friendly might have described the guerrilla war he was forced to wage in order to survive, let alone function. It has been a war of newsmen against their own network's commercial system, a steam roller of paid-for time aboard which the news must pay or beg its way. And on a related front it has been a war against the subtle or overt pressures of those non-journalists, in or out of a network, who attempt to keep news and documentaries as happy, conformist and noncontroversial as the rest of television.

Against such a background, the great programs that Murrow and Friendly produced would stand out as heroic. They shook up America: not just the entrenched interests, who screamed and threatened but average citizens who hardly expected their cause, which is to say their sense of themselves as individuals and not as an exploitable market, to be championed on the electronic box. To question, to arouse, to stimulate are television's great possibilities. Murrow and Friendly made them actualities—for a time.

Their wars against McCarthyism, their crusades in behalf of the dispossessed and disadvantaged (migrant workers and the American Negro, among others), their defiance of the money establishment (the automotive and tobacco industries, the political wing of the American Medical Association) are proof they were on the side of the citizen; events have proved that they were on the side of history. An inside history could have revealed how they worked the miracle—in spite of superiors, company, industry and advertisers.

I place such emphasis on the book Friendly might have written because the one he did write, Due To Circumstances Beyond Our Control (Random House), is nothing like what his experience might suggest. In this guarded, no-name-or-blame backward glance at commercial television, Friendly spends half his space on scanty documentation—as deep as a press release—of his two major documentary series, See It Now and C.B.S. Reports.

A third is devoted to Friendly's short, happy life as president of C.B.S. News, two years that came to an end with his resignation last year over the C.B.S. decision not to carry George Kennan's testimony on Vietnam before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee hearings. Revenue-producing entertainment reruns were telecast instead.

The rest of the book is evangelism, part persuasive (the chapter, "Common Stock vs. the Commonweal," contrasting huge private profits with minuscule public service), and part rehash (last summer's Ford Foundation plan to use a domestic satellite as a means whereby the commercial networks would finance a noncommercial rival).

In Friendly's canon, the system is to be blamed, not the individuals who created and manage the system. Hence the title. His book is readable; it seems dictated. It is also shallow and full of appalling sycophancies and galling evasions.

"We could feel CBS's support for 'See It Now' fading ever so gradually." Eh? When and how was the decision made to combat McCarthyism? Why was Teddy White, as a China expert, "not deemed acceptable to the management"? Was that a news or business judgment? "I suppose I was subtly influenced to do controversial subjects in a noncontroversial manner." How?

Friendly says "no opprobrium is intended for anyone other than Senator McCarthy—certainly not for William Paley or Frank Stanton." But stiletto work is apparent. Stanton is described as more interested in form than content and given to wasting time on such trivialities as the marking of the men's rooms (M) in the new C.B.S. building.

Paley is quoted about See It Now: "I don't want this constant stomach ache every time you do a controversial subject." Even more shattering is his reported statement in a divisional-president meeting that unscheduled news coverage of events such as Sir Winston Churchill's funeral, the space program and civil rights affected "first-quarter programming costs [so as to reduce earnings] by six cents a share." A few gossip tidbits like that will cause near apoplexy in the C.B.S. hierarchy and may be titillation enough for best-sellerdom.

Friendly does mention two big stories he missed producing as documentaries—black listing and the quiz scandals. But he does not say whether he would have been permitted to indulge in such industry self-criticism. He reveals in passing that he accepted black listing when he was producer of the news quiz show, Who Said That?, and that on another occasion he stood by while an unnamed executive cleared a theme-music composer.

The book—cautious, evasive—is not typical of the blunt rampager. Friendly would have made a better documentary of the material. He is a doer, not a sayer; a catalyzer of ideas. His programs prove it. His "public dividend" plan for a noncommercial network and his flair for publicity promise to broaden the review of educational television, on this year's Congressional agenda, into a full-scale re-evaluation of all American television. A firm believer in "what the American people don't know can kill them" (his wife's words), he may yet get others to act in the domain of U.S. television. But by failing to practice in his book what he preaches in his crusades, he has seriously damaged his cause.

ART

MAX KOZLOFF

For all its apparent obviousness, the box or cube is a polyvalent form in modern sculpture. The very fact that one can refer to it, on the one hand, as a rectangular receptacle and, on the other, as a geometrical element, indicates some of the virtuosity of meaning that has made it as durable as the square in painting. The cube can be hollow, a mere format containing extremely variegated sculptural objects or artifacts; it can also be incorporated into a larger three-dimensional vocabulary in which, in part or whole, fully stated or suggested, it is a constituent. Naturally, these differing functions will have much to do with the way the spectator perceives scale, reading into the work either a microcosmic or a macrocosmic situation, depending upon the fairly direct alternatives that are offered him. Concomitantly, they will inflect space very characteristically, whether by establishing a module with perpendicular relationships of surface, or by opening up

100 Years of Fighting Stampedes *

THE NATION

has managed to survive, the Decatur (Illinois) Herald observed on the occasion of our centennial, "by fighting stampedes for over 100 years."

Heading off stampedes is peculiarly American; the country has the energy and space to set hoofs really thundering. We call to mind only a few of the most irrational flights: the jingoism that plunged us into wars with Mexico and Spain, the hypocritical hysteria of Prohibition, the "uproar" of McCarthyism, "Let's Get Hoffa!," "Send in the Marines!" (to Haiti, Nicaragua, the Dominican Republic, Cuba, etc.), "we must beat the Russians to the moon," the anti-missile missile, the SST. The list is long. Some of the stampedes of the last 102 years ran over us roughshod, some we slowed a bit, some we helped to stop. But there are few we failed to challenge. If you think Bonanza is where the action is, come out on the range with The Nation.

*("Stampede, any headlong flight of a large group; from the Mex.-Sp. estampida or 'uproar.'")

"The South's hope, Dennett reported, was that the former slaveholders would 'get the States back into their hands,' for they 'much preferred that the freedmen be kept in a condition as nearly as possible resembling their former slavery.'"

"Dennett's dispatches are examples of masterly journalism. Dennett died in 1874—before the slaveholders got back the states, overthrew the Reconstruction, and reduced the freedmen to a condition resembling slavery."

N. Y. Times 10/31/65

THE SOUTH AS IT IS

by John Richard Dennett

FREE With every new subscription

Fill out the subscription coupon below, and start receiving The Nation, this country's oldest weekly journal of opinion.

THE NATION 333 6th Avenue New York, N. Y. 10014

Herewith is my order and payment for a NEW subscription to The Nation. Please send me FREE a copy of THE SOUTH AS IT IS by John Richard Dennett.

☐ One Year, $10 ☐ Two Years, $18 ☐ 6 Months, $6

(Foreign and Canadian Postage, $1 per year extra)

NAME

ADDRESS

CITY STATE ZIP No.

4-10-67

a relatively small cavity, into which one peers and juxtaposes the frame as the stage can be juxtaposed with its props and actors. Louise Nevelson, now being presented in an illuminating retrospective at the Whitney, follows the latter course.

Well known since the mid-fifties, Nevelson's work has been, at times literally, a fixture of the artistic scene. Her frequently giant, black wooden walls of gridded boxes, that resemble break-fronts or highboys, have a habit of taking over entire segments of an environment, as if demanding equality with furniture on its own terms—or better still, supplanting it. Though Nevelson's pieces are shallow enough (generally being not more than a foot deep), they are nevertheless oddly commanding. This is due in part to their blackness which, because it puts you in doubt about the exact location of the planes, tends to obscure the internal sculptural boundaries of the work. Then, too, her sculpture is a seemingly endless aggregate of boxes, so that while the compositional unit is small, it proliferates in a spirit that is almost grandiose. Like a reredos, a Nevelson sculpture suffuses the space with a reverential monumentality. It is a ritualized theatre whose multiple episodes are distributed laterally across the whole possible span of the eye, diffusing the attention by its limitless variety, and yet as impressive as a monolith in its final proportions. It therefore transcends the lapidary and miniaturized reading, the sequential, compartmental ordering of forms (or more often, a literary gaming with forms) that assemblage imposes upon the spectator.

This is not to say that one can ignore Miss Nevelson's iconography. These perverse bookcases are densely crowded with objects that half resemble the "metaphysical" wands of di Chirico and Carra, mingled with the fluted balustrades and the filigree sprockets of American gingerbread homesteads. Bowling pins and table legs alternate with more abstract flanges, spandrels and crating. If the whole field is a species of screen, it is in turn broken up into innumerable smaller screens, like incomplete and curving stage flats.

It has already been noted that Nevelson derives in about equal measure from Cubism and Surrealism. The grid-like faceted format, with its flat planes and convex volumes, and its sense of shifting apertures, contrasts with insistently dislocated and fragmented found objects, that have almost the status of personages in their own right. Yet the effect of fetishistic encrustation (or rather display) is countered by the deliberate schematism of the material, and the formalized nonspecified distancing of the imagery. She is interested neither in nostalgic decay nor technological glamour. Her titles, on the contrary, indicate a concern for atmospheric states, ceremonial events, exotic places. Such is the gist of legends like "Young Shadows," "Black Moon," "Tropical Garden," etc. There is even to be found in this show a gilded, slatted "altarpiece" such as "An American Tribute to the British People," or a piece called "Homage to 6,000,000."

It must be admitted that these are somewhat arbitrary labels; there is nothing inevitable about their relationship to the objects they caption—although there is also no reason why there has to be. But in the installation of certain of her works, Nevelson has seen to it that only an extremely dim or bluish light bathes the wooden façade with a hushed lunar glow that presumes to evoke the unearthliness hinted at by her titles. She will sacrifice a considerable degree of physical articulation in order to intensify this mood, to enshrine her special odds and ends as unintentionally campy objects of veneration. No doubt a great deal of intelligence is needed to integrate Nevelson's sculptures effectively into their surroundings, and the Whitney probably does an adequate job, considering that it is not an apartment. But the special circumstances demanded by the lighting introduce an illustrational, rather than obey an expository function. They also betray a weakness in the overall vision.

I would say that this weakness is compounded of facility and a kind of willful humanism. They lead to an accent on style which ultimately does not convince, either as a crystallization of emotion, or as formal inventiveness. A tremendously energetic resourcefulness of execution does not quite cover up a conceptual stasis, with the result that the sculpture falls back on mannerism, a fault unfortunately common in American sculpture that matured in the 1950s. (Nevelson herself is slightly older than the Abstract Expressionists.) Hers, however, is a mannerism of format and motif, rather than of surface. She will not go so far into the realm of personal poetry as Cornell, though she more than works at it; she will also typically steer clear of the chaotic, the expressionist or the ironic, as in Rauschenberg's combine paintings. The more hieratic and Olympian offerings at the Whitney belong to an area far removed, but somewhere between these two alternatives. The difficulty is that Nevelson's impersonality is studied, but not rigorously abstract: the interplay of forms in her countless tableaux is reiterated more in the cause of "interest" than necessity. Possibly that is why it seems a chore to "work" with her compositions; while, on the other hand, it is too easy to appreciate their effect. This predicament is the more regrettable because the sculptor is not merely dedicated and ambitious but substantially talented.

It is to the credit of the Whitney to have allowed us to trace this talent in a development that had not previously been clear, at least to me. Louise Nevelson first seems to have emerged as a sculptor of potentiality in 1955, with some Picassoid-Surrealist pieces, silhouettes impaled with wooden pegs and spikes ("Indian Chief"), that still seem fresh. Of the next year, "Undermarine Scape," a glass box with bent wooden "weeds" interspersed with "bone" forms, is an extremely appealing creation. She hits her stride in the next three years, with the box façades, which are stronger whenever—although this is comparatively rare—they are simpler. From a historical point of view, however, in their extendability, and their literal piled-up additiveness of construction (without pedestal), they were characterful contributions to the tradition of assemblage. Examples of their kind painted in white or gold, on the contrary, look only too much like repainted compilations from the curio and antique shops of the New York East Side. From the works that approach 1964, I prefer the "bas-reliefs" to the totems, the evenly graded figurations to the looser, more broken up assemblies, where the attempt to bring off a tour de force is purchased only by a rather conventional grouping of forces. On the other hand, the open door or zigzag or curving aggregations ("Homage to the World") are fruitful changeovers, and often genuinely imposing. Lately, Nevelson has constructed a number of aluminum and black epoxy enameled staggered fronts composed of open-faced room dividers, that are more brittle and less associative than is her usual work. An interest in modules and riveted jointures comes undistractedly to the fore. Here she is dependent much more emphatically on her capacities as an organizer, and here she is attaining her most coherent, if also most restricted, results. Finally, a very recent clear plastic, "Model for Atmosphere and Environment, Ice Palace I," with its glittering rivets punctuating a three-dimensional chessboard, achieves a charming poetry, and terminates the exhibition on an optimistic note.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1196

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS:

- 1 Perhaps capital supplied by one who rents out the complete area between streets! (5, 6)
- 9 What one might see on the stage with glasses? (8)
- 10 An old religious man who shouldn't be trusted with cards? (6)
- 11 Better, perhaps, with the spirit to travel. (7)
- 12 Step around the place of refreshment—the boat is small! (7)
- 14 Not out in 23, by the sound of it. (6)
- 15 Henry VIII might have been one of the first in canaling, possibly. (8)
- 17 Secretly agree, but not for the point of the church! (8)
- 20 And don't agree with what might have to be collected. (6)
- 22 A phantom of it gleamed for Wordsworth. (7)
- 24 and 25 down A special guardian, perhaps, but customers aren't, commonly. (6, 5)
- 26 Such a music maker sounds like a crank. (6)
- 27 Time, as it might be, follows too closely? (8)
- 28 Polygon, by the sound of it, as a result? (6, 5)

DOWN:

- 2 Promises of reward for work? Might be hard to get! (9)

- 3 Sticker-splitter? (7)
- 4 Roll two ways. (4)
- 5 Giving a little extra in the direction of a 4? (7)
- 6 Drew on the stage an angle half-space. (5)
- 7 Add a scotchman on call. (6)
- 8 Crimea, as an older place of revolution. (6)
- 13 What people play in the current book market? (5)
- 16 What the girl in mink might have said after dining out to make the boy-friend angry? (9)
- 18 A poser for such as Carmen and Lucia.
- 19 If once this, one might later use it to help emphysema. (7)
- 20 Does one so get the idea to make a profit? (7)
- 21 We sometimes invite the intractable to come to their own. (6)
- 23 The object of a literary passage. (5)
- 25 See 24 across

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1195

ACROSS: 1 Daddy-long-legs; 9 Wooser; 10 Exanthema; 11 Affiant; 12 Incipit; 13 Three; 14 Sounds off; 16 Eventuate; 18 Witch; 19 English; 21 Laicize; 22 Ledbetter; 23 Lehar; 24 The Night Watch. DOWN: 1 Down at the heels; 2 Drop-forged; 3 Yardage; 4 Overt; 5 Gratitude; 6 Enticed; 7 Sweep; 8 Salt of the earth; 14 Spaghetti; 15 Out with it; 17 Trirreme; 18 Whitlow; 20 Godot; 21 Lurch.

Readers are invited to send for a free copy of Mr. Lewis' "ground rules." Address requests to Puzzle Dept., The Nation, 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N. Y. 10014.

PUBLICATIONS

WORLD DEMOCRACY. By Bin Dir Woor. Self-Designated Symbolical World President. Unique. Entrancing. $2. Greenwich Book Publishers, 282 7th Avenue, N. Y. C. Bin Dir Woor says that the lotus, the mirror, the crescent, the Star of David and the Cross are symbols of ineffabilities which shine through the word symbol, "World Democracy", with the power of ten thousand suns.

"SELECTED POEMS" of George Flynn (Villiers of London $2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound."—James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at 544-82 St., Brooklyn 9, N.Y.

THE IDLER. Lively, offbeat liberal monthly. Fun to read. Send $2 for trial year's subscription. IDLER, 413B 6th Street, N.E., Washington, D.C. 20002.

SECULAR PASSOVER HAGGADAH FOR PEACE AND HUMAN RIGHTS. beautiful illustrations enrich story of the Exodus and the Seder Ceremony. A rewarding item for each member of the family. $1.00. Editor, Lewis M. Moroze, 364 South 12th Street, Newark, New Jersey 07103.

NEW LITERARY BI-MONTHLY. Fiction and poetry needed. Subscriptions: $3.95 per year. THE INNER WELL, Box 274, Marion, Indiana.

TRAVEL

The OTHER Israel—a three-week summer program for young people 21 to 35—a dialogue with young Israeli socialists—meet farmers, workers, Arabs, labor leaders, peace groups, parliament members—live and work in a kibbutz—tour the country, $625.00. For details write: Young Americans for Progressive Israel, 150 Fifth Avenue, Room 700, New York, N. Y. 10011.

APARTMENTS—UNFURNISHED

Live in a Mies van der Rohe Apartment . . . adjacent to Branch Brook Park . . . 25 minutes from Manhattan. Community activities: Little Theatre, newspaper, classes, clubs. Rentals from $99. Request brochure "N." COLONNADE, 381 Broad, Newark, N. J.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALGONQUIN 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

ART

ORIGINALS COST LESS THAN REPRODUCTIONS! Contemporary original signed etchings, lithographs, woodcuts, $3.50. Guarantee. Free brochure. GRAPHIC CIRCLE (NA), 68 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10011.

KHAJURAH'S EROTIC SCULPTURES: Thousand Year Old Temple Friezes of Hindu Arts, Carnal Love, Masterpieces, Chandra Architecture. Twelve Color Slides $10. TEMPLE VIEWS, Box 25101, Cincinnati, Ohio 45225.

ORIGINAL LITHOGRAPHS, ETCHINGS: Chagall, Miro, Braque. Moderately priced. Send $50 for color-illustrated catalogue. Kirschner, 90-59 56th Avenue, Elmhurst, New York 11373.

PERSONALS

NON-PROFIT CAMP (interracial, interreligious) desperately needs donation of pianos. Tax deductible. Will pick up. Box 600, c/o The Nation.

IMPOSE legal $30,000,000 Public Fine on U.S. Business to Protest Vietnam War. Write: DOVE, Box 1049, Jamaica, N.Y. 11431.

USE LAWFUL DIRECT ACTION to repeal all abortion laws LEGALIZE ABORTION, POB 24183, Los Angeles, Calif. 90024.

WHY WEEKLY PAY FOR WAR? Legally demand income tax refund. Write: TAXPAYERS AGAINST WAR, Box 15394, San Francisco, California 94115.

Now — the sensational Off-Broadway hit — complete with the original Village Gate cast, on 2 long-playing records

BARBARA GARSON'S MAC BIRD!

"One of the brutally provocative works of the American theater, as well as one of the most grimly amusing."

—ROBERT BRUSTEIN
N. Y. Times Magazine

"The funniest, toughest-minded, and most ingenious political satire in years."

—DWIGHT MACDONALD,
N. Y. Review of Books

"Clever, cruel, funny, grotesque, flip-pant, gross, mean-spirited, timely and tumultuous . . . probably the best political satire around." —NORMAN NADEL, N. Y. World Journal Tribune

"The most reviewed, reviled and revered play of the season." —Newsweek

"There has been nothing like it in its field since the time of Jonathan Swift. Writers have been put to death for less."

—JOE MCGINNISS,
Philadelphia Inquirer

2 long-playing records, $9.50. Now at your bookstore or record store — or use this coupon to order direct from EVERGREEN RECORDS, 315 Hudson Street, New York, N. Y. 10013. Please enclose payment.

EVERGREEN RECORDS, Dept. N-4107
315 Hudson Street, N. Y., N. Y. 10013

Please send me copy(ies) of the original-cast recording of MAC BIRD. I enclose $9.50 for each 2-record set ■ payment in full. (No C.O.D.)

Name

Address

City State Zip
(N. Y. residents please add sales tax.)

AUTO INSURANCE KEETON & O'CONNELL

THE NATION

APRIL 17, 1967 35 cents

BURLINGAME
APR 18 1967
LIBRARY

Resentful Partner CANADA
FIGHTS ITS ORBIT

C. W. GUNICK

Benevolent Coercion NEW YORK'S
DOPE NOSTRUM

ANTHONY PRISENDORF

Rebels from Affluence
The Provos of Holland

PIET THOENES

MANCHESTER'S MALAPROPAGANDA ELMER BENDNER

Letter from Two Germanys E. R. von FREIBURG

722-67 PLS-801
BURLINGAME PUB LIBRARY
CALIFORNIA 94010

NEWSPAPER

LETTERS

little beauty

New York City

DEAR SIRs: Unlike Robert Sherrill ["Marriage in Haste," The Nation, Mar. 20], I cannot persuade myself that the high probability of unattractive offspring from the A.B.C.-ITT union should be blamed exclusively upon one of the matrimonial partners. It is not a wedding of Beauty and the Beast as much as the marriage of childhood sweethearts who have much in common, have been brought up in the same climate and neighborhood, and who have always thought alike about most of the "important" issues and problems they are likely to face in the state of matrimony. . . . Why should a conflict arise about permitting "A.B.C. newscasters to say even an oblique kind word for Castro"? When has A.B.C. management "permitted A.B.C. newscasters such a thing"? . . .

A newscaster who has the urge to commit such indiscretions—no matter how oblique—is not likely to find himself in the vicinity of live microphones. Men who have urges to be indiscreet are simply not the A.B.C. type or the ITT type—not for any job where they can hurt the public "image," anyway. . . .

Little Beauty—like her competitors—has been very competent in keeping any "conflict of interest" off the air. When she leaves her virginal bed, she'll carry on as she always has. And we won't even notice the difference.

Alice Mary Hilton

The Federal Communications Commission has voted to review its earlier decision approving the A.B.C.-ITT merger. As to A.B.C. and Castro, Miss Hilton has no doubt forgotten that it was this network that carried the late Lisa Howard's remarkable one-hour interview with Castro on May 10, 1963.

The Editors

letter from South Vietnam

The following letter is a response from leading students and professors at the universities of South Vietnam to the 100 American student leaders who in January, 1967, addressed a letter of concern about the war in that country to President Johnson. It is released by the Fellowship of Reconciliation.

Saigon

Dear Fellow Students: We are students and professors from all the universities of South Vietnam (Saigon, Hue, Dalat, Can Tho and Van Hahn), who write to thank you for your action in trying to stop this terrible war in our country. We cannot act officially, as you did, because the universities here are not permitted by the government to express themselves freely. We have made petitions and appeals, but we cannot let our names be made public, because we would be arrested and imprisoned. . . .

Nevertheless, we write to thank you for your actions and to plead with you to continue. We ask you to consider these facts:

In South Vietnamese cities the American power has become so great in support of the Ky government that no one can speak against the war without risking his life or his liberty.

If it were not so, millions would speak out. The people of South Vietnam . . . are not Communists, but if the war does not soon end, they will join the National Liberation Front because they see no other way out.

Americans should not believe that they are protecting the South Vietnamese against communism. Most of us believe that the United States wants to control our country only in order to prepare for war with China.

The present government of South Vietnam is not our

(Continued on page 500)

EDITORIALS

Why Unthinkable?

Sen. Clifford P. Case of New Jersey is one of our more thoughtful legislators and a leader among moderate Republicans, but his stand on the politics of Vietnam is disappointing. It is "unthinkable," he argues, for any candidate to "make political capital" out of the Vietnamese War in the 1968 campaign. "I've been boiling at the idea that Vietnam would be considered by either party as a political issue," Mr. Case said in a TV interview on April 1. He said he was distressed by reports that advisers of Gov. George Romney were divided over whether he should be a hawk or a dove in his pursuit of the Presidency. There is ample reason to be distressed, but only over the fact that Mr. Romney and his supporters seem to feel that it is purely a question of which stand will collect the more votes. The argument that the issue should be buried is in conflict with the whole theory and practice of political democracy. If it prevails, it will make the 1968 campaign meaningless.

In 1964, the incumbent President made it quite clear that he had no intention of escalating the war. He as much as promised to pursue a policy of caution, in contrast to the harsh and reckless line which his opponent appeared to endorse. Once he was assured of four more years in office, Mr. Johnson in effect changed places with Mr. Goldwater. Are we now to understand that the Johnson Administration is not to be held accountable for what has happened, for the original deception and the series of deceptions that followed? How are the people in a democracy ever to play a major part in government if their hands are to be tied by the inhibitions that Senator Case advocates?

Mr. Case seems to have forgotten the stand of the Presidential nominee of his own party in 1952. Korea was labeled a police action, as Vietnam is labeled now. As that undeclared war dragged on, it became increasingly unpopular, although never so unpopular as the Vietnamese War has been from the outset. Prompted by a speech writer, General Eisenhower promised to go to Korea if he was elected. Was this making political capital, or wasn't it? Are we to understand that Senator Case, in retrospect, regrets that General Eisenhower carried out his inferential promise to end the Korean War?

Mr. Johnson has managed to pre-empt the center position on Vietnam, while actually pursuing a policy much closer to that of the hawks than that of moderates like Gruening, Morse and Hatfield, who are doves only in caricature. (There is not a single person in any position of power to whom the "dove" label can be legitimately affixed.) Is Senator Case willing to absolve Mr. Johnson of making political capital of the war in Vietnam? If so, politics has lost all meaning.

Even by those who regard the Vietnamese War as justified, there may—there should—be controversy about the manner in which it has been carried on. What about the lack of candor which is one of the President's unvaried techniques? What about the failure to seek the advice of the Senate? What about a dozen issues, such as the cat-and-mouse game Mr. Johnson has played with Hanoi, always pretending to be prepared to talk unconditionally, always laying down conditions and boosting the war another notch when Hanoi refused to comply? There are many issues short of unconditional withdrawal of American forces which would nevertheless justify a critical attitude toward the Johnson Administration's conduct of the war.

Nor is it possible to evaluate the actions to which Mr. Johnson has committed the United States in Southeast Asia without moving into broader areas of foreign policy. What American military power is doing in Vietnam, the horrors it has inflicted on the Vietnamese people, North and South, are not regarded in other parts of the world with the equanimity which Senator Case seems to consider appropriate. What about another phase of the war—the threat to China, and the danger that that unpredictable power will take an active part?

Mr. Johnson has pursued a desperate gamble. He set out to crush Communist power in Southeast Asia. His premise was that he could do so without bringing China into the war, and that he could emerge as a victorious war President before the 1968 campaign. As far as Mr. Case is concerned, Mr. Johnson is to be left free to sacrifice American and Vietnamese lives for his own ends, with no major opposition at home. A reactionary or opportunist Republican might well connive at such a policy, on the ground that it is never safe to oppose the Chief Executive during a war, declared or undeclared, justified or unjustified, honorable or dishonorable. But that stand ill becomes a Republican of Mr. Case's reputation for liberalism and good sense—and there is a good chance that it will prove to be poor politics as well.

Plain Talk

"I believe that if we had kept and would keep our dirty, bloody, dollar-crooked fingers out of the business of these nations so full of depressed, exploited people, they will arrive at a solution of their own, that they design and want. That they fight and work for. And if unfortunately their revolution must be of the violent type because the 'haves' refuse to share with the 'have-nots' by any peaceful method, at least what they get will be their own and not the American style which they don't want and above all don't want crammed down their throats by Americans."

Who said it? A Communist? Hardly—there is no deduction from theory and the appeal is to nationalism rather than ideology. Could it be a university scholar? Not even the bluntest eggheads lay it on the line like

IN THIS ISSUE

April 17, 1967

EDITORIALS

482

ARTICLES

- 486 Benevolent Coercion:
New York's Dope Nostrum
Anthony Prisendorf
- 489 Resentful Partner:
Canada Fights Its Orbit
C. W. Gonick
- 494 Rebels from Affluence:
The Provos of Holland
Piet Thoenes
- 498 Auto Insurance: Crack-Up Ahead
Robert E. Keeton and Jeffrey O'Connell

BOOKS & THE ARTS

- 501 History and Malapropaganda
Elmer Bendiner
- 502 Half & Half Equals Two
E. R. von Freiburg
- 503 The Love Singer (poem)
Sandra Hochman
- 506 All the World's a Toy
Chester Johnson
- 507 Book Marks
Henry M. Christman
- 509 Theatre
Julius Novick
- 510 The Islander (poem)
Louise Gluck
- 511 Crossword Puzzle
Frank W. Lewis

Publisher JAMES J. STORROW JR.	Associate Publisher GIFFORD PHILLIPS
Editor CAREY McWILLIAMS	Associate Editor PHIL KERBY
Executive Editor ROBERT HATCH	Literary Editor HELEN YGLESIAS
Copy Editor MARION HESS	Poetry Editor MICHAEL GOLDMAN
Theatre HAROLD CLURMAN	Washington ROBERT G. SHERRILL
Art MAX KOZLOFF	Paris ALEXANDER WERTH
Music BENJAMIN BORETZ	London RAYMOND WILLIAMS
Science CARL DREHER	Bonn C. AMERY
Advertising Manager MARY SIMON	Canberra C. P. FITZGERALD

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July and August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1967 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel.: CH 2-8400. West Coast office: 1434 Westwood Boulevard, Los Angeles, Calif. 90024. Tel.: GR 4-3547. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give four weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE NATION
Combined with FRONTIER

Volume 204
No. 16

that. An isolationist? If so, a peculiar kind: most isolationists want America to stay at home because we are superior and already have what we want, so why dissipate it abroad? There is in this speech an incongruous note of compassion and humility. How come?

Actually, the author is one of those sui generis types. He is Gen. David M. Shoup, former commandant of the Marine Corps, and winner of the Medal of Honor at Tarawa in World War II. He said it last May, in a speech at Pierce College in Los Angeles, and it was belatedly inserted in the Congressional Record by Sen. Vance Hartke (D., Ind.). Shoup said much more, such as that the whole of Southeast Asia, as related to the present and future safety and freedom of the people of the United States, is not worth the life or limb of a single American. Strange talk, and no doubt displeasing to the hawks in Congress and the Johnson Administration, but it is difficult to cast doubt on the patriotism of a military man, and doubly so when he has Shoup's record of gallantry and leadership.

Although he is certainly offbeat, Shoup is by no means the only independent-minded military man; for some reason there seem to be more of them among the Marines than in the other services. One recalls Gen. Smedley Butler, likewise a retired commandant of the Corps, who in the 1930s inveighed furiously against war and fascism and spoke at meetings arranged by people who, a couple of decades later, were hauled up before the House Committee on Un-American Activities. And then there was the gung-ho hero of World War II, Colonel and finally Brig. Gen. Evans F. Carlson, a Marine who might have put something of a crimp in the preparations for the cold war, if he had lived.

Of course most Marines are as hidebound as their fellows in the other services, but every now and then someone high in the Corps lets loose. With few exceptions, the press has ignored Shoup's speech; it is regarded as too hot to handle. It seems to be the product of an organization which has to be tougher when it fights than anybody else, and tougher also when it talks. Shoup should keep on talking.

The 'Credibility Gap'

Besides denouncing the Vietnamese crusade, General Shoup had something to say about the "credibility gap." The feeling back home in Indiana, he said, was: "Why don't they just once try telling the truth first?" The real nature of the "gap" could not be better described. The phrase, as Walter Lippmann has pointed out in two first-class columns, is a polite euphemism for deception. It is a term of a kind that has never been needed in American government before, and its emergence is disquieting.

Lippmann recognizes a certain normal degree of tension between the President—any President—and the reporters. The reporters want to know more than the President finds it expedient to tell them; consequently there is always a degree of sparring. Normally, however, the reporters feel that the President wants to be as candid as his responsibilities will permit and that, though he may not tell them what they want to know, neither will he mislead them.

The relation between President Johnson and the White House press corps is significantly different. The reporters distrust, Lippmann says, "is the result of a deliberate policy of artificial manipulation of official news." What Mr. Johnson wants is to obtain "consensus," or support of his policies by managing the news in his own political interest. He will give lip service to the idea of an independent press, but in everything he says and does he undermines one of the cornerstones of American society.

Will it work? To a certain extent, and for a time, it will. Those Americans who take a light view of their responsibilities as citizens of a democracy will go along with Mr. Johnson's maneuvers. It is much more comfortable to believe that the United States is engaged in a righteous war on behalf of the victims of aggression than to face the reality of aggression on our own part. When Mr. Johnson protests that he wants peace, and will go anywhere to negotiate, this section of the electorate will take him at his word, ignoring the fact that his actions constantly belie his words. But the more thoughtful citizens—and those who cannot reconcile themselves to the brutal application of national power, as by the Fascists in and before World War II and by the United States today—see through the Johnson rhetoric and are alienated. It is this bifurcation that accounts for the division in the academic community and the aversion that a majority of the more intelligent and sensitive people of the United States feel for Mr. Johnson's leadership. In the long run, inability to accept what the government says at face value must spread. Whatever Mr. Johnson gains at the moment will cost him dearly in the long run—and unfortunately not him alone. It may, as John Kenneth Galbraith has pointed out, lead to the ruin of the Democratic Party.

The Big Spenders

The United States and the Soviet Union have no significant competition, either as arms suppliers or in keeping their own military strength at Gargantuan levels. Both countries are bursting with weapons. If they were half as generous with help for countries in need they would rank as the benefactors of mankind; as it is, they are a threat to its very existence.

Henry J. Kuss, Jr., the Pentagon's star salesman, estimates that his office accounted for $1.7 billion in armament sales during fiscal 1966; he predicts joyously that the armories of the "free world" will be doing a $10 billion export business after 1970. Less joyously, Prof. Emile Benoit of Columbia University has completed another of his studies of world "defense" spending, this one in collaboration with Harold Lubell of the Agency for International Development. The results are contained in Disarmament and World Economic Interdependence, edited by Professor Benoit and just published by Columbia University Press.

Even prior to the Vietnamese build-up, total world expenditure for military hardware and personnel was running at $133 billion a year. This was the figure for 1964-65; it is probably in the neighborhood of $145 billion today. At the time of the survey, U.S. military spending was at the rate of $51 billion a year, while the Soviet program was budgeted at $42 billion. Thus, between them, the two leaders accounted for 70 per cent of the world arms spending—for their domestic requirements alone.

The rest of the field was strung out far in the rear. By the West, Red China is pictured as a ferocious giant poised to spring on its neighbors, but Professor Benoit credits the Chinese with a military budget of less than $5 billion, about the same as that of the United Kingdom. Despite its force de frappe, France spends only $3 billion a year. There is no getting away from the Benoit-Lubell conclusion that the military wealth of the United States and the USSR "probably gives an ineradicably bipolar structure to the arms race, despite the loosening of alliances and military blocs."

Not all the billions swallowed up by the arms race are pure waste. Something under $40 billion goes for pay and support of personnel. They would have to be fed, clothed and housed in any case, although they might be doing something useful in return for their wages. And, except from an unrealistic viewpoint, allowance must be made for forces required for internal security and the estimated cost of a world peace-keeping force. All such deductions, however, still leave a net burden of more than $70 billion, which is estimated to be nine times as large as the total capital flow, public and private, in the form of grants, loans and other transfers, from the developed to the less developed countries.

For their part, the latter manage to divert $1 billion a year from their meager resources to weapons spending. For example, The Economist (March 25) reports that Somalia, with a population of 2 to 3 million, supports an army of at least 25,000 men and is said to have recently received from the Soviet Union 150 MIG fighter-bombers, 20 helicopters, and enough T-34 tanks to make up an armored brigade. Somalia's uneasy neighbor, Ethiopia, has received more U.S. military aid than all the other countries of Africa put together. On the other side of the Red Sea, the troubled lands of the Arabian peninsula (Aden is a particularly hot spot at the moment) are likewise beneficiaries of Soviet military assistance in one camp, Anglo-American in the other. Thus the two leaders in the bipolar structure may find themselves at each other's throats should a pair of unmanageable satellites decide to fight it out in some remote corner of the world. And the more the superpowers spend, on themselves and on their vassals, the greater the peril to all alike.

News from the North

In all the cities south of the Great Lakes, it is a newspaper axiom that Canada is not news. Except for the exploits of its hockey teams, and seasonal feature stories in the travel sections, the fortunes of the nation with which we share our longest boundary go unrecorded, and Canada remains for most of us the land of the Mounties and the Dionne Quintuplets.

That this is a one-sided indifference is demonstrated by C. W. Gonick in this issue (p. 489); the Canadians care quite intensely about what the United States is up to, and increasingly they are determined that it shall not be at their expense. Prof. Edward J. Miles, director of Canadian Studies at the University of Vermont, put it neatly in a comment quoted by Time: "Most Canadians have considerable if malevolent knowledge of the United States. Most Americans have a benevolent ignorance of Canada."

This year, the southward flow of news (and the northward flow of tourists) will be considerably increased by Expo 67 at Montreal. But world's fairs are essentially non-events, and though Canada's jamboree looks to be more substantial and rewarding than most it is unlikely to produce a permanent increase of traffic in ideas across the border.

A more optimistic sign is Harvard's recently announced chair of Canadian studies, founded with an endowment by Canadian and American businessmen. It is the first such chair in the United States, where as of now only thirty-seven of the more than 2,000 colleges and universities offer courses in Canadian history. The evolution of Canada into a modern democracy parallels, but intriguingly differs from, the experience of the United States. Its continued association with the British crown for one thing, and its bilingual culture for another, have produced unique characteristics. Only the most complacent insularity can see it as a suburb of its southern neighbor.

And now that we are to have a chair of Canadian studies (there should be many imitators of Harvard's example), we should apply ourselves to finding an adjectival form of "United States" and desist from usurping the name "American," to the dismay of our Canadian and Mexican neighbors.

Beard Phobia

It is being rumored in the country's bohemia that Expo 67 will not welcome visiting youths who wear beards and anti-Establishment buttons, and the opening move to keep the midway noncontroversial for mom, dad and the kids may have been the harassment last month in Calgary of the San Francisco Mime Troupe. Hippies, it may be presumed, will get the message that Canada is no Casbah.

The disaffiliated group from California had been engaged to perform their now celebrated Minstrel Show, or: Civil Rights in a Cracker Barrel at the University of Calgary. However, before the show could go on, the stage of the Student Union was pulled from under the actors, and three of them were arrested on the charge of possessing marijuana. An envelope containing twigs of something was allegedly found in the suitcase of one of them; for the other two, evidence was obtained by analyzing the dust found in the seams of their jacket pockets.

No one suggests that anyone was smoking pot, and the question that immediately arises is whether there was a connection between the contents of the actors' belongings and the content of their production. Would a company touring in, say, Our Town have stimulated the Canadian police to a similarly zealous examination of luggage and wearing apparel?

As so often happens when democracies play at Gestapo, this incident had its funny side: the police swooped down on the student union, where a protest meeting had been in progress, and seized six members of the faculty who, being bearded, were thought to be mimers. The professors were quickly released, but the display of authoritarianism in Calgary was distasteful and will not be dismissed so easily. Canadians are forever bewailing the infiltration of Yankee culture; they might begin resisting it by refusing to succumb to our terror of youths who are unshaven and ideas that are not endorsed by the American Legion. Bigotry is a much more dangerous import than Coca-Cola.

BENEVOLENT COERCION

NEW YORK'S DOPE NOSTRUM

ANTHONY PRISENDORF

Mr. Prisendorf is a reporter on the New York Post.

Since 1952, when New York City finally realized that the police alone could no longer cope with the social problem of drug addiction, incalculable sums of money and manpower have been spent on the losing battle. What was seen in the mid-1940s as exclusively a law-enforcement problem is today the elusive quarry for no fewer than thirty-four well-meaning public, private and voluntary agencies, all striving—often competitively—to rehabilitate the city's 35,000 known addicts. The results are disheartening. One city hospital's recent follow-up study of "cured" addicts is characteristic: of 147 patients who could be located two years after their release from voluntary treatment, 91 per cent had returned to their daily habits; only 24 per cent had managed to stay "clean" for the first six months. The follow-up studies at the U.S. Public Health Service Hospital at Lexington, Ky., are still more depressing: 83 per cent of those released are back on drugs within six months.

That drug addiction has grown in New York to menacing proportions is scarcely news, but even so, the responsibility of addicts for contemporary crime rates is frequently exaggerated. In a special message to the state legislature on February 23, 1966, Governor Rockefeller asserted:

Bugging the Press

A newspaper advertisement for The Saturday Evening Post promoted the top article in a recent issue with a startling black line, "I Spy on Jackie Kennedy." The advertisement explained that "a badgering press and curious public have made harassing Jackie Kennedy a year-round international sport." To the unsuspecting reader this approach had a sympathetic, almost protective, sound. However, the Post has joined the Jackie Kennedy-watching sport with its own wolf-pack vengeance.

In a full-page, carefully numbered map, the editors divulge "Jackie Kennedy's Manhattan." An accompanying chart clearly locates with specific addresses Mrs. Kennedy's apartment, office, hairdresser, gym, bridle path; it pinpoints where she eats when she goes out, where she shops, where her relatives live, and where she worships. A thorough job, the map even spots Caroline's school, John's school, John's barber, the children's playground and their Good Humor man.

CONSTANTINE POULOS

"The problem of addiction to narcotics is at the heart of the crime problem in New York State. Narcotics addicts are responsible for one-half of the crimes committed in New York City alone." A year before that, the New York County Medical Society reported that "drug users account for up to 22.4 per cent of various crime categories involving property," and that "drug users were implicated in only 1.2 per cent of crimes against persons." According to the city's police department, addicts in 1966 committed 12.7 per cent of the felonies against property, and 2 per cent of those against persons.

The discrepancies in the crime statistics may have escaped the state legislators, but the impact of the Governor's special message did not. Thoroughly convinced that the only solution lay in an all-out "war on crime and narcotics addiction," the bipartisan legislature overwhelmingly passed last spring a massive $233 million narcotics rehabilitation program. The cardinal provision of this "campaign for human renewal," which went into effect on April 1, mandates the involuntary commitment of addicts in state institutions for periods up to five years.

Technically, Governor Rockefeller's program is a revision of the state's Metcalf-Volker Law, a pioneering measure enacted in 1962 (also an election year for the Governor). Under that law, addicts charged with minor crimes could choose medical treatment in state hospitals instead of facing trial and prison. If the addict successfully completed the rehabilitation program, the criminal charges, held in abeyance, were dropped. The efficacy of this ambitious program was limited at best. Less than one-third of those eligible for civil commitment sought it in 1963. By the following year, the percentage had dropped to one out of four. Of the 615 addicts committed during the first two years, 13 per cent escaped. Almost three-quarters of the first 500 addicts released after treatment disappeared from the after-care programs to which they had been assigned. And, as of October, 1964, only 28 per cent of the addicts accepted for treatment completed hospitalization and after care in a manner to justify dismissing the criminal charges. On May 10, 1966, Governor Rockefeller admitted to a U.S. Senate subcommittee on criminal law and procedures: "Experience under the state's Metcalf-Volker Act of 1962 has shown that the choice offered addicts accused of a crime under this humanitarian legislation has allowed too many of them to choose a short stay in prison and an early return to narcotics when their real need is for treatment."

What the Governor could not have been expected to report was that the state program was ill equipped to offer a legitimate option to the 14,000 addicts arrested every year. During the four years that the Metcalf-Volker Act was enforced, the Rockefeller administration was providing a total of 705 beds for treatment in eight hospitals. Moreover, a bill appropriating the necessary funds to implement the law was allowed to die in legislative committee. Two years ago, Dr. Donald B. Louria, later appointed chairman of the Governor's Council on Drug Addiction, gave his reasons why the Metcalf-Volker program languished: "Follow-up clinic facilities are inadequate, in-patient psychotherapy is at best superficial, and the percentage of patients lost either by escape or lost from follow-up is inordinately high."

The solution to the problem of drug addiction, as Governor Rockefeller sees it, "is to eliminate this major cause of crime by preventing [his italics] those who have not resorted to crime from doing so, and those engaged in crime from repeating their acts. . . ." Accordingly, his new program concentrates on the following two categories:

(1) The convicted addict. Any defendant arrested for possession of drugs or the paraphernalia for administering them must submit involuntarily to a medical examination. If determined an addict, the defendant, at the time of his conviction in court, will be remanded to the state's new five-member Narcotics Addiction Control Commission to begin a compulsory three-year program. After October 1 of this year, an addict convicted of any misdemeanor or prostitution (the police say that 80 per cent of the city's prostitutes are addicts) must undergo a three-year treatment program. At the judge's discretion, convicted addict-felons may be imprisoned under the state's Penal Law, or committed to five years of rehabilitation.

(2) The noncriminal addict. Under the Metcalf-Volker Law, only next of kin could apply to the courts for the involuntary commitment of a noncriminal addict. Further, the old law authorized the state's Department of Mental Hygiene, which administered the program, to assign a noncriminal addict to a maximum treatment period of ninety days. The Rockefeller program authorizes "anyone," including policemen, to petition the courts for a warrant to take a "suspected" addict into custody for a medical examination. If the suspect is found to be an addict, he will be "sentenced" to a three-year rehabilitation period.

The Rockefeller plan has confused rehabilitation with retribution. In the case of a convicted addict, the gravity of the crime, not his condition, determines the length of forced confinement. Moreover, implicit in the new narcotics law is the groundless assumption that a felon's habit will take almost twice as long to cure as that of an addict convicted of a misdemeanor. Even so, at first glance, the quasi-criminal approach inherent in the state's compulsory commitment program seems attractive. It may reassure edgy New Yorkers that 50 per cent of the city's "criminal element" is being swept from the streets and parks. However, in its fervor to eradicate drug addiction and the attendant ills, the state comes dangerously close to trampling on the constitutional rights of "suspected" noncriminal addicts. In the name of order and tranquillity, critics maintain, the legislature has denied liberty and, more important, "due process of law" to a substantial segment of the state's population. Probably the most articulate presentation of this argument was made on March 8, 1966, by Henry M. diSuviero, former staff counsel to the New York Civil Liberties Union, and now executive director of its New Jersey chapter. Testifying before the state Assembly's committee on health, which was holding preliminary hearings on the Rockefeller program, diSuviero said: "The basic proposition underlying the Governor's proposal is that addicts are dangerous to others. Because they are dangerous, they must be removed from society, and certified to places where they can inflict no harm. The fallacy in this is that absent from any other evidence, addiction, standing alone, is no proof of dangerousness. To deny a person liberty, to confine him for a period up to three years, when he may not constitute any threat at all to society, should shock the conscience of anyone dedicated to freedom."

The arguments advanced by diSuviero parallel a landmark decision by the U.S. Supreme Court in 1962. In Robinson v. California, the court struck down as unconstitutional a statute of the California Health and Safety Code, making it a criminal offense to "be addicted to the use of narcotics." However, in that same case, the court went on to say in less lucid terms that ". . . in the interest of the general health or welfare of its inhabitants, a state might establish a program of compulsory treatment for those addicted to narcotics. Such a program of treatment might require periods of involuntary confinement. And penal sanctions might be imposed for failure to comply with established compulsory treatment procedures."

While advocates of a compulsory commitment program feel certain that the court's authorization is implicit in the above passage, others, particularly constitutional lawyers, are less positive. As one points out: "In Robinson, the commitment issue, with all of its manifold ramifications, was not before the court." Then, too, there is an analogy between Governor Rockefeller's forced confinement of noncriminal addicts and the federal government's internment of the Nisei (citizens of Japanese-American background) during World War II. The Supreme Court ruled in 1944 that "compulsory exclusion of large groups of citizens from their homes, except under circumstances of direst emergency and peril, is inconsistent with our basic institutions." Whether Governor Rockefeller's "war on crime and narcotics addiction" fulfills those demanding criteria is a question for constitutional scrutiny.

Yet no one genuinely concerned about drug addiction in New York denies for a moment that the more fundamental question to be resolved is whether involuntary commitment works. Any preliminary appraisal of Governor Rockefeller's approach must also recognize that a considerable body of medical opinion on addiction questions the wisdom of forced confinement. Typical of this professional disenchantment are the observations made two years ago by Dr. Marie Nyswander, a former staff member at Lexington. For the past seven years, Dr. Nyswander, a psychiatrist and psychoanalyst, has been working with addicts in East Harlem, and has helped popularize the use of methadone, a long-lasting synthetic substitute for heroin. "I hope that we don't have to go through another thirty years of failure to find out that civil commitment is not the answer," she was quoted as saying in The New Yorker. "More and more people are coming to admit that imprisonment, with or without medical treatment, doesn't work. But civil commitment with medical treatment is still, in most cases, compulsion. Often, the first thing an addict will do when he gets out of jail is to take a shot so he can feel like a human being again instead of an outcast who has been quarantined. I'm afraid that if an addict is forced into a hospital before he's ready to get off drugs, the same thing will happen."

To be sure, Dr. Nyswander does not speak for all of her colleagues. At present, a more prevalent attitude among professionals—and politicians—is that addicts cannot be rehabilitated unless they are first isolated from their environment. To dramatize the positive correlation between environment and addiction, Sen. Robert F. Kennedy says that 75 per cent of the nation's addicts come from the lowest 20 per cent income group. Moreover, say the professionals, many addicts are not "sufficiently motivated" to commit themselves to the long-term programs necessary for rehabilitation. Consequently, like the victims of any contagious disease, they must be quarantined.

Debate over forms of treatment often breaks down into intermural backbiting. The most perplexing problem besetting addiction rehabilitation programs, at least in New York, is not a lack of funds or manpower but rather a degree of professional rivalry that has obscured the objectives. Each organization—private, public or voluntary—is unalterably convinced that it alone is pursuing the true path. Halfway houses, such as Daytop Lodge and the Synanon Foundation, maintain that only the addict, with close supervision and guidance, can rehabilitate himself, and that no amount of coercion or confinement will instill the proper motivation. Others, notably Governor Rockefeller's partisans, contend that while this approach may work successfully with relatively small numbers of addicts, the contemplated wholesale rehabilitation of 35,000 addicts demands a more drastic and, consequently, a less personal philosophy. Still others, such as the Health Research Council of New York City, subscribe to the Supreme Court's 1962 declaration that "a drug addict is a sick person, physically and psychologically. . . ." If diabetics must have insulin, this group reasons, why shouldn't addicts, who are equally dependent on medical sustenance, receive maintenance dosages of synthetic drugs like methadone. Apart from the physiological benefits, the council says, the city-wide, regulated distribution of a synthetic drug would all but eliminate the number of crimes addicts must commit to support their costly habits. Law-enforcement officials pretty much agree that a heroin addict in New York City has to sell about $36,500 worth of stolen merchandise a year to the fences in order to pay for his drugs.

Unlike the others, the council and the research groups it represents do not feel constrained to defend their program at every turn; the statistics do that quite well. Since 1963, the council, a city-subsidized but independent agency, has accepted 383 addicts into its methadone program. Thirty have been expelled or have dropped out. Of the remaining 350, all receiving methadone regularly, 78 per cent are working steadily or are in school. By contrast, California's seven-year compulsory commitment program, bolstered by intensive after care, reports that an average of 69 per cent of those released resume their drug habits within a year.

Despite the accomplishments demonstrated by the council and similar groups, New York State, like all others, has refused to acknowledge that methadone projects have advanced beyond the research stage. Undoubtedly this provincial thinking has been influenced by the U.S. Treasury Department's Bureau of Narcotics, which firmly believes that drug addiction is part of a sinister Communist China plot to take over the United States.

In a 1964 booklet discussing the prevention and control of addiction, the bureau points out that before Japan invaded China in the 1930s, "it flooded the intended victims with free or low-cost narcotic drugs with the intention of reducing the willingness or capacity for resistance. Today Red China is guilty of similar strategy by pouring narcotics into countries the Red Chinese hope to weaken." Even more absurd is the bureau's puritanical notion that addiction is anti-social, criminal behavior that must not be raised to the dignity of a disease. Consequently, the bureau has relentlessly harassed doctors who prescribe drugs for addicted patients, a campaign of terrorism that flies in the face of a 1925 Supreme Court ruling that was supposed to protect doctors. In view of the rigid, 19th-century federal techniques for dealing with addiction, it is not at all difficult to understand why state officials are reluctant to broaden by innovation and experimentation the latitude of rehabilitation programs.

It was only logical, therefore, that New York State's Narcotics Addiction Control Commission would choose, or more accurately settle for, the most convenient course of action. Drawing from a $75 million capital expense fund, the commission has acquired sites for ten rehabilitation centers in New York City—unwanted hospitals, nursing homes, a YMCA in Brooklyn, even a bankrupt river-front motel in Manhattan. But community opposition, stemming from fear of widespread "patient" escapes and, more important, a sputtering personnel recruitment drive, have delayed the centers' openings. On March 19, just twelve days before the compulsory commitment program was to go into effect, the commission's chairman, Lawrence W. Pierce, conceded that although seventy doctors had expressed an interest in the program, not one had been hired to work full time. Moreover, the project has no full-time psychiatrists, a situation that the commission appears to regard as relatively insignificant. Thus in a television interview, Pierce said: "I do think it's true that we're not likely to wind up with very many full-time psychiatrists, but that's not to say we're going to need psychiatrists full time. If we can engage fifteen and twenty hours of the time of psychiatrists, and get enough to give us that amount of time, we can meet our needs." Pierce's interest in psychiatry grew when he was faced with the disquieting prospect that without full-time psychiatrists, the state program might not qualify for Medicare subsidies.

Embarking on a relatively unexplored tack in the frustrating work of rehabilitating drug addicts is as uncertain as the acoustics of a new philharmonic hall. No amount of informed prognosis or conjecture can match actual performance. If the Rockefeller program does succeed, it will have New York City to thank. Recognizing that the Governor's pre-campaign zeal had outstripped his state's capacity to perform, city officials agreed to accept the first 2,000 of the 8,400 criminal and noncriminal addicts the commission expects to treat during the next twelve months. The city's facilities (on Riker's Island in the East River) are large enough and remote enough to keep the Governor's program going while the state scrambles for suitable treatment centers.

Despite the Supreme Court's unmistakably clear ruling in 1925 that doctors may prescribe drugs "for relief of conditions incident to addiction," the country has failed to come to grips with the problem. Instead, it has clung desperately to the hoary belief that addiction is a criminal problem, to be solved through stiffer punishment. Much of the same suspicion and ignorance that supported the Bedlam approach to mental illness permeates the federal government's official policy today. Until the government, and in particular, the Bureau of Narcotics, takes the initiative and recognizes addiction as a public health problem, too many rehabilitation programs will continue to be nothing better than thinly disguised punitive solutions. And yet a century of evidence proves that the "criminalization" of addicts doesn't work.

RESENTFUL PARTNER

CANADA FIGHTS ITS ORBIT

C. W. GONICK

Mr. Gonick is editor of Canadian Dimension and assistant professor of economics at the University of Manitoba, Winnipeg.

Winnipeg

No other country in the world is as dependent—economically, militarily, culturally and psychologically—on another country as is Canada upon the United States. Canadians have been able to live comfortably with this arrangement for many generations, thus reflecting the moderation, compromise and conciliation which have ever characterized their country, but there are signs that the period of accommodation is coming to an end.

Canada is undergoing a new wave of nationalism. It is not, nor can it be, a strident nationalism based on past achievement and glory; for the blunt fact is that Canada does not have a glorious past. Nor does it have a fully conscious present. It is still divided into two distinct cultures, English and French, and the ostensibly "English" still tend to identify as much with an ethnic group (Ukrainian, German, Italian, Jewish) or with a region (the Prairies, the Maritimes, British Columbia) as with Canada. By and large, the English Canadian intellectual elite abhor nationalism. They are celebrators of the Canadian mosaic, priding themselves on their cosmopolitanism, on living in a land of many cultures, a country that neither waves its flag nor glorifies its heroes.

Nor is the new nationalism embodied effectively in Canadian politics. The major parties are badly split on the question of relations with the United States. None has been able to mobilize nationalist sentiment or to offer credible programs for Canadian independence. The advocates of integration with the United States — what is called "continentalism" — are much better organized and have formed more powerful alliances among politicians, business leaders, academics and trade union leaders than have their more numerous opposition.

The new Canadian nationalism combines a distaste for what the United States has become, obsessively consumptionist at home and obsessively anti-Communist and militarist abroad, with a strong desire to halt the absorption of Canada into the Great Society. Vietnam has been a powerful catalyst. In the past eighteen months large numbers of Canadians have developed a profound sense of horror at what white, affluent, liberal America is doing there, and an urgent desire to end Canada's complicity in the war.

Nationalism is expressed in a number of ways: in the speeches of Walter Gordon, "Chief Nationalist" (probably sole nationalist) in the Liberal Party; in the editorials of the one nationalist newspaper, the Toronto Daily Star; in the "moderate program for Canadian independence" being put forward by the New Democratic Party; in Canadian Dimension, the leading Left-independence publication, and in conferences like the one recently sponsored by Dimension, "Canada and the American Empire." But by and large nationalist sentiment, especially strong among the young, remains unmobilized. It awaits leadership and organization—in short, a movement for Canadian independence.

Response to Aggression

The thrust of Canadian history has been commonly viewed as a series of measured responses to the threat of aggression or the quest for annexation from the United States. Today there is no question of military attack or political annexation. Instead, a kind of secular absorption is gradually swallowing Canada into the American empire. When threats of invasion or annexation were real, the Canadian people responded vigorously. Often the response took the form of giant economic projects like the first trans-Canada railway system, which was seen as a means of welding a national economy whose trading links were primarily east-west rather than north-south. The territorial integrity of the nation-state was preserved.

However, at the same time that Canada's borders were being jealously protected, business and government were actively wooing American capital to develop Canadian resources and to establish subsidiary manufacturing operations across the line. By the 1920s American industry had established a large corporate base in Canada. In 1926 U.S. corporations accounted for 30 per cent of all assets in Canadian manufacturing industries and 28 per cent of all assets in Canadian mining and smelting industries. By the mid-1960s the U.S. multi-national corporation had become predominant in virtually all nonagricultural, non-financial sectors of the Canadian economy; it now controls almost 60 per cent of the manufacturing sector, 70 per cent of petroleum and natural gas, and 60 per cent of all mining and smelting. Along with the growth of American capital in Canada and its penetration and predominance in all the dynamic sectors of the economy, a steadily increasing trade dependence has developed: approximately 70 per cent of Canada's international trade is conducted with the United States, and almost a third of Canada's production of goods is exported there.

These corporate and trade links make Canada a regional economy, part of a continental economy, rather than an integral national economy. The Canadian economy cannot evade a depression emanating from the United States; the current dose of inflation is clearly brought about by the excessive continental demand generated by war. The function of Canada as a region within the continental economy is to supply staple commodities as substitutes for the increasingly depleted resources of the United States. American corporate ownership in Canada generates and perpetuates this branch-plant economy: resource industry is developed to supply U.S. industry with raw materials; manufacturing industry is developed to supply the limited domestic market.

Because Canada has become a satellite to the American metropolis, the Canadian Government lacks the leverage to direct the economy along a path divergent from that of the United States. Its function is to adjust to the changes occurring in the United States as smoothly and efficiently as possible; to introduce measures which parallel the policy initiatives of Washington.

Confrontations of Power

Canadians celebrate their centennial this year with grave self-doubts and frustrations. The nation has become so deeply penetrated by the American metropolis that the possibility of independence appears doubtful and the cost of independence stupendous. Nevertheless, the conflicts which inevitably grow out of an empire-like, economic relationship are attracting increased public attention and generating further indignation, and the political parties can scarcely continue to ignore an agitation that so preoccupies the electorate. The signs indicate that independence will play a major role in the next general election. Indeed, not since the 1890s has concern over Canada-U.S. relations so dominated public affairs.

There have been a number of confrontations between Ottawa and Washington in recent years. The federal election of 1963 was fought largely on whether Canada was obliged to accept U.S. nuclear-tipped Bomarc missiles; a year or so later, Time and Reader's Digest were exempted from advertising restrictions placed on Canadian editions of American magazines; Gen. Maxwell Taylor has publicly complained of Canada's failure to participate in the Vietnamese War; Canadian subsidiaries of American flour-milling companies have refused to accept orders for shipment to Cuba; Ford of Canada would not sell trucks to China; Canadian subsidiaries of American drug companies refused to sell to the Quakers medical supplies for Hanoi.

It is impossible in this space to review the details of all these intrusions into Canadian sovereignty, but the explosive confrontation early this year over the Mercantile Bank may be cited as typical of the forces and factors involved. Three years ago, National City Bank took over the Mercantile Bank of Canada, a small Netherlands-owned concern that specialized in business connected with foreign trade, proposing to use its new subsidiary to engage in a general banking business across Canada. At the time of the take-over, Finance Minister Walter Gordon warned James Rockefeller, chairman of the board of National City, that the Canadian Government disapproved of the transaction and that restrictive legislation was likely. Such legislation was subsequently presented to Parliament, and has been the basis of two vigorous U.S. State Department diplomatic notes. The controversial clause restricts non-Canadian holdings in any chartered bank to 25 per cent, and limits to 10 per cent the holdings of any shareholder. If either of these provisions is violated, the foreign-owned bank is prohibited from increasing its assets to more than twenty times its authorized capital. Mercantile now violates both provisions, and its assets already exceed the limit. The government's main concern over Mercantile is that, left to expand without limits, it could quickly become one of Canada's largest banks and would be in a position to disregard monetary policy laid down by the Bank of Canada, since, unlike the Canadian-owned chartered banks, it would have access to funds from the United States.

Macpherson, Toronto Star

"We Got Us ■ New House Rule, Stranger!"

The State Department argues that the legislation is being applied retroactively to National City, but its real concern is that it might set a precedent for similar curbs to American corporate interests in other parts of the world. It hinted at two types of sanctions: the imposition of restrictions on Canadian exports to the United States and the cancellation of the right now granted to Canadian chartered banks to maintain agencies in American cities, especially New York. Five of Canada's chartered banks operate agencies there and, unlike U.S. banks, are not limited in the interest they can pay. They now handle nearly half the lucrative call-loan business on Wall Street, with assets between $1.6 billion and $2.0 billion.

The State Department and Mercantile mounted a vigorous campaign to thwart the legislation, and they found a strategic group of Canadian allies. Canadian chartered banks were approached by the American Embassy and warned of the retaliatory measures. They responded by pleading with the government to "let Mercantile into the club." Their associates on the daily press saw the point and gave support to the cause. Mercantile also found allies in Sen. Louis Gelinas and A. T. Seedhouse, two of its Canadian directors. Mr. Seedhouse is also president of the Manufacturers Life Insurance Company, half of whose new business is being underwritten today in the United States.

It now appears that all this effort has paid off. Two vital concessions have been offered National City. It will be allowed to retain a 25 per cent interest in the Mercantile Bank of Canada. This privilege—denied to all other investors, Canadian or foreign, who can own no more than 10 per cent of the stock in the other chartered banks—assures National City of effective control over Mercantile even after it sells the remaining 75 per cent of the stock to Canadians. The second concession gives National City five years to dispose of the 75 per cent, during which period Mercantile is free to expand its business without limit. This provision suspends the drastic restriction imposed on banks that have more than 25 per cent of their shares owned by foreign interests.

The short-term effects of this arrangement on Canadian monetary policy are overshadowed by the precedent it sets for future efforts of Canadian governments to restrict foreign control of industry. As a rare nationalist newspaper editorial put it: "Just be bull-headed and unyielding and have Washington bring pressure on your behalf and the Canadians will water down the offending regulation—that is the lesson likely to be drawn."

The Continental Elite

The destiny of Canadian business leaders is so bound up with the American economy and with the continued and expanding presence of the American corporation in Canada that they can do little but support the American multi-national corporation against Canadian nationalists. Giant Canadian-owned corporations often have their own subsidiary companies in the United States; for many of them, sales and profits depend entirely on the American market. Canadian business leaders sit on the boards of U. S.-affiliated companies and representatives of American business sit on the boards of giant Canadian-owned companies.

The most active association working to further the integration of the two economies is the Canadian-American Committee, established in 1957 "to study problems arising from growing interdependence between Canada and the United States." Its major function has been the financing of a large number of "objective research studies in various aspects of Canadian-American relations." When the studies prove favorable to the committee's point of view, they are published. The committee also issues policy statements signed by its members. The work of the committee has proved of utmost importance for the Americanization of Canada. First, it is the only ongoing research institute studying aspects of the Canadian-U.S. economy, and the only nonpolitical organization that regularly issues statements on Canadian trade and investment policy; second, its sponsors include an impressive array of Canadian business leaders, Canadian trade unionists (almost all of whom are connected with Canadian branches of international trade unions), presidents of large Canadian universities and various other prominent Canadian figures. The committee has sixty members, thirty in each country.

Another group, The Canadian Trade Committee, was set up in 1961 to specialize in Canadian trade problems and policies. Its members are constituted in the same way as the Canadian-American Committee and like it are sponsored by the National Planning Association (U.S.A.) and the Private Planning Association of Canada.

The underlying assumption of all the studies and policy statements issued by both committees is that continentalism is both good and necessary for Canada. Indeed, a number of the reports are clearly aimed at "proving" that there is no alternative. One study, for example, attempts to demonstrate that "economic planning" is not feasible in Canada; another that there can never be large-scale trade between Canada and the Communist nations. In the winter of 1965, the Canadian-American Committee presented its most daring proposal: a free trade area between the two countries.

In addition to the research financed by these groups, the Ford Foundation has been actively subsidizing research on Canada-U.S. relations. The most important study it has financed is the recently published Foreign Ownership of Canadian Industry by E. A. Safarian. It would appear from the monotony of the continental refrain that economists are unanimous on the question. That is not so, but research funds are not available for economists who do not accept, a priori, the necessity for continentalism. Even the Canada Council, a government-sponsored agency which distributes funds to the arts and the social sciences, regularly turns down requests for support of any study on Canada-U.S. relations which may take a critical position.

The Price of Independence

None of Canada's major political parties has put forward a program which can halt the American absorption of Canada or provide the basis for an independent political economy. The American way of life is not despised by Canadian political leaders, as it might be by European. By and large, it conforms to their own notion of a liberal democratic, free-enterprise society. In any case, since they have no different vision of society to put in its place, they will not take vigorous measures to counter the infiltration of American culture and values.

Some leaders may disapprove of America's role as the world's policeman and deplore specific actions—the landing of Marines in Santo Domingo, the bombing of North Vietnam, the Bay of Pigs fiasco, the attempt to isolate China in the councils of the world. But most of them see the world as do their American counterparts and feel grateful to the United States for "protecting us from the evils of international communism." The minority that is troubled by American foreign policy is not eager to display its disapproval openly and loudly because, it argues, quiet diplomacy is the better way. It is doubtful, though, that this view is held with real conviction; too many American politicians and commentators have urged that Canada will have some influence on U.S. policy only if it kicks up a real fuss. Basically, they all believe that Canada must have access to American investment; otherwise, the living standard of its people will drop drastically (Prime Minister Pearson has suggested a fall of 30 per cent).

That is why they are so impatient with the mavericks within the ranks, like Walter Gordon. Gordon is concerned that Canada is not getting all that it might from the North American economic structure. He would strengthen Canada's bargaining position within the continentalist system, to win for the country a greater share of the continental pie. The Canadian legislature has passed one of his proposals—tax incentives to encourage American subsidiaries to sell shares to Canadians—and he is advocating a government-sponsored trust fund that would buy up Canadian firms which would otherwise be sold to Americans. While Minister of Finance he put forward and then was forced to withdraw legislation to place a stiff tax on sales of Canadian business to foreigners.

Because Canadian business is worried that Gordon's exploits will scare away American capital, anger the American State Department and, incidentally, bring more government control into the Canadian economy—and because they are content with their present share of the continental pie—they would like nothing better than that he should quit politics altogether. And Gordon was about to do just that, after being thoroughly isolated in his own party, when he was suddenly invited back to sit in the Liberal cabinet. He may lack support among the ranks of business or even in his own party, but he has a certain appeal among the youth of Canada and among the intellectuals. Without him, it appeared that the "left wing" of the Liberal Party might collapse and that the New Democratic Party would pick up this support.

The New Democratic Party, moderately Socialist, has been making rapid headway in the past few years, and the latest public opinion polls (Gallup, of course) show it to be second in popularity. In the past six months the leadership of the NDP has announced that the party now regards Canada's lack of independence as the primary issue facing the Canadian people. But there remains some doubt as to how much energy the NDP is prepared to devote to it, and how effective it could be in mobilizing nationalist strength. Judging from its performance in Parliament and in the provincial legislatures, and from the speeches of its leaders across the country, the party appears to be weighed down with its concerns from the past—pensions, medicare and the other paraphernalia of the welfare state—and with fighting off the Socialist image of its predecessor, the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (CCF). Moreover, an important strain of anti-nationalism in the NDP regards the concern over Canadian independence as reactionary and anachronistic. This group will most often identify with liberal Democrats of the Humphrey, Fulbright, Paul Douglas, Kennedy variety, and though opposed to some of the methods used to carry out United States foreign policy, is in no way opposed to its principles.

The NDP is closely tied to the Canadian trade union movement. Affiliated locals provide membership dues to the party, and some of the large unions lend organizers to the provincial parties during and sometimes between campaigns. Well over three-quarters of the labor movement in English Canada is organized into branches of international trade unions with headquarters in the United States. The increasing dependence of the NDP on the trade union movement can have no effect other than to dampen the party's enthusiasm for a platform which places prime emphasis on independence.

Conference on Empire

One of the more hopeful signs that independence is on the agenda for political action was the successful "Canada and the American Empire Conference," held in Montreal on the weekend of March 3 to 5. Sponsored by the magazine, Canadian Dimension, the conference was designed to clear away some of the confusions and misconceptions that surround the question of continentalism in Canada; to bring together that small group of critical intellectuals who have actually done some research on the imperial relationship, and to gauge the temper of Dimension readers on the question of Canadian independence. It was an important event because it was the first conference ever devoted to an examination of this question.

With publicity largely restricted to the magazine's readership (somewhat greater proportionately than The Nation's circulation in the United States), the three-day conference nevertheless attracted some 300 persons. At least 80 per cent were under 40; about half were students. Many academics came from universities in Ontario and Quebec, and there was a scattering of labor officials, especially from the Canadian-based national trade unions. Aside from a few Liberals, Progressive Conservatives, political neutrals and New Leftists, the participants were largely New Democrats.

A measure of the occasion's success was that it never became bogged down in the French-English debate. That conflict has infused itself into most political questions in Canada and has wrecked various attempts to establish national political movements. But one of the speakers, Jacques-Yvon Morin, made it clear that "Canada has value for the majority of the French Canadians only insofar as it constitutes a protection for their culture; at the moment when it fails to provide this protection, it ceases to have any meaning." Morin, prominent on the faculty of the University of Montreal, and president of the newly reconvened Estates General of Quebec, warned that "if ever French Canada decided to integrate itself in the majority . . . it would probably go all the way and join the United States." French Canadians must regain their cultural rights in all areas of Canada; they must have confidence in the continued existence of an English Canada which would be distinct from the United States, and Quebec must be granted special status within confederation. This position was widely accepted by the other participants, but it overlooks one crucial question:

in a two-state Canada, will the central government be strong enough to counter the forces of continental integration? It was a shortcoming of the conference that this question was never raised.

A major task of the conference was to define the content of Canadian nationalism. Fear of nationalism as it has been manifest elsewhere in the world is one of the major sources of moderation among Canada's young intellectuals—this moderation that "will be the death of us," as somebody observed. The task of definition was undertaken by Gad Horowitz of McGill University. It was not difficult to show that fears of Pan-Canadian nationalism are largely misplaced. "Canadian nationalism does not lead to Auschwitz; it simply leads away from Washington." Horowitz was less sanguine about the mutually antagonistic chauvinisms of English and French Canada. He likened these interior nationalisms to the disruptive forces that divide many countries along racial, religious, language or tribal lines, and lead to hatred and bloodshed.

Horowitz had a second important task: to demonstrate that in Canada nationalism and socialism do not conflict but are necessary to each other. These remarks, again, were directed at an important segment of New Democrats who cannot see the compatibility. Socialism looks to the establishment of world government and to the eventual withering away of the nation-state. But the goal of world government will not be advanced in any measure by the absorption of Canada into the United States. "If the United States were Socialist," Horowitz said, "we would be continentalists. We are nationalists because, as Socialists, we do not want our country to be utterly absorbed by the citadel of world capitalism. We are nationalists because we believe that something new can be created here—something different from what the Americans have created—and that that something new could be a social democracy. The point of our nationalism is not to preserve a Canadian identity no matter what it might be but to create a Canadian identity that measures up to a vision of the good society. There will be no socialism in a Canada which is being absorbed into the United States. Therefore, there can be no Canadian socialism without Canadian nationalism."

The Alternative

The continentalists are strong not only because of their positions of power in Canadian society but because they have convinced almost everybody that there is no alternative. And, indeed, there is not within the framework of an economy guided by the free pull of the market, in which the center of decision making is the private corporation. A major purpose of the conference was to demonstrate that, given a new set of premises, economic independence is possible.

One of the most effective papers exploded a myth that has long tyrannized Canadian nationalists: that Canada is still in desperate need of foreign capital. Even the conference participants were surprised to be told that, as far as direct investment capital is concerned, Canada is a net exporter to the United States, not a net importer. Between 1960 and 1965, the parent companies of the multi-corporations exported just over $2 billion to their Canadian affiliates; in the same period, the affiliates sent $3 billion back to the parent companies in the form of dividends. American direct investment is expanding very rapidly in Canada, but this "American" capital is not imported from the United States. Its major source is the reinvestment of profits earned by subsidiaries in their Canadian operation.

The Dimension conference sharpened the intellectual tools of Canadian nationalists. It analyzed the nature of the alliance for continentalism, put forward programs to halt and reverse the process of continentalism. Though much more analysis is required, it is now clear that what is missing most is an effective vehicle for Canadian nationalism. It may well be that independence is ultimately not possible without socialism. But socialism is not yet a major force in Canada, and meanwhile the Americanization of Canada continues unabated. Only one proposal was offered as an immediate device for halting this process, but it may well be the most important contribution made by the Dimension conference: a common front among Canadian nationalists of all ideological persuasions; a new independence movement which would embrace all Canadians who, for whatever the reason, desire to preserve an independent Canada, and who see this independence being eroded by the existing relationship with the United States. Is there the will for a common front? Can a minimum program be devised, among the English and French communities alike, to forge a broadly based coalition that will expose and fight the continentalist alliance and its programs? The future of Canada may turn on the answers.

REBELS FROM AFFLUENCE

THE PROVOS OF HOLLAND

PIET THOENES

If Holland is the most staid of the Western nations, it has also produced the most interesting of the youthful revolt movements. The Provos (short for Provocateurs) are exceedingly small in number, but they have elected one candidate to the Dutch legislature, utterly unnerved the bureaucracy of Amsterdam and attracted world attention. Though part of the international protest movement that goes under the now almost universal term, "beat," the Provos project a sharp personality of their own. They share the nonviolent principles of the international movement, but they have developed irony as a formidable weapon against authority. Their method, as The New York Times has said, is "Dada put to political ends."

*In the following pages, Piet Thoenes discusses why it was the Dutch who produced the Provos and what their emergence may mean for the social future of Holland, and for the other nations of the West. Dr. Thoenes is on the staff of the Institute of Social Studies, The Hague; his most recent book is The Elite in the Welfare State.*

Amsterdam

Their main meeting place is called the Cellar—part of an old house, on the banks of a canal, right in the heart of the old town.

The Cellar is always open, day and night; at any hour, there are people to talk to, to listen to, to be with. There are no convocations, no fixed hours, no attempts at organization. There is a certain stability of clans, but a still greater instability of ever-changing topics, actions, relationships and leaders.

Anyone can tell you where the Cellar is, and if you are rather more than a tourist, if you are really interested, go there and meet the people. You can sit and talk, or help to print the next edition of Provo. Or join a group that is on its way to start a happening around "Het Lieverdje," the "little sweetheart," a nearby statue which is a famous rallying point for Provos, police and innocent onlookers.

The Provo movement is an open one; no one is excluded. But if you really intend to join, you will have to change a lot. To be a Provo is more than part-time entertainment, and relationship with the movement cannot be fixed simply on a weekend basis, or by taking out a membership. A genuine Provo is utterly different from the bourgeois society around him. He has no ambition for a suitable career, or a well-organized family life; no fixed plans for next week, no ideology.

A Provo is against the dead symbols of a dead society, against official religions, against any kind of authority and obedience, against heroism and martyrdom. He is, above all, a nonconformist, a lover of things new, original and authentic. He is always on the move, restless, even faithless and illusive.

His problem may be: how is a man without any ties to become or remain involved in the world around him? His beloved Cellar is not a nomad's tent. It is a womb and the womb, alas, is not the world.

By now, society must realize that change is the phenomenon most characteristic of the kind of world in which we live. And if I were interviewed on the topic, while sitting at ease behind my desk, I would readily agree, saying—change, that is most important! But time and again, as we move about in this world, we are caught unawares. Suddenly there is something new, something provoking, unpredictable. It is exceedingly difficult to face these new phenomena with the slightest degree of objectivity.

We react as emotionally as the "adversary" might hope, and the amount of change which we must digest in the span of one generation seems to give us a fair amount of stomach trouble. Perhaps the blame should be placed on the generation of our fathers, who taught us about social institutions, social processes and social behavior as though they were eternal truths. Certainly we have doubts that never troubled them. But we did, after all, inherit a few things—ideas about duty and courage and obedience—that shouldn't be touched. There we know where we stand and what it is that we must defend.

Now, suddenly, part of the younger generation hits us precisely on the points where we thought ourselves reasonably safe. No one really understands where these young people came from. They seem to have escaped our educational devices. Who taught them? Who brought them up? There they are, suddenly, in the center of the stage, throwing smoke bombs at the royal galaxy.

And in the Netherlands of all places. One of those nice little countries, so clean and tidy; wealthy, self-assured, quiet and friendly. Not one of those eternal trouble spots erupting once again, but NATO's dearest child. Is it just accident, a little shower on a pleasant April day? Or is there something rotten in the state of Holland, and is Provo just another sign of the decay of the West?

In any case, Provo has aroused the attention of the world. It has captured far more of the international press than has any hard-working Dutch politician, professor, merchant or industrialist. Why should it attract this interest? Is it ethnological curiosity, like some newly documented oddity of behavior among the Eskimos or the Onas? Or was there a constellation of factors in the Dutch society which unexpectedly spawned a phenomenon that foreshadows tomorrow's culture of the Western world?

It may be a key to our puzzlement that the welfare state is indeed very real, and a reality markedly different from the liberal kind of society one remembers from the pre-1940 period. It is a reality, moreover, that has not yet been brought to consciousness by a new well-developed ideology.

Holland today, for example, differs widely from Holland before World War II. There is another level of education. Formerly, 25 per cent continued their education after the compulsory school-leaving age; now 80 per cent do so. The occupation structure has changed, with far less agriculture and commerce, more industry and services. Wealth is greater and public poverty has disappeared.

And so we have arrived in a distinct consumer culture. Before the war, the main thing was to earn money. If you were able to earn much and spend little, you had "arrived"—always assuming you were not actually a miser. It was assumed also that you knew what to buy in the way of clothes, books and furniture; at the same time, excessive attention to good taste was looked upon by a large part of the Dutch middle class as bordering on bad taste.

Not so nowadays. In a way, what makes the welfare state such a pleasant society is the stress on a good life. To earn a lot is, of course, still tremendously important, but there is a growing amount of "gardening" in daily life. "Gardening" here means focusing on personal things in your immediate surroundings. There is less interest for long-term, large-scale public affairs; more time for hobbies, collections, friendship and love.

This attitude may be in part a reaction to what is happening in the world around us. A larger role is given to secondary structures and organizations immediately outside the private circle: more bureaucracy, more impersonal contacts, more rationalization in a society of ranks, diplomas, functions and administration.

The world uses us and we use the world, but there is little involvement. It is not only that we lack love or hate. This world seems to have so many laws and powers of its own that we, as individuals, cannot do much about it. And so it is better to leave worries to the Establishment.

A logical consequence is widespread political apathy. Even in countries with less anomalous political parties than the Netherlands, political interest is ebbing. It is felt almost universally that politics are old-fashioned, a holdover from a generation that had not yet discovered that the real powers cannot be controlled by Parliament. Deep down, there is no lack of interest in religious matters; but it takes the form of personal judgment and is no longer caught by official movements or organizations.

Now what do these differences signify? The welfare state is undoubtedly a society, but it is not the creation, let us say, of an elite which purposely started a revolution and now proudly looks back on what it has achieved. We live in it, most of the time we are reasonably happy with it, but we hardly ever look at its blueprint and wonder if it is as we really intended it to be. If the welfare state had a distinct ideology, perhaps there would be a general protest, clear-cut goals for a coming generation. But there are none. The parents live on, half satisfied, half worried; and so do the larger part of the younger generation—half satisfied, half frustrated.

Or is there really a generation in the making, with ideas of its own, and certainties and ideals that they may have directly inherited from their grandfathers? In order to understand the Provos as a possible new form of young generation, we must first take a closer look at some characteristics of the Dutch society which has produced this new phenomenon.

The Dutch welfare state society has much in common with that of other small European states: Finland, Sweden, Norway, Denmark, Belgium and Switzerland. It loves to look at itself as a sensible, middle-of-the-road bourgeois society, capable of making sound distinctions between possibilities and impossibilities. Perhaps even more than its fellow countries it has been associated with an ideology of practical, not too rugged economic individualism—the do-it-yourself kind of society, without much political interest, democracy being mainly a middle-class device to prevent the state from becoming too important.

But it is precisely this liberal, casual attitude that is difficult to maintain in a welfare state. The state, in the Keynesian tradition, had become very important from 1945 onward.

Somehow, we were able to close our eyes to such facts, and then, suddenly, there came a great surprise. A new mixed Catholic-Socialist government came out into the open in 1965, with a long-term program to guarantee undisturbed economic growth up to the year 2000, by which time the population will have grown from 12 million to 20 million. But to carry out this program, the government asked higher taxes and still more government interference.

The Establishment now showed itself in a form unpalatable to Dutch taste. What we had suspected but not wished, or dared, to see, proved suddenly to be only too true. Political interest revived and resulted in a comeback by left-wing and right-wing parties. But the real reaction was panic at a deeper level: don't let state and Establishment fool you! Do away with politics in their traditional form. Try something else, show your independence. Ancient anarchist sentiments, present in Dutch society from Anabaptist days, suddenly flared up.

And where could that happen but in Amsterdam? In Amsterdam, the capital, but already involved in an old feud with The Hague, the seat of the government. Amsterdam, the town with the best war record, and where the princess was now going to marry a German, an ex-soldier.

Amsterdam is our most cosmopolitan city, where most artistic innovations have originated. Here the Cobra movement had already announced changes in the fields of painting and literature that seemed to forecast the end of a traditional bourgeois culture. It was in Amsterdam that local feelings of frustration and inferiority, and the wantonness of a younger generation that wished to demonstrate its divergent views in an unmistakable way, combined into a highly explosive mixture. On a hot night in June, 1965, a series of riots broke out, of a magnitude and violence that the town had not known since its famous strikes during the German Occupation.

It was here in Amsterdam, also, that the Provo movement developed; it was even accused of having organized the June rebellion. The movement has been a mixed affair from the very beginning. It includes students of the New Left, old-town bohemians of both younger and older generations, labor-class anarchists, practical reformers and less practical utopians. They are bound together by a common style, a common anti-bourgeois, anti-Establishment and anti-welfare-state attitude. The nucleus of the movement consists of not more than fifty, around whom are grouped a few hundred more. When there are demonstrations, the participants may rise to 1,000. They are a curious lot who dress differently, talk differently, act differently—a godsend for the TV crews.

Bernard de Vries, one of the movement's leaders, distinguishes the following categories of Provos:

1. The happeners

They organize artistic happenings, new style. Not the old-fashioned "art to look at and admire," but a new style of collective action art. In the streets, and as many participating as possible. Now this kind of performance is not admired by the municipal authorities—it slows up traffic. A conflict between happeners and police is the result, and in due time, the happening acquires the character of a political demonstration.

2. The beats and the hipsters

These are nearest to the British teddy boys, either very dandified or very unwashed. On the spiritual level, they are prepared to try anything between Zen and Yevtushenko.

3. The thinkers

This is a more intellectual type, writing about art and anarchism in periodicals of more or less irregular publication, such as Provo and Revo.

4. The activists

They organize demonstrations, Sit-Ins, Teach-Ins, Lay-Ins, forums. They are all out for publicity, and organize their activities mainly around political topics such as Vietnam, elections, conscription, all of which they deal with in unorthodox ways.

I am inclined to add to this classification the group of practical reformers. The Provos have made history by publishing what they call white plans. A "white bicycle plan" of community-owned bicycles to solve Amsterdam's traffic chaos; a "white chimney plan" to stop air pollution; a "white chicken plan" to reorganize the municipal police.

In a way, the practical reformers are the least revolutionary group because they try to save the old society by proposing technical revisions. At the same time, their entirely unorthodox solutions by-pass the official Establishment.

In what respect, then, are the Provos in advance of developments elsewhere? As with other younger generation movements, their forms of nonconformism are deep-rooted. But they go further. They do not stop at the kind of "count us out" attitude, once described for Germany in Schelsky's Skeptische Generation. The Provos include a group with intellectual and cultural aspirations, a group that cannot help being involved to such a degree that it wishes to devise new ways and new solutions.

It is this attitude, be it a flirtation with anarchism, or an attempt at new styles of social engineering, that gives Provo its political flavor. It has the detachment from the existing system necessary for really interesting negative comments, and by its honest, if sometimes flighty, attempts to try new solutions shows real concern and perhaps develops a stature that surpasses the traditional form of generational conflict.

Thinking about the future, I must revert to a distinction made in the first part of this article. Provo is the sum of two, let us say, cultural, factors in Dutch society.

One is a general condition. Welfare states, with their kind of external educational system, are always high on the list for possible generational conflicts of the beatnik type. The combination of rapid technological change and continuous political apathy leads easily to that kind of protest. As such, it is entertainment but not much more. It does not really influence overall society, its structures, processes and value systems. We all know that the dissenting members of the younger generation will one day take their examinations, marry their girls and find their jobs.

The existence of this form of generational conflict lends some extra color to our society, sometimes an element of surprise, even of reflection, but there is nothing in it that promises to change the course of history. The other factor is a particular combination that occurred in Holland during the mid-sixties, and that gave the generational protest a character which prevents us from dismissing it as a form of growing pains. It has reached a level at which history is made, enabling us to look around the corner and get an idea of what might lie beyond the welfare state: another kind of society, a real homo ludens, even a new religion.

In any event, Holland will never be quite the same again. If we go to the theatre, we shall recognize the 19th-century flavor of the setup; if we start a new organization, we shall know that it is already a bureaucracy; and if we found a new political movement, we shall have to confess that in some way or other it is already part of the Establishment. Although Provo has not been able, or even tried, to force us to change existing structures, it has left an indelible mark.

But why, I wonder, do I write as though Provo were already safely locked up in the past? Is it because there have been hardly any happenings during the last few months? No provocations, no riots, no new men, really nothing at all? Or because the stream of publications on Provo (mainly very good ones) gives the feeling that we have analyzed, understood and pigeonholed the movement? It may, of course, be wishful thinking on the part of a middle-aged, middle-class observer who wishes to relax once more in the security of "God, Nederland en Oranje."

Provo has given us a new way in which to look at things. But that is also precisely where its weakness lies. A number of people might start thinking anew, but nothing obliges them, or even allows them, to start re-living. Nothing will happen if we go on as before. Provo is a challenge, but only provoking in the field of ideas, important as that may be. When you continue to publish white plans that are not enforced, and when you go on throwing smoke bombs at the royal procession, it just doesn't work any longer—not for yourself or for your enemies.

Perhaps that is the main reason for writing about Provo as if it were already a thing of the past. But I hope that I am wrong. I hope that here, or somewhere else, a movement which starts as the protest of a generation will grow into something more—more than entertainment, than irritating hooliganism. Provo has shown that one may use his imagination to envision a different world. Why, after all, should the welfare state be the last phase of history before Judgment Day?

Auto Insurance: Crack-Up Ahead

ROBERT E. KEETON and
JEFFREY O'CONNELL

Messrs. Keeton and O'Connell are professors of law, the former at Harvard University and the latter at the University of Illinois. They are co-authors of Basic Protection for the Traffic Victim: A Blueprint for Reforming Automobile Insurance (Little, Brown), and After Cars Crash: The Need for Legal and Insurance Reform (Dow Jones—Irwin).

The present automobile insurance system cannot long survive. The pressures for legislative action are rising in every section of the country, and though the causes and cures for the ills of the present system may be sharply disputed, the symptoms are clear.

One set of symptoms concerns the harsh treatment of traffic victims. A substantial number go uncompensated, even for their out-of-pocket losses. Long delay in the payment of compensation has become normal; in metropolitan areas the lapse of time between filing of suit and trial averages more than thirty-one months, with a nationwide high of sixty-nine and a half months in a Chicago court. If the case is appealed—and many insurance companies are quite ready to appeal an adverse jury verdict—an even longer wait is in store for the plaintiff.

Adding to the injustice of delay is the unfair distribution of the insurance payments that are made. Persons suffering minor injuries are commonly overpaid, receiving compensation many times greater than their losses, while the severely injured seldom recover more than a fraction—often only a small fraction—of their losses. All this occurs in the face of the theory of the system that a traffic victim is entitled to all or nothing—the “all” being full compensation for his losses plus money to “compensate” for his pain and suffering.

Another set of symptoms clusters around the experiences of the insurance-buying public. Rates are rising everywhere, and in some states they are skyrocketing. Between January 1, 1955, and dates approximately eleven years later, according to data supplied by the American Insurance Association, average rates for a minimum level of automobile liability insurance covering bodily injuries rose by 112 per cent in Michigan, 95 per cent in South Carolina, 83 per cent in Virginia, 77 per cent in Arkansas, 56 per cent in North Carolina, and 54 per cent in Massachusetts and Mississippi, to give a few examples. New York fared somewhat better, with an increase of only 22 per cent, but it started this period with the highest rates in the nation, just above Massachusetts, and ended with the second highest, just below Massachusetts. (Puerto Rico, incidentally, has even higher rates than Massachusetts and New York.)

Almost as much public resentment arises from the readiness with which insurance companies cancel or refuse to renew insurance policies as is provoked by spiraling rates. In the race for the so-called “preferred” risks, the companies offer the advantage of lower rates to the middle-aged, middle-income suburbanites. In contrast, all too many other drivers—those between 16 and 25, those over 65, and those living in the congested metropolitan centers, for example—can get insurance, if at all, only through “assigned risk” plans (under which the undesired applicants are assigned to insurance companies in proportion to their volume of voluntary business), or from insurance companies specializing in insuring “high-risk” drivers at sharply increased rates.

Moreover, drivers unable to get insurance through the usual channels include groups among whom an appreciable percentage are unsophisticated about automobile insurance—the elderly and those living in poor neighborhoods, for example. They fall prey to the unscrupulous among the “high-risk” companies, an inordinate number of which have gone bankrupt, leaving their policyholders and many traffic victims high and dry. Not all or even most of the companies accepting high risks are shady or shaky, but this area has provided the most notorious abuse in the casualty insurance business of recent times. An investigation of high-risk insurance in 1965 by the Anti-Trust and Monopoly Sub-Committee of the Senate Judiciary Committee disclosed that in the preceding five years, sixty-five companies had become insolvent, leaving 300,000 people with $100 million in unpaid claims. And the committee reported in January, 1967, that eight more “high-risk” companies had failed, bringing the total to seventy-three in six years. This scandal has roused broad concern about weaknesses of state regulation of casualty insurance, and most observers expect Congress to turn actively to the problem this year.

The increasing costs are the more disturbing because of the system's inherent wastefulness and its built-in inducements to exaggeration and actual fraud. Claims for payment under automobile liability insurance are based upon fault—that is, the injured person must show that he was free from negligence and that the accident was caused entirely by the other driver's negligence. And the criteria for determining fault are so unrealistic that in many cases—perhaps most—they can be satisfied only if witnesses indulge in imaginative reconstruction of events imperfectly perceived and even more imperfectly remembered. Who really knows what happened in that split second before collision? In truth, opposing litigants seldom seem to be describing the same accident!

In this setting, a litigant has the maximum inducement to embroider, even to commit outright perjury, in an attempt to buttress his case. The cost of all this bickering over fault is even greater than the amount at stake in the multitude of cases involving relatively minor injuries. Overall—taking into account the whole range of cases from severe to trivial—automobile liability insurance is so inefficiently administered that the public pays $2.20 in premiums for every $1 provided in net benefits to injured persons.

All these symptoms of crisis in automobile insurance arise naturally from five characteristics of the present system:

First, claims are based upon fault, the criteria for which are unrealistic.

Second, claims are pressed against the other driver's insurance company, a procedure that heightens the possibilities for antagonism and litigation, since the company liable for payment feels no loyalty toward the person seeking payment.

Third, they are lump-sum claims. That is, the plaintiff is not entitled to have his losses reimbursed periodically as they occur, but must prove his claim once and for all, receiving one payment as reimbursement for his total losses, not only up to the time the estimate is made but for the future as well—even for a lifetime. No such estimate can be accurate, and in the circumstances it is natural that whoever makes the estimate, whether judge or jury, will lean to the high side because a mistake against an injured person might leave him destitute, whereas a mistake against the insurance company can be absorbed (i.e., passed on to policyholders in higher premiums).

Fourth, the rules for determining what is paid in these cases disregard payments from other sources. Thus, an accident victim who has medical-payments coverage in his own automobile insurance policy and a form of Blue Cross-Blue Shield coverage that also pays without regard to what he has received from other sources (as many policies do) can make a profit from incurring additional medical expenses. For example, if he has an X-ray that costs $20, he receives payment once under the medical-payments coverage, again under Blue Cross-Blue Shield, and a third time from the claim against the other driver's insurance company.

Fifth, automobile liability insurance claims include payments for pain and suffering, for which no objective measure is available. What is an ache in your arm "worth"? As a result, there is room for dispute in every case, and ample room for exaggeration.

These five troublesome features of insurance against traffic injuries are not present in the collision insurance that covers damage to cars. Under collision insurance, one collects from his own company for damage to his own car, without regard to fault and without arguments about indefinite claims for compensation above actual loss. Collision insurance has continued to work rather well, while the performance of insurance covering injuries to person has grown steadily worse as the numbers of cars and drivers and accidents have increased.

We propose a basic reform—called the Basic Protection Plan. It changes fundamentally the payments made in the great mass of traffic cases involving injuries that are not severe. In all such cases, first, one's claim would be paid on the basis of being injured in a traffic accident, not on the basis that somebody else was at fault. This principle is already in use in medical-payments insurance, collision insurance (the coverage that pays for damage to the insured automobile without regard to fault) and fire insurance. Second, claims would be submitted to one's own insurance company rather than to that of the other driver. Third, payments would be made as loss occurs, month by month, rather than in one lump sum. Fourth, claims would be for net loss; that is, no payment would be due for loss covered by other sources such as Blue Cross and sick-leave pay. Fifth, the claims would be for objectively measurable loss, no compensation being paid for pain and suffering.

Coupled with the development of this new form of insurance would be a law doing away with injury claims based on negligence in traffic accidents, unless the damages were higher than $5,000 for pain and suffering, or $10,000 for all other items such as medical expense and wage loss. This sharply distinguishes the proposal from accident and medical insurance one can buy today, and because of this feature all but a very small percentage of injury claims in automobile accidents would be handled entirely under the new Basic Protection coverage. The wasteful bickering over fault—with all the cost of investigators, lawyers and the courts—would be eliminated in the great majority of cases. Rights to higher damages, including money for pain and suffering, would be preserved in the cases of severe injury. The number of these cases is relatively small, and the amounts involved warrant the expense of determining responsibility according to negligence, if realistic standards are applied. Also, allowing pain and suffering damages in these cases satisfies the grievance of innocent victims against negligent drivers, without giving every trivial case a nuisance value that makes insurance costs skyrocket. And preserving these claims based on negligence in the cases of severe injury helps to place a fair extra share of the burden of accident costs on negligent drivers.

Preferably, Basic Protection insurance would be compulsory, to meet the whole need for covering basic losses and to provide the fairest distribution of insurance costs among motorists. It could also work, however, under a voluntary system with a law making special provisions for those victims of uninsured cars who were not themselves car owners and had not had fair opportunity to choose whether to carry insurance.

Refusing to allow any overlap between this new coverage and such insurance as Blue Cross and disability contracts would not only save money in premiums immediately, but might also lead to a much needed re-examination of the whole problem of waste and "overutilization" (incurring expenses needlessly) spawned by overlapping benefits.

This new approach requires state action, and legislators in Michigan, Massachusetts and New York have already filed bills to enact the Basic Protection Plan. Other states are warming to the issue. All across the nation, however, the organized trial bar is in firm opposition, and there is little reason to hope that its attitude will change. One of the national leaders of this segment of the bar recently referred to the concept that damages should be paid to a traffic victim only upon proof of a driver's negligence as "a crowning triumph of reason and morality." He continued: "Literally, the principle of liability for fault is derived from the religious belief that each of us is responsible to his God for his own conduct." Skilled trial lawyers will sound countless oratorical variations on this theme, and the more effectively because many of them deeply and sincerely believe it. But the force of their opposition will be blunted if the public recognizes that they have a large financial stake in the status quo. There is hope, too, that many members of the bar will support fundamental insurance reform, recognizing that it is in the public interest and that the lack of a solution to the present crisis will necessarily result in disrespect for law and lawyers.

Until recently, the insurance industry had been as sternly opposed as the trial bar to any basic reform of automobile insurance. Within the past year, however, a number of spokesmen for the industry have warned that changes are inevitable and that the industry should help to fashion a reform that would be acceptable from its point of view. An even clearer warning was sounded by former Assistant Secretary of Labor Daniel Patrick Moynihan, addressing an insurance industry conference on safety, held at Hartford last January. He called attention to the example of the automobile industry, which continued to brush off proposals for making their cars safer, while warning clouds were gathering. Then, in a series of striking developments, the storm descended. Within a few months the automobile industry suddenly became subject to federal regulation.

In the summer of 1966, it was rumored briefly that top executives in the automobile insurance industry would make a sharp turn away from the prevailing opposition to reform. But the hope did not develop, and as of now there is no solid evidence that the insurance industry is ready to take the initiative.

Where, then, can support for fundamental reform be found? Because automobile insurance reform is everybody's concern, there is danger it will be nobody's business. Yet widespread public support will be required. Perhaps there is hope for organizing it along consumer-interest lines; perhaps groups as widely separated as chambers of commerce and labor unions can be persuaded to join the fight.

The need for reform is so obvious that some kind of legislative action is almost certain to be taken in several states in the immediate future. But there is still serious reason to doubt that the legislation enacted will go deep enough. Patchwork reform that alleviates the pressure for action will merely postpone the real job that has to be done.

LETTERS (Continued from page 482)

government and is not representing our people. It was imposed on us by the United States, and is controlled by military men who fought for the French against the Vietnamese before 1954. . . . We want a government of our own, not controlled by either side, so that we may be able to settle the problems of Vietnam by ourselves on the basis of national brotherhood: to negotiate peace with the National Liberation Front and North Vietnam, and negotiate the withdrawal of American troops with the United States.

Do not believe that the danger of a Communist take-over justifies continuation of the war. We believe we are strong enough to form an independent government. The decision, however, should be ours, not yours, when it is our lives and our country that are being destroyed.

We endorse the proposals outlined in the book written by our friend Thich Nhat Hanh, Vietnam: Lotus in a Sea of Fire, and ask your help in realizing them.

Finally, we send you our best wishes and those of the Vietnamese people.

(Done in Saigon, Feb. 20, 1967, for seventy students and professors.)

Cao Ngoc phuong Pham hieu Tai counsel of perfection

Madison, Wis.

DEAR SIR: I found much to admire in Michael B. Folsom's review of my anthology Echoes of Revolt: The Masses 1911-1917 [The Nation, Feb. 27], but his essay was disfigured by that self-righteous intolerance which is the most unattractive aspect of the New Left. Indeed, it sometimes seems to me that moral dogmatism is the principal link between our youngest radicals and the old Left of the 1930s. When Mr. Folsom has aged to the point where he can look back upon a selfless and error-free life entirely devoted to worthy causes, it will be time enough for him to pass judgment on The Masses' editors whom he now finds wanting in character as well as integrity.

William L. O'Neill

nothing changes

Wellesley, Mass.

DEAR SIR: "Fight the draft any way you can, but don't go to jail. . . . I still haven't recovered from being forced to submit. . . ." [David Bell, as quoted by Paul Good in the article, "Laying Freedom on the Line," The Nation, Mar. 20.]

"In prison nothing yields, nothing changes. . . ." Well, in the army nothing yields, nothing changes, either. And when you come out you've got to live with having served as a slave to the system you abhor. . . . Articles and editorials such as those in the Mar. 20 Nation may jar some of us into anti-draft action—keep them up.

Lanier C. Greer
Cora C. Greer

Berlin peace walks

West Berlin

DEAR SIR: Americans in West Berlin have formed an information service and lobby to encourage a political settlement in Vietnam. . . . Our activity will receive wider attention with the beginning in late April of a series of weekly one-hour walks of 100 Americans through Berlin. We would welcome any Americans who would like to contribute to or contact the "U.S. Campaign" at Droysenstrasse 15, Berlin-Charlottenburg (West). . . .

Peter R. Standish
Secretary, U.S. Campaign

BOOKS & THE ARTS

History and Malapropaganda

THE DEATH OF A PRESIDENT: November 20—November 25, 1963. By William Manchester. Harper & Row. 710 pp. $10.

ELMER BENDINER

Mr. Bendiner, writer and editor, is author of The Bowery Man (Thomas Nelson).

There are several ways in which to categorize William Manchester's account of the five days in November, 1963, during which John F. Kennedy was assassinated, the man charged with the crime was murdered, and Lyndon Johnson inherited the Presidency. The volume can be looked upon as a merchandising marvel or as a political weapon in a factional feud, and in either case it could be hailed as a tour de force. But the author's passionate insistence that his work be regarded as history—in fact, as the history of the assassination, is another matter. In his foreword Manchester stakes his claim to such a monopoly, finding it "fair to assume that should any new studies of this subject appear in the near future, they must be largely based upon the [Warren] Commission's work, mine, or both."

It would be presumptuous to argue with a latter-day Book of Revelation; a reviewer can only list some of the wonders. This is not merely retelling of the tragedy; Mr. Manchester fills page after page with facts never before reported. We discover that the White House Communications officer asked a sergeant for a roast beef sandwich before President Kennedy's last helicopter ride. At the moment of disaster in Dallas, Ben Bradlee, Newsweek's Washington correspondent, was browsing in a Brentano's bookstore; and the private who would later ride behind the Kennedy caisson "was stuffing his soiled uniforms into a coin-operated laundromat."

We are told here for the first time what Prince Stanislaus Radziwill was doing at the fatal moment when the clock in Rome's Eden Hotel stood at 7:21, and that in the nation's capital "half the men on the streets wore topcoats and half did not."

The book is mine of such data and historians can only regret that when Lincoln was shot no conscientious reporter was available to chronicle the state of Bismarck's digestion. Though many of the readers who are clamoring for Manchester's report may not appreciate the full significance of his minutiae—which consume half or more of this monumental effort—they may trace a larger pattern.

The stature of Lyndon Johnson, for example, shrinks notably in Manchester's telling. It is not pretty to read of the stricken widow's arrival at the Presidential plane in Dallas only to find Johnson in full possession of her bedroom. Johnson's image also suffers in Manchester's description of the oath-taking ceremony and of Johnson's insistence that Jackie Kennedy appear at his side, even though she would not change the dress still drenched in her husband's blood. The circumstances of the ceremony itself are stained with controversy. Johnson quotes Robert Kennedy as his legal authority for the necessity of taking the oath immediately, but Kennedy hotly denies that he sanctioned it or that it was necessary. Similarly, Johnson's precipitate speed in moving into the White House is contrasted by Manchester with the patience of that other Johnson who waited weeks after Lincoln's murder before he took over his quarters.

The President is described as "almost alone" in offering the on-the-spot theory that the assassination was part of an "international communist conspiracy." And an investigative commission composed exclusively of Texans, according to Manchester, was frustrated only by the intervention of attorney Abe Fortas and the Kennedy "loyalists." Johnson will also have to live down the monstrous gaffe of Lady Bird who, in offering her condolences to Mrs. Kennedy, said: "What wounds me most of all is that this should happen in my beloved State of Texas."

The book is no MacBird, of course. Manchester fully endorses the most significant conclusions of the Warren Commission. And at every opportunity he carefully explains the strains borne by the new President and the allowances that must be made. Inevitably, the repetition of these apologies has the ring of Mark Antony's refrain: "And Brutus is an honorable man."

By contrast Robert and Jacqueline

Kennedy emerge as story-book hero and heroine, strong, resolute, romantic—"She was Gallic; he a Celt." The coldness of the Kennedy team to the new Chief is excused as an excess of loyalty and grief. But one cannot say that this book is designed as a tool in the Kennedy cause because we are forbidden to say so. Manchester opens his testament by commanding: "You may not conclude that I have served as anyone's amanuensis. If you doubt me you may as well stop at the end of this paragraph."

A reviewer with the temerity to disobey such imperious foot stamping could point out that Manchester was chosen by the Kennedy family, that he did come to some agreement with them, involving their right to at least review the manuscript before publication and that, however coincidentally, the work does enhance the stature of Robert Kennedy at the expense of Lyndon Johnson. The great, if abortive, legal battle between the Kennedys and Manchester resulted—again fortuitously—in a net gain for both sides. The Kennedys cannot be tagged with the book's faults and the publicity must account in part for the gigantic prepublication sale. Moreover, the Kennedy assault never discredited the book itself.

True, the evidence of political motivation is only circumstantial; but Manchester, in convicting Oswald of the single-handed murder of the President, declares a new legal dictum: that circumstantial evidence is "the very best kind." Manchester brushes aside all doubts and criticisms. The critics, in fact, do not exist; he has not heard of them. "Had any other major investigator been around I certainly would have heard the echo of his footsteps." This is odd because, though all of the dissenters from the Warren Commission Report may ultimately be refuted, there are few who would allege that they went about their work on tiptoe.

Where he touches upon the controversy he simplifies it with authoritative finality. "At that distance, with his training, he [Oswald] could scarcely have missed," Manchester declares, citing for authority his own experience on the Marine Corps rifle range. He takes no notice of those FBI sharpshooters who repeatedly missed when they tried to duplicate the shot. The argument of those who wonder about the seconds necessary to aim, load and fire the murder weapon is dismissed as a "trick," refuted by simple arithmetic. He seems unaware that the calculations have been based not on the time lapse between first and last shot but from the moment when the President could have been visible in the assassin's gun sights to the final firing.

For Manchester there are no grassy knolls, no bullet holes that need explaining. He is above sleuthing. Nonetheless, he has unearthed the curious fact that two hours before Oswald was shot, three trauma rooms had been prepared at Parkland Hospital "against precisely this calamity." He explains that the Dallas police expected some attempt to be made against Oswald while en route to the county jail but, curiously, not before. Dallas is like that, he says.

The impounded X-rays of the President cause him no anxiety at all. "Because the material is unsightly it will be unavailable until 1971," he reports in a footnote. It may be true that some small segment of the medically minded public would be able to tell a sightly from an unsightly X-ray, but in any case no film could equal the harrowing, tasteless, clinical detail with which Manchester loads whole chapters. Here the wounds, the blood, the flying bits of flesh and the surgical interventions are minutely detailed. If the American people and the Kennedys can stomach that, they probably can stand any X-ray ever made.

It should be pointed out, in all fairness, that there are chapters of genuine interest: the flight of top Cabinet members to Washington, the mood of Dallas, the bumbling, grotesque mechanics behind the funeral. Even though these sections contain little that the newspapers and television have not already reported, Manchester might be credited with a neat compilation in handy format. Unfortunately, even this information appears in his lofty prose.

William Manchester does not command language; he defies it. Rarely has the English tongue been so elegantly tortured. He refers to fine weather as "a golden lacuna of a day." He calls haze "aoristic." The Eastern seaboard, seen from a plane, is "vermiculating." President Kennedy's body is carried in an "apopemptic ride." Oswald is depicted (by inspired divination) as withdrawing after the final shot "in the deliberate lock step of a Marine marksman retiring from the range"—a feat comparable to a lone performer singing in unison.

Mrs. Malaprop would blush at Man-chesterisms that leap out of the volume. Even when he uses words with some faint regard for their meaning, he is so grandiloquent that the reader is left in baffled awe. Mrs. Kennedy does not enter a room, for example, she "debouches" into it. She also withdraws into a "cantalot of privacy." Galbraith does not fall asleep; he "induces insentience." Oswald is shown "combing his hair like an oarsman sculling." And the Kennedy and Connally families, during their vigil at the hospital, are outrageously described as "entangled in their abattoir."

It is hard to say whether William Manchester will ultimately be known as the pioneer collector of the crumbs of history or the single-handed destroyer of the English language. This reviewer's guess is that he may make an obscure footnote in the record of our time—if not a "golden lacuna."

Half & Half Equals Two

E. R. von FREIBURG

Von Freiburg is a pseudonym for a bilingual East-West writer team of two who have lived in both Germanys for many years.

A curious thing happens when one is asked about the literature of East Germany. Immediately one starts thinking about the literature of West Germany. But if one is asked to discuss the literature of West Germany, one's mind inevitably wanders to the literature of East Germany. They are two separate literatures, but only superficially do they constitute two separate phenomena. The one cannot be understood without the other.

It is easy enough to complain that contemporary German writers cannot be compared with the prewar giants—Brecht, the Mann brothers, the Zweig non-brothers, Lion Feuchtwanger, Anna Seghers. There are potential giants: Günter Grass (West) and Peter Hacks (East). The question is, why have they remained only potential? The difference between the older and the younger generation of German writers is probably not one of native gifts but of native land—of wholeness as against halfness.

All German writers today, East, West and in exile, are suffering from a split psyche. Kaiser Germany and Hitler's Third Reich, and the impotent Weimar Republic sandwiched in between, may not have been the most reassuring native land—with its amoebically, cannibalistically fluid borders—but it was a whole. It had one past, one present and presumably one future. Its culture, despite all the inner contradictions, belonged to one people. It was not a happy people. The number of writers it drove to suicide, insanity or exile is an appalling statistic. Yet Germany's exiled writers had no peace; they kept returning, spiritually or physically, to the scenes that had tormented them and driven them away.

It was Heine who wrote from Paris:

*When I think on Germany at night
I toss and turn till morning light*

Peter Weiss in Sweden finds himself doubly exiled. Unable to identify himself with either East or West Germany, he cannot write about contemporary Germany at all. On the other hand, his "Ten Theses of the Writer in a Divided World," a soul-searching analysis of contemporary political alternatives, could have been written only by a German today—a divided German. In it he floated in spirit, like Heine's ghost, over the two halves of his native land, in each half preferring this and rejecting that, and finally floating away again to his haunted homelessness.

The dilemma of the halved German writer was keenly described by dramatist Peter Hacks in a spoof aimed at Günter Grass and the guitar-playing East German bard Wolf Biermann who, like Hacks, emigrated from West to East Germany out of political conviction, and who has been in the doghouse in that country for about a year. In a letter in the West German magazine, Theater heute, describing the plot for a new comedy, Hacks wrote that his hero, "a German petty bourgeois" named Wolf-Günter, was accidentally divided in two when the Berlin Wall was built, and has since then existed in two separate halves. Wolf (East) and Günter (West) are absolutely identical; both have "the most comfortably demonic walrus mustache," considerable talent and an enormous need to make an impression; both represent every opinion one can possibly have, and its opposite; and both suffer from unrequited love for the same Fräulein, the government of the half-country in which they respectively dwell. The letter continued:

No one can be more progressive than Wolf when he happens to fall among the capitalists, and no one more reactionary than Günter with the Communists. . . . They do not realize that the German states, both the Socialist and the capitalist, are exactly as the requirements of the historical situation compel them to be; they imagine that both states could be somewhat more Wolf-Günterish, if they only wanted to be. This error is reinforced by their physiological need to reunite. . . .

The joke, says Hacks, is that this hero just cannot leave his government in peace. No sooner has he sung its praises again than "something funny happens—his house door is set on fire [this happened to Grass], he gets bawled out by the Minister of the Interior [this happened to Biermann], etc." The climax comes when the double hero, now played by one actor, visits his head of state to offer him advice. At the right sits the Chancellor, at the left the Chairman. Wolf-Günter, at downstage center, says his piece and gets kicked in the pants by both chiefs.

All the German writers, including Hacks, regardless of their class position, regardless of their political acumen or lack of it, have been more or less crippled by the partition of their country. All have been trying to fly with one wing. It is the fate of every German writer who commits himself to the East (unless he is writing for a hypothetical posterity) to have to devote all his energy to hastening the progress of socialism and helping to block the encroachments of West Germany's neo-Nazism. Decadent frivolity is not for him. And it is the fate of every German writer who takes his chances with the West to have to make rejection of the East German way of life a fundamental tenet of his Weltanschauung (unless he doesn't mind not being published).

Biermann, feeling intolerably cramped between these alternatives, tried to withdraw from absolute commitment and sit on the fence, i.e., the wall—or rather, to "promenade along the top of the wall," as he wrote in his ballad on François Villon (with whom he likes to identify himself). But the political tensions in Germany have been too acute; and he has not been allowed any public concerts since 1965. There is no place like Germany for making it clear that a Third World does not exist.

Grass, too, has unsuccessfully tried to swerve around partisanship or to hit it and run. In The Tin Drum, he appeared to be merely getting the hilarious tantrums of his Danzig youth out of his system, making some universally valid comments on the position of the artist in society, and suggesting that the Nazis had been rather ridiculous. But the book unraveled itself and wound up in a tangle of repetitions. He tried also to maintain the stance of superb indifference to commitment in Cat and Mouse, setting up a gargantuan phallus to divert attention from the fact that he was evading a real viewpoint.

In neither of these works was there anything to offend Bonn. On the contrary, Grass's novels were welcomed as the ideal window dressing. His dull and turgid third novel, Dog Years, made at least one thing clear: he had paid the full price of admission to the West German establishment—outspoken rejection of the GDR.

His play, The Plebeians Rehearse the Uprising (1966), underlined this. Written in mock-Brecht verse, the idea was that German workers are too tame to rebel against injustice, and that Brecht was no better because he supported the government of the GDR.

These last two works insured Grass absolute Narrenfreiheit (fool's immunity) in West Germany. He could embarrass the Social Democrats by barnstorming for them on a platform all his own; he could fulminate to his heart's content against the powerful Christian Democrats with whom they were planning a coalition, but artistically he had reached the pass described above. Scarcely fledged, he had lopped off his left wing.

Tactfully not mentioning any names, Erich Fried said at the Gruppe 47 meeting in Princeton last year that most

THE LOVE SINGER

*Suddenly he appeared in our lives
Without a shadow
Crying "Joy" in a language that
We had forgotten or never knew
As syllables dropped like kumquats
From his tongue and he smiled at boys
In the street who made fun of him. He Did not seem Western — he was too mad for
That — jangled and put together in a shabby way
That might have embarrassed us. And from What place in the East he had arrived we could Not tell — he seemed to have shed his origin
The way flowers shed petals
Until only the stem remains. And he was
That stem. Thin, made of sunlight, his face burned
By wind (all the streets he had been to!)
And he wandered
Past gaps, white buildings,
Glassy windows bursting with Jewelry, past flowers,
Mirrors —
And what he sang was again this word "Joy," Sounding so much like a bird
Calling to his invisible mate
As he flies beyond the New Territories
Then dips into a mountain

Love Singer! Perhaps he once played at being
A dove or a vulture or a god in China before Singing
In parking lots, gardens, traffic, new Hotel lobbies. And we listened.

What has bothered me all afternoon
Is not his name,
Or what he sang — or even his small
Instrument that seemed to be cared for and polished
By feathers — but that here, in this city,
Everyday we have seen this miracle monger
Walking the streets. But never Did I hear him speak to me so clearly.*

SANDRA HOCHMAN

writers are success addicts, not for money alone but because success is the confirmation that they are not isolated, that they have found their audience. "Just like other addicts, they can be corrupted through what they strive for." The statement is suggestive for the predicament of all German writers, regardless of which side they are on.

In East Germany, however, it is mainly socialism they are striving for. A publisher there told us years ago that he was becoming impatient with dark hints of subjects that were too hot to handle. He was beginning to doubt that the manuscripts existed at all. "They're never submitted to me," he said. "Where are they?" They were simply self-censored before pen was ever put to paper. "Corrupted" is scarcely the word for the earnestly self-denying artist in the GDR. Truncated, yes. Hamstrung, and loaded down like Atlas. Fearing that too much criticism of his society may hurt the cause, he tempers and minimizes by conscientiously piling on the counter-evidence and does the best he can to achieve "Socialist realism," which has never yet been satisfactorily defined but seems to mean—roughly—silhouetting the story, however grim, against a backdrop irradiated by the rising sun of socialism.

At the same time, he is writing at top speed, constantly mindful that socialism is in a race for its life and that he is supposed to be inspiring the laggards. But can he, at this frantic hobble, with the world on his back, produce art?

With great fanfare, a Soviet novel full of cathartic heresies was publicized and widely circulated in East Germany in 1962: Battle on the Way, by the late Galina Nikolayeva. Bachirev, an engineer who refuses to turn out poor-quality tractors, opposes Valgan, the works manager, who doesn't care what junk comes off the assembly line as long as high production figures bring him glory. Valgan is supported by the entire party apparatus; the Communist father of the heroine Tina has died innocent in one of Stalin's prisons; and Tina is shown to be a more valuable person than the wife of the man she is having an affair with. This was the first time a book published in the GDR admitted that such things happened. There was a reason.

Theoretically, the Berlin Wall built in 1961 had put East Germany in a position to recover from the financial catastrophes of the open frontier and to operate without further losses. In practice there were huge stumbling blocks. The worst was the inefficiency caused by bureaucracy and the acute labor shortage. Battle on the Way was part of a drive to raise production and quality simultaneously. It was read by hundreds of thousands of people and discussed in the party press and in factory meetings for weeks. It opened the floodgates to an unprecedented wave of salutary, desperately needed criticism.

A spate of outspoken novels by East German writers followed, among them: Ole Bienkopp by Brecht's friend Erwin Strittmatter, poet and dramatist; Divided Heaven by Christa Wolf; The Auditorium by Hermann Kant; and Track of Stone by former [Communist] Party functionary Erik Neutsch.

Neutsch's book, most directly influenced by Nikolayeva, is perhaps the most impressive, a rough block of truth. Werner Horrath, Party Secretary on a gigantic industrial project in the GDR during the fifties, is out to achieve maximum efficiency even if it means exposing comrades who conceal costly mistakes to protect their own position, and rewarding useful workers who may be non-party or anti-party. He is trapped in a tragic conflict between this aim and his clandestine love for Katrin, a recently graduated engineer, whom he has gotten pregnant.

Their involvement starts when she helps him win over and recruit a boastful tough named Balla who spits on all authority and happens to be the best and most influential worker on the project. If Horrath, a married man, confesses to being the father of Katrin's child, it will mean that a party functionary is "no better" than an "element" like Balla, and therefore the party will have to throw him out when he is accomplishing the most and his personal prestige is so crucial. This is exactly what happens. He finally confesses and is fired; but through his too protracted, Hamlet-like vacillation he has lost both Katrin and his wife. We see him at the end, dreary and lonely, looking for a job as a day laborer—senselessly wasted human material.

The bad writing in this book makes one's hair stand on end, but it sold 216,000 copies. In distinction to West Germany, where the novel-buying public is relatively limited (high prices are one reason), a bestseller in East Germany reaches the masses and is judged more for its direct relation to their lives than for its artistic value. Neutsch's book had raised the question of officious and destructive party interference in private lives. It had cast doubt on the whole rigid moral standard preached by the party but impossible to reconcile with changing conditions, particularly the family upheavals that result from the changing status of women.

The hero in Ole Bienkopp is a resourceful oddball, a Communist peasant whose "bee head" is always buzzing with plans for improvement. His frustrating struggle with party bureaucrats ("soulless bureaucrats" was a popular expression in the party press in the early sixties) ultimately leads him to suicide. Strittmatter's dour understatement and startling, compact images provide more literary pleasure than the other three novels, although the book is marred by an overabundance of farmyard details.

In Divided Heaven, Christa Wolf tackled the question of why so many valuable intellectuals deserted to the Federal Republic before 1961 (when the wall was built). The heroine has to decide between her love for the gifted chemist, Manfred, who has asked her to follow him to West Berlin, and her loyalty to the GDR. She decides for the GDR, i.e., for solidarity, for the collective, for the hard but honest way, as against the moral maelstrom of casual, overnight betrayal. This simple appeal to Socialist conscience sold not only 244,000 in the GDR but 10,000 in West Germany, and the film made from it (Die Welt of Hamburg called it "amazingly potent artistically") reached still wider audiences on both sides.

Before the publication of his first novel, The Auditorium, Hermann Kant was best known for his elegant newspaper polemics against West Germany's Kulturpolitik. A young electrician just home from the army after World War II, Kant himself went to college in the "Workers' and Peasants' Faculty" in the then Soviet Zone, an institution which gave the children of the poor their first chance for a university education in Germany. From the vantage point of today's sophistication, Kant portrays the raw kids who were his roommates, charting through their careers the jagged but inexorable upward graph of the GDR.

The story tells of the unexplained defection of his friend Quasi, a promising mathematician, to West Germany. Kant finds him years later in Hamburg, impassively running a beer joint, betraying neither regret nor satisfaction. This reminder of the loss of identity in the plunge from world to world, of the heart-sinking but never acknowledged realization that one has made a bad bargain by crossing over—an everyday tragedy in divided Germany before the wall was built—is the most effective single detail in the book. It gives the tale a resonance otherwise lacking, for Kant prefers to maintain an ironic, off-hand tone, forbidding not only sentimentality but sentiment.

In short, the self-censorship in the East was giving way, and authors had begun to feel that their first responsibility was to the truth, insofar as they could discover it. Without the cleansing truth, the new conflicts emerging under socialism would never be settled satisfactorily. Kant, Christa Wolf and Neutsch represent the generation that was just coming of age at the end of the war, the legatees of shame, horror, devastation and hunger, those who saw just enough of the Nazis to feel an inner ethical obligation toward anti-fascism for the rest of their lives.

They are all upright puritans, reformers, who reject the material temptations of the West as not very attractive bait set by the neo-Nazis. To them the simple life of the GDR, neither poor nor luxurious, calm, rather pedestrian, but free of rat race, is such an incomparable improvement over fascism that nothing could make them betray it. Faults in the fabric have to be corrected—by “us,” because it is “our” state. Not by some abstract “them.”

The building of the Berlin Wall had a paradoxical effect. It clearly defined a separation that had long existed without being generally acknowledged. It compelled respect on both sides by proclaiming the GDR's intention to defend its statehood. But it also aroused—such is the psychological effect of a wall—the longing to cross it.

During a brief period that began in about 1962 and culminated in 1965, a tentative rapprochement was brought about between the East and West German writers which both found very exciting. They held radio debates, gave joint readings, spoke at each other's congresses, and published selections from each other's work. These contacts were accompanied by violent friction, aggressive defensiveness and hurt love. The majority of West German writers dislike their government, but they also dislike the position of the writer in East Germany. The East German writers, while sensitive to the charge that state-sponsored “Socialist realism” narrows the approach to truth and art, feel that their West German counterparts are jeering all the louder to distract attention from the price they pay for survival—if not express anti-communism, then prolonged adolescence in the form of the whole faddist bag of mini-literature, pessimism, absurdity and cruelty.

Yet the more dedicated the East German writer was to socialism, the more his West German colleague grudgingly respected him; and the more fun the West Germans had at wild parties of art on the loose, the more the East Germans longed to abandon themselves—if only they had the time! Both worshiped one literary idol: Brecht. Each found in him the justification for his own way, as well as the painfully persuasive argument for the other side.

It was like an anxious, illicit love affair, taking place in a sphere which realistically did not exist, and it was viewed with increasing disapprobation by both German governments. West German non-Communist writers were making drastic anti-government statements which influenced students and intellectuals. East German writers, intoxicated by the thaw on both frontiers, were happily prying open every closet in which they suspected a skeleton.

This game of transmutal puss in the corner was abruptly stopped at the end of 1965, a period of mounting political tension, when the German Federal Republic announced openly its desire to possess nuclear weapons, “liberate” the East Germans, and restore the frontiers of 1937. In a crack-down that started at its 11th Plenum in December, 1965, the Socialist Unity [Communist] Party of the GDR made it clear that any thaw was an intellectual hallucination unless peace was guaranteed. It forbade all art that it termed “pessimistic,” “skeptical” or “pornographic,” and reduced East-West hobnobbing to a tenuous minimum. Writers who had published in the West works critical of the GDR (Biermann, Stefan Heym), film producers who were working on rebellious films, even writers who merely used “obscene” language, were pilloried in the press for weeks.

The writers were shocked at the harshness of these methods, which were intended as a warning to all of them. They could see the need for increased vigilance, but not for being collared like schoolboys and having their ears boxed, while the good boys in the class, the workers, were encouraged to point at them as a group and laugh. Whereas they had been, and still were, unconditional supporters of Socialist power, the party by no means returned their confidence. What had previously been a voluntary—or rather, an involuntary—self-suppression, based on a feeling of responsibility, was now blurred by official censorship. Film contracts were canceled, publishers' lists were revised, plays were dropped from consideration, and no one knew what to write. The result was that not one East German novel, play or film of any value emerged in the GDR in 1966.

It was a lean year for West German literature too. The writers there were not unaffected by events. They had lost a dimension, an illusion, an escape valve. Feeling rebuffed by the Socialist state, abused in their own state (“little yapping terriers” was ex-Chancellor Erhard's term for them), they not only became increasingly precious, form-obsessed, and isolated from ordinary people; they also turned contemptuously on one another, expending a disproportionate amount of ingenuity on reciprocal verbal mutilation.

Peter Hacks, who poked fun at Biermann and Grass, is not likely to have the last laugh. He, whose favorite form is tragicomedy, is himself a tragicomic figure dancing in the air above the wall. He could easily be the model for the Schuhu in his delightful fairy tale about a boy with wings who came out of a very hard egg; while the flying princess who betrays him with a dull cheese merchant may be the GDR. In the end she returns to him and they set up house-keeping on top of a mountain. Hacks has just had a new comedy published in West Germany; it contains a number of gibes at the GDR, and GDR officials have shown that they are not amused. A public reading of Margarete in Aix, whose subject is the alienation of the

A brilliant analysis of Africa's tumultuous politics over the past decade

This book clarifies the continuing Congo crisis . . . the convulsions in other African states . . . the maneuvers of African delegations in the UN. Behind all these events, Professor Wallerstein traces a revolutionary movement which formally states its objective as African unity—but which really aims for full equality with Europe and America, and a reorganization of the world economy for particularly African purposes.

AFRICA: THE POLITICS OF UNITY

By IMMANUEL
WALLERSTEIN
Author of *Africa:
The Politics of Independence*

$4.95, now at your bookstore
RANDOM HOUSE

artist in society, was canceled, and the [Communist] Party paper attacked him.

Hacks, now 38, did not grow up in the GDR. Having read Hegel and Marx, he had decided for communism and flown on his Schuhu wings in 1955 to the part of Germany where Hegel and Marx were taught. But his feet never quite touched the ground there. The conflict between idea and reality is the dynamic of most of his work.

He is enormously talented. Like Brecht and Lewis Carroll, he can be didactic with charm. He combines perfect poetic pitch, a lusty whimsy, and an informed and ruthless insight into human motives. Yet all his seven plays are too cerebral, too green, too torn. They are the work of a changeling who stands behind a curtain and peeps out with big, strange eyes at the funny way his adopted family eats soup:

*Have I been talking again? I admit
I do like talking. The right words attach Themselves to things like handles
So you can pick them up and move them.*

Talk about them and you've got them.

says the title figure of one of his plays, Moritz Tassow, a utopian Socialist and motley fool in whom Hacks evidently meant to satirize a cast-off self. But the play remains an unsettled argument in the author's head, between disappointing but probably necessary party pragmatism and a Communist idealism for which the people are probably not yet ready. The party was not prepared to admit that pragmatism was holding idealism on a leash, and the play was taken off the boards—the second time this happened to Hacks. Where can he go from here?

*The knowledge of man's ways is something special.
I uttered many judgments, judgments of all kinds
And everything I said was said too soon,*

mourns Vaudemont in Margarete in Aix.

"I cannot agree," said Anna Seghers at the GDR Writers' Conference last November, "with certain criticisms. Imagination withers away when it is underestimated and all its thinking is done for it. Gorky did not only write the novel The Mother, often considered the source of the laws of Socialist realism. He also wrote about all sorts of destinies that stirred him, short stories and plays; he wrote fairy tales too, about departed or invented worlds." She warned against "intimidating in the very process of arising" experiments which are "premonitions of the new world to come."

One thing is certain: The two worlds in which the writers of East and West Germany live are drifting rapidly apart, pulled by antagonistic political forces. Their separation is already plainly incurable. Within this generation they will evolve into two new German-speaking countries as different from each other as they are from Austria and German Switzerland. Only when this situation is formalized will their two literatures be able to develop from halves to wholes. Each side, left to itself, will find its own separate solution in its own utterly different pattern of life.

All the World's a Toy

A HISTORY OF TOYS. By Antonia Fraser. Delacorte Press. 256 pp. $25.

EUROPEAN AND AMERICAN DOLLS. By Gwen White. G. P. Putnam's Sons. 274 pp. $19.95.

AN ILLUSTRATED HISTORY OF TOYS. By Karl Ewald Fritzsche and Manfred Bachmann. Murray's Books (England). 194 pp. 84s.

JAPANESE TOYS. By Kazuya Sakamoto. Translated by Charles A. Pomerooy. Photographs by Kiyoshi Sonobe. Bijutsu Shuppan-Sha and Charles E. Tuttle Co. 516 pp. $17.50.

CHESTER JOHNSON

Mr. Johnson is a free-lance science and technology editor and writer. He is the author of Clocks and Watches (Odyssey Press).

"The world," grieved Spinoza, "is God's doll's house"—and whatever else is said in reference to toys is as likely to be true: their universal appeal and symbolism is nothing mysterious. The Australian aborigines—until recently a people using only five tools and no clothes—were reputed to be toyless, but aboriginal youngsters have been discovered cherishing worn-out stone choppers, cuddling them and wrapping them up at night. Toys, as we learn from these four books, implement the acting out of children's emotional needs; they are necessary props in the child's psychic staging. Toyless children find it difficult to externalize their private worlds, and it has been proved that a lack of toys contributes to the emotional remoteness of institutionalized children. Like adult religious and magical paraphernalia, toys can be objects of ritual potency. It is this archetypal character in toys—often destroyed in the gimmick-obsessed market place—that enables certain of them to remain satisfying through centuries and even millennia.

Toys are almost as much admired by adults as by children. The hackneyed tableau of Dad, monopolizing Junior's train, is not far from the truth. Multi-ulcered executives can while away the weekend's milk-fed hours by reconstructing in "durable plastic" the Pierce Arrow limousine that "Dad had," leaving Junior to paint blood on the stump neck of his headless toy Frankenstein's monster and Sis to ponder (archetypally) what color bra the crew-cut Ken doll would like to see on his nubile, modeled-to-look-willing Barbie. Provided with wardrobes for all (socially acceptable) occasions these dolls (both American and British versions are illustrated in the Fraser book) are on the make and ready to go.

Fortunately for adults, toys can be collected as well as played with, and it is this penchant for preserving former playthings as present objects of virtue that allows us to gain some idea of the evolution and significance of toys. Collectors and publishers form a happy symbiosis: to a large extent they depend upon one another. A collector of any ilk must have reference books; in the present competitive collecting arena (where early Coca-Cola bottles are bringing $25 each) collectors can still afford to read about what they can no longer afford to buy.

Antonia Fraser (mother of five, daughter of an earl, and wife of an M.P.) has put together a "reading-type" book, illustrated with an Argus eye on the general reader's potential interest in toys; she has thoroughly surveyed the toy world from Pharaonic pottery mice to Edwardian orthopters, to "spy dolls" for smuggling microfilm—even to toys for Thalidomidized children. The illustrations, whether plain or in color, are clear, and there are more than 300.

As outlined in the author's first chapter, a satisfying toy must furnish the child with possibilities for pleasure.

Coming Next Week

THE NATION

SPRING BOOK NUMBER

a distinguished group of contributors in a special issue on the new poetry fantasy and imitation (although one wonders what the G-string clad Indian youngster, reproduced from an Elizabethan drawing, made of the farthingale doll given her by Roanoke colonists). Animal and human dolls often invite profound and powerful emotional investment; they may, like the poet John Betjeman's teddy bear, be cherished as talismans into adulthood.

Many of the elaborately dressed dolls of the past, now collectors' prizes, survive because they were not played with. A successful toy is one you can do something with or to. If it is too complete and elaborate, as were many Victorian and Edwardian dolls, the grownups may ration its use, "until you show greater responsibility"; by that time, of course, it may have been forsaken for an old rag doll or a rough wood wagon. Children will innovate and improvise; the author mentions the "emergent toys" made by poor children, and illustrates a pathetic but arresting 1905 vintage doll made from an old shoe, now preserved in that unique institution, the Museum of Childhood in Edinburgh.

Certain toys—weapons, dolls, rattles, soldiers, pull toys—are immortal. The yo-yo (once a deadly weapon in the Philippines) is an example: first a toy in the ancient Far East, it created a craze in Directoire France and was greeted with the same enthusiasm in England and the United States during the 1920s. The toys of older children reflect the life style of the age—and to us they are important as cultural pieces of the past. Some of them, the playthings of long dead princes, are works of art; the author mentions and illustrates many too beautiful to have been played with. Queen Mary's doll house, designed by Sir Edwin Lutyens, architect of New Delhi, had a real wine cellar (teetotalers objected), and was equipped with working plumbing, miniature versions of books autographed by their real authors, scale-built models of royal Daimlers, and a phonograph which played God Save the King (meanwhile back in the London slums, some child was cuddling that shoe doll).

Gwen White's European and American Dolls and their marks and patents is her eighth work on the subject and (with its many illustrations of dolls' body structure in "anatomical" detail) is a serious reference work for the doll collector's library. Collectors and dealers of Victorian and Edwardian dolls will find the 28 pages of makers' names and the 625 makers' marks and trade names invaluable (Paladin Baby, the Flirt, Joli Baby, Mein Liebling). To the noncollector the book is a compendium of arcane lore; how many of us realize that bereaved 16th- and 17th-century mothers had their deceased babes miniaturized in flesh-colored wax? One of the many intriguing photographs shows Ondine, a wide-eyed, French swimming doll, sedately breast stroking (in the author's tub?) like an imagined great-aunt, across the Titanic-engulfing waters.

An Illustrated History of Toys, translated from the original German, is a natural history of traditional German toy making, illustrated with numerous plates and some sixty woodcuts, a restful change from the usual flashy coffee-table layout and design. Although the authors mention modern mechanical and even fad toys, their prime focus is on hand-carved toys made by individual craftsmen. They describe how the toys were made (up to 100 little wood horses can be sliced from a properly profiled, lathe-turned dish); how they were activated (by updrafts from candle flames, trickling sand, bobbing weights); and how they were and still are gathered from the individual carvers and marketed all over the world.

Some of the items are not, properly speaking, toys; they are seasonal souvenirs for feast days, local and national holidays and village processions. German wood carvers enjoyed, at best, a rather precarious living; they carved anything that would sell (locally or abroad) but it is noteworthy, amid the current welter of plastic rockets and machine guns, that the handcrafted toy is still a living industry.

Dolls are often gods or demons that have fallen from power—obsolete magic is sometimes relegated to the nursery. Traditional Japanese dolls and toys were seldom only playthings; most of them, as strikingly illustrated in Japanese Toys, derive from ritual and ceremonial objects; some of them are even now supposed not to be devoid of their original magic powers. Windmills, tops, straw mobiles, masks, kites, drums, whisks, plaited objects of sun-bleached straw, talismanic wands—abstract, humorous, serene, violent, mysterious, arresting, eldritch—they are all of these. A "pure"-looking toy whisk has the function of "banishing the summer lethargy which often overtakes children." Some look truly inscrutable; only a few examples, such as the Daruma doll (a bobbing, self-righting, smiling torso modeled after Japan's Buddhist "Saint Patrick," whose legs withered away during nine years of contemplation) are remotely familiar to Westerners.

We would, as with some of the German carvings, regard many of these strange but evocative objects as charms, souvenirs, keepsakes, talismans and mascots, rather than playthings. Like the German traditional toys, many of them are still handcrafted and produced only regionally for certain festival days, more or less uncorrupted by commercial exploitation.

Tradition and craftsmanship still have their place in a quite different part of the Japanese toy realm. Exquisite emperor and empress dolls (along with court ladies, samurai and guards) are still made for Japan's yearly Doll Festival; so precious were these dolls—with which youngsters were taught to recognize the hierarchy of the ancien régime—that they were kept apart in little brick houses of their own, in case the owners' were destroyed by earthquake.

Primarily an album, Japanese Toys consists of a general introduction, followed by the plates (grouped under the six main regions of Japan) and notes about the plates. All the books are well made except the German one, which has fragile cardboard covers and brittle paper. Is there, however, a sufficient audience to save them from the remainder sale?

Book Marks

THE JOURNALS OF DAVID E. LILIENTHAL. Vol. 3: VENTURESOME YEARS, 1950-1955. Harper & Row. 647 pp. $11.95.

The latest volume of the noted Lilienthal diary, published as written day by day during past decades, covers the period just after the author had completed his famous TVA and AEC tours of duty. A revealing picture of a sensitive, dedicated liberal, together with much valuable source material for study of the time—and some candid views of figures still on the public scene.

LABOR AND LIBERTY: The La Follette Committee and the New Deal. By Jerold S. Auerbach. Bobbs-Merrill. 246 pp. $6.50.

A carefully researched, excellent study of the role of the famous La Follette committee during the early years of the New Deal, which gives an unusual insight into the overall background and social philosophy of the entire New Deal era. Yet this book is even more than that—for the author, assistant professor of history at Brandeis University, has astutely chosen as his subject the key transitional period in which American liberalism shifted from a traditional laissez-faire civil libertarian suspicion of "big government" to precisely the opposite position, that federal power is a logical and even indispensable instrument for both social change and the protection of constitutional liberties. The book helps establish a proper rank in American history for the tragic Sen. Robert M. La Follette, Jr., one of the most idealistic spokesmen for American progressivism. A first-rate historical study, with profound implications for today's divisions within the liberal-labor forces.

NEW DEAL THOUGHT. Edited by Howard Zinn. Bobbs-Merrill. 431 pp. $8.50.

Another in the excellent American Heritage Series of anthologies, this volume presents a panoramic view of the New Deal from the writings of those who were formulating and administering it, and also those who were criticizing it for going either too far or not far enough. In his introductory essay, editor Howard Zinn, professor of government at Boston University, sets the stage for the work to come. The selections themselves range from political declarations by President Roosevelt to an analysis of the basic problems of the farm worker by Carey McWilliams that is still as appropriate as when it was written twenty-five years ago.

WENDELL WILLKIE: Fighter for Freedom. By Ellsworth Barnard. Northern Michigan University Press. 611 pp. $7.50.

A frankly partisan biography, intended to perpetuate Willkie's reputation as a fighting liberal. A fourteen-year labor of love by the author, professor of English at Northern Michigan University, this work is too specialized for general interest, but serves the worthy purpose of gathering and preserving much valuable first-hand material by and about Willkie and his associates.

MR. JUSTICE MURPHY AND THE BILL OF RIGHTS. By Harold Norris. Oceana Publications. 568 pp. $7.50.

According to this study, during the 1946-52 terms of the United States Supreme Court, Justice Frank Murphy was the only member of the Court to have a 100 per cent perfect civil liberties voting record on a total of 113 cases for free speech claims, criminal defendants' claims, Negro claims and alien claims. Such was the dedication to civil liberties on the part of Justice Murphy, New Deal leader, former Mayor of Detroit, Governor General of the Philippines, Governor of Michigan, Attorney General of the United States, and finally Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. Murphy's key judicial opinions are included. Harold Norris, a professor at the Detroit College of Law where Murphy once taught, has made an excellent contribution toward perpetuating Murphy's place in American history.

THE COMING OF THE WELFARE STATE. (Revised Edition.) By Maurice Bruce. Schocken Books. 308 pp. $8.95.

The first American edition of a standard history of the welfare state in Great Britain, this book carefully presents contemporary British social policy and legislation within a historical context, beginning with the Industrial Revolution and the Poor Law of 1834. The American edition is enriched by a special essay comparing the British and American social service programs, with emphasis on the parallels. An essential reference work for those concerned with welfare state philosophy in general and with the United Kingdom in particular.

THE HUNGER TO COME. By John Laffin. Abelard-Schuman. 208 pp. $4.95.

A horrifying picture of present and future malnutrition and starvation in the underdeveloped areas of the world, and an impassioned plea for immediate action. The author, a British journalist, argues that American prosperity cannot last more than another fifteen years at the current rate of population growth, because the increased need for public services will swamp the economy at the very time that natural resources will greatly diminish; that, by 1982, one in four of the world's population will be Chinese; and places these problems in a political and economic context. He is at his best in emphasizing the immediate human aspect. As he pointedly remarks: "Responsibility for food supply is no longer a matter for communities or even single countries; it is international and must be so tackled. By failing to tackle it vigorously enough the 'haves' of the world are guilty not merely of criminal negligence but of gross and culpable manslaughter." His solution is a drastic program of world-wide birth control combined with unprecedented efforts to increase food production, particularly food from the sea.

THE INDIAN: America's Unfinished Business. Report of the Commission on the Rights, Liberties, and Responsibilities of the American Indian. Compiled by William A. Brophy and Sophie D. Aberle. University of Oklahoma Press. 236 pp. $5.95.

With major public attention focused on the problems of poverty and civil rights in the nation's urban centers, it is important to be reminded of the contemporary problems of a rural-based ethnic minority, the American Indian. The late William A. Brophy, former Commissioner of Indian Affairs and long one of the foremost experts in the field, was the major architect of this authoritative and sensitive analysis. Though the Indian faces problems common to all rural minorities, there are very significant variations, growing out of the distinctive Indian culture and tribal structure. This much needed book summarizes them with skill and compassion. The text is enhanced by many good photographs.

THE ORDEAL OF DESEGREGATION. By Reed Sarratt. Harper & Row. 374 pp. $7.50.

There has been an urgent need for a volume which would thoroughly and dispassionately assemble and record the facts of the impact upon the South of the landmark decisions of the Supreme Court outlawing segregated public schools. This book by a member of the Southern Regional Education Board may well become the standard reference volume. An indispensable handbook for researchers in this field.

THE WHITE PROBLEM IN AMERICA. By the Editors of Ebony. Johnson Publishing Co. 181 pp. $3.50.

First published as a special issue of Ebony magazine and prepared mainly by staff members, the twenty-one articles in the book include special contributions by Martin Luther King, Jr., James Bald-

$2.95 each

SAVE YOUR COPIES OF

The NATION

• Each file holds a full year's copies.

• Jesse Jones Volume Files for every publication.

• Covered in durable leather like Kivar, title embossed in 16 Kt gold.

Satisfaction guaranteed

Attractive and practical for your home or office

3 for $8.25

ORDER NOW — send check or money order.
MAGAZINE FILE CO.
520 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 36, N. Y.

FREE DESCRIPTIVE FOLDER UPON REQUEST

win, Prof. Kenneth B. Clark, Louis E. Lomax and other distinguished Negro spokesmen. A factual and objective overall picture of the various aspects of the problem facing the American Negro today—which, of course, as the title indicates, originates in the historic problem of the attitude of whites toward Negroes in America. The essays form a distinctive, well-rounded entity that deserves preservation and perpetuation in book form for general attention.

HENRY M. CHRISTMAN

THEATRE

JULIUS ROYICK

This season two new resident professional companies have been started in the South: one in Atlanta and one in New Orleans. Both are run by Northerners. The two theatres are very different, but both seem to be having trouble making headway against the two great problems of the resident theatre movement: the difficulty of putting on good productions with the talent available, and the difficulty of inducing the local public to come and see the shows.

Greater Atlanta has a population of well over a million and is growing rapidly, but until last fall, when Theatre Atlanta's professional company began its career, the city had no professional non-commercial theatre. Yet Theatre Atlanta is not new. Like the resident professional companies in Cleveland, Pittsburgh, Houston, Memphis and elsewhere, it began as an amateur organization.

Last season, Jay Broad came down from New York to become Theatre Atlanta's managing director. Mr. Broad had spent four years running a community theatre (in the relevant jargon "community" means amateur) in Fort Wayne, Ind. He had also directed at a resident professional theatre (now defunct) in St. Paul, Minn., and had done an off-Broadway production of Life Is a Dream by Calderon. For Theatre Atlanta, he recruited a company of twelve Equity actors: six from the Atlanta area who had acted with Theatre Atlanta as amateurs, and six from out of state. Meanwhile, construction was progressing on a splendid new $1,250,000 thrust-stage theatre, built by a wealthy local lady in memory of her daughter who had been killed in the 1962 plane crash that took the lives of so many of Atlanta's prominent citizens. Last November, Theatre Atlanta opened its new home with Peter Shaffer's Royal Hunt of the Sun.

In most cities, professional theatres are slightly ashamed of the recourse they often make to local amateur performers. (Many theatres can afford Equity companies; not so many can afford all-Equity companies.) At Theatre Atlanta, however, they make no bones about their continuing use of "avocational" actors (as they are delicately called) alongside the professionals. Still, the transition from amateur to professional is necessarily traumatic: a small, cozy local institution is suddenly taken over by strangers—who are paid with money raised by those they have in large measure supplanted! (The budget shoots up wildly: from $25,000 to $196,000 in Atlanta.) The lady who met me at the Atlanta airport, a local matron who does volunteer work for the theatre, was quite touchy about the "paid ones," as she called them. "What's the difference?" she asked. One index to what's wrong with American acting is that she's got a point.

The quality of the Atlanta company, judging from the performance I saw of Arthur Miller's After the Fall, is not significantly below that of most resident companies—which is not saying very much. Miller's autobiographical play walks a thin edge between profundity and meretriciousness; Frederick Congdon, who played the lead in Atlanta, pushed it over immediately into meretriciousness and kept it there. The problem was not that Mr. Congdon is a bad actor but that he is the wrong kind of good one.

Miller's hero is tolerable, in his endless concern with his own problems, only because he is really suffering: it was impossible to believe that spruce Mr. Congdon, in his impeccable three-piece suit and rep tie, with his charming little smile, could be really bothered by anything. Certainly nothing in the play had a chance of penetrating his supreme smugness. His performance made me intensely aware of what Jason Robards, the original Quentin, had been able largely to conceal: how Quentin patronizes everyone he meets, how maddeningly self-righteous the character is.

Kathryn Loder as Maggie (the Marilyn Monroe part) had a wonderful bodily characterization, swifty hipped yet vulnerable, but she was limited by the adenoidal, high-pitched voice she affected. It was amazing how much acting Miss Loder was able to do in spite of that voice. The supporting actors contributed some notably unidiomatic performances; watching what appeared to be an all-WASP cast, I was reminded of something Miller himself has had difficulty coming to terms with: the extent to which he is a specifically Jewish playwright. Quentin's mother, for instance, was played by Lila Kennedy, who, I was told, has been for many years the first lady of theatre in Atlanta. Miss Kennedy performed with plenty of dignity and plenty of poise, but she hadn't a clue about what to do with a line like: "Who knew he would end up so big in the gallstones?"

After the Fall is Quentin's self-analysis, delivered to an imaginary psychiatrist: Mr. Broad staged it explicitly as a psychodrama. He added the psychiatrist to the cast, and wrote him a few lines explaining that a group of people have gathered to help Quentin by acting out elements of his past. The actors spent the evening seated in chairs set around the perimeter of the thrust stage, facing inward; they would get up when required, play a scene, and sit down again. The device did not strike me as intrusive, and it may have made the play clearer to those unfamiliar with nonrealistic dramaturgical devices. But Broad carried his scheme to the point where it committed him to an unvarying, rudimentary plan of staging, with setting and lighting to match, and this made a dull production duller.

In addition to After the Fall and Royal Hunt of the Sun, Theatre Atlanta has scheduled Tobacco Road, Waltz of the Toreadors, Caesar and Cleopatra, Boy Meets Girl, Moby Dick (in Orson Welles's adaptation), and a new play for its first season. (Caesar and Cleopatra features the Negro actress Diana Sands as Cleopatra; that ought to stir up some excitement in Atlanta.) The plays are presented in repertory, so that at least two are on view every week. Only four performances are given per week, yet in spite of the novelty of a glamorous new auditorium, in spite of the national publicity attracted by its opening, in spite of the organization's roots in the community, Theatre Atlanta is running at only 55 per cent of capacity. It seats 765; Broad admits that for the present, 400 would have been plenty. But, after all, isn't it shortsighted to build just for the present?

Unfortunately, the power structure and the big money in Atlanta are committed to the Arts Center going up a few blocks away, and have little to spare for the new repertory company. Theatre Atlanta has built for the future, but it is an open question whether it can hold on until the future comes.

The Repertory Theatre of New Orleans has, for the moment, no such problems since it is bankrolled by the federal government to the extent of $500,000 for the season. The money comes from the National Endowment for the Arts and the U.S. Office of Education; it is part of a pilot project to test whether live professional theatre deserves a place in the high school curriculum. The Repertory Theatre's primary function is to mount a season of four productions, each of which is seen free of charge by virtually all of the 38,000 high school sophomores, juniors and seniors in the New Orleans area. (The other part of the project is a similar company, financed by a similar federal grant, in Providence, R. I.) This is not another program to provide "scenes from" this and that to tour high school auditoriums on a shoestring. The Repertory Theatre gives its student audiences full-length, full-scale productions in a 1,500-seat former road-show house; in addition to the student matinees, each production is performed three times a week, at ordinary prices, for the public.

Theatre Atlanta evolved (too quickly for its own good, perhaps) out of an established community group; the Repertory Theatre of New Orleans came into existence last fall by government fiat. Both are having trouble at the box office. The Repertory Theatre has about 5,000 adult subscribers, and sells about 5,000 additional tickets for each production over the counter, which means that the adult performances have taken place before half-empty houses. Stuart Vaughan, producing director of the theatre, complains that "the adult population is extremely slow to respond. . . . I don't think New Orleans would have had a local professional theatre for fifteen or twenty years without government intervention." One New Orleanian I talked to had been to see Vaughan's production of Romeo and Juliet. "It was terrible," he said. "I don't think they changed the scenery three times in the whole production." If this reaction is typical, it would seem that New Orleans has been, as Vaughan says, "a culturally deprived area."

Vaughan is a considerable person in the resident professional theatre movement. At the age of 42, he has been instrumental in founding four resident professional companies in various parts of the country. He was the first artistic director of the New York Shakespeare Festival, the Phoenix Theatre Repertory Company (New York) and the Seattle Repertory Theatre. In December of 1965, he was suddenly dismissed by the board of directors of the Seattle Rep; shortly thereafter, Roger L. Stevens, Special Assistant to the President on the Arts, picked him to head what became the New Orleans company. (Vaughan was chosen as its director before New Orleans was chosen as its location.)

During his days in Central Park with the New York Shakespeare Festival, Vaughan tended toward imaginative, busy productions; he once introduced a miniature circus into Two Gentlemen of Verona. Nowadays his work is more scrupulous, more conservative, more austere; some people find it stuffy.

I keep being interested more and more [he says] in how to make the audience listen to the play on the play's own terms, and less concerned with how to create an exciting success. I think a lot of directors think if you've excited them, you've done it. But I want the audience to see the play. If they want to get excited, that's swell too. . . . Naturally one wants to interest, to move, to excite—but with what? For what purpose? How much?

If a director is determined, as Vaughan is, to avoid directorial razzle-dazzle, he had better have a pretty good group of actors, since they're going to be up there with nothing to distract attention from their deficiencies. Vaughan would seem to be in a good position to form such a company: he is an old hand at the trade, with ten years of experience in fishing the New York talent pool (where nearly all the regional theatres look for their actors). No other American director has had so much practice in putting a resident company together from scratch. Furthermore, he has plenty of money at his disposal: he can afford an all-Equity company, and he can afford a top salary for resident actors of $300 a week. Special guest stars get even more than $300, and so Tessie O'Shea came down to New Orleans to play the Nurse in Romeo and Juliet; Parker Fenelley ap-

THE ISLANDER

*Sugar I am CALLING you. Not Journeyed all these years for this:
You stalking chicken in the subways,
Nights hunched in alleys all to get
That pinch . . . O heartbit,
Fastened to the chair.
Your supper's freezing in the dark.
While I, my prince, my prince . . .
Your fruit lights up.
I watch your hands pulling at the grapes.*

LOUISE GLUCK

pears as the Stage Manager in Our Town, and June Havoc will be Mrs. Malaprop in The Rivals. (Atlanta can't pay any actor more than $150 a week.)

And yet the New Orleans Romeo and Juliet, directed by Vaughan, was not impressive. The first half went well enough, thanks to Miss O'Shea, and Humbert Allen Astredo as Mercutio. Astredo was a mature Mercutio, looking quite a bit older than his friend Romeo. He made no pretensions to elegance; he was even willing to get laughs by gargling and spitting. But he gargled and spat in a likable manner, and he had the bounce and brio the part needs. Miss O'Shea, a stout English vaudevillian who has appeared on Broadway and done a turn on the Ed Sullivan Show, gave her usual performance. But since her usual performance consists mostly of radiating vigorous, vulgar, big-hearted love in all directions, she made a very good Nurse.

After the halfway mark, however, Mercutio is dead, and the Nurse's best opportunities are over; the lovers must carry the play. Vaughan's Romeo and Juliet were attractively youthful, but had not much to offer beyond that. Rex Thompson was, I suppose, a tolerable Romeo of the extreme poetic-exquisite persuasion. As for the Juliet (Gretchen Corbett), she was merely slightly insipid.

Vaughan's staging was straightforward and sensible, but the best that can be said of the production as a whole was that it was better than no Romeo and Juliet at all. Like the work of Vaughan's that I saw in Seattle, it was somewhat dry and lacking in impact.

The conditions I have been describing are by no means peculiar to Atlanta and New Orleans. All over the country, the ambitions of theatrical entrepreneurs have—temporarily, one hopes—outstripped both the capacities of the available talent and the desires of the local audience. Until both the actors and the audiences catch up, the resident theatres would seem to be in for some awkward years.

The Best Way To Get THE NATION

THE NATION 4-17-67
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

- ☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ 6 Months, $6
☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed
(Foreign and Canadian Postage
$1 a year extra)

NAME _____

ADDRESS _____

CITY _____

STATE _____ ZIP NO. _____

Crossword Puzzle No. 1197

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS:

- 1 and 22 down Hamlet finally decided life wasn't what many a heroine faced. (1, 4, 5, 4, 5)
- 9 Thrust out. (7)
- 10 What might he said on slipping back around the meat course? It should make for a clean part. (7)
- 11 Tender, if professional, in what might attract attention on the Rhine. (6)
- 12 Potter with something less than a simple machine carrying timber? (8)
- 14 Ties with those of 17 and 25 sometimes affected by Americans. (7)
- 15 See 21 down
- 17 and 25 A turbulence of air battering the country? (5, 7)
- 19 Do they run from certain pressure to find another similar environment? (7)
- 21 Putting up with what we might have to work in? (8)
- 23 More than a hundred with a ratio so surrounded, in general. (6)
- 25 See 17 across
- 26 Is it hard for a mother-worker? (7)
- 27 and 8 down The equivalent might be of little notice! (2, 3, 4, 2, 3, 4)

DOWN:

- 1 If getting mean, one might so swear on getting older. (9)
- 2 A commander in chief can in the interior be capable of making certain essential changes. (7)

- 3 Lavish. (9)
- 4 Frank is possibly associated with the tournament. (4)
- 5 A period during which one is not allowed to play bridge, perhaps. (10)
- 6 A voice might have one pull the string. (5)
- 7 It might be related to what Keats considered a still unravish'd bride of quietness. (7)
- 8 See 27 across
- 13 Lancing may discover such a condition. (10)
- 15 Part of the big ranch a country considered a cause of dispute. (4, 5)
- 16 It might improve the visibility of animals around the freezing point. (9)
- 18 The bull-dog is an early one. (7)
- 20 High air specialist. (7)
- 21 and 15 across Is the offspring noble, but never the upright type? (4, 5)
- 22 See 1 across
- 24 A famous knight had gone for a good time, it seems. (4)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1196

ACROSS: 1 Block letter; 9 Tumblers; 10 Palmer; 11 Improve; 12 Pinnacle; 14 Indoor; 15 Anglican; 17 Conspire; 20 Refuse; 22 Delight; 24 and 25 down Patron saint; 26 Handel; 27 Imitates; 28 Parrot fever. DOWN: 2 Laborious; 3 Cleaver; 4 List; 5 Tipping; 6 Ellen; 7 Summon; 8 Mercia; 13 Games; 16 Infuriate; 18 Operas; 19 Inhaler; 20 Realize; 21 Senses; 23 India.

TRAVEL

The OTHER Israel—a three-week summer program for young people 21 to 35—a dialogue with young Israeli socialists—meet farmers, workers, Arabs, labor leaders, peace groups, parliament members—live and work in a kibbutz—tour the country, $625.00. For details write: Young Americans for Progressive Israel, 150 Fifth Avenue, Room 700, New York, N.Y. 10011.

PUBLICATIONS

"SELECTED POEMS" of George Flynn (Villiers of London $2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound."—James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at 544—82 St., Brooklyn 9, N.Y.

THE IDLER. Lively, offbeat liberal monthly. Fun to read. Send $2 for trial year's subscription. IDLER, 413B 6th Street, N.E., Washington, D.C. 20002.

AMERICAN HAIKU magazine. Subscription—$3.00 yearly. Box 73, Platteville, Wisconsin 53818.

NEW LITERARY BI-MONTHLY. Fiction and poetry needed. Subscriptions: $3.95 per year. THE INNER WELL, Box 274, Marion, Indiana.

ART

KHAJURAH'S EROTIC SCULPTURES: Thousand Year Old Temple Friezes of Hindu Arts, Carnal Love, Masterpieces Chandra Architecture. Twelve Color Slides $10. TEMPLE VIEWS, Box 25101, Cincinnati, Ohio 45225.

ORIGINALS COST LESS THAN REPRODUCTIONS! Contemporary original signed etchings, lithographs, woodcuts, $3.50. Guarantee. Free brochure. GRAPHIC CIRCLE (NA), 68 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10011.

ORIGINAL LITHOGRAPHS, ETCHINGS: Chagall, Miro, Braque. Moderately priced. Send 50c for color-illustrated catalogue. Kirschner, 90-39 56th Avenue, Elmhurst, New York 11373.

PERSONALS

LEARN YOUR OWN I.Q. Take test at home. Simple, self-scoring. Send $2. for test and scoring instructions. TESTS, 3220 N. Washington, El Monte, California.

I WANT GRAFFITI for my collection. Send to: George, P.O. Box 95, University Station, Seattle, Washington 98105.

WHY WEEKLY PAY FOR WAR? Legally demand income tax refund. Write: TAXPAYERS AGAINST WAR, Box 15394, San Francisco, California 94115.

USE LAWFUL DIRECT ACTION to repeal all abortion laws. LEGALIZE ABORTION, POB 24163, Los Angeles, Calif. 90024.

NON-PROFIT CAMP (inter-racial, inter-religious) desperately needs donation of pianos. Tax deductible. Will pick up. Box 600, c/o The Nation.

IMPOSE legal $30,000,000 Public Fine on U.S. Business to Protest Vietnam War. Write: DOVE, Box 1049, Jamaica, N.Y. 11431.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

Buy Your Books through The Nation

Nation readers can avail themselves of our offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S., at the regular retail price post-free. When ordering, please give name and author and publisher, if possible. Remittance must accompany order. Make checks payable to THE NATION.

Reader's Service Division
333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

100 Years of Fighting Stampedes*

THE NATION

has managed to survive, the Decatur (Illinois) Herald observed on the occasion of our centennial, "by fighting stampedes for over a hundred years."

Heading off stampedes is peculiarly American; the country has the energy and space to set hoofs really thundering. We call to mind only a few of the most irrational flights: the jingoism that plunged us into wars with Mexico and Spain, the hypocritical hysteria of Prohibition, the "uproar" of McCarthyism, "Let's Get Hoffa!," "Send in the Marines!" (to Haiti, Nicaragua, the Dominican Republic, Cuba, etc.), "we must beat the Russians to the moon," the anti-missile missile, the SST. The list is long.

Some of the stampedes of the last 102 years ran over us roughshod, some we slowed a bit, some we helped to stop. But there are few we failed to challenge. If you think Bonanza is where the action is, come out on the range with The Nation.

*("Stampede, n. v. any headlong flight of a large group; from Mex.-Sp. estampida or 'uproar.'")

"The South's hope, Dennett reported, was that the former slaveholders would 'get the States back into their hands,' for they 'much preferred that the freedmen be kept in a condition as nearly as possible resembling their former slavery.'"

"Dennett's dispatches are examples of masterly journalism. Dennett died in 1874—before the slaveholders got back the states, overthrew the Reconstruction, and reduced the freedmen to a condition resembling slavery."

N. Y. Times 10/31/65

FREE

With every new subscription

Fill out the subscription coupon at right, and begin receiving The Nation, this country's oldest weekly journal of opinion—a truly independent, critical weekly—which since July 6, 1865, has been in the forefront of the fight for civil rights.

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N.Y. 10014

Herewith is my order and payment for a NEW subscription to The Nation. Please send me FREE a copy of THE SOUTH AS IT IS by John Richard Dennett.

☐ One Year, $10 ☐ Two Years, $18 ☐ 6 Months, $6
(Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 per year extra)

NAME

ADDRESS

CITY STATE ZIP No.

4-17-67

NASA: THE IMAGE MISFIRES WILLIAM HINES

THE

NATION

CORLINGAME

APRIL 24, 1967 35 cents

APR 24 1967

LIBRARY

POETS ON POETRY

Definitions and Forecasts in a Time of Crisis

ESSAYS by

LOUIS SIMPSON
ROBERT BLY
STEPHEN KOCH
SIDNEY BERNARD
WENDELL BERRY

NEW POEMS by

RICHARD EBERHART
JOHN HAINES
JAMES MERRILL
STANLEY MOSS
NED O'GORMAN
ADRIENNE RICH

MICHAEL GOLDMAN on JAMES DICKY
DAVID IGNATOW on HARVEY SHAPIRO
JOHN LOGAN on A. R. AMMONS
M. L. ROSENTHAL on JAMES TATE
PAUL ZWEIG on ROBERT LOWELL

NEW TRANSLATIONS

ANNA AKHMATOVA by STANLEY KUNITZ
CESAR VALLEJO by CLAYTON ESHLEMAN

MS-801
AME PUB LIBRARY
PNIA 54010

NEWSPAPER N

LETTERS

SDS on draft

Corona del Mar, Calif.

DEAR SIR: In "Laying Freedom on the Line" [The Nation, Mar. 20] Paul Good quotes David Mitchell as saying, "Students for a Democratic Society backed off from an anti-draft program after the Administration's get-tough policy scared them." He also quotes Staughton Lynd: "I don't understand why SDS decided not to emphasize an anti-draft program."

Perhaps these quotes are not very recent. I enclose for your information a copy of SDS's Anti-Draft Resolution, a major product of this winter's National Council meeting.

Because of SDS's decentralized democratic structure, of course, local chapters determine for themselves the extent to which they wish to emphasize anti-draft activity.

Leslie Lincoln

Miss Lincoln enclosed a copy of the SDS resolution which, among other points, authorizes SDS members to organize unions of draft resisters, and which opposes any attempt to "legitimize" Selective Service by currently proposed reforms—which would not in the view of the National Council change its basic purpose: "to abduct young men to fight in aggressive wars."

The Editors

Lincoln on war

Decatur, Ga.

DEAR SIR: An editorial in the Mar. 13 Nation describes President Johnson reading Abraham Lincoln's famous passage on criticism of Presidential war efforts, and thereby implying that Lincoln's Civil War role was similar to his own in Vietnam. Less well known, but perhaps equally topical, are Lincoln's views on the Mexican-American War as expressed in his Campaign Autobiography, 1860:

... the President [Polk] had sent General Taylor into an inhabited part of the country belonging to Mexico, and not to the United States, and thereby had provided the first act of hostility, in fact the commencement of the war. . . . Mr. Lincoln thought the act of sending an armed force among the Mexicans was unnecessary, inasmuch as Mexico was in no way molesting or menacing the United States or the people thereof; and that it was unconstitutional, because the power of levying war is vested in Congress, and not in the President.

S. Schroeder

Friendship and Fratricide

New York City

DEAR SIR: David Cort's review [The Nation, Mar. 20] of Meyer Zeligs' remarkable book, Friendship and Fratricide, has given it the stature and importance it deserves. . . . Dr. Zeligs demolishes Chambers' credibility. Mr. Cort concludes, just as did I, that Alger Hiss must be vindicated. . . .

Eleanor L. Furman

throwaway line

Northridge, Calif.

DEAR SIR: Fred Cook's chilling article ["The Right Has Nine Lives." The Nation, Mar. 13] neglected a major dimension of the great right-wing brainwash. This is the local neighborhood newspaper—usually an advertising throwaway and almost always enthusiastically committed to the hard right-wing line. . . .

Nicholas V. Seidita

EDITORIALS

The Humphrey-Nixon Law

One of the great, though necessarily narrow, sociological discoveries of the century applies to Vice Presidents. It was first established during the Eisenhower administration, when Richard M. Nixon was so vehemently attacked by aggrieved Latin Americans that the President considered flying down an expeditionary force to bring him back in one piece. Now the law has been confirmed by Hubert Humphrey's recent experiences and observations in Europe. Like all recent great scientific formulations, the Humphrey-Nixon Law does not lend itself to precise description without a computer, but for the layman it may be stated in this fashion: When the Vice President ventures abroad, the louder the volume of the boos, the more jeering and flag ripping, the more paint and eggs thrown in his direction, the more splendid must be the reception accorded him on his return. The reasoning is that the more the Vice President has been affronted, the better must have been the job he did.

The law does not apply to lesser officials, such as Secretaries of State. It is conceivable that some day a Secretary may be thrown into a tar pit or down a manhole, but so far no one has bothered to notice Mr. Rusk or his predecessors, one way or the other.

For Vice Presidents, however, the law is infallible. If one of them journeyed to foreign parts and was greeted with applause and adulation, it would be the ruin of his career. Vice Presidents with an eye on the Presidency would do well to arrange to be driven from as many capitals as will cooperate—particularly those of friendly countries. An opera singer, however talented, must have the reassurance of a claque; the inverse rule, for the Vice President, is to be in danger at least of having his clothes ruined. The cry will then go up, "He can take it."

Some scientists have tried to draw the conclusion that the clamor of dissatisfied foreigners is directed not against the Vice President as a person but at this nation and its policies. There may be something to this, but it would not be good politics to admit it, since the policies of the United States will never be changed to suit other nations. We are the rulers and, as the Hon. Mendel Rivers has put it with laconic originality, they can go fly a kite. Another sound reason for keeping the intrepidity of the Vice President on a personal basis is that it redounds to the advantage of the incumbent President and his party. By putting on a big show and praising Mr. Humphrey's eloquence and ability, Mr. Johnson was also calling attention to his own qualities, which naturally must exceed those of his coadjutor. And, as a valuable by-product, all good Americans can see what dogs those Commies are, to abuse a good-natured man like Hubert, who comes to them with a big grin on his face, love in his heart, and just a whiff of napalm.

With But One Voice

The Establishment has spoken. If one were looking for a classic demonstration of how it swings into line against one of its own who has had the temerity to deviate, no better example could be found than the reaction to Dr. Martin Luther King's declaration of opposition to the war in Vietnam. This is not to say that the Establishment is a monolith or that its members conspire to put down the dissenter. It is simply that the most sacred tenet of accepted institutions and those who adhere to them remains, with little modification, "my country right or wrong." When we are at war, no matter how infamous the war may be, you must not say publicly what a great part of the nation—and the world—thinks and says in private. If you do, the Establishment forgets its internal differences and unites against you.

Dr. King is certainly no firebrand, and his Southern Christian Leadership Conference has served as a bridge between the moderate civil rights organizations, such as the NAACP and the Urban League, and the militant Congress of Racial Equality and Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee. Hence, as in all such cases, the chastisement begins with a tone more in sorrow than in anger, in the hope that the erring sinner, having learned his lesson, will return to the fold. Dr. King's "friends" have spoken of his "tragic" (or "monumental") mistake, the "sorrowful occasion" which compels them to part from him, the "grave injury" he has done to the civil rights movement and to himself. "Many who have listened to him with respect," The Washington Post editorializes, "will never again accord him the same confidence." His usefulness, in this view, is all but over, unless he repairs quickly to the mourners' bench.

What has happened, what is going to happen, tells much about Dr. King as a man and a moral leader; it tells even more about the Establishment. What did its officers expect him to do? Stand still, with summer coming up and tensions rising? The more sensible voices among those who deplore Dr. King's declaration are compelled to concede that the civil rights movement has been stymied, and that the war, if not the sole cause, is the principal one. So once again they expect the Negro to wait, despite the fact that the President could (The Nation does not advocate it), by imposing wage and price controls, carry on both the war and civil rights programs. But that would reduce the prospects for a continuance of profit at the level to which business has become accustomed—the more so because some slight faltering in the onrush of "prosperity" has become evident. This course does not appeal to Mr. Johnson, who, under his Populist cloak, is about as business-minded a President as any we have had in this century. Thus we behold once more the familiar spectacle of pseudo-liberalism seizing on a war in order to avoid expenditures it never liked and to which it yielded only under duress.

Deep down, commercial interests opposed, and will

IN THIS ISSUE

April 24, 1967

EDITORIALS

514

ARTICLES

517 NASA: The Image Misfires

William Hines

POETS ON POETHY

520 Dead Horses and Live Issues Louis Simpson

520 Lions Copulating (poem) Richard Eberhart

522 On Political Poetry Robert Bly

522 The Blue Shutter (poem) Ned O'Gorman

524 Performance Without a Net Stephen Koch

526 Charleston in the 1860s (poem) Adrienne Rich

527 Response to a War Wendell Berry

527 The Wreck (poem) John Haines

528 Anna Akhmatova (translations) Stanley Kunitz

529 Inventing the American Heart Michael Goldman

531 The Past Reordered David Ignatow

532 More Enterprise (poem) James Merrill

The Kitchen Knight (poem) Stanley Moss

532 Love's Edge (poem) Sidney Bernard

534 Poet at the Podium Paul Zweig

536 A Murderous Solvent M. L. Rosenthal

538 At Full Speed Clayton Eshleman

540 Translating César Vallejo John Logan

541 Interior and Exterior Worlds Frank W. Lewis

543 Crossword Puzzle

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Copy Editor
MARION HESS

Theatre
HAROLD CLURMAN

Art
MAX KOZLOFF

Music
BENJAMIN BORETZ

Science
CARL DREHER

Advertising Manager
MARY SIMON

Associate Publisher
GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Associate Editor
PHIL KERBY

Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIAS

Poetry Editor
MICHAEL GOLDMAN

Washington
ROBERT G. SHERRILL

Paris
ALEXANDER WERTH

London
RAYMOND WILLIAMS

Bonn
C. AMERY

Canberra
C. P. FITZGERALD

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July and August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1967 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel.: CH 2-8400. West Coast office: 1434 Westwood Boulevard, Los Angeles, Calif. 90024. Tel.: GR 4-3547. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give four weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE NATION
Combined with FRONTIER

Volume 204
No. 17

continue to oppose, expenditures for civil rights. They feel the civil rights movement has gone too far and too fast, that it should be cooled off for the duration of the war, and then we will see. These interests never object to war expenditures, or a $40 billion program for an anti-missile missile, or for a leap to the moon in this decade. The leaders of the moderate civil rights organizations have played along with the powers that be, hoping to placate them and to receive a measure of continued support, while giving their own members an impression of practicality merged with aggressiveness. This dual role Dr. King has now made more difficult, and the leaders don't like it.

One of the biggest myths of U.S. politics, and the most convenient for the Establishment, is that foreign policy has no relation to domestic need. The fact is, quite apart from Vietnam, that one cannot push a reform movement as significant as the Negro's demand for full equality, and at the same time pursue a policy which makes us the world's policeman. The whole history of the civil rights movement shows the incompatibility. In the darkest days of the cold war, say from 1947 to 1955, Negro rights were shelved. There were splendid opportunities, as when Eisenhower came into office in 1952 and the Supreme Court made its decision in Brown v. Board of Education in 1954, but he did not act, nor did Congress. The 1955-65 decade saw a slight breather in the cold war, enough to make civil rights gains possible. Now, with the deepening involvement in Vietnam, things are at a standstill once more. The whole history refutes King's critics.

Equally to the point, King spoke because he cannot play fast and loose with the moral issues which American power and the zooming technology of war have forced on public notice. He could not urge his people to practice nonviolence in the streets of American cities and condone violence in the jungles and rice paddies of Vietnam. It is significant that the NAACP did not attack King's moral stand, only his operational strategy. They would like to keep moral conviction and public action apart. But the time is past when the separation could be maintained. The partition has been broken, and it will not be rebuilt.

The critics who were never friends of King's, and who never made common cause with him, are more severe than those who have lost an ally—and the storm is only beginning. We are told that in proposing a boycott of the war he is stopping just short of sedition. The next step will be to accuse him of outright sedition, which is the verbal form of treason, and to try to shut him up. Dr. King has offered himself as the symbol of the moral force which got him his present prominence and the Nobel Prize. The imminent showdown may well center upon him. Whatever the consequences may be for King himself, the issues will be clearer for Negroes and whites alike by the time the voters go to the polls in 1968.

Dean Rusk at Cornell

Although the Humphrey-Nixon Law, aforementioned, prevents Mr. Rusk from getting attention on his travels abroad, he need not feel neglected at home. "When Dean Rusk came to Cornell," an SDS member of the welcoming committee writes, "we were waiting for him." It was not an SDS operation; the chapter was busy with preparations for a large-scale draft-card burning in connection with the April 15 anti-Vietnamese War march in New York City. The Inter-University Committee (IUC) was in charge of the arrangements to welcome Mr. Rusk, and its officers came to the conclusion that walk-outs, vigils and other customary forms of protest had proved ineffective. They got hold of several hundred death's-head masks and some 125 people agreed to wear them. (The Ithaca Journal of March 25 puts the number at about fifty.) When Mr. Rusk entered the Bailey Hall auditorium everything appeared normal, except for some walk-outs, but as the Secretary began to speak the death's-head contingent rose, turned their backs to the stage, donned the masks and took their places again. Photographs leave no doubt as to the effectiveness of the masquerade; even Mr. Rusk, whom nature has endowed with the composure of a cigar store Indian, must have been startled.

The meeting was moderated by Cornell president, James Perkins, who ushered Rusk out after a question-and-answer period that the hostile portion of the audience considered too brief. One question was whether the Red River dikes were a possible future bombing target. The questioner loaded the query with the information that the breaching of the dikes would cost between 2 million and 5 million civilian lives and concluded: "If you do not choose to commit yourself, we can only conclude, Mr. Secretary, that the United States wishes to reserve the right to commit genocide in Vietnam."

A verbatim text of Mr. Rusk's reply to this soft impeachment is not available, but it was to the effect that the United States had refrained from bombing the dikes out of consideration for civilians and there was no present intention of changing this policy. However, in a familiar riposte, he challenged the questioner to get a reciprocal guarantee from the North Vietnamese Government not to bomb dikes in South Vietnam. Since the questioner did not have a hot line open to Hanoi, the exchange ended in a draw, with some of the audience wondering where the South Vietnamese dikes were located and why nothing had been said about them before.

Mr. Rusk turned aside some questions and was booed by the maskers and their sympathizers. Later, both he and President Perkins are said to have admitted that the masks made them uncomfortable, and Mrs. Rusk is supposed to have cried "all the way home"—presumably not all the way to Washington. Except for the local press, the masks were ignored by the reporters. TV crews were on hand but were barred from the auditorium.

NASA: THE IMAGE MISFIRES

WILLIAM HINES

Mr. Hines is science editor of the Washington Star and a syndicated columnist on science and space affairs. He is the author of Conquest of the Moon (Pyramid), and has won major awards for science journalism.

Washington

Even the American public's almost boundless gullibility is being strained by the National Aeronautics and Space Administration's performance in the Apollo affair. An explanation hardly more valid than agent Maxwell Smart's "sorry about that, Chief" on WNBC-TV is being offered in extenuation of an accident that took three lives at Cape Kennedy's Pad 34 last January 27.

In essence, NASA's case ten weeks after Grissom, White and Chaffee died rests on the working of Murphy's Law. This is an elegant adaptation of the so-called law of averages which states that if anything can possibly go wrong, it will. Murphy's Law relies on the fictitious perversity of inanimate objects; by implication, it eliminates the factor of human error.

The final report on the accident proper was published on April 9. A lengthy, detailed and apparently straightforward study of the facts, it discussed the proximate cause (an electrical malfunction) and criticized sloppy workmanship and management on the Apollo job. To insiders these conclusions came as no surprise, and the report did not do what desperately needs doing. It did not ask how such a situation could develop in a government agency supposedly dedicated to technological excellence. Judgments of this kind were not within the competence of the review board which studied the accident and made the report.

In the week preceding publication of the report, various personnel shifts were announced in the Apollo management structure of NASA, and more were promised. They were susceptible to various interpretations, but seemed at first glance to be not much more than a game of musical chairs, giving the appearance of movement and progress without doing anything very profound. NASA, whose initials are jokingly said to stand for "Never A Straight Answer," had a reputation for looseness with the truth. Unhappily the agency has snared itself in its own deceitful web.

In these flack-ridden times it is perhaps not surprising that the taxpaying public should be hoodwinked, falsely propagandized, deliberately misled and, on occasion, even lied to by its servants. It is deplorable, however, and dangerous in the bargain, that NASA has deluded itself into believing the reality of its own Image.

The Image is a myth 9 feet tall, compounded in equal parts of John Glenn and Dr. Robert H. Goddard, with just a dash of the Redeemer added for omniscience and omnipotence. Its exploits are chanted off-stage by a Greek chorus composed of Walter Cronkite, Frank McGee, Jules Bergman and Paul Haney. Its personal experiences are chronicled and preserved for the ages in the full-color pages of Life.

It is essential that The Image never show its feet of clay; everything NASA attempts must be crowned with success; probing the frontiers of technology and doing things never done before, NASA must always do them on schedule, within budgets, and just exactly right. There must be no defects, and if mistakes are occasionally made, people must not make them.

So it is convenient to have Murphy's Law to fall back on, as Kennedy Space Center director Kurt H. Debus found about ten days after the accident. "Despite meticulous attention to the smallest detail, this tragedy occurred," Debus said with a straight face to a meeting of space technologists; and they, with straight faces, received the "explanation."

Debus and his audience knew that slackness, corner cutting, schedule racing and slipshod workmanship have plagued the space effort since its inception in the fifties. An "in" joke among spacemen tells of an astronaut paying a triumphal post-flight visit to the factory where his spacecraft was built, and being asked if there was any particular individual he would care to meet.

"Yes," says the fictitious astronaut, "I'd like to meet the son of a bitch who welded his lunch box to the left yaw thruster."

John Glenn would never have said such a thing, but Gus Grissom would have—and on several occasions did. He was widely reputed to have been critical of workmanship going into Spacecraft 012, the hermetically sealed oven in which he perished. Grissom's suspicion of the Apollo spacecraft's quality was nothing new, and not directed solely at "Brand X," as North American Aviation, Inc., is known in the aerospace industry. Almost three years before he died, Grissom visited the Martin Company plant near Baltimore where the Titan II booster rocket for his "Molly Brown" Gemini flight was being built. After inspecting the work, Grissom grumped, "It'll never get off the ground." He was mistaken about the GT-3 rocket, but correct about a later one. Walter Schirra's Gemini 6 booster shut itself off just after ignition and without leaving the pad; it was discovered later that a mechanic had left a dust cap in a vital pressurizing line of one engine and that a quality control inspector had approved the work as properly done.

Before Gemini, Project Mercury was troubled with defective workmanship attributable not to the complexity of the task and the technology but to simple carelessness. An example: an installer ruined a critical sealing device by gouging it with a screwdriver while trying to force it into place. Simple carelessness—call it stupidity, which in many cases is what it is—remains a factor at Cape Kennedy today. As recently as March 16, a memo was circulated among Kennedy Space Center officials on the subject of "instrument abuse." Thousands of dollars' worth of repairs were required on delicate equipment because of misuse bordering on idiocy. For example, someone ruined a costly automatic chart-recording instrument by throwing the remains of his lunch into it. At the conclusion of Project Mercury in 1963, its operations director, Walter C. Williams, publicly chided industry for sloppy practices and expressed hope that future programs would benefit from some of Mercury's melancholy experience. This hasn't happened, and Williams has long since left NASA, a victim of a policy summed up in the phrase, "Don't create waves." His shunning by NASA has been complete; 1,500 "expert consultants" were rounded up to assist NASA's board of inquiry into the accident, but Williams was not among them.

When Williams' 1963 Mercury report was made public and its substance printed in the New York and Washington papers, Space Administrator James E. Webb was called to account before a Congressional committee. One of the capital's fastest talkers and most accomplished snow-job artists, Webb turned the occasion to his own advantage, using the Congressional forum to castigate the press for scandalmongering and to deliver a ringing defense of industry's splendid performance.

This is characteristic of NASA's permissive, protective attitude toward its industrial contractors, and possibly reflects Webb's own background. Before becoming Space Administrator in 1961, he was a director of the McDonnell Aircraft Co., the St. Louis aerospace concern that recently swallowed Douglas Aircraft. McDonnell had the capsule contract for Project Mercury and Project Gemini, and McDonnell-Douglas has a handsome piece of Apollo.

Webb's solicitude for his contractor friends extends beyond the old firm and persists to this day. In an enlightening exchange in the course of a Senate hearing last February 27, Webb revealed his concern for that most sensitive of aerospace-industry barometers, the stock market. Sen. Walter Mondale (D., Minn.) was pressing Webb for details of a report supposedly derogatory of North American Aviation's performance, and finally asked for a copy. Webb in effect refused.

"I would like to take that as a request, Senator Mondale," he said, "and examine it very carefully because, obviously, these companies are public companies. You have got many factors related to this and certain of these reports are regarded as of deep concern. What we would be very happy to do is make it available to the Comptroller General under any request that the committee or you would make to him. This provides a certain measure of control of these reports. . . ."

Later, Mondale said he did not know what Webb meant by his response; neither did James J. Gehrig, staff director of the Senate Committee on Aeronautical and Space Sciences, in whose hearing room the exchange occurred. No matter; Mondale never got the report he sought. Neither did Gehrig get a list of consultants active in the Apollo fire investigation. Webb blandly refused to submit it on grounds that this might interfere with the inquiry.

Webb, a florid-faced, overbearing man with chutzpah Sammy Glick never dreamed of, can hardly be blamed for getting away with whatever he can. The fault lies with the House and Senate "space" committees, which make it clear that he can get away with a very great deal. He gets away with less in his dealings with the appropriations committees, and in his appearances before the tough-minded and powerful Joint Committee on Atomic Energy (JCAE) he gets away with nothing. Executive privilege (sometimes called "the bureaucrat's Fifth Amendment") is not invoked before the JCAE; before the space committees it is a handy and frequently used foil.

The committees charged with supervising NASA's operations exercise, in general, only the loosest of supervision. With minor exceptions, this has consisted in asking NASA how NASA is doing and then printing the reply as a committee document. Close supervision, of the type exercised routinely by JCAE, is regarded as kibitzing and is discouraged. Early last year, when one of the House subcommittee chairmen tried to knock out a space project which he regarded as valueless, he was rebuffed and a NASA official publicly commented with some pique that Congress' job is to vote the money and leave the program planning to experts downtown. Congress, also, is expected not to create waves.

At the time of the Navy Court of Inquiry into the Thresher disaster, two JCAE staff men elbowed their way into the hearing room and sat through all sessions, secret as well as open, as official observers for the committee. They encountered some resistance at first, but asserted the committee's right—written into the Atomic Energy Act—to be kept "fully and currently informed" of all matters relating to nuclear energy. The Space Act of 1958 confers no such right on the space committees. Consequently, when the Apollo board was empaneled by NASA headquarters on January 28, it never occurred to either committee to send observers. In all probability they would not have been admitted.

In short, it has been the experience of the past several years that NASA gets what it wants from Congress. Perhaps this is because Congress as a whole has never taken the space program seriously. Despite adulation of the astronauts and lip service to the potentialities of lunar colonization, most legislators tend to look on space activities as a combination of Buck Rogers and Mickey Mouse. Space sneaked up on them gradually; by 1961, John Kennedy's proposal to send men to the moon, while bizarre, was not so manifestly outlandish as to call his sanity into question; at the same time, the notion was too far out to be taken altogether seriously when Kennedy broached it as an "urgent national need" after only 125 days in office. There is some question, indeed, if Kennedy himself cared very much that astronauts should actually land on the moon; possibly he may have looked on the moon journey as a convenient device to "get America moving again" and divert people's minds from the Bay of Pigs and Cosmonaut Gagarin.

Kennedy was frank enough with Congress in his May 25, 1961, "Message on Urgent National Needs." The task, he said, would be long, difficult and expensive, and should be undertaken only after full legislative and public discussion. "If we are to go only halfway, or reduce our sights in the face of difficulty, in my judgment it would be better not to go at all." But when the time came for discussion, there was none; suddenly it was Camelot again and the knights were riding out (in space suits rather than armor) in quest of a Holy Grail buried somewhere on Mare Tranquillitatis. The United States' prestige was on the line, committed to a production that might have been scripted by Cervantes and filmed by Disney.

The advantage of a moon goal, the public was told then and still is told, was that it focused the tremendous inventive and productive potential of American technology on a clearly defined objective. It also—and this the public is not so often told—created a colossal politico-industrial pork barrel. The Houston case is an excellent example.

Houston is the center of manned space activity and home of the astronauts, not because of Lyndon Johnson, as is commonly supposed, but because of the late Albert Thomas. Thomas was chairman of the House Appropriations subcommittee handling NASA's budget at the time of the May, 1961, moon message. He exacted a piece of the lunar action for Houston as his price for continued cooperation in funding Project Apollo. The apocryphal story is that Thomas told Webb, "the road to the moon lies through Houston," and Webb, a one-time business associate of that master politician, Robert Kerr of Oklahoma, heard and heeded.

From the outset, Apollo was conceived as a government-industry "team" effort, with the government pitching and industry catching the $20 billion or so it would cost to get men to the moon. Repeatedly in the early days of Apollo, Webb pointed out that "this money isn't being spent on the moon, but right here on earth—in the United States." About 90 per cent of NASA's $5 billion annual budget is spent outside the agency, chiefly in factories. Webb and his Associate Administrator for Manned Space Flight, George E. Mueller, like to point out that Apollo hardware contracts are to be found in every corner of the country and have given employment to something like 350,000 persons. Big names—GE, GM, Chrysler, Boeing, Douglas, North American, RCA, IBM—are part of the Apollo team; where a man's treasure lies, there is his heart also—and NASA has powerful friends in industry.

While it is possible, even practical, to turn on an effort of this scale at the whim of a President, it is not possible to turn it off as easily. NASA's powerful friends in industry have considerable clout on Capitol Hill, and the question, "after Apollo, what?," is being answered with a follow-on program of manned activities that will support the industrial team in the manner to which it has grown accustomed—that is to say, $4.5 billion to $5 billion a year. In authorizing recently a go-ahead on the NERVA atomic rocket project, President Johnson has opened the way for possible manned exploration of Mars. This is judged to be a $60 billion to $100 billion project that could take twenty or thirty years. Clearly the technological WPA is in business to stay.

That infinitely patient and ill-used animal, Bos publicus, in the six years since Apollo began, has been milked for something like $20 billion in furtherance of Kennedy's conceit that there was an "urgent national need" to send men to the moon before 1970. In all that time between the stanchions, bruised and abused by cold-fingered tax collectors, the public cow has never received a comprehensive, critical accounting of NASA's stewardship. Individual specialists, writing in individual newspapers, have tried to keep their readers abreast of developments, but these efforts have been spotty. The news-magazine handling has been worse, and as far as Life and the TV networks are concerned, the space program is entertainment.

Bos publicus, fed on a silage of mulched press releases and activated astronaut memoirs, at first accepted the space effort for what, essentially, it was: an exciting and rather imaginative extravaganza. The program even produced a new breed of public figure, the Future Hero: the original seven astronauts, men of high celebrity from the date of their introduction twenty-five months before the first of them flew. They played with decent modesty and, for the most part, with grace the difficult role of hero-before-the-fact. The Gemini Nine and the Apollo Fourteen and the anonymous multitudes who have followed never really had the problems which perplexed the Mercury Seven.

At the time of Shepard's initial suborbital flight, the world marveled; people cheered as Glenn orbited the earth; they fell to their knees en masse in Grand Central Station and prayed when Carpenter overshot his splash-down point and was "lost" for fifty minutes in one of the sleaziest hoaxes ever perpetrated by a public relations man. But as time went on and success followed success, public interest in the program waned, as was proved on the night of the Gemini 8 crisis a year ago: outraged Batman fans jammed the switchboards of A.B.C. television affiliates, protesting the pre-emption of Batman's time for spot-news coverage of the Space Age's first legitimate orbital emergency.

When Armstrong and Scott got back safely that night and four more Gemini missions were flown without serious incident, public interest waned again. Despite clear warnings to the contrary, most people took at face value NASA's assurances that all was for the best in the best of all possible agencies, and that "zero defects" meant exactly what it said. So, unfortunately, did NASA take these assurances seriously, and here is the real tragedy of Pad 34. Deputy Space Administrator Robert C. Seamans' statement in his Third Interim Report last February 25—"Continued alertness to the possibility of fire had become dulled by previous ground experience and six years of successful manned missions"—is perhaps the most damning indictment of the Apollo program that could be made. It accords closely with Astronaut Training Chief "Deke" Slayton's charge that somebody's carelessness caused the death of his three friends.

Whose carelessness? Some worker's, perhaps, when he wired a cable up to the wrong terminal, or some quality control man's when he stamped his approval on work he did not witness, or some engineer's when he said: "Skip it; we won't run that part of the test." Possibly a case can be made along these lines, but the root cause of the accident lies far removed from the mechanic on the pad and much higher in the table of organization. As Admiral Rickover told the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy after the Thresher disaster: "If I have a job to do and it doesn't get done well, I am not going to blame the workmen."

It will be interesting in the coming weeks, as a Congressional committee strives to probe the Apollo tragedy, to see how NASA contrives to explain away the root cause of the fire that killed Grissom and White and Chaffee.

POETS ON POETRY

Dead Horses and Live Issues

LOUIS SIMPSON

Mr. Simpson is the author of five books of poetry, among which Selected Poems (Harcourt, Brace & World) won the Pulitzer Prize in 1964.

In 1956, three writers met in a basement in Massachusetts and began putting together an anthology of contemporary verse. They thought of themselves as fair judges of American poetry, and one of them had an extensive knowledge of British poetry. However, though they did not know it, they were influenced by the Zeitgeist.

At that time the New Critics were still functioning, and many poets were writing in a manner that lent itself to so-called "close reading." Let us try to remember what New Criticism stood for: the poem treated as an object complete in itself; impersonality, a distance between the poet and the poem, use of a persona, irony, et cetera. On the other hand, at that time the counter-forces that have since come forward so powerfully had not begun to make themselves felt. Poets who were to become famous had not yet published a book; or if they had (Duncan), the book was not widely distributed. As the three editors turned over books and magazines, they did not discover, for example, Robert Duncan or Allen Ginsberg or Robert Creeley. These poets were then writing in a manner which, contrary to the New Criticism, stressed self-expression and took Pound and William Carlos Williams as models of rhythm and diction. But in 1956, Pound and Williams were not an "influence," at least not in New England, and their disciples were practically unknown.

When it came out the anthology was titled The New Poets of England and America. The definite article infuriated those poets who had been left out and, in 1960, another anthology appeared which was made on principles derived, more or less, from Pound and Williams. But there was a more urgent principle: to exclude all the poets who had been in the first anthology. This was The New American Poetry. There were several differences between the anthologies. Most of the New Poets were Easterners; some of the New American Poets were located in San Francisco. East was East and West was West. Also, in prose statements at the back of the book, the New American Poets cocked a snoot at the "Academy," meaning the ideas of people who taught for a living (the editors of the first anthology had committed that indiscretion). To offset some domestic and uxorious poetry in the first anthology, The New American Poetry offered a selection of wild men, the Beats.

It has been ten years since these anthologies so neatly divided all Gall into two parts. Since then, everything has changed, though this has not been noticed by some reviewers, those deceived husbands of fashion who are always the last to know. For one thing, several of the New American Poets who were so scornful of universities have become . . . professors of English. Indeed, the only thing that looks like an Establishment in American verse is the following commanded by Charles Olson, one of the poets in the second anthology. This school has a system of breathing and using the typewriter that will enable anyone to write poetry naturally, without thinking. I have met several young writers who hope by entering the school not only to write poems but also to find a job on graduation.

But schools of poetry are a contradiction in terms and cannot last. For poets, who really are, want poems above everything else and will recognize good work and condemn bad, even if the praise and condemnation are not in accordance with their own aesthetic, political or other interests. For a stunning example of this, see Pound's praise of Thomas Hardy, a poet of content and narrative power rather than style—praise that threatens to annihilate everything that Pound himself ever wrote. For a true poet, critical theory, and even friendship, must make way for the recognition of poetry when it appears, in whatever shape or voice.

Since the time of the anthologies there has been a general flight of poets of all kinds away from the sort of verse that the New Criticism was so well

LIONS COPULATING

*We caught lions copulating on the plains
Of Africa. Our landrover closed in,
I pressed so hard on my 8 mm. color film
I almost lost this gigantic naturalism,*

*Trying to preserve it for my friends and astoundees.
But saw the King of Beasts with his head high,
His mane imperial, no expression on his face,
Prodding in and out of the great female*

*As if he were a schizophrenic dualist
And had to put up with his baser nature,
For his great face had no expression at all
While his lower being worked mechanical,*

*Then he fell away, and stood off, and lay
His full length on the ancient earth
While the lioness with a sumptuous gesture
Rolled over as I have seen other females do*

*In the perfect surfeit of her animal nature,
And took ease as if nobody were looking on,
And after an interval of valuable rest
These great beasts of the African wilds*

*Stood in their historic posture of superiority
And ambled across the limitless plains in silence
Without a thought of the lucubration of man,
Trying to signify their big natures in empathy.*

RICHARD EBERHART

equipped to deal with. Though poets have not agreed on what they want to write, they have been agreeing on what they do not want to write. They don't want to write Low Tide verse—about finding a dead fish at low tide; or the poem about the statues in the Villa Medici; or the well-rhymed poem about picking up the kid's busted tricycle and thinking of the death of Patroclus. In fact, they don't want to write any kind of rhymed poem. Repulsions held in common—that's what we find when we look at the work of American poets today. They don't want to write the so-called "well-made" poem that lends itself to the little knives and formaldehyde of a graduate school.

There is an accelerating movement away from rationalistic verse toward poetry that releases the unconscious, the irrational, or, if your mind runs that way, magic. Surrealism was buried by critics of the thirties and forties as somehow irrelevant; today it is one of the most commonly used techniques of verse. The change can be measured by comparing the reputation of W. H. Auden today with what it was twenty years ago. Auden was nothing if not rational. Reading an Auden poem today is a chilling experience. Talk about snows of yesteryear!

The general movement is such as I have indicated, but within it there are poets of all varieties, and their disagreements can be sharp. Though they are, in Melville's phrase, fleeing from all havens astern, this does not mean that they are sailing for the same ports ahead. I can see very little similarity between the aesthetic principles of James Wright and Allen Ginsberg, or Robert Creeley and W. S. Merwin, or Robert Bly and Gary Snyder. Yet if these people were asked what they dislike, I think there'd be a surprising amount of agreement.

One common revulsion has joined American poets, at least for a while, in the common enterprise of poetry readings and protests against the war in Vietnam. They are all—or nearly all—agreed to dislike it. The occasion has not produced much good poetry—occasions hardly ever do—but it may serve to change the poets profoundly, so that in the future their poems will be political in the way that really counts—that is, by altering the angle of vision. Political poetry need not be about a political occasion; it may be about a butterfly. A poor man does not see the same glass of wine that a rich man sees, and a poet who has been deeply affected by the war may never again see the objects around him in the way he used to. Many Americans are being changed by this experience—in spite of themselves, for the experience is painful.

Of course, there are exceptions. John Ashbery, in a recent article on another man's work, complimented him on not having written poetry about the war. This struck me as a new concept of merit—praising a man for things he has not written. But it was not amusing to see a poet sneering at the conscience of other poets. Some people seem able to protest only against an act of protest by others:

*Cet animal est très méchant,
Quand on l'attaque il se défend.*

I think one result of the war will be that American poets will have to take their vocation seriously, as Europeans have had to take it. They are being compelled to take themselves seriously; they are becoming an intelligentsia.

The movement to release the unconscious, and this new political awareness, will give rise, I believe, in the next ten years, to poetry of the vatic kind. Donne is out; Blake is in. Whitman, Pound of the Cantos, and foreign-language importations such as Neruda and Voznesensky, will be the models for young poets. At the same time, the gap between criticism and the art of poetry will grow even wider. Most critics were trained in the defunct Brooks-Warren method which didn't discuss, as I've said, anything but the poem-as-object. They have no language in which to treat the new poetry; indeed, it is increasingly obvious that they cannot see or hear, much less discuss it. New kinds of criticism will have to be developed in the coming years.

Whatever happens to poetry, we shall need poets to write it. Those who believe that poems will not have to be made, but will rise complete from the unconscious, and that the result will be poetry of a more valid and exciting kind, are having a fantasy with which poetry has little to do. We are in for some dreadful, bad writing . . . prose chopped into lines that look like verse . . . the outpourings of ignorance and vanity endlessly repeating themselves. We shall suffer through the Prophetic Book, the Whitman catalogue, the Adams Canto, written not by Blake, Whitman or Pound but by people without talent or humility. Yet, as we suffer these longueurs, let us remember, if we can, how trivial were the poems written under the direction of zanies who spoke of the "affective fallacy" as others might speak of the Whore of Babylon. And we can hope that a release of the unconscious and a larger range of concern in some poets will make for new work that has enthusiasm, imagination, vital rhythm and original form.

For want of a better word, I have spoken of surrealism. But this is misleading, especially if we think of Breton's brand of surrealism—automatic writing. I doubt that anyone would want this back. Opposing the exaggerations of rationalism, Breton laid down the dogma that only the irrational is poetic. But the mind cannot be divided into rational and irrational sections, and the attempt to divide it is—rationalism run mad. There is nothing drearier than "pure" surrealism, a spate of disconnected images.

Contrary to Breton, poetry represents not unreason but the total mind, including both reason and unreason. (In order to explain I must use this language.) Poetic creation has been described by some poets—Wordsworth and Keats come to mind—as a heightened state of consciousness brought about, curiously, by an infusion of the unconscious. See the "Ode to a Nightingale." The images are connected in a dream; and the deeper the dream, the stronger, the more logical, are the connections.

Dream is precisely what we do not find in the poetry of W. C. Williams, who is being much imitated nowadays. I agree that he wrote a number of excellent poems. He was a puritan, with limited imagination and a numbing self-consciousness, but he had a gift for description, for telling the facts in a flat style. His imitators are not likely to do as well; they have his flatness without his eye for significant detail. They are crippled by the doctrine of "sincerity," that is, reporting just the facts in a monotone, like Joe Friday. As for imagination—they are all puritans, unable to imagine any other life than their own. Among the followers of Williams there is more than ignorance; there is a fearful avoidance of thought. They do not read. They have not read Rilke, Yeats, Jimenez. They dare not read them. They could not bear the comparison.

My remarks are aimed at the school, not against Williams who wrote his poems and is honored for them. But, placed beside the Duino Elegies or the poems of Yeats, the poems of Williams are just good snapshots. (Having written this sentence, I remember seeing, the other day, a new book of poems in the manner of Williams. The poems are appended to and serve as comments upon a series of . . . photographs.)

It's no use talking about "American" rhythms, et cetera. It's no use saying that you write dully on purpose. To make out of Williams' poems a mystique of American style is to confuse writing poetry with the activity of a chamber of commerce. If we must look for native masters, there is more nourishment to be got from Whitman, Crane, Roethke, Stevens—though he is so mannered—and Pound—though sometimes he is incoherent—than from the dry, flat, painfully self-conscious lines of W. C. Williams.

I cannot end without quoting something. Here is a poem. "First Frost," by Andrei Voznesensky, translated by Stanley Kunitz:

*A girl is freezing in a telephone booth, huddled in her flimsy coat,
her face stained by tears and smeared with lipstick.*

On Political Poetry

ROBERT BLY

Mr. Bly's book of poems, The Light Around the Body, will be published by Harper & Row in August. The following essay, in somewhat longer form, will appear as the introduction to a book of poems to be published by The Sixties Press later this year, called Forty Poems Touching on Recent American History.

Why have we had so few real political poems in the United States? American poets interested in politics (and most are) generally fall into one of two groups: the first group—we might take Lowell and Wilbur as examples—are occasionally brave in public statements, and their poetry has not the slightest political energy. Poets in the second group fill their poems with political language and then act like clowns. Poets like Gregory Corso make sure we understand they don't really mean it. In the United States, we have never developed a man like Pasternak, a man who wrote great poetry, who took a clear stand, and whose work itself has serious political meaning.

American society as a whole quite obviously tries to turn its artists and writers away from political content. Our wise men and wise institutions assure us that national political events are beyond the reach of ordinary, or even extraordinary, human sensitivity. As a result, a sort of husk has grown around the psyche of the nation.

Very few American poems penetrate to any reality in American political life. The truth is that most American poets do not bother to penetrate the husk around their own personalities, and therefore cannot penetrate the husk that has grown around the psyche of the country either. When a poet succeeds in driving inward, he develops new energy that carries him through the polished

*She breathes on her thin little fingers.
Fingers like ice. Glass beads in her ears.*

She has to beat her way back alone down the icy street.

*First frost. A beginning of losses.
The first frost of telephone phrases.*

*It is the start of winter glittering on her cheek,
the first frost of having been hurt.*

The "sincerity" of this should be pleasing to some of our younger American poets. But there is more involvement with the subject, and unashamed tenderness, than we get from our poets.

outside husk that deflects most meditation. Once inside the psyche, he can speak of inward and political things with the same assurance. Those poets who try to write political poems, without having developed any inwardness, have embarked on an impossible task. Paradoxically, what is needed to write true poems about the outward world is inwardness.

A good personal poem comes alive when the poet succeeds in carrying over some of his own psychic life into the poem, and entangling it in his language. The good political poem entangles in a similar way some of the psychic life of the nation.

The dominant poem in American literature however has always been the personal poem. John Crowe Ransom, for instance, wrote an elegant version of the personal poem, Yvor Winters a gnarled version of it, Randall Jarrell a flabby version. Robert Lowell a harsh version, Reed Whittemore a funny version, W. D. Snodgrass a whining version, Robert Creeley a laconic version, etc. I love the work of several of these poets, but one has to admit that they rarely escape from the purely personal poem. Some poets say flatly that they are "not political," and adopt the fiction that their psyches are unaffected by political climates. They secretly believe their psyches are like the psyche of a tree, which evidently grows as well in a Johnson Administration as in a Roosevelt administration. This assertion of independence for a man is a fiction.

The only political poetry that has been written with any determination in the United States were the poems written during the thirties by Edwin Rolfe, Sol Funaroff, Kenneth Faring and others of that group. It is interesting that their poems were usually political in opinions. For example, the poet might declare that he had discovered who the phonies in the world are, something he didn't know before. But changes of opinion are steps in the evolution of the poet's personality; they are steps in the poet's psychic growth. These "political" poems of the thirties then, like all poems of opinion, were not really political poems at all but personal poems appearing under another guise.

The life of the country can be imagined as a psyche larger than the psyche of anyone living, a larger sphere, floating above everyone. In order for the poet to write a true political poem, he has to be able to have such a grasp of his own concerns that he can leave them for a while, and then leap up, like a grasshopper, into this other psyche. In that sphere he finds strange plants and curious many-eyed creatures which he brings back with him. This half-visible psychic life he entangles in his language.

Some poets try to write political poems

THE BLUE SHUTTER

J'ai prononcé le mot réalité. Il faut encore bien s'entendre sur la signification de ce mot: ce n'est pas une fiction, c'est une réalité.—Père de Regnon

It opens, closes, opens and freezes on the blue shutter, surging, hinge and pine, against the stone walls and spider lights of autumn. The eye dreams in its sanctum of bone. The shutter rumbles against the skull, swings inward and halts against the bramble of the eye like a hand holding in the dusk a shield of hides. At the burning edge of the iris, circling the heart, the shutter opens like a leaf fallen on the edge of bright water.

NED O'GORMAN

impelled upward by hatred or fear. But those emotions are stiff jointed, rock-like, and are seldom able to escape from the gravity of the body. What the poet needs to get up that far and bring back something are great leaps of the imagination.

A true political poem is a quarrel with ourselves, as a personal poem is, and rhetoric is as pointless in that sort of poem as in the personal one. The true political poem does not order us either to take any specific act; like the personal poem, it moves to deepen awareness.

Thinking of the rarity of the political poem in the United States, another image comes to mind. We can imagine Americans inside a sphere, like those sad men in Bosch's "Garden of Earthly Delights." The clear glass is the limit of the ego. We float inside it. Around us there are worlds of energy, but we are unable to describe them in words because we are unable to get out of our own egos.

Yeats and Neruda seem to me to have written the greatest political poetry of this century so far. We know Yeats's poems fairly well; let me quote a poem of Neruda's called "The Dictators," which I think is a masterpiece of the political poem. (The translation is my own.)

*An odor has remained among the sugar cane:
A mixture of blood and body, a penetrating
Petal that brings nausea.
Between the coconut palms the graves are full
Of ruined bones, of speechless death-rattles.
A delicate underling converses
With glasses, braid collars, and cords of gold.
The tiny palace gleams like a watch
And the rapid laughs with gloves on Cross the corridors at times
And join the dead voices
And the blue mouths freshly buried.
The weeping is hidden like a water-plant
Whose seeds fall constantly on the earth
And without light make the great blind leaves to grow.
Hatred has grown scale upon scale,
Blow on blow, in the ghastly water of the swamp,
With a snout full of ooze and silence.*

The poem's task is to entangle in the language the psychic landscape of a South American country under a dictator. The Spanish original, of course, is much more resonant. But even in the translation it is clear that Neruda is bringing in unexpected images: "The tiny palace gleams like a watch"—images one would expect in an entirely different sort of poem: "rapid laughs with gloves on." Suddenly a blind plant appears, that reproduces itself by dropping seeds constantly on the ground, shaded by its own huge leaves. This image is complicated, created by a part of the mind inaccessible to hatred, and yet it carries the reality of hatred radiating from dictators into the consciousness with a kind of massive intelligence. Describing dictators in "The United Fruit Company," Neruda uses for them the image of ordinary houseflies. By contrast, the journalistic mind would tend to describe them as huge and cunning.

Whitman was the first true political poet we had in North America. Surely his short poem, "To the States" is also a masterpiece of the political poem:

*To Identify the 16th, 17th or 18th
Presidentiad:*

*Why reclining, interrogating? why myself and all drowsing?
What deepening twilight—scum floating atop the waters,
Who are they as bats and night-dogs
askant in the capitol:
What a filthy Presidentiad! (O South, your torrid suns! O North, your arctic freezings!)
Are those really congressmen? are those the great Judges? is that the President?
Then I will sleep awhile yet, for I see that these States sleep, for reasons;
(With gathering murk, with muttering thunder and lambent shoots we all duly awake,
South, North, East, West, inland and seaboard, we will surely awake.)*

William Vaughn Moody wrote some fine lines in 1898:

*Was it for this our fathers kept the law?
This crown shall crown their struggle and their ruth?
Are we the eagle nation Milton saw
Mewing its mighty youth,
Soon to possess the mountain winds of truth,
And be swift familiar of the sun
Where eye before God's face his trumpets run?
Or have we but the talons and the maw,
And for the abject likeness of our heart
Shall some less lordly bird be set apart?
Some gross-billed wader where the swamps are fat?
Some gorger in the sun? Some prowler with the bat?*

His poem was written against United States policy for the first time we invaded Cuba. The language at times is remarkably swift and intense, particularly when compared to the hopelessly foggy language of political poetry being written by others at that time.

In the last thirty years, few American poets have had any sense of a nation beyond their own ego. Two of the Five Wesleyan poets are here— in this issue of The Nation

Published Today!

JAMES DICKEY Poems 1957-1967

Poems 1957-1967 presents the major work of the man designated as the authentic poet of his American generation. The book includes sixty-eight pages of forceful new poetry that demonstrates significant change and stylistic maturity. James Dickey has also selected from his four published books those poems that reflect his truest interests and his growth as an artist. 315 pages. $6.95

Also by JAMES DICKEY Buckdancer's Choice*

(National Book Award in Poetry, 1966)
"Buckdancer's Choice is the finest volume of poetry to appear in the sixties..." —CHARLES MONAGHAN,
The Commonwealth

Drowning With Others* Helmets*

Other poets in the Wesleyan Poetry Program:

LOUIS SIMPSON A Dream of Governors* At the End of the Open Road* (Pulitzer Prize in Verse, 1964)

JOHN HAINES Winter News*

DAVID IGNATOW Figures of the Human* Say Pardon*

HARVEY SHAPIRO Battle Report*

*Volumes in the Wesleyan Poetry Program.
Each, $4.00 cloth, $1.85 paper.
Write for descriptive material.

WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY PRESS
Middletown, Connecticut 06457

exceptions are Kenneth Rexroth and Thomas McGrath. In his "Ode for the American Dead in Korea," Thomas McGrath wrote:

*And God (whose sparrows fall aslant his gaze,
Like grace or confetti) blinks and is gone,
And you are gone. . . . But, in another year
We will mourn you, whose fossil courage fills
The limestone histories: brave;
ignorant: amazed:
Dead in the rice paddies, dead on the nameless hills.*

Rexroth has written beautiful poems touching on life outside our egos, among them "A Christmas Note for Geraldine Udell":

*I think of you in Gas,
The heroine on the eve of explosion;
Or angry, white, and still,*

*Arguing with me about Sasha's tragic book . . .
I light the lamp and hunt for pad and pencil.
A million sleepers turn,
While bombs fall in their dreams. The storm goes away,
Muttering in the hills.
The veering wind brings the cold, organic smell
Of the flowing ocean.*

More recently, Robert Duncan has written a number of powerful poems on the Vietnamese War.

America needs political poetry now, so it can see what is happening. And the younger poets are beginning to write it. America is still young itself, and it may become something magnificent and shining, or it may turn, as Rome did, into a black dinosaur, the enemy of every nation in the world that wants to live its own life. In my opinion, that decision has not yet been made.

Performance Without a Net

STEPHEN KOCH

Mr. Koch teaches at the State University of New York at Stony Brook.

A legitimate avant-garde guards nothing, least of all itself. Its animating ethic is risk, and the rewards given to it are particularly glittering because its daredevils risk the whole show—if they fail, they produce something less than bad conventional art, and take the plunge into sub-rubbish, into nothing at all. But whether the act is good or bad, it must be performed without the net.

Except that art is not a circus. In its realm, the daredevil's dive takes the sober form of a question asked by any artist who has made something new: "What is art? I have an imagination. What should I be doing with it now?" At the moment there are three energetic schools of avant-garde poetry—labeled with such catch phrases as "City Lights," "The New York School" and (clumsiest of all) "Olson-Duncan-Creeley"—carrying out this interrogation.

The City Lights group, presided over by Lawrence Ferlinghetti and composed of the fathers and children of the so-called San Francisco Renaissance, is the most programmatically and stridently avant-gardiste of the three for the paradoxical reason that they adopt the classical avant-postures with least modification and the least that is new—though the old is frequently watered down or vulgarized. Though Gary Snyder and Philip Whalen are primarily interested in modes of contemplative expression derived from Oriental religion (especially Zen Buddhism), others of the group are concerned with using poetry in acts of liberation and revolt. Its driving energy is the energy of classical ressentiment against the middle class and the forces of repression; it talks very dirty and its images are as explosive as possible; the group seems happiest when in trouble with the law.

The neo-surrealist wing, which includes Ferlinghetti himself, Michael McClure and Phillip Lamantia creates its work in the light of a metaphor adopted from French radical politics: in their minds the ideas of liberty and revolution are absolutely fused and have no independent meaning; they see themselves as the sans culottes of the spirit. True enough, Ferlinghetti's work is rather dulcet: he writes sentimental hymns to love and "the rebirth of wonder," but the standard fare in his magazine, City Lights Journal, construes art as a form of assault or a means for personal release from the psychological blocks and evaporations and freeze-ups that keep the poet from being fully himself. But whether the revolution is private or directed against the suffocating, obscene, lily-livered bourgeoisie, the imagery is generally derived—however remotely—from the Reign of Terror.

These artists' involvement in and understanding of politics is characteristically very slight because, like many revolutionaries, they are much less interested in politics than in the apocalypse. Whether it is the quasi-political eruptions of Ferlinghetti or the convulsions—simultaneously supercharged and banal, anguished and breezy—of Michael McClure, the dream of apocalypse alone leads them to poetry.

Like their mentors—Antonin Artaud, Pollock, Whitman, Sade, many Surrealists, among others—these poets make their governing metaphors as radical as possible: their terms are the Self and the World; Freedom and Bondage; the will and the conditions of reality. Potentially, this gives their work the greatest possible interest, but a metaphor must succeed, however radical and open-ended it may be, and it must succeed in aesthetic terms. Even when it does, someone must ask what might be the nature and value of liberty found only in metaphor. So far as I know, nobody at City Lights has had the wit or diligence to deal with such a question adequately, with the result that the work is—when it is not trash—pale and incomplete. McClure, I should add, disclaims any intention to shock others into Freedom.

The work of the remarkable Robert Duncan (who was also among the founders of the San Francisco Renaissance) is in an entirely different class. He has published ten books, most notably the Letters, Selected Poems, Roots and Branches and The Opening of the Field. His work is not based on the naive revolutionary metaphor that nourishes the City Lights group; instead he joins Charles Olson (whose most important book is The Maximus Poems) and Robert Creeley (For Love and the recently published Words) in a concern with the process of the poem's development and creation; with alternations of voice and rhetoric, and with the linear development of metaphoric time—concerns which Olson derives from the glamorous example of Pound's Cantos with their potentially interminable sequence and their radical revisions of poetic logic and structure, their intuitively jointed swing across language. Almost every page of Duncan manifests these concerns:

*Glare-eyed challenger! serpent-skin coated
Accumulus of days!
Swung in your arms, I grow old.*

*The numbers swing me. The days that count
my dervish invisible that time is Up—My time is up?*

Period by period the sentences are bound.

Here words like "swing" and "time" introduce new variations on the voice, new inflections picked up in the next usage, "swinging" from the charged "mythic" opening tones to the banal, questioning, "My time is up?" And the poem reflects on its own structural procedure in the line "Period by period the sentences are bound."

Though classed with them, Duncan seems to me a much more considerable figure than either Olson or Creeley. Their obsessive—almost exclusive—concern with vocal structure and tonality leads them to exclude from their work any appeal to the eye—or to any other sense for that matter. A prolonged bout of reading either one—particularly Olson—is likely to leave the reader feeling he suffers from an acute case of sensory deprivation. Whatever their other interest, Olson's poems are as flat and gray as the Massachusetts landscape in which they are often located, and they drain the eye into the same visual vacuum. Duncan's work is much more sensual, and unlike Olson and Creeley, he is willing to be quite self-consciously "literary"—his vocabulary, a vast composite anthology drawn from Renaissance poetry to the language of myth, is easily the most "conventional" of any practicing poet of importance, so that his rhetoric is much more varied and full-blooded than the rather anemic, strictly American voices of Olson and Creeley. It can be argued, of course, that Duncan's "literary" rhetoric is a limitation on his modernism. He seems unaware that Apollinaire ever lived, and he seems to hold the commonplace in almost 18th-century contempt.

Finally, Duncan's poetic intentions are much more exalted than those of his contemporaries. In an introduction to his early poems, recently republished under the new title The Years as Catches, Duncan mentions an early homosexual love affair, and remarks of his subsequent poetic development:

Perhaps the sexual irregularity underlay and led to the poetic; neither as homosexual nor as poet could one take over readily the accepted paradigms and conventions of the Protestant ethic. The structure of my work was to emerge in a series of trials, a problematic identity. A magpie's nest or collage, a construct of disparate elements drawn into the play they have excited, a syncretic religion. Often only the complex pun could hold the variety needed to assert the Real felt in the unity that excited.

This grammatically tortured remark explains Duncan's lofty rhetoric and the peculiarly anachronistic way he has greeted the triumph of secularism. Driven by a scattered sense of self and his sexual nonconformism, he has erected a private poetic structure from the language of myth and penance and prophecy: he is the prophet of himself, the high priest of a revelation which he himself both creates and witnesses. Duncan is without doubt the most solemn poet going; an Isaiah singing out a Book—made up of everything from Milton to the kitchen sink—to an unknown God which the song itself creates by auto-suggestion.

The prophecy has a limitation, however: the God thus miraculously raised into Being flickers out of existence the moment the book is closed. Though I see no objection to the artificial quality of Duncan's devotional temperament, the high solemnity of his rhetoric and the sonorous seriousness with which he takes his own role as poet frequently put an unbearable burden on the slender substance of his Devotional Being. Duncan is freshest and strongest in his less ambitious work; and his occasional forays into the realm of allegory—as in his verse play, Adam's Curse—can result in failure.

His religious temperament functions by producing works of brilliance—he is unquestionably one of the most intelligent poets alive. But it also functions

Theodore Roethke
Robert Lowell
Stanley Kunitz
Richard Wilbur
Richard Eberhart
William DeWitt Snodgrass
Howard Nemerov
J. V. Cunningham
Randall Jarrell
W. S. Merwin
Denise Levertov
Louis Simpson
Anne Sexton

A chapter devoted to each of these thirteen modern American poets is included in the new, augmented reprint of Poets in Progress edited by Edward B. Hungerford

xii + 297 pages

$2.75, paper $6.50, cloth

Northwestern University Press
 1735 Benson Avenue
 Evanston, Illinois 60201

NEW DIRECTIONS POETRY

DENISE LEVERTOV

The Sorrow Dance. New poems. $4; paper, $1.60

With Eyes at the Back of Our Heads. Now in paper, $1.45

KENNETH REXROTH

Collected Shorter Poems, $7.50

CHARLES OLSON

Selected Writings. Poems & essays. $7.95; paper, $2.45

VERNON WATKINS

Selected Poems. Paper, $2.25

KENNETH PATCHEN

Hallelujah Anyway. Picture poems. Now in paper, $1.25

NEW DIRECTIONS
 333 Sixth Avenue, New York 10014

LAWRENCE FERLINGHETTI. Pictures of the Gone World (City Lights); The Coney Island of the Mind; Starting from San Francisco; Unfair Arguments With Existence; Routines (all New Directions).

GARY SNYDER. Myths and Texts (Citadel Press); Riprap (Origin Press).

PHILIP WHALEN. Like I Say (Citadel Press); Memories of an Interglacial Age (Auerhahn Press).

MICHAEL MCCLURE. Meat Science Essays (City Lights). The New Book/ A Book of Torture (Grove Press).

PHILLIP LAMANTIA. Destroyed Works (Auerhahn Press).

ROBERT DUNCAN. Selected Poems (City Lights); The Opening of the Field (Grove Press); Roots and Branches (Charles Scribner's Sons).

CHARLES OLSON. Maximus Poems (Citadel Press).

ROBERT CREELEY. For Love and Words (both Charles Scribner's Sons).

KENNETH KOCH. Poems (Tibor de Nagy Editions). Thank You; Ko. Or a Season on Earth; Bertha and Other Plays (all Grove Press).

JOHN ASHBERRY. Rivers and Mountains (Holt, Rinehart & Winston).

CHARLESTON IN THE 1860s

(derived from the diaries of Mary Boykin Chesnut)

*He seized me round the waist and kissed my throat . . .
Your eyes, dear, are they grey or blue, eyes of an angel?*

The carts have passed already with their heaped night-soil, we breathe again.

Is this what war is? Nitrate . . .

*But smell the pear,
the jasmine, the violets.*

Why does this landscape always sadden you?

*Now the freshet is up on every side,
the river comes to our doors,
limbs of primeval trees dip in the swamp.*

So we fool on into the black cloud ahead of us.

Everything human glitters fever-bright, the thrill of waking up out of a stagnant life?

There seems a spell upon your lovers—all dead of wounds or blown to pieces . . . Nitrate!

I'm writing blind with tears of rage.

In vain. Years, death, depopulation, fears, bondage: these shall all be borne.

No imagination to forestall woe.

ADRIENNE RICH

in a religious void; the devotional temperament, whether it worships religious language (as Duncan seems to) or religious beings, is alien to the secular age in which we live; and Duncan's works cut off our imaginative awareness at the same time as they open it. They embody a notion of what it means to be serious as a man that the era does not and cannot support, with the result that they are hounded by anachronistic ultimates: they seem simultaneously heroic and irrelevant.

This leaves us with Mere Art and the New York School—a jump across the continental divide from ritual to wit, from the religious sensibility manqué to the strictly secular sensibility playing with and extending its art. Historically speaking, this school is attempting to arbitrate the symbolist and surrealist aesthetic in a way that parallels the work of some contemporary French figures such as Francis Ponge and Denis Roche, as well as Paul Celan in Germany; these poets—John Ashbery, Kenneth Koch and the late Frank O'Hara—are interested in exploiting the capacities of the senses without any transcendent aim. Inevitably, supporters of Duncan accuse the school of superficiality.

The New York School is greatly indebted to Surrealism; but it has moved beyond the City Lights group to revise the revolutionary surrealist metaphor and return it to the complex confines of art, from which it originally exploded. Ashbery and Koch are aware that language is better able to traffic in the impossible than any other medium (partly because it so largely defines our sense of the possible), but that its sensory appeal is much less direct than that of the plastic arts, music, film or drama. They compensate for this fade-out of the printed word by exploiting the lushness of dissociation, leaping fantasy and surprise as fully as possible. Particularly in Koch's hands, this kind of graciously jumpy procedure has been given encyclopedic exploration in his work: (Poems, Permanently, and Thank You); in a mock epic poem "Ko," and in the delightful collection Bertha, and Other Plays. (Several chapters of a novel also have appeared in magazines.) Koch must be accounted the freshest and most polished literary wit now writing—as well as an "influence" whose workshops at the New School for Social Research opened the way to a new kind of poetic practice, giving direction to some of the most promising younger poets we have. I am thinking particularly of John Perreault and David Shapiro, who in their different ways have developed the master's lesson and shown it to be more than a mere method, but a true poetic—quivering, as Breton said, with a sense of the future.

Koch's energy is exemplary, and so is his movement out of the form of the traditional lyric poem into narratives and drama. "Ko"—a book-length narrative (115 pages) about a Japanese baseball player who bounces around the world like a TV beam from some whirling satellite—is a parody that returns storytelling to the methods of poetry, while the surrealist comedy of Bertha—and the other plays, like The Return of Yellowmay—makes the fundamental theatricality of Koch's whole poetic approach explicit.

John Ashbery's poetry differs from Koch's by being on the surface much more serious and at the same time much less coherent. The audience at one of Koch's readings ends laughing, while Ashbery's audience is more likely to be bluntly bewildered, wondering quite literally what goes on. Ashbery's work embodies sensory elements in which Koch appears to have little or no interest, the most important of which is time. Significantly, Koch wrote "Ko" quite early in his career, while for years Ashbery has been trying without success to write a long poem, to succeed only with the extraordinary "The Skaters," included in his latest book, Rivers and Mountains. Ashbery is concerned with the imaginative problem of embodying poetic time, and while Koch could write his long poem by resorting to the simple expedient of telling a story in the most disconnected way he could (and still tell it), Ashbery confronts vastly more difficult and exciting problems of scale and dynamics.

Although John Ashbery is an art critic, I suspect that the art (other than poetry) which interests him most is music, the only other art that deals with temporal elements in the way he aspires to do. It is no accident that Ashbery is the modern poet who shows the influence of John Cage, particularly in his earlier poems. If one is looking for analogies to the other arts, it is Koch's work that most resembles painting, since his methods of disjunction and collage show no particular attention to the artistic problem of linear time.

As the three schools make clear, the old cliché, "very interesting, but is it art," masks and evades questions of liberty and revelation, of the stature and viability of art in a secular age. Such questions could scarcely be more commanding, but in this context they command only to the degree that the work captures the imagination as art. Is this mere intellectualism? Or mere aestheticism? The two cannot be separated. Insofar as he has been captured, the reader is the captive who learns and wins.

Response to a War

WHERE IS VIETNAM? American Poets Respond. Edited by Walter Lowenfels. A Doubleday Anchor Original. 160 pp. $1.25 paper.

WENDELL BERRY

Mr. Berry is a poet now living in Kentucky. His latest book is The Broken Ground (Harcourt, Brace & World).

American writers have often longed for the peaceful contemplative life, and so they have often been painfully aware of distractions. They have felt tearing in themselves the rift between private peace and public trouble. Thoreau wrote: "... I endeavor in vain to observe nature; my thoughts involuntarily go plotting against the State. I trust that all just men will conspire." And Mark Twain sent Huck down the Mississippi in what has become the definitive American idyl, giving him for companion Nigger Jim, whose condition was the whole nation's shame and agony.

Not long ago most poets in this country were confidently promoting the specialization of their art. Young poets who began writing in the fifties were more than likely to gather from their elders that the poet's obligation was to poetry and to his language. Other concerns were for other specialists. But within the last three and a half years there has been a turn around. It began.

THE WRECK

The Church, like a wreck blown ashore from the Middle Ages, battering on a shoal at Finisterre . . .

*The seams have opened,
and the sea, like a luminous window falling away, flashes briefly with ikons, chalices, gold candlesticks.*

*Angels and saints, their faces crusted with salt,
draw near to the flooded railing.
They try to sing—the wind,
full of a wintry fervor, whips the kyries from broken spars.*

And the figurehead on a cross has never moved . . .

*a conch mourns in the littered shallows;
unwieldy shapes, driftwood and sea-coal,
groan and struggle to their feet, survivors from a shipwreck of souls.*

JOHN HAINES

I think, with the poems written on the assassination of President Kennedy; for the first time in maybe a century American poets wrote public poems—poems about a public happening, written out of feelings that the poets had in common, then, with most of the people in the country.

The assassination poems were almost inadvertent. They didn't come out of any formed intention, much less any formed sense of public responsibility. But they must have suggested the possibility of a public role for poetry, which has now been deliberately assumed by many poets, all over the country, in response to our war in Vietnam. This new anthology, Where Is Vietnam?, contains the work of eighty-seven poets, a considerable number, though by no means all who have written and publicly read poems in protest against this war. It appears safe to say that nearly all of our poets are party to this protest. I know of a few who hold to the notion that poetry has no business in politics, but I know of no pro-Johnson poem.

There is no mystery at the source of these poems. It is an agony of a kind that probably has not been felt so deeply by so many people in America before. Most American poets, like most Americans, have been taught from infancy that in a democratic country individuals are responsible for the actions of their government. And now they find themselves "represented" by a government that many of them helped elect on its promise not to do what it is doing, a government that in the name of democracy and brotherhood has made itself a tyrant and a scourge. They feel responsible for what they can neither approve nor control. They know that their country is determining the future of the world by the quirks of hypocrisy. They think of the people of Vietnam—the old people, the husbands and wives, the children—who are being dispossessed, scattered, maimed, burned alive, by us, for nothing they have ever done wrong.

The first poem in this anthology is by the Vietnamese poet, Nhat Hanh, a lament for the destruction of his country, "our dear green garden":

*O terrible winds that blow from the ends of the earth
To hurl down our houses and blast our fertile fields!
I say farewell to the blazing blackening place where I was born.*

And the rest of the book can be read as a response. Maybe a representative voice is that of the person "who once was a teacher in Asia," in the poem by Evelyn Thorne:

*Here between the hills and the Hudson
autumn comes in a rage of gold. I walk in a shower of midas leaves, and the smell of frost.
and I find myself being happy. Then great God
I remember. Over there in a land I love
the beautiful people are being murdered,
the courteous brown people who move with the grace of deer, and speak softly.
And I live here, in the land of the murderer.*

This strikes me as a desperate book. It would help to be able to believe that poets are unacknowledged legislators, or that they serve as the conscience of their race. But who knows? And who can help doubting? There are respected politicians and generals whose protests against this war have been ignored. In terms of effect, then, do these poems really represent the exercise of a public responsibility, or are they doomed to be only private gestures of expiation or repudia-

New poetry from VIKING

The Vaudeville Marriage by SANDRA HOCHMAN

"She conveys in her exotic imagery and her seemingly casual rhythms a breezy openness to experience.... It's a good book and an original one."—PETER DAVISON $3.95

Collected Poems 1930-1965 by A. D. HOPE

"Mr. Hope declares for a style that is 'plain, lucid, coherent, logically connected, syntactically exact, and firmly based in current idiom and usage.'"—Times Literary Supplement $6.00

The Weathercock by ANN STANFORD

"Miss Stanford writes with depth and emotion. As she describes her innermost visions the reader falls under the spell shadowed with the intensity of her message."—Library Journal $4.50

THE VIKING PRESS

tion? I don't know, but the question worries me.

This collection suggests that poets have begun again to want a public or political role—or at least that poets, as thoughtful and responsible-feeling persons, are finding themselves unable to refuse such a role. But I think that this will not amount to very much unless our poetry develops the ability to do more than protest. The poets in this volume very movingly, and often very competently, condemn the way things are, but they never do this, it seems to me, by the standard of any coherent vision of how things ought to be. Their impulse is mainly negative. The Waste Land still exemplifies the powers and the limits of most of our poetry. When we want to despise or condemn what is going on, we hark back to some "good" time in the past, juxtapose selected evils of our own time, and note the discrepancies. That, it must be said, is easy to do, and it is becoming utterly useless. The poems in Where Is Vietnam? are so locked in their horror of the present that they can hardly look even backward, but they are locked in this horror partly because their inheritance has not equipped them to imagine anything in the other direction.

In the long run, this protesting will be as negligible as the merest fashion if it doesn't produce a full realization of how the war grows out of what is corrupt and false in our life; and that realization will come to nothing if it doesn't produce a believable vision of a better life that is possible for us. Without this, protest is little more than wishful thinking, as futile as wishing that we had been born in the good old days.

We need a vision of a national life in which efficiency is not the highest good, and of a governmental consciousness of life that can include and control the consciousness of power. We need to be able to feel that all problems cannot be solved by power or by technology. We probably have the necessary ideas already, but their application to our time and our troubles will have to be imagined. To have any life or any appeal or any effect, the ideas not only will have to be thought about and assented to but their possibility will have to be foreseen in the lives of people. This is the vision we don't have. The lack of it makes the desperation of this book of poems, and of the war it was made to oppose, and of the society that can find no alternative to the war.

Translations of Anna Akhmatova (1888-1966)

STANLEY KUNITZ

Mr. Kunitz is currently visiting the Soviet Union and other Eastern European countries under the cultural exchange agreement. In the preparation of these translations from the Russian, Mr. Kunitz has worked closely with Max Hayward with whom he is collaborating on The Selected Poetry of Anna Akhmatova, to be published next year by Macmillan. Like that of her contemporaries, Mandelstam, Pasternak and Cvetaeva, Akhmatova's work is an important influence on the new Russian Poets. Mr. Kunitz's Selected Poems (Little, Brown) was awarded the Pulitzer Prize in 1959.

READING HAMLET

*A barren patch to the right of the cemetery,
Behind it a river flashing blue.
You said: "All right then, get thee to a nunnery,
Or go get married to a fool. . ."*

*It was the sort of thing that princes always say,
But these are words that one remembers.
May they flow a hundred centuries in a row
Like an ermine mantle from his shoulders.*

Kiev, 1909

JULY 1914

I.

*All month a smell of burning, of dry peat
Smouldering in the bogs.
Even the birds have stopped singing,
The aspen does not tremble.*

*The god of wrath glares in the sky,
The fields have been parched since Easter.
A one-legged pilgrim stood in the yard
With his mouth full of prophecies:*

*"Beware of terrible times . . . the earth
Opening for a crowd of corpses.
Expect famine, earthquakes, plague,
And heavens darkened by eclipses.*

*"But our land will not be divided
By the enemy at his pleasure;*

*The Mother-of-God will spread
A white shroud over these great sorrows."*

II.

*From the burning woods drifts
The sweet smell of juniper.
Widows grieve over their brood,
The village rings with their lamentation.*

*If the land thirsted, it was not in vain,
Nor were the prayers wasted;
For a warm red rain soaks
The trampled fields.*

*Low, low hangs the empty sky,
Tender is the voice of the supplicant:
"They wound Thy most holy body,
They are casting lots for Thy garments."*

Slepnevo, 1914

'HEART'S MEMORY OF SUN...'

*Heart's memory of sun grows fainter,
Sallow is the grass,
A few flakes toss in the wind
Scarcely, scarcely.*

*The narrow canals no longer flow,
They are frozen over.
Nothing will ever happen here,
Oh, never!*

*In the bleak sky the willow spreads
Its bare-boned fan.
Maybe I'm better off as I am,
Not as your wife.*

*Heart's memory of sun grows fainter.
What's this? Darkness?
Perhaps! This very night will bring
The winter.*

1911

Inventing the American Heart

POEMS 1957-1967. By James Dickey. Wesleyan University Press. 299 pp. $6.95.

MICHAEL GOLDMAN

Mr. Goldman, poetry editor of The Nation, is the author of First Poems (Macmillan). He teaches at Columbia University.

One of the things we should mean when we call a poet "good" is that his work returns us to the world and not merely to the poet. We do not assimilate good poetry; we become included in its imagination. James Dickey is a good poet, very good. The appearance of this volume, containing most of his four previous books and a substantial amount of new work, makes it clear that by a continuing act of the imagination Dickey has penetrated a large and unfamiliar portion of the world. The life he establishes is fearful, often inhuman, but it is necessary because in it we recognize ourselves. He lifts something out of our experience that our mind has not yet been able to play upon, and frees us to encounter it.

Dickey's poems are remarkable for imagination, in the most literal sense, for their power of grasping and making images. But these are not the "images" the tradition of poetry has taught us to expect. They are neither minute visual notations nor elaborately constructed symbols. Here is the beginning of "A Screened Porch in the Country":

*All of them are sitting
Inside a lamp of coarse wire
And being in all directions
Shed upon darkness*

This is more than a type of high wit, more than a strikingly accurate piece of description. Dickey gives the moment a natural energy, not the energy of the poet's insistence upon his own personality but the energy of a vast life outside the poet which moves all things through one another and through him.

For many poets the image is a form of self-projection, a personal signature that they inscribe upon experience. For others it is a kind of affectionate clarity, a loving selective focus. But Dickey incorporates everything he sees into an image that is in motion, a momentarily complete environment flexing and warm like living tissue, within which he moves. It is as if the world about him became an animal, and he entered its body.

In "Cherrylog Road," the poet remembers how as a young man he made his way to a rendezvous through the abandoned hulks of an automobile graveyard. He goes from a Ford to an Essex to a Chevrolet:

*None had the same body heat
I changed with them inward, toward
The weedy heart of the junkyard*

His images are bodies within which he changes, moving toward a heart which is not his heart but a heart of experience—an animal center, usually dangerous. He moves mainly by water in the earliest poems, which are somewhat diffuse and "romantic" in aura, and in the very latest poems he seems increasingly concerned with movement through the air, but the movement is always into a realm where animal powers lurk, foxes or snakes or enemies, where the explorer becomes his exploration and the hunter puts on his victim's skin. Dickey returns again and again to the figure of a man putting on someone else's body, a hollowed-out boar's head, a suit of armor, a dead man's helmet. Even the spurs of the "Power and Light" man are like a gamecock's spurs; and of course the hero of this poem takes on power from the wires to which he climbs:

*flung up on towers walking
Over mountains my charged hair standing on end crossing
The sickled, slaughtered alleys of timber
Where the lines loop and crackle on their gallows.*

And when the power and light man comes home and shuts himself in his basement to drink he feels a similar energy coming at him through the ground:

*... in the deep sway of underground among the roots
That bend like branches all things connect and stream
Toward light and speech tingle rock like a powerline in wind,
Like a man working, drunk of pine-moves the sun in the socket
Of his shoulder . . .
Far under the grass of my grave, I drink like a man
The night before Resurrection Day.*

For Dickey, an image is like a special kind of clothing, a charged shape of the outside world that he puts on, in order to connect himself to the world's monstrous power.

The last section of the book is devoted to poems written since Buckdancer's Choice (which a year ago won the National Book Award), and here Dickey seems to confront the monstrous even more directly. There are a number of magnificent poems (particularly

How we saw "Red"

AMERICANS AND THE SOVIET EXPERIMENT 1917-1933

By Peter G. Filene

In the sixteen eventful years between the Bolshevik February Revolution and Roosevelt's recognition of the Soviet regime, Americans viewed the "Red experiment" with mixed emotions. By turns confused, fearful, fascinated, agitated, curious, complacent, anxious, admiring, outraged, even envious and hysterical—but never bored—businessmen and educators, clergymen and labor leaders, reactionaries and radicals compared and contrasted American and Russian achievements. In a constantly engrossing story, Mr. Filene uncovers much about how attitudes are formed and how they produce opinions, and about how Americans saw—and see—democracy, capitalism, and themselves. Illustrated.

$7.95

ALIENS AND DISSENTERS: Federal Suppression of Radicals, 1903-1933. William Preston, Jr. Foreword by Oscar Handlin. "Important... focuses attention on an antidemocratic tradition that many complacent Americans tend to overlook... a standard work in the history of civil rights."—American Historical Review. Center for the Study of the History of Liberty in America.

$6.75

HARVARD UNIVERSITY PRESS

"Sustainment," "The Head-Aim," as well as "Power and Light"), and in most of them, some inhuman power possesses the human body. "The Head-Aim" discusses how to be an animal:

*You must throw your arms
Like broken sticks into the alder creek
And learn to aim the head.
... This is the whole secret of being*

Inhuman.

"The Sheep-Child" is about the legendary offspring of a farm boy and a sheep; the bulk of the poem is devoted to a speech by this "woolly baby" supposedly "pickled in alcohol" in a museum in Atlanta. Like many of the poems it is also concerned with the values that may rise out of our experience of the inhuman. The sheep-child says of the farm boys:

*Dreaming of me,
They groan they wait they suffer Themselves, they marry, they raise their kind.*

Dickey attempts a more encouraging conclusion, with less success, in "Falling," a poem about a stewardess who falls to her death from an airliner. It seizes its subject brilliantly and characteristically:

As though she blew

*The door down with a silent blast from her lungs ...
... falling living beginning to be something
That no one has ever been and lived through*

But at the end as the girl lies with a broken back in a Kansas field, Dickey tries to assert a positive value for the experience. She

Feels herself go go toward go outward breathes at last fully Not and tries less once tries tries AH, GOD —

By and large, Dickey is more convincing at terror than exaltation, but terror—as opposed to the nervous irritation for which so much of our poetry settles—is a rare thing in poetry, and it clears the heart.

A special quality in these poems—at least for another poet—is Dickey's surrender to his scenes. Today, poets frequently write about their surrenders—to pain, madness, drugs, anger, sex, nirvana—but their surrenders so often turn out to be seizures, spasms of the nerves and of the will. Dickey, "self-possessed in self-surrender," allows himself to register fully the terrible life that flows between the self and the world. He knows the world is the bigger of the two and that the self grows by exposure to it. It is his sense of the threat and alluring power of the world, which is also the threat and alluring power of the self, that governs his imagination and gives it a fearful energy. When he writes about a girl hideously scarred by windshield glass in an automobile accident he begins:

*All glass may yet be whole
She thinks, it may be put together
From the deep inner flashing of her face.*

And in the opening lines of "The Ice Skin," he seems to be describing the very process of tragedy:

*All things that go deep enough
Into rain and cold
Take on, before they break down
A shining in every part.
The necks of slender trees
Reel under it, too much crowned,
Like princes dressing as kings.*

*And the redwoods let sink their branches
Like arms that try to hold buckets
Filling slowly with diamonds
Until a cannon goes off
Somewhere inside the still trunk
And a limb breaks, just before midnight,
Plunging houses into the darkness
And hands into cupboards, all seeking Candles, and finding each other.
There is this skin*

Always waiting in cold-enough air.

This succeeds not because the poet has tried to come up with an arresting string of symbols for tragedy, but because through his imagination he has included himself in tragic life.

In Dickey's poems there is very little of that secret dialogue among words, the sense of "words talking among themselves" that Auden refers to, which is the usual source of root vitality in poetry. His secret dialogue is among images—they flow into and transform one another, breaking out of the literal pattern and insisting on their own visionary, contrapuntal life.

Verbally, Dickey has all the breath he needs: his language is never exhausted and seldom inexact. Yet it remains true that what I have called the secret dialogue among words is a characteristic of the greatest poetry: every word infects every other word, impregnates every other word, bites every other word, makes a flesh with every other word—and it is this verbal power which, till now, has not been markedly present in Dickey's work. Now this is an ultimate power, very rare in its true form. It should not be confused with the mere appearance of verbal power, which may be contrived by any poet who is willing to devote his career to never taking risks. It has nothing to do with what reviewers call "the distinctive voice." We praise a poet for having a distinctive voice only when there is nothing else distinctive about him. Some poets may give us a svelte stuffed animal, but Dickey gives us the living mouth and lung and claw. And when his language takes on its own animal life, while still remaining transparent to the life of its images, we have a poetry that no active poet has bettered:

and wandered the lane of water

*Upstream and home,
His bridle dragging, his saddle Maniacally wrenched, stopping often to drink
Entirely, his eyes receiving bright pebbles,
His head in his own image where it flowed.*

Dickey's strangeness is peculiarly American (though I suspect that in the next few years it will prove very successful with foreign audiences). The "natural world" of America is very different from the natural world of, say, England, and yet when American poets come to write about nature, they write poems that are finally no different in method from English nature poetry. That is, they give us a paysage moralisé, more or less precisely noted, a landscape which reflects the human image. There may be disorder in it; we may even observe "nature red in tooth and claw," but even the chaotic is placed in a frame of civilized observation. Nature is observed by man, who seems always firmly anchored in the human world. This is the method of Herbert and Gray, of Keats and Yeats; it is also the method of Williams and Frost. The "nature" Frost observes often seems to lie at the edge of the inhuman American wilderness, but Frost deals only with what is at the edge, and always includes what he sees in a firmly moralized landscape. Whitman, too, sees nature in a human setting: it is a projection of his own inclusive self. But just as Dickey's typical use of the image is different from that of Whitman, Williams or Frost, so the poetry he produces is, at its most distinctive, like no other "nature poetry."

In Dickey's work, the inhuman is no longer contained in the human arena. He has created a poetry of American nature, a nature we recognize in Melville, in the documents of American history, and in the daily papers. Its subject is the wilderness that was raped by the first settlers and has taken its revenge by continuing to dominate and excite our hearts. Dickey moves out into the wilderness, is contained in it, and runs with the animals. It is a terrible risk he takes, and it produces, at its best, a terrifying poetry.

The Past Reordered

BATTLE REPORT. By Harvey Shapiro. Wesleyan University Press. 77 pp. $1.85 paper.

DAVID IGNATOW

Mr. Ignatow's most recent collection of verse is Figures of the Human (Wesleyan University Press).

I am moved by a sense of purification in this book. Battle Report consists of selections from three previous collections and an opening group of more recent poems, an arrangement which impels the reader to seek out certain implications. Here is a poem, "Past Time," from the late period:

*I believe we came together
Out of ignorance not love,
Both being shy and hunted in the city.
In the hot summer, touching each other,
Amazed at how love could come
Like a waterfall, with frightening force
And bruising sleep. Waking at noon,
Touching each other for direction,
Out of ignorance not love*

And here is "The Marriage," from Mountain, Fire, Thornbush, Harvey Shapiro's third book, published in 1961:

*When they were canopied, and had the wine
To lace their spirits in the trembling cup,
And all the holy words sang round their heads
In tribute to the maker and the vine,
He saw the leeching sea lap, like darkness,
Up her summer's gown, as if dark time
And he should race to claim the maidenhead.
When he smashed the cup, then ruin spread.
The dazzled floor showed sea and blood.
Beyond this harvest that the ritual bore (Their mothers weeping on the farther shore)
They saw the journeying years extend.
And Zion's hill rose for their reckoning.*

Consider in the latter the conception of the dark, sacramental wine likened to death as at the same time it draws the marriage into direct relationship with the eternal godhead. Bride and bridegroom, journeying toward Zion, the manifest eternal, are fixed forever in their relationship toward each other, removed from the exigencies of a transient world. Acting in support, the ritual language lifts the wedding to its symbolical level of absolute truth, to the measure of the traditional and majestic iambic foot, rhymed.

But then examine the language of "Past

Time" in its very nearly brutal gesture. Direct, plain, matter of fact in tone, without flourish or apology, it sets the marriage in its ordinary, quotidian, circumstantial text. God, Zion and preordination are either abolished or, having vanished in the daily struggle for existence, are now forgotten without regret or afterthought. A fury of discovery races through the poem to give it the curt power of its accomplishment. We are alone and that is the point Harvey Shapiro hammers home in the language and in the text, alone with no one but ourselves to preside over our faults, frailties, the world being just this, ours to make.

All these recent poems, including "Past Time," could be grouped together as one, with the effect of each leading to the next. Uncompromising in tone and point of view, their content would permit conjecture as to what precisely in the poet's life led to such a radical change of style. But that would be irrelevant to the point of the poems, which is that they are entirely a fresh departure, written with a vigor altogether different from and even superior to the earlier poems. They spring from a dual vision in the poet of disillusionment, and regeneration born from disillusionment. That which led to his despair turns out not to have had basis in reality in the first place, its connection with reality specious at most. The permanent and immutable are to be found in the processes of life itself of which we are one expression, no matter what form of it we take. To live is to endure and it is through endurance that we manifest the energy of life:

*I cast out
Beyond the demonic element
And the fear of death
(And the fear of death)
Into that bright water
Beyond this water
Where leviathan swims.
Communication is instant
When it comes — close
As my hand, the words on my tongue,
Though the crying in my ear
Is my own death crying.*

Harvey Shapiro has been able to extend this achievement into the public area of our lives, to give us one of the few notable poems on the death of President Kennedy, "National Cold Storage Company":

What's really happening in China? Does Mao want war with the U.S.? the U.S.S.R.? Will the "cultural revolution" degenerate into a blood purge? What caused the Red Guard outbreaks?

These and many other vital questions are answered in this brilliant, profound and exciting book by an internationally-known journalist and expert on Communism who has been correspondent for the New Statesman, and now writes for Le Nouvel Observateur. He travelled freely through China for four months talking with workers, farmers, intellectuals, and top Chinese leaders including Chou En-lai. The best informed, most up-to-date, and most provocative book on China today.

32 pages of magnificent photographs by Marc Riboud

CHINA: THE OTHER COMMUNISM By K. S. Karol

$7.95

HILL & WANG
141 Fifth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10010

*The National Cold Storage Company contains
More things than you can dream of.
Hard by the Brooklyn Bridge it stands
In a litter of freight cars,
Tugs to one side; the other, the traffic
Of the Long Island Expressway.
I myself have dropped into it in seven years
Midnight tossings, plans for escape, the shakes.
Add this to the national total —
Grant's tomb, the Civil War, Arlington,
The young President dead.
Above the warehouse and beneath the stars
The poets creep on the harp of the Bridge.
But see,
They fall into the National Cold
Storage Company
One by one. The wind off the river is too cold,
Or the times too rough, or the Bridge
Is not a harp at all. Or maybe
A monstrous birth inside the warehouse
Must be fed by everything — ships,
poems,
Stars, all the years of our lives.*

The poignancy of this poem has also its application to the many recent poems of love and marriage in the book. These are not written from defeat either but out of a need to know if one would live.

Despite the contrast the earlier work makes with the new poems, it is very much a preparation for what follows. I am referring especially to Shapiro's experience as an Air Force radio gunner in World War II, used in an account in retrospect in the title poem to the book, "Battle Report." Too long to quote in full, the poem is clearly written out of an obsession with the experience:

*In this slow dream's rehearsal,
Again I am the death-instructed kid,
Gun in its cradle, sun at my back,
Cities below me without sound.
That tensed, corrugated hose Feeding to my face the air of substance,
I face the mirroring past.
We swarm the skies, determined armies,
To seek the war's end, the silence stealing,
The mind grown hesitant as breath.*

Defeated in his effort at a relatively calm redress, Shapiro continued to search still further back in his past for other ways to recover himself. With his exceptional knowledge of Hebrew history and religion, such poems as "The Wedding" followed, rich in evocation of Hebrew faith and wisdom, and poignant with his need. From "Dream of Life":

*But yesterday I saw
Seven gulls pass overhead.
It may be tonight I will dream myself into a promise of life.*

In his way, Shapiro repeats the experience of countless young men after the war in search of a surety of some kind that life comes first, after all. Many did finally manage to come to terms with their past of bomb and bayonet and to lead a fairly normal existence, digging as far as they could without loss of self-respect into ritual and the secular conformations of America. These became for them their haven, allowing them to live contentedly (or perhaps not so contentedly) for the balance of their days with wives, children, mortgaged homes, television sets and cars: the evidence of a fulfilled existence. In Harvey Shapiro another thing was at work. The after-strain of war, it could be said, continued to act on him, with this latest book as a result, in which he decisively sheds the religious aura and again as in his gunner days stands exposed—but shield and weapon are himself now, invulnerable in his life. In "News of the World":

*The past, like so many bad poems,
Waits to be reordered,
And the future needs reordering too.
Rain dampens the brick,
And the house sends up its smell
Of smoke and lives —
My own funk the major part.
Angling for direction,
I think of the favored in Homer,
Who in a dream, a council meeting,
At the bottom of despair,
Heard the voice of a god or goddess,
Though it was, say, only Polites
Speaking. Turning to a friend,
I ask again
For news of the world.*

MORE ENTERPRISE

*A sideways flicker, half headshake of doubt — Meaning, confusingly, assent — fills out
The scant wardrobe of gesture I still use.
It clings by habit now. The old strait swank
I came in struts the town on local heirs.
Koula's nephew has the suit she shrank,
Andreas coveted my Roman shoes. . . .
Into the grave I'll wear that Yes of theirs.*

JAMES MERRILL

THE KITCHEN KNIGHT

*O my white armor, my copper or stainless steel
Or aluminum brainstorms, each with its steam panache!
The woman comes, goes, turns me off,
Wipes me dry, and sits down to her meal.

A fussy, elderly muse who needs a man,
She looks at raw experience with distaste.
Who doesn't? Yet when she passes it on to me
My code constrains me to do all I can.*

JAMES MERRILL

LOVE'S EDGE

*It is summer in my apartment, like last summer.
I have only to touch the thermostat,
the air cools and fans.
What was that? A light turns on and off at a distance, as if someone crossed between me and fire,—or was signaling.
Possibly the wind bent a branch across a lighted window, or an automobile turned away.
Her passion was almost unnoticeable, —like the statue of Saint Teresa in ecstasy, looking to heaven, a single toe crooked sharply, her mouth barely open, showing the edge of a marble tongue. How was I to know?
Flesh is a ghost, inarticulate.*

STANLEY MOSS

IMPORTANT

Random House

BOOKS

Hell's Angels

By HUNTER S. THOMPSON

The strange and terrible saga of the outlaw motorcycle gangs, by the man who rode with them. "Superb and terrifying."—STUDS TERKEL, Chicago Tribune. $4.95

Senator Fulbright

THE ARROGANCE OF POWER

"An invaluable antidote to the official rhetoric of government."—MAX FRANKEL, front page, N.Y. Times Book Review. Cloth $4.95; Vintage Book paperback $1.95.

Byzantium

The Imperial Centuries
A. D. 610-1071

By ROMILLY JENKINS

"The book is a model of learning, gracefully and excitingly expressed."—ALDEN WHITMAN, New York Times. Maps, index, bibliography. $10

Oscar Lewis

LA VIDA

Winner of the 1967 National Book Award for Science, Philosophy and Religion.

"Unquestionably one of the most important books published in the United States this year."—MICHAEL HARRINGTON, front page, N.Y. Times Book Review. $10

The Age of Keynes

By ROBERT LEKACHMAN

"For the non-professional reader to get a good view of John Maynard Keynes and his ideas has not been easy... For this reason, this book will be greatly welcomed."—JOHN KENNETH GALBRAITH, front page, N.Y. Times Book Review. $6.00

Fred W. Friendly

DUE TO CIRCUMSTANCES BEYOND OUR CONTROL...

"A major book... forceful, enormously informed, astute, passionate, and disturbing... No one can read it without a sharply heightened sense of the tragedy of American TV."—ERIC GOLDMAN, Book Week. $6.95

NOW AT YOUR BOOKSTORE • RANDOM HOUSE • NEW YORK

Until now no one has dared to say what this book says about LBJ.

"A withering, explosive investigation of Lyndon B. Johnson."—WILLIAM HOGAN, San Francisco Chronicle

"All this is explosive stuff."—DONALD STANLEY, San Francisco Examiner

"ROBERT SHERRILL has written a fast-paced, disturbing book . . . provocative and challenging . . . sharp and tough as befits the situation . . . He goes far beyond a mere discussion of Johnson's quest for and use of power. He faces frankly the question many other writers avoid: 'In whose interest is the power exercised?' "

—WALTER JOHNSON, Saturday Review

THE ACCIDENTAL PRESIDENT

by Robert Sherrill

$5.00, now at your bookstore
GROSSMAN PUBLISHERS

Poet at the Podium

SIDNEY BERNARD

Mr. Bernard is New York editor of Literary Times and roving editor of The Smith.

Russian poetry has taken to the road in a theatrical sense—and has stirred an extraordinary audience response in the case of the United States, in "stick" towns like New York, Chicago, Pittsburgh and San Francisco. The two leading exemplars—Yevtushenko and Voznesensky—of the Russian school of poetry-as-recital did, in a way, no more than what comes naturally on home grounds. The forte—especially since Mayakovsky—of declamation, of "styling" poetry as an acted-out experience, was what gave the road shows their vibrancy. By and large, the American experience has been different—at least insofar as acted-out poetry goes. The closest example was of course Dylan Thomas—and he was an on-loan quantity at most. Earlier, and indeed, milder, examples were—Vachel Lindsay and Carl Sandburg. But the guitar, more than voice and theatrical effects, was the adjunct to the lines. The general rule could be put: whereas Russian poets, at least in recital, get in front of the poetry, American poets get behind it; even in the Read-Ins against the war in Vietnam, this basic style does not change. In any case, Yevtushenko and Voznesensky stirred U.S. poetry juices, as did, too, Pablo Neruda, who in his own way is an exemplar, within the Spanish-speaking poetry tradition, of the same style of declamative verse. The contrast, finally, was dramatically on view when Voznesensky gave his New York recital; here the Russian and several American poets (who read translations) appeared together and the two styles got full, back-to-back display.

For Yevgeny Yevtushenko's reading last fall, the calls for tickets were coming into the 92nd Street YM/YWHA at a flood tide—not simply from regulars but from poetry lovers like Time, Life and Newsweek. Less than 700 seats, and just about all of Manhattan suddenly wanted in. Nor did it help much if you had a friend at the Russian Embassy, or knew so-and-so at the poet's New York publishing house, or had to be there to cover the reading. Best you could get, finally, was a ticket to closed-circuit in the art gallery, adjacent to the auditorium. After which you, and most others in the gallery, managed to slip through unguarded doors, ending up hugging the auditorium's dark mahogany walls for the reading.

After a half hour's delay, the reading was opened by Robert Lowell. A long table at stage right bristled with three microphones—before two of which sat a short, bearded interpreter, Edward L. Keenan, and the poet's English reader, Barry Boys, a handsome young actor. Lowell, tall, a little stooped, came to the stand-up microphone at stage center, and waited several seconds for the crowd to quiet down. Hesitant, and with an air of almost painful diffidence, he then began his remarks by alluding to Yevtushenko as a "world-wide cultural and political figure." One who had, Lowell continued, stood up for a number of causes, among them the right of poets to talk about politics. Lowell, now crossing his legs in splayed position, now drawing back from the microphone to score a point, referred in passing to his own political confrontation, offering in a fillip of irony the thought that "if you're Jane Austen, you can ignore Napoleonic wars if you want to."

The undercurrent of Lowell's brief introduction seemed more than just hands-across-the-border protocol. There was an edge to his words, as of hanging lightning; and the diffidence of delivery, the way he clasped and unclasped his hands, the steps he took (as if in pain) away and toward the microphone, all added to a taut portrait in motion of a middle-aged poet doing battle with himself—and in a way for the audience looking on—to find that means by which art and conscience merge and must stand. He made a small joke of what Yevtushenko had told him, that we must find a way "to get rid of the two black cats that stand in our paths." And he ended his remarks with what seemed an invocation: "I have a sense of a classical moment, of someone Greek standing in the wing, preferably a lady, telling us that the hour is one of danger. . . ." He hesitated again, pursed his mouth, put away the few scratch notes he held, notes that he referred to only once or twice. Robert Lowell then said the words, "I give you Yevgeny Yevtushenko," and he was off behind the curtains even before the Russian poet came forward.

That sense of foreboding, grave but gritty, gave way to a lighter mood, as Yevtushenko looked out at the crowd. He is tall—aged 33—and carries himself with almost a bamboo give. He was wearing a gray polo shirt, which fell in a neat line below the waist of his gray-and-white striped trousers. For several seconds his eyes, which under the lights had a blue-gray brightness, did a darting dance to all sections of the hall.

Yevtushenko's sharp bony face was a polygraph—and remained so all evening long—of a whole range of inner tunes, and the one that registered first, as the crowd applauded and cheered him (some from their seats and many who were standing) was of a man happy for the greeting but impatient for the poetry. His first words were "Spasibo . . . thanks for coming," given in Russian, and then repeated by the translator, who had joined him at the microphone. When the crowd finally eased back in their seats, the poet reminded them that they might have had enough of speeches, during the last days of an election, and that in any case he was there for the poetry. Yevtushenko nodded to his reader who came forward from the table, while the poet and translator returned to it, and the evening was opened with Boys reading "Babi Yar" from manuscript.

No monument stands over Babi Yar

—the opening line, read by Boys in motionless calm, brought a soft ripple of recognition from the audience. Boys soon gained momentum, now weaving the lines, now drumming them across in a tone of anger. At the table, the poet cast a sharp eye through the hall. He shifted in his seat, or cupped his cheek tightly with his hand. And his angular face, lips pale and expressive, hair a finespun brown and cut short, was never quiescent. When Boys rang out the three jagged lines, "Hounded./ spat on./ slandered," a cold anger flickered across Yevtushenko's features. And when he came to the Anne Frank passage:

I seem to be

Anne Frank

transparent

as a branch in April.

And I love.

And have no need of phrases.

Yevtushenko's face lit up in innocence. At the end of the piece, the poet rose from his seat and exchanged places with Boys. He waited for the applause to fade and then recited "Babi Yar" in his own tongue, from memory. He employed a sharp, evenly paced declamative style, with stiff or sweeping gestures of the hands, the hands now and then molded into fists; and his lean body full of sway, as if to dance the muse. And the voice, pitched a little high and silvery, a voice of near-inexhaustible drive.

"Babi" was followed by "Sleep My Beloved," a lyric charged with soft lamentation, which Boys and the poet recited in near-hushed tones, drawing audible sighs here and there. Next came

"Portrait of Childhood," which delineated a moment of violence, as well as of shame and disgust, out of the poet's youth (the violence of a gang of toughs beating up a stranger)—Yevtushenko giving the lines a passion that fell on the ears like blows. A lighter and broadly satiric mood came next, a sort of filmic Baedeker of international James Bonds called "Impressions of the Western Cinema." Here the poet drew rounds of laughs and some mock hissing as he ticked off a veritable rogues' gallery of spies (including ". . . the Chinese agent, the gaunt Li Chu"). Also "The City of Yes, the City of No," which described the poet's metaphorical journeying between the No city ("Each object there/ sullenly scowls") and the Yes city (where "Any star in the sky/ just begs to fall into your hands")—the long and bitter "Colosseum," a monograph on man's cruelty from the sacrificial days of Rome to the more impersonal killing of the nuclear age ("Hallooers./ hounders./ from your safe seats/ you squeal/ at us to be fearless")—and the two ending poems, "Why Did You Do That?" and "Hail in Kharkov," the latter a joyous, Dylanesque evocation of falling sheets of hail, on one level, and a political rally cry (anti-Stalinist) on another. (The poem's theme: people who run from a storm—and people, the young in heart, who revel in it.) The English translations were those of George Reavey and Geoffrey Dutton, about half and half.

It was a two-hour set, with no intermission. And with a question period to come, announced by Yevtushenko with a broad grin, which could have been read as glee plus a small anxiety. What came out, and soon enough, was something in between the two—i.e., a waspish show of temper on Yevtushenko's part that was a surprise to some and worth laughs to others. The Q. and A. went this way: Man (from far back): "What did you think of Senator Robert Kennedy?" (The poet met Kennedy, the day before, at the Senator's New York apartment.) Poet (crisply): "An interesting man. . . ." Lady (with cultivated voice): "What is your pheelosophy of poetry?" (Question arrives as if by fourth-class mail.) Poet (blinking): "I write poetry—that is my philosophy." Man (cautiously): "What do you think of the poetry of Mao Tse-tung?" (Audience laughs.) Poet: "Well—I hadn't thought. . . . Maybe the same as he thinks of mine." Man: "Would you read some more—Mandelstam, Pushkin . . . (this or that) poem of yours?" Poet (tartly): "I don't believe in dictation. Not from audiences, or elsewhere." Man: "What

A fresh, hard-hitting appraisal of American labor.

"His analysis of the past, the insight into the present, and his optimistic view of the future are based on an intimate knowledge of the diversity of the trade union movement."

—SAUL MILLER
American Federationist

THE LABOR REVOLUTION

by Gus Tyler

$6.50

THE VIKING PRESS

625 Madison Avenue
New York, N. Y. 10022

A concise, lucid history of economic planning in this country, plus an authoritative explanation of what is being done to meet the urgent problems of today. "This book is crucial for those who desire perspective on where we are going by looking where we have been. George Soule is one of our wisest economic commentators."—Library Journal

$4.95

PLANNING U.S.A.

by George Soule

author of The New Science of Economics is your relationship with John Steinbeck?" Poet: "My relationship with him is—private." Man: "Is your pretty wife, Galina, with you? We'd like to meet her." Poet (quickly): "Maybe she wouldn't like to meet you." And more questions, some perhaps not so "loaded."

The crowd was a broad mix of New York's cultural cognoscenti—college youths of both the brushed and lank-haired variety, assistant English professor types, people from the stage and concert halls, several poets from above and below the 14th Street geographical line (i.e., the line that separates avant from establishment poets in terms of, say, style, if not necessarily politics) and a good number of older, and old-European types who in the main appeared to be getting the full drift of both the English and the Russian versions of the readings.

There was a sense all evening of the electricity of a happening, combined with the bravura (the latter a touch old-fashioned, and maybe even "square") of a one-man Chautauqua, Russian version. By contrast, our own readings, say from Richard Wilbur to Marianne Moore, are to Yevtushenko what a sleek GM car is to a troika. Soundless gear shifting, in one case; an earthy clobber of wheels on cobblestones, in the other. As to the poetry, the differences seem just as sharp. Where most established American poets are private, alienated and/or Ivy League-paced, Yevtushenko is open, didactic and full of immediacy. Put another way, our poets seem to "suffer" their art; Yevtushenko beards his and comes up with a song.

There is, of course, an affinity between the Russian poet and our own avant, those of the East Side explosion starting with Allen Ginsberg and Ferlinghetti. The avant, as is Yevtushenko, are attacking establishment mores, but pot rather than politics is the spur. (Vietnam excepted.) And only in Ferlinghetti, among the avant, do you get an approximation of Yevtushenko's lyricism, and then only fleetingly. As to the poems' lasting or literary qualities, this was almost beside the point. On one level alone, the performing one, he is a poet to see.

A Murderous Solvent

NEAR THE OCEAN. By Robert Lowell. Farrar, Straus & Giroux. 123 pp. $6.

PAUL ZWEIG

Mr. Zweig is a poet who teaches English at Columbia University.

Robert Lowell's new book is entitled Near The Ocean; yet we discover as we read that it is a strangely hostile ocean; a place from which the Gorgon's head is fished up "with all its stranded snakes uncoiled/ here beheaded and despoiled." There are no voyages to be made on or under this water. All one can do is sink into it, with "eyes worn white as moons from hitting-bottom."

Indeed, Lowell's title takes on new meaning if we consider the first image in the book: a chinook salmon, "nosing up to the impossible/ stone and bone-crushing waterfall—/ raw-jawed, weak-fleshed there." The salmon batters its life out on the way upstream, trying wildly to outlast the current that drags it back toward the ocean.

Already in Lord Weary's Castle Lowell's water was a murderous solvent: the very element of that self-destructive violence which overwhelms the rhetoric of the book with its knotted rhythms, its glimpse of past America dragged down by a kind of vengeance. The poet's life is described in the book as a precarious balance, "skating on thin ice," while "Whore and Beast and Dragon rise for air/ From allegoric waters." Lowell's heroes in Lord Weary's Castle were Christ and Ahab. Even his tormented Catholicism was above all a confrontation with the concealed energies of the sea, where "the ghost/ of risen Jesus walks the waves." As for Ahab, one suspects that he is the hero Lowell already knew he was not: Ahab turned to face the ocean that maimed him. Lowell's hard rhetoric leads him upstream, away from the ambiguous "asylum" of water.

The new volume, Near The Ocean, contains some memorable lines and stanzas, yet on the whole it is a disappointing book. The group of five poems, from which the title is taken, occupy almost half the volume. The rest is devoted, for the most part, to a number of translations in the Lowell manner, plus too many undistinguished drawings by Sidney Nolan, illustrating lines and couplets from the poems themselves. The whole is eked out by careful page composition, meant to inflate a rather meager volume to the full size befitting the stature—one hopes not equally inflated—of "our greatest poet."

What disappoints, however, is not so much the size or page design of the volume but the sense rather that we have been here before. Lowell's tense rhythms, the harsh formality of his style, create a mood that is curiously impersonal, held at a distance from the life which the poet seems to be confessing. It is an impersonality of surfaces, as if Lowell, "skating on thin ice," had devoted all his considerable verbal power to the task of bolstering, ordering and tying together what is utterly familiar. Most of the poems are written in doggerel couplets, rhymed and slant rhymed. The result is a hurried rhetoric which, at its best, has a swift, almost classical incisiveness to it, as in these lines near the end of "Waking Early Sunday Morning":

Only man thinning out his kind sounds through the Sabbath noon, the blind swipe of the pruner and his knife busy about the tree of life . . .

Here the hard surface of the poem gives way for a moment; the violence of war becomes strangely quiet; the wit of "man thinning out his kind" gains a haunting profundity from the steady "blind swipe" of the hand that trims life with death. Too often, however, Lowell gives in to the natural energy of doggerel verse: an energy apt for satire and neat epigrams,

The Nation SUBSCRIBERS' BOOK SERVICE

Offers the following at discount prices:

	Price
<input type="checkbox"/> THE NAKED IMAGE: Observations on the Modern Theatre by Harold Clurman (Macmillan, $6.50)	$3.20
<input type="checkbox"/> DE GAULLE: A Political Biography by Alexander Werth (Simon and Schuster, $7.50)	$6.00
<input type="checkbox"/> COLLECTED SHORTER POEMS of Kenneth Rexroth (New Directions, $7.50)	$6.00
<input type="checkbox"/> LIBERATION OF THE JEW by Albert Memmi. Translated from the French (Grossman, $4.95)	$3.96
<input type="checkbox"/> THE PSYCHOLOGY OF POWER by Ronald Sampson (Pantheon, $4.95)	$3.96
<input type="checkbox"/> SCIENCE AND SURVIVAL by Barry Commoner (Viking, $4.50)	$3.60

Remittance accompanying orders should be made payable to THE NATION, 333 6th Ave., N.Y. 10014

☐ Payment enclosed ☐ Please bill me

Readers can avail themselves of our regular offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S. at the retail price post-free. When ordering, please give title, author and publisher, if possible.

but not for the power and the self-revealing violence which the poet intends. As a result, the poems often appear unsettled. They start off in several directions at once, keeping the reader from a sustained commitment to the attitudes and images Lowell describes. Almost all of "Fourth of July in Maine" moves in this undecided way from descriptive, broadside couplets like these:

Civil Rights clergy face again the scions of the good old strain, the poor who always must remain poor and Republican in Maine.

to the familiar family poetry of Life Studies ("Dear Cousin, life is much the same," etc.), to a momentary gesture toward the sublime:

*We watch the logs fall. Fire once gone, we're done for: we escape the sun,
rising and setting, a red coal,
until it cinders like the soul.*

Fragmentation has always been ■ danger in Lowell's work. His poems, even at their best, do not have a sustained, dramatic impetus. The unit his imagination works best with is the line, the couplet or the stanza. Rarely does he extend his vision beyond that, preferring instead to begin again, to proceed by sudden, unaccountable shifts, by changes of voice. As if his imagination had lost interest after its initial thrust, or was unwilling to follow its own momentum down beneath the mosaic of surfaces. One rarely feels a texture of inevitability behind the shifts, as in a many-voiced poem like "The Waste Land." The real difficulty of Lord Weary's Castle, for example, lies not so much in its cluttered rhetoric as in the discontinuity of the poems: their abrupt shifts of imagery and theme are erratic or simply too private to be transferred into the reader's imagination.

Of all Lowell's works, Life Studies comes closest to solving this problem of discontinuity. The confessional mood of the book is sustained throughout. Such poems as "Beyond the Alps," or the series of commemorative poems in Part Three, have a density which is never cluttered. They express Lowell, perhaps, at his best. Yet it is a curiously unpoetic best. Though his verse is hard and incisive, its very swiftness has ■ quality of epigrammatic prose. It is worldly in a way that a certain kind of 18th-century rhetoric is worldly. Lowell is, in Pope's sense, a student of man: a student of those presentable, if terrible, surfaces which are turned outward, made into social habits, familiar attitudes, even into familiar pains. The prose fragment which forms the heart of Life Studies reads like a series of painful, self-rendering anecdotes for a society column. The style is brilliant and kaleidoscopic, pointing in anecdote after anecdote toward an emptiness of emotion, and an underlying fear which it keeps always at a distance as if to have allowed their eruptive rhythms into the light of language would have been indecorous.

Lowell's many-times-great-grandfather spoke wisely to him from his portrait frame: "We are all dealers in used furniture." There is indeed too much used furniture in this world of angular emotions, of pains told in a loud voice, as if they had passed through many hands, retaining the smell of each, but the singular, delicate nuance of none. A brilliant prose imagination is at work in Life Studies, which gets no closer to the ocean—to the eruptive energies beneath the surface—than the Hill in Boston where that other dry-docked commodore, father Lowell, kept house, instilling a distrust of depths into his son which he has since wrestled with but rarely conquered.

For the Union Dead stands out because in half a dozen of its poems the familiar worldly violence transforms itself. A quiet voice is heard, as if something in Lowell's imagination had begun anew turning the tools of his language toward some "infinitely tender, infinitely suffering thing." Think of these stanzas in Fall, 1961:

*Our end drifts nearer,
the moon lifts,
radiant with terror.
The state is a diver under a glass bell.*

*A father's no shield for his child.
We are like a lot of wild spiders crying together but without tears.*

There is indeed nothing to protect us, no literary shield for the shock of what such an image of "wild spiders" reveals. If our analogy of the ocean has any value, then Lowell is closer here to the ocean than anywhere in his poetry. The character in "The Mouth of the Hudson" "drifts with the wild ice/ ticking seaward down the Hudson." There is a poignancy in the final words of the poem "Water."

*We wished our two souls might return like gulls to the rock. In the end
the water was too cold for us.*

Poems like this open a breach in the vigorous play of surfaces which has always characterized Lowell. Their consistency, for once, is not "literary"; it is personal in a way that the confessional poems have not often been.

Our cultural world in America is singularly unattuned to poetry. Our sensibility, at ease with the novel, distrusts what the peculiar, unnarrative rhythms of poetry have to say: the concern with quietness and depths, the imagery of the unconscious mind, the inwardness. Lowell's poetry avoids these meditative rhythms. By avoiding the "ocean," by fleeing into prose, he has created a language in which the novel readers can be at home. It is a poetry which describes, but does not respond to, the exasperated rhythm of our cities. Lowell, in his brilliant, pained way, sets out to tell it as it is. If the poems are nervous and violent, it is because our own scene is nervous and violent. If the poems are fragmented, it is because our world is stifled and discontinuous. Lowell tells and dramatizes for us what we know: the neuroses, the family struggle, the ugliness.

Missing too often from his style is that element of praise which, for Rilke,

THE CENTENNIAL REVIEW

VOL. XI, No. 2 SPRING 1967

SIGURD BURCKHARDT

How Not to Murder Caesar

HANS APEL

West Berlin and German Reunification: An Exercise in Utopian Realism

GERALD J. MASSEY

Symbolic Logic Among the Humanities

DAVID H. BENNETT

The Enigma of American Extremism

R. HECTOR CURRIE

The Energies of Tragedy:
Cosmic and Psychic

HENRY WINTHROP

Status-Maintaining Functions of Middlebrow Conversation

HUGH B. FOX

The Problem of Identity in Contemporary Spanish-American Philosophy

E. SAN JUAN, JR.

Orientations of Max Weber's
Concept of Charisma

• • •

Subscription Rates:

$1.00 for single copies

$3.00 a year (4 issues); $5.00 for two years

Available from bookstores or from

110 Morrill Hall,
Michigan State University,
E. Lansing, Mich. 48823

100 Years of Fighting Stampedes *

NATION has managed to survive, the Decatur (Illinois) Herald observed on the occasion of our centennial, "by fighting stampedes for over 100 years."

Heading off stampedes is peculiarly American; the country has the energy and space to set hoofs really thundering. We call to mind only a few of the most irrational flights: the jingoism that plunged us into wars with Mexico and Spain, the hypocritical hysteria of Prohibition, the "uproar" of McCarthyism, "Let's Get Hoffa!," "Send in the Marines!" (to Haiti, Nicaragua, the Dominican Republic, Cuba, etc.), "we must beat the Russians to the moon," the anti-missile missile, the SST. The list is long. Some of the stampedes of the last 102 years ran over us roughshod, some we slowed a bit, some we helped to stop. But there are few we failed to challenge. If you think Bonanza is where the action is, come out on the range with The Nation.

*("Stampede, any headlong flight of a large group; from the Mex.-Sp. estampida or 'uproar.'")

"This book suggests that poets have begun to want a public or political role — or at least that poets, as thoughtful and responsible-feeling persons, are finding themselves unable to refuse such a role."

Wendell Berry
The Nation 4/24/67

FREE with every
new subscription

THE NATION 333 6th Avenue New York, N. Y. 10014

Herewith is my order and payment for a NEW subscription to The Nation. Please send me FREE a copy of WHERE IS VIETNAM? edited by Walter Lowenfels.

☐ One Year, $10 ☐ Two Years, $18 ☐ 6 Months, $6
(Foreign and Canadian Postage: $1 per year extra)

NAME

ADDRESS

CITY STATE ZIP No.

4-24-67

was the poet's special gift, as he wrote in the Ninth Elegy:

*Are we here perhaps just to say:
house, bridge, well, gate, fruit tree, window —
at most column, tower . . . but to say, understand this, to say it as the Things themselves never fervently thought to be.*

That, for Rilke, is what the suffering was for: to recompose, out of the intense experience, what would otherwise have been indescribable. Not only to tell the storm, but to see through it, into the eye of the storm.

At Full Speed

THE LOST PILOT. By James Tate. Yale University Press. 72 pp. $3.75. Paper $1.45.

M. L. ROSENTHAL

Mr. Rosenthal is professor of English at New York University. He is the author, most recently, of The New Poets (Oxford University Press).

As with so many of the recent Yale Series of Younger Poets volumes, James Tate's The Lost Pilot gives us poetry of speed more than of power. Most of the poems zip down the slide toward punch-line endings. They gather notes of joy or poignancy on the way; then there's a splash, and voilà! that one's over. Seldom can we get a purchase on the poem in mid-slide. Seldom, despite Dudley Fitts's introductory praise of the poet's technical mastery, are the internal effects and balances any more than momentary brakes on the downward movement. Witness "Death on Columbus Day":

*Sometimes you can hear the naked will working, like the ocean becoming a shore yesterday, and the day before,
the trees shrinking away, even the more transitional phase of seasons,
the tenacious skidding of a gone
summer,
the cleaving to lusciousness, and (you can see all this from your window if you wash it regularly, if you are afraid to go out) even whole environments,
giants of varying kindness,
dissolve, and you, your pupils,
yes, blue as they may appear,
are, when you think about it, acolytes to all destruction.*

This particular poem consists of a single sentence, in some disarray, full of perhaps interesting thoughts if it had the time to stop and sort them out, but in a hurry despite them to make its final point. Rather a striking start, but then in the second line the syntax grows awkward and we shoot through a number of images without an opportunity to relate to them before the parenthetical thought—suggestive in itself—interrupts the speeding curve momentarily. Afterward, the series of images of irreversible dissolution is resumed, with the final twinge at the last line suggesting something undemonstrable, that the process is somehow helped by human consciousness.

That is to say, there are meaningful thoughts, feelings, impulses here, but the ordering is minimal, really insufficient. The justification might be that the poem seeks to evoke in a single quick sweep the pervasiveness of the death principle. The loss of what is to hand, of all our "known" reality, seems to take place in the wink of an eye. All right, but in the process some fine possibilities have been subordinated to the emergence of a near cliché. The more jumbled the preceding structure, the greater the poet's desire for a knockout ending, and so the pseudo-profundity of the highly arguable conclusion.

I hate to hear myself carping so, for certainly a number of these poems are very much alive. There are bright movements of darting association, as in "Coming Down Cleveland Avenue," which Fitts praises most highly of all. He likes its "weird and substantial" character, its "giddy bouffée surréaliste." So do I, though I should add that its high-spirited, amiably satirical buffoonery, and its sexily gay gallantry at the end, particularly lend themselves to Tate's accelerated style as well as to his love of natural, unaffected speech. It is a bit reminiscent of some of Ferlinghetti's earlier, more sprightly effects, and of Jacques Prévert:

*At one point
you even lay down your coat, and she, in turn, puts hers down for you. And you put your shirt down, and she, her blouse, and your pants, and her skirt, shoes —
removes her lavender underwear and you slip into her proud, white skin.*

It's fun, and one overlooks that the last line is not all that good—is an improvisation that stops the movement amusingly but too seamlessly, as it were. It is "young poetry," as Fitts says, though not as "utterly new" as he claims. The poem is of a piece with "Violins" ("She knew how to make a moment famous"), with "Why I Will Not Get Out of Bed" ("I don't love you"—that's the reason the speaker in this poem of liberation from romantic bondage proffers for not getting up, filling its lines with a universe yet to be explored and re-explored), and with a few other sparklers.

I am reasonably sure that for Tate the main burden of his book is carried by the poems in a more somber vein. The title poem has to do with the loss of his father who, the jacket tells us, "was reported missing over Germany" five months after the son's birth in 1943. It is a complaint against this loss, and against the ambiguity of the meaning of survival and of the son's own identity. The father was lost at the age of 22, and the poem conceives of him as the child must have done, as orbiting endlessly about the earth. The son could not have been much older when he wrote "The Lost Pilot." In it he suggests that his father has avoided the "rot" of actual survival, has escaped his destiny to become hardened into an immortal and unreachable symbol, "hard like ebony" or "like a tiny, African god." The sense of meanings that one has to try to gather up quickly but still cannot hold onto, meanings that account for everything but that are forbidden and guilty, is perfectly summed up in its final lines. The thought here suggests a rationale for Tate's poetic method, and at the same time helps account for the pain in the poem. "To Mother on Father's Day," the suicidal imagery in a number of the poems, and the curious linking in others of motifs of passion with those of despair. In poems like these, as opposed to the ones that are simply thrown away by the pell-mell method, more than a hint is given us of the possibilities for poetic realization in this vigorous writer, whose work at the present time only barely contains the pressure of his emotional intensities:

*My head cocked towards the sky,
I cannot get off the ground,
and, you, passing over again,*

fast, perfect, and unwilling to tell me that you are doing well, or that it was mistake that placed you in that world, and me in this; or that misfortune placed these worlds in us.

This special poetry issue of the Books and the Arts section was prepared jointly by Helen Yglesias, Literary Editor and Michael Goldman, Poetry Editor.

SOVIET UNION and EASTERN EUROPE

(Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Poland, Rumania, Yugoslavia)

Enjoy the experience of a lifetime with one of these wonder tours planned by America's foremost specialists. Here's a wide range of itineraries fitting every taste and budget. Specify booklet you want:

- Russian Language Seminar Tour, from $595
- Motorcoach and Budget Tours to Balkans, East Europe and Israel, from $706
- Special Tours to Armenia, Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania, from $740
- Scandinavia and East Europe
- Russia-Siberia-Mongolia; Israel and East Europe
- Medical Tours in USSR (from $160 for 24 days)

SPECIAL: Europe by Motorcoach AND Expo '67, 25-day tours, from $640

Group and Individual Tours
We Obtain Visas

AFTON TOURS, Inc.

1776 Broadway, New York, N.Y. 10019
PL 7-9595

FOR WRITERS!

Enrich your style through Herbert Spencer's and Edgar Allan Poe's classic principles that have influenced many of the world's great authors. A help for writers eager to get published. Send $1.00 to

PAGEANT PRESS
101 5th Ave. N.Y. Dept. M

what's in a GAME?

The GAME of SHAKESPEARE is actually 4 games in 1... a unique and challenging form of entertainment for Shakespearean expert or novice alike. Includes 52-page booklet with synopses of all 37 plays, biography of Shakespeare and quotes. Enjoyably educational!

LIFE calls it a "leapfrog of the gentlest, sweetest and lustiest characters in all literature... a good game"! For 1 to 4 players, all ages. $6.98

Available at local game book counters, or send $6.98 to Dept. S-3,

Avonlea Hill, 4517 Harford Rd., Balto., Md. 21214

Name _____

Address _____

City _____ State _____ Zip _____

☐ Send FREE brochure ☐ Sorry, no C.O.D.

Translating Cesar Vallejo

CLAYTON ESHLEMAN

Mr. Eshleman is a poet and translator who teaches at New York University. The Peruvian poet, César Vallejo (1892-1938), while hardly known in the United States, is one of the great figures in Latin American poetry. Of part Indian ancestry, Vallejo eloquently voices in his work the sufferings of the Indians and other underprivileged peoples. His books of poetry include Los Heraldos Negros, Trilce and España, Aparta de Mi Este Cáliz (Spain Give to Me This Cup), the last a group of poems resulting from his alignment with the cause of the Republic in the Spanish Civil War. His last book, Poemas Humanos, posthumously published in Spanish, will be published in English this year by Grove Press. Mr. Eshleman is the translator of this collection of ninety-four poems.

"Intensity & Height" is considered to be one of the great sonnets of the Spanish language; it is also a fair indication of what a poet faces in translating César Vallejo.

Most apparent is the difficulty in handling the end words of the octet, all of which come as surprises and swing the eight lines through their all-in-nothing, nothing-in-all dialectic, which is itself grounded in the pithy uma and hollow ollo end-rhymes. I decided that if I could make a listener hear an octet in my English, even though it was not a perfect one, then by a shift of rhythms I could move into the sestet.

The first major problem is with "me atollo." Atollarse means to be stuck in the mud; it is a crude rural shout, for which we have only swear words. As the reader can see, the word I choose for "me atollo" determines the word used for the second jawbreaker, "cogollo," in line 4, since the uma rhymes fall pretty naturally into "spume," "sum" and "puma." As a matter of fact, I decided upon "stick" for "me atollo" unaware that in some notes on the poem I had written "neck" as one possibility for "cogollo." "Stick" lacks the reverberation and exactness of "me atollo," yet it does stick, and end-jams the line. "Cogollo" drove me crazy for four years, during which time I kept trying to figure out how I could say "cabbage-heart" or "plant-shoot" in such a way that a second denotation of the Spanish word—"apex"—(which Vallejo plays off against "pyramid" earlier in the line) would obtain. When I understood that the cabbage-heart joins plant to earth, a head/body image came forth. I decided that a pyramid with a neck was about as strange as Vallejo's line and would force an attentive reader into the deeper implications in such a way that "root" or "core" would not.

The English lines begin to lengthen out naturally in the second stanza. Vallejo's great sixth line again cuts on two levels that are nearly impossible to suggest with one English word: encebollarse, which makes a verb out of cebollo (onion) and which must have originated in a Spanish kitchen, does not mean that Vallejo wants to make an onion out of himself; rather, while carrying the common meaning it also means to defraud oneself or to be bundled (as onions), to be infuriated before the dishonest proposition of the laurel. "Wreathed in garlic" was suggested to me by the poet, Cid Corman. The phrase carries much of the frustration, keeps my homemade rhyme scheme going and, more than anything else, suggests Vallejo's wit, which is much more frequent in the Spanish of Poemas Humanos than I can keep up with in my English.

The last two octet lines were less exasperating to catch; while we have "brume" for "bruma" I decided against it because it is too heavy. Using "mist" I hit my fourth "ick" "eck" "lic" sound and then could round off the octet by choosing "evolution," a very weighted word, from the number of possibilities "desarrollo" suggests. The heavy u in evolution picks up the umes and ums, and somehow I have myself an octet. I should mention here that the choice of "evolution" against, say, "unwinding" has a lot to do with knowing the other ninety-three poems in the book. Vallejo believed there was no God without evolution.

The shout "Let's go," at which point the poem beautifully turns—faced with the impossibility of resolution in the octet to explore what we're stuck with and can do in the sestet—is the first of a series of tighteners reining movement in. Here I did not want to push my former luck with end-words, so I built two compact units in which any rhyme at all is internalized. The last line of the poem was most ornery: cuerva is a she-crow or female jackdaw (or maybe even a lady rook), but there is no one-word equivalent in English and I could not make one up without ruining the poem's effect. What I finally chose was a compromise, held in place hopefully by the quick ate echoing.

A translator's talents are at best tools for his first task: to annihilate himself, facing another's inspiration.

INTENSIDAD Y ALTURA

Quiero escribir, pero me sale espuma, quiero decir muchísimo y me atollo;
no hay cifra hablada que no sea suma,
no hay pirámide escrita, sin cogollo.

Quiero escribir, pero me siento puma;
quiero laurearme, pero me encebollo.
No hay toz hablada, que no llegue a bruma,
no hay dios ni hijo de dios, sin desarrollo.

Vámonos, pues, por eso, a comer yerba, carne de llanto, fruta de gemido, nuestra alma melancólica en conserva.

Vámonos! Vámonos! Estoy herido; vámonos a beber lo ya bebido,
vámonos, cuervo, a fecundar tu cuerva.

INTENSITY & HEIGHT

I want to write, but it comes out spume,
I want to say so much & I stick;
there's no cipher spoken not a sum,
no pyramid written, without neck.

I want to write, but I feel myself, puma!
I want the laurel but I'm wreathed in garlic.
There's no cough spoken that doesn't come to mist,
no god or son of god, without evolution.

Let's go then for this & feed on grass, weep flesh, groan fruit, our melancholy soul canned.

Let's go! Let's go! I'm hit;
let's go drink that already drunk, crow, let's go fecundate your mate.

27 OCTOBER 1937

Interior and Exterior Worlds

NORTHFIELD POEMS. By A. R. Ammons. Cornell University Press. 69 pp. $3.95.

JOHN LOGAN

Mr. Logan is professor of English at the State University of New York at Buffalo. He is the author of Ghosts of the Heart (University of Chicago Press) and Spring of the Thief (Alfred A. Knopf).

A. R. Ammons is one of the most prolific and, at the same time, most intelligent gifted poets of recent years. Northfield Poems is his third book to appear in two years—with Corsons Inlet and Tape for the Turn of the Year—and there were two others in the previous ten-year period; Ommateum (which was privately printed) and Expressions of Sea Level.

Tape for the Turn of the Year, perhaps the most interesting single volume, is a continuing poem, mainly unrevised, which Ammons composed by inserting one end of an adding machine tape in a typewriter and proceeding to the other end. The imposed limitation of form apparently provided a pressure which helped to produce some very beautiful writing, all 200 pages of it in the mode of a journal extending over a period of about a month. The long, thin poem is occasionally ascetic in its effect (as an El Greco figure) and again it is snakelike. There is a passage where the poem shows a striking self-recognition of its phallic character:

*If I had a flute: wdn't
it be fine
to see this long thin
poem
rise out of the wastebasket:
the charmed erection,
stiffening, uncoiling?*

Another passage catches from inside the work, toward its end, the speaker's sense of his own utterance:

*I wrote about these days
the way life gave them:
I didn't know beforehand what I wd write, whether I'd meet anything new: I showed that I'm sometimes blank and abstract, sometimes blessed with song: sometimes
silly, vapid, serious, angry, despairing.*

The free form of the poem (despite its strict limitation on line length) and its willingness to risk "prose" and looser diction, has given it an utterly original tone, a curious blend of confession, lyricism and observation of two kinds—the strikingly concrete and the near abstract.

All three of these qualities recur in other books though there is less of the first—indeed less personal portraiture of any direct kind—in Ommateum. Confession begins with Expressions of Sea Level where, combined with childhood reminiscence as in "Nelly Myers" and "Silver" it has given us some of the most beautiful poems of our time:

*I will not end my grief, earth will not end my grief,
I move on,
we move on, some scraps of us together,
my broken soul leaning toward her to be touched,
listening to be healed.*

A number of poems in Expressions, Corsons Inlet and Northfield, as the names of the latter two hint, are based on experiences of places in South Jersey—where Mr. Ammons was for many years an executive in a chemical glass factory before turning to teaching.

Ammons' voice is unique and would not fail to be recognized even in the first book:

*So I said I am Ezra and the wind whipped my throat gaming for the sounds of my voice
I listened to the wind go over my head and up into the night.*

There is a return to the oracular, Old Testament-like persona of "Ezra" in the poem "The Wind Coming Down From" in the present volume. The poems of this book reiterate several motifs we are familiar with from the others, and they range from the highly abstract game-stance of "The Numbers":

*be confident;
as you turn to the numbers
veracity links segment to segment: a sausage bliss!*

through the lecture-like sound of "The Motions" to the Biblical incantation of "Joshua Tree" on the one hand or the very direct, sure, imitative dialect of "First Carolina Said Song" on the other:

*We got there just in time to see her buried in an oak grove up
back of the field:
its grewed over with soapbushes and huckleberries now.*

"Joshua Tree" is a moving piece in Poetry at the Y

Thursday evening, May 4 at 8:30 pm

HUGH MACDIARMID

First U. S. reading by the greatest poet of Scotland since Robert Burns

Wednesday evening, June 28 at 8:30 pm

GÜNTER GRASS

and

HANS MAGNUS ENZENSBERGER

reading from their poetry in German English translations will be read by Michael Hamburger and Jerome Rothenberg

These programs are presented in association with Lincoln Center Festival '67

For further information, please call or write The Poetry Center:
The 92nd Street YM & YWHA, 1395 Lexington Avenue
New York City 10028 / Fi 8-1500 which the speaker relates to the wind, who instructs him to *settle here by this Joshua Tree

and make a well.*

The speaker, after lamenting that he is consigned to form that will not let me loose except to death

so that he "must go on" until then, asks that later the wind—muse-like and yet like a man—

*enter angling through my cage
and let my ribs
sing me out.*

The wind is a frequent persona in the

APARTMENTS—UNFURNISHED

Live in a Mies van der Rohe Apartment . . . adjacent to Branch Brook Park . . . 25 minutes from Manhattan. Community activities:
Little Theatre, newspaper, classes, clubs.
Rentals from $99. Request brochure "N,"
COLONNADE, 381 Broad, Newark, N. J.

PERSONALS

IMPOSE legal $30,000,000 Public Fine on U.S.
Business to Protest Vietnam War. Write:
DOVE, Box 1049, Jamaica, N.Y. 11431.

USE LAWFUL DIRECT ACTION to repeal all abortion laws. LEGALIZE ABORTION,
POB 24163, Los Angeles, Calif. 90024.

NON-PROFIT CAMP (interracial, interreligious) desperately needs donation of pianos.
Tax deductible. Will pick up. Box 600, c/o
The Nation.

TENNIS ANYONE? Nation reader needs tennis partners, weekends, N.Y.C. Phone evenings: 275-6743.

The Best Way To Get THE NATION

THE NATION 4-24-67
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

- ☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed
(Foreign and Canadian Postage
$1 a year extra)

NAME

ADDRESS

CITY

STATE ZIP NO.

poems, as breath itself becomes fleshed out. Considering wind as breath one begins to see the connection between the poems of external landscape and the elements (which fill the first book and reappear here) and the poems of internal geography.

When I go back of my head down the cervical well, roots branch turning, figuring into flesh.

I don't like the line "meat's indivisible stuff" because its texture jars with the rest of the coulage of diction, but otherwise this poem, "Landscape with Figures," is one of the strongest in the collection.

There is a constant playing off of the interior world of mind and cells against the exterior world of things where self lies dispersed and in need of the gathering force of a poem. The rapport of interior and exterior is itself expressed in a perfect short poem entitled "Reflective," which I give here entire:

I found a weed that had a mirror in it and that mirror

looked in at a mirror in

me that had a weed in it.

The half-solipsistic character of this is projected beautifully to trees in a fuller sense in the poem "Halfway":

*birches stand
in*

pools of themselves, the yellow fallen

leaves reflecting those on the tree that mirror the ground

From the idea of external—reflected—in—internal, one can move rather easily to the notion of the cosmos reflected in small in one of its parts, as in the striking poem, "The Constant," where the galaxy-like, moving film of sand in the water of a clam shell seems to reflect the scope of sky, so that:

*a gull's toe could spill the universe:
two more hours of sun could dry it up;
a higher wind could rock it out. . . .*

There is a marvelous imaging of the tentativeness with which things "live and move and have their being" as the Old Fellow said. This mood is seconded in "Contingency" where, contemplating all the life and change started by a sprinkler, one reflects that:

*a turn of the faucet
dries every motion up.*

And it is brought into a new key in the poem, "Zone," which suggests that a myth of creation is completed only by its parallel myth of uncreation. There is a constant need for recovery, whether for the shadows of trees (in "Recovery") or for time future (in "Passage")—

tomorrow emerges and falls back shaped into today: endlessly

—or for the life of a man himself. For poets this latter kind of recovery is accomplished by the writing of poems, and when the poems are as good as these, it is sometimes accomplished for others by reading them.

Intellectuality is a prime trait of Ammons' work, as is suggested by the abstract character of several titles in the new book: "Height," "Reflective," "Contingency," "Interference," "Salience." Sometimes, as in the latter poem and in "One-Many"—two of the most ambitious and strongest poems in the book —there is too much cerebration demanded of the reader, I believe, before the poem begins to burgeon. There are some other faults. Occasionally the poems seem to lack vigor. Occasionally influence obtrudes itself, as that of Marianne Moore in "Uh, Philosophy" or of Dylan Thomas in these punning, elegiac lines:

*If bleak through the black night
we could outrun
this knowledge into a different morning!*

or of T. S. Eliot in this passage: "though the world ends and cannot end" and "To death, the diffuse one going beside me, I said. . . ." (Yet the most pervasive influences—those of William Carlos Williams and Ezra Pound—have been well assimilated to form a highly original body of work.) There are occasional bad lines: "O ablutions!" Yet, a careful look at the whole body of Ammons' work, particularly Tape for the Turn of the Year and the new book, will show that we are dealing with a major talent, one who has the courage and the heuristic power to discover new form, as well as the eye and the ear and the mind to hold us and to give us what Thomas called "the momentary peace of the poem."

Crossword Puzzle No. 1198

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS:

- 1 Everything depends on the little things? You're surely not so out-dated! (2, 2, 3, 6)
- 10 Proving the normal amount with drinks makes for ostentatious shows. (7)
- 11 Hide more than a confidential letter? (7)
- 12 It serves some purpose in cutting out an Arab's meal, possibly. (5, 4)
- 13 Plunge into water to perform and employ it. (5)
- 14 Raising one taken away for measures of a sort, if small. (6)
- 16 What a specialist might have to so badly finish with 22 down. (8)
- 19 See 9 down
- 20 It's a girl Eddie Cantor knew well—obviously the thin type! (6)
- 22 Rather like an ice-cream holder. (5)
- 23 Does it go along with the Arts of the Underground? (If you know it, you're a good scout!) (9)
- 25 One way the beginning is too proper—the other way it's too bitter. What a bloomer! (7)
- 26 Women are supposed to get in this naturally—but that's the price of learning! (7)
- 27 Next to seers, they could be most helpful—and they can't be framed! (7, 6)

DOWN:

- 2 and 22 down—Certain etherial beings put up with them, but it presents a view in depth. (9)

- 3 Tennis ranking, or is a quiet case called for? (5, 2, 3, 5)
- 4 Shut up, in the common sense. (6)
- 5 In the main, what one might expect of a dinner partner. (8)
- 6 An honor granted only in the south of France? That's cutting it pretty fine! (4, 11)
- 7 An outer slum has to be wrecked—it's too shaky! (9)
- 8 Defense statement? (8)
- 9 and 19 across At this place, a sort of neatherd could be ambiguously located. (4, 3, 5)
- 15 Proving the "Nation" and its make-up have a leisurely pace. (9)
- 17 Does one choose to be, if the office is empty? (8)
- 18 It might be chaotic with one of reading, writing, etc., to go "umpty-umpty"! (8)
- 21 Is in one form a large number coming up with explosive results? (6)
- 24 Tiny stage figure, tiny only at times in literature. (5)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1197

ACROSS: 1 and 22 A fate worse than death: 9 Extrude: 10 Shampoo: 11 Arnhem: 12 Wedgwood: 14 Cravats: 17 and 25 Great Britain: 19 Isobars: 21 Building: 23 Scipio: 26 Adamant: 28 and 8 In the year of our Lord. DOWN: 1 Averaging: 2 Actinic: 3 Exuberant: 4 Open: 5 Suspension: 6 Twang: 7 Amphora: 13 Malignancy: 15 Gran Chaco: 16 Defroster: 18 Edition: 20 Soprano: 21 and 15 across Baby grand: 24 Gala.

PUBLICATIONS

GRAFFITI

life, death, love, hate, evil, fiction, satire, commentary, LBJ, plays, music, credibility gaps, air pollution, thought pollution, anger, despair and poetry where it's at: Graffiti Magazine ($2 - 6 issues, $3.50 - 12) Dept. N 88 Bleecker St., NYC 10012

THE IDLER. Lively, offbeat, liberal monthly. $1 brings four different sample back issues. Idler, 413B 6th St., N. E., Washington, D. C. 20002.

"SELECTED POEMS" of George Flynn (Villiers of London $2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound."—James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at 544-82 St., Brooklyn 9, N.Y.

NEW LITERARY BI-MONTHLY. Fiction and poetry needed. Subscriptions: $3.95 per year. THE INNER WELL, Box 274, Marion, Indiana.

TRAVEL

The OTHER Israel—a three-week summer program for young people 21 to 35—a dialogue with young Israeli socialists—meet farmers, workers, Arabs, labor leaders, peace groups, parliament members—live and work in a kibbutz—tour the country, $625.00. For details write: Young Americans for Progressive Israel, 150 Fifth Avenue, Room 700, New York, N. Y. 10011.

ART

ORIGINALS COST LESS THAN REPRODUCTIONS! Contemporary original signed etchings, lithographs, woodcuts, $3.50. Guarantee. Free brochure. GRAPHIC CIRCLE (NA), 68 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10011.

KHAJURAHOS' EROTIC SCULPTURES: Thousand Year Old Temple Friezes of Hindu Arts, Carnal Love, Masterpieces Chandra Architecture. Twelve Color Slides $10. TEMPLEVIEW, Box 25101, Cincinnati, Ohio 45225.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

SAVE YOUR COPIES OF

The NATION

Each file holds a full year's copies.

Jesse Jones Volume Files for every publication.

Covered in durable leather like Kivar, title embossed in 16 Kt gold.

Satisfaction guaranteed

Attractive and practical for your home or office

3 for $8.25

ORDER NOW—send check or money order. MAGAZINE FILE CO. 520 FIFTH AVENUE NEW YORK 36, N. Y.

FREE DESCRIPTIVE FOLDER UPON REQUEST

I Want To Know

how citizen exchange corps will help
americans find out this summer

Why They Behave Like Russians in the U.S.S.R.

Inquire Now About Summer 1967 CEC Three Week Exchange Visits To The USSR

Send me free reprints of N.Y. Times articles and editorials telling about CEC, a non-profit, tax-exempt foundation. Tell me how it brings together Americans and Russians of all ages and occupations to meet their counterparts in both the United States and the Soviet Union...and how I can participate in this program, which will lead eventually to exchanges of Americans and Soviets to live and work in each other's country for 6 months to 2 years as a major step toward mutual understanding and survival.

NAME _____
CITY _____
ADDRESS _____
STATE _____ ZIP _____

Mail to:
CITIZEN EXCHANGE CORPS,
550 FIFTH AVE.,
DEPT. N4-11, N.Y., N.Y. 10036
a tax-exempt, non-profit organization

EARLY ARDEN

ROBERT FAGOLLI

THE

NATION

MAY 1, 1967 35 cents

STRANGE DECORUM OF LESTER MADDOX

ROBERT G. SHERRILL

On the March Again

NEW YORK PAUL GOOD

SAN FRANCISCO MEL WAX

EXPO 67

Time / Space in Montreal

ERVIN GALANTAY

MAKING ART LEGITIMATE

ALAN TRACHTENBERG

LORD RUSSELL IN HIS PRIME

RONALD SAMPSON

5-2-67 PLS-801
BURLINGAME PUB LIBRARY
BURLINGAME
CALIFORNIA 94010

LETTERS

Cronkite's role

New York City

DEAR SIR: I had thought I was too busy to answer your Feb. 27 editorial regarding my Johns Hopkins speech. The AFTRA strike, however, has provided me a little more leisure than I had counted on.

I believe there must be a clear, strong, unbreachable line between news and commentary on television and radio. To cross that line ever so narrowly or infrequently is to endanger seriously one's role as an impartial, unprejudiced news editor and broadcaster. . . .

I am not opposed to commentary on the air when it is properly labeled as such, and I think my own program deserves credit for breaking new ground with our use of Eric Sevareid's brilliant essays. But I do not think that is my role on that program. I gather that your writer has missed a daily five-minute analysis that I render on C.B.S. Radio. There . . . the approach is considerably different.

Your writer's second point seems to have missed my point entirely. He seems to think that, because I outlined the problem of cold-war security in what he believes to be the same terms in which the Pentagon outlines that problem, that perforce I accept the Pentagon's solution of the problem. I find nothing in my speech to indicate that I think that. And I think Cronkite, and every citizen, has quite a cause for complaint.

Walter Cronkite

Mother's Day

Beverly Hills, Calif.

DEAR SIR: To the oft-repeated cliché, "Yes, but what can individual citizens do about the 'big' problems," such as Vietnam, a group of Southern California women are seeking to provide an answer.

Sick of the senseless killing, unintimidated by all of the hawk shot, aware of the essence of time, these ladies, all mothers, have determined that this year's Mother's Day shall have a ringing theme—"Peace."

Calling themselves "Another Mother for Peace," the group has created a simple and beautiful card. The message inside reads, "For my Mother's Day gift this year, I don't want candy or flowers; I want an end to killing. We who have given life must be dedicated to preserving it. Please Talk Peace."

These cards are being distributed, at cost, to other mothers for mailing as Mother's Day cards to their Congressmen, Senators and the President.

A post office box (P.O. Box 69930, Los Angeles, Calif. 90069) has been established to answer inquiries and receive orders for the cards.

Robert H. Shutan

UN drama

New York City

DEAR SIR: The Board of Missions of The Methodist Church is holding, from July 10 to 27, a drama workshop for playwrights to stimulate the writing of scripts based on an exploration and interpretation of the United Nations and the controversial, moral issues involved.

For further information, please write to me at Room 1480, 475 Riverside Drive, New York, N. Y. 10027.

Margaret R. Bender, Executive Secretary
International Affairs, Woman's Division

Bigelow on the floor

Sacramento, Calif.

DEAR SIR: Reagan said, "taxes should hurt." When the $25,000 rug that Reagan bought for his office is reflected in increased taxes for the average taxpayer . . . it will hurt.

James Winston

EDITORIALS

Moral Double Bookkeeping

Lyndon B. Johnson, in his role of self-righteous moralist, raised the issue of the indivisibility of right and wrong in his speech to the Tennessee legislature, and it has been dutifully echoed in the editorial pages. Even The New York Times criticized the peace demonstrations of April 15, which far exceeded in numbers and resolution all previous efforts in that field, on the ground that the demonstrators were pursuing a double standard, depicting "the United States as the epitome of evil and the Vietcong guerrillas and their North Vietnamese allies as the epitome of good." No responsible critic of U.S. policy in Southeast Asia takes any such position, but the preponderance of evil in this war is as clearly on the American side, as the preponderance of evil in World War II was on the Fascist side. One need only consider where the war is being fought.

Neither Mr. Johnson nor Mr. Rusk, who never tires of the theme that we have been cruelly put upon by the Communists, will ever admit that the latter have a case. But the truth is that we have for many years insisted on a double standard, one for ourselves, one for the rest of the world. William L. Shirer pointed this out with devastating clarity in a recent letter to The New York Times. We are punishing North Vietnam, said the President, for "her flagrant violation of the Geneva accords" (which we did not sign but agreed to respect). But these accords forbade foreign intervention in Vietnam, and we have systematically intervened under three Presidents, and encouraged violations by the governments fronting for us in South Vietnam. If North Vietnam can be held guilty of "subverting" South Vietnam and must be punished, should not we be punished for overthrowing governments not to our liking in Iran and Guatemala? "As Athens, before the attack on Syracuse," Mr. Shirer concludes, "as imperial Germany before 1914 and Nazi Germany and imperial Japan before 1939, the United States, it seems to me, is today displaying the arrogance and the irresponsibility of power."

But this shabby double standard not only dominates our international behavior, it permeates our whole culture. "We are the lying society," Margaret Halsey asserts in the Village Voice (April 6), and she supports her indictment with the TV quiz scandal, the Richard Nixon broadcast of 1952 in which the candidate exculpated himself with the aid of the spaniel Checkers, the McCarthy era, which goes on without McCarthy, and instance after instance. Sen. Thruston Morton finds that the public has lost confidence in Congress—how could it be otherwise? The reason lies not only in the lax economic morals of Congressmen but in the way in which these predominantly right-wing politicians are supported unanimously by right-wing commentators. Senator Dodd put into the Congressional Record (April 13) testimonials in his defense by David Lawrence, William Buckley, Jr., John Chamberlain, James J. Kilpatrick and Russell Kirk. Too late for inclusion came William S. White's lament, "The Unending Pursuit of Thomas J. Dodd," in which White castigates the four employees who exposed Dodd, and says he "does not pretend to know the degree of impropriety, if any, of which Dodd may in fact be guilty." (Italics added.) Doesn't he read the papers?

The double moral standard within the country feeds the Vietnamese War, and vice versa. Yet the rights and wrongs of most of these issues are not difficult to discern. As Clemenceau said, historians might find many causes of World War I but they could never find that Belgium invaded Germany. The old man could be venomous, but he had been through the Dreyfus case and he had both a clear mind and a sense of justice.

Faithless Men

Grissom, White and Chaffee were in a risky business and the risk caught up with them; tragically it caught up because they put their faith in faithless men. No coroner's jury sitting in inquest on their deaths could fail to return a verdict of negligent homicide.

Proof of this—if proof were needed—came after the article in last week's Nation, "NASA: The Image Misfires" by William Hines, had gone to press. The "Phillips Report" referred to in the article, which was withheld from Congress by Administrator James Webb in defiance of an official request, was finally flushed out by Sen. Edward Brooke, the Massachusetts Republican. He elicited the information that North American Aviation, Apollo prime contractor, had been running a slack operation from top to bottom. The report's author, Maj. Gen. S. C. Phillips, Apollo program manager at NASA headquarters, told the Senator and his colleagues at an open hearing:

I felt that the top management of both the corporation and the division (in charge of building the Apollo spacecraft) were not giving sufficient attention to the details of the direction and execution of these contracts, and recommended more attention from that level of management to the details of their problems and progress.

This statement, descriptive of the state of affairs late in 1965, raises important questions. North American Aviation is the second biggest aerospace contractor in the country, in terms of dollar-volume of government business. It is NASA's biggest contractor, and NASA's Apollo project is North American's biggest job. Why was North American's top management paying so little attention to Apollo, and if those in Executive Suite were not monitoring Apollo, how were they spending their time?

Looking back (for the past is prologue) one finds in the old files an almost perfect parallel of slipshod man-

IN THIS ISSUE

May 1, 1967

EDITORIALS

546

ARTICLES

- 550 On the March Again: New York Paul Good
 552 San Francisco Mel Wax
 553 Strange Decorum of Lester Maddox Robert G. Sherrill
 557 Expo 67: Space/Time in Montreal Ervin Galantay
 562 The UN and the Have-Nots: Alternatives to Explosion James Boyd

BOOKS & THE ARTS

- 565 The High Cost of Professionalism Alan Trachtenberg
 565 So Fair a World It Was (poem) Mark Van Doren
 566 Russell in His Prime Ronald Sampson
 568 Definitions of Love Arno Karlen
 570 Television John Horn
 571 Photography Max Kozloff
 573 Theatre Robert Pasolli
 574 Windows (poem) David Cornel DeJong
 575 Crossword Puzzle Frank W. Lewis

Publisher JAMES J. STORROW JR.	Associate Publisher GIFFORD PHILLIPS
Editor CAREY McWILLIAMS	Associate Editor PHIL KERBY
Executive Editor ROBERT HATCH	Literary Editor HELEN YGLESIAS
Copy Editor MARION HESS	Poetry Editor MICHAEL GOLDMAN
Theatre HAROLD CLURMAN	Washington ROBERT G. SHERRILL
Art MAX KOZLOFF	Paris ALEXANDER WERTH
Music BENJAMIN BORETZ	London RAYMOND WILLIAMS
Science CARL DREHER	Bonn C. AMERY
Advertising Manager MARY SIMON	Canberra C. P. FITZGERALD

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July and August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1967 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel.: CH 2-8400. West Coast office: 1256 Westwood Boulevard, Los Angeles, Calif. 90024. Tel.: GR 4-2533. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give four weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE
NATION
Combined with FRONTIER

Volume 204
No. 18

agement by a contractor on an important NASA project. The Centaur rocket program lagged, overran costs and finally failed spectacularly in its maiden flight test. Reviewing the situation in May, 1962, a Congressional subcommittee found:

Centaur occupies a position of key significance in the Nation's space programs. . . . From all appearances, General Dynamics/Astronautics . . . resisted, until quite recently, making any really significant change in its management of the Centaur program, despite repeated urgings by NASA officials to adopt management changes at an earlier date. . . . Management on the part of the Government also appears to the subcommittee to have been inadequate. . . .

Scientists at the University of Michigan have shown that it is possible to get even so lowly a creature as the flatworm to profit by experience. Why do highly paid industrialists and their powerful bureaucratic overseers in Washington seem unable to profit similarly? One of the rewards promised the American people in exchange for the billions lavished on NASA was a general sharpening of technology and a refinement of management practices. The whole economy would benefit from this "spin-off" from America's flight to the moon, or so it was claimed.

This has not happened, and will not, unless NASA undergoes a shake-up of seismic proportions. Negligent homicide it certainly was, at Pad 34 last January 27, but perhaps it was worse. There was carelessness certainly; was there also corruption? The space program has enjoyed a reputation thus far of being quite "clean"—but even if 99.9 per cent of the money appropriated were spent honestly, there would be enough lost through graft in a program of this magnitude to make a couple of dozen millionaires.

On Not Knowing When To Stop

From the outset there has been a latent but obvious danger that Red China might enter the Vietnamese War. In its euphoria at seeing China and the Soviet Union at loggerheads, there was—there still is—the danger that the Pentagon will induce U.S. action of a nature to bring China in. It has not yet happened, but the result of the Johnson Administration's commitment to progressive escalation has been to bring China and the Soviet Union together once more—on a basis that is still limited but nevertheless bound to have adverse effects on the American war effort.

All the stories out of Washington from reporters who have a reputation for sober analysis and plausible prognosis agree that around the middle of February the deterioration of Sino-Soviet relations—so far as Vietnam was concerned—reached a turning point. The Chinese lifted the siege of the Russian embassy in Peking, and Ho Chi Minh sent a courteously worded but tough letter to the Pope, blowing sky-high the peace hopes generated by conferences between Soviet Premier Kosygin and Prime Minister Harold Wilson. Now we know, through dispatches from Saigon to U.S. News & World Report (April 3) and from Paris to the Los Angeles Times (April 12) that outward events marked an agreement between Peking and Moscow to end Chinese interference with overland shipments of Russian arms and equipment to North Vietnam.

The North Vietnamese leaders are evidently confident of the ability of their people, and the Vietcong, to continue the war if the means are available to them, even on the present level of inferiority to American firepower. Hanoi is gambling on a change of U.S. administration in 1968 which might enable it to salvage the gains of its victory over the French in 1954. If President Johnson and his Pentagon advisers had been willing to agree to genuine peace efforts shortly after the beginning of this year, the tripartite enemy agreement might well have been averted.

As it is, the tough line in Washington led to a tough line in Hanoi, Peking and Moscow. The North Vietnamese continue to be victimized in that they and the Vietcong are doing all the bleeding and the North Vietnamese economy is being set back ten or twenty years. But from the American viewpoint things are not rosy either. The bombing of the power plant a mile from the center of Haiphong is doubtless the prelude to bombing or mining of the harbor, but the North Vietnamese troops and the Vietcong can probably survive with supplies shipped by rail. And the concentration of North Vietnamese troops at the demilitarized zone has relieved some of the pressure on the Vietcong in the delta. Nor can we expect the Soviet-North Vietnamese war effort to remain at its present level, much less to slacken.

In all such situations there is a point of no return. If our military have their way and we bomb the North Vietnamese airfields, the chances are the North Vietnamese will be allowed to move back to bases in China, increasing the chances of Chinese involvement. If Gen. Creighton Abrams invades North Vietnam and repeats his past ground-gaining performances, the Chinese will be forced to move against him. As Joseph C. Harsch has said, "The kind of pressure which might bring Ho down is the kind of pressure which might bring China in."

The irony is that we received and ignored fair warning. Harrison Salisbury quotes a "high Soviet diplomat": "We would like to see the war ended by diplomatic means. But if . . . the United States is going to step up its action on the land and in the air, we will escalate our aid to North Vietnam step by step. If the United States sends in more planes we will send in more missiles, more rockets, more MIGs. There should be no misunderstanding on this."

That was a month ago. The warning could still be heeded, but if the Pentagon view prevails, the stupidities of the past will only pave the way for the stupidities of the future.

Et Tu, Russell?

It must be admitted that the Pentagon's latest gimmick—Fast Deployment Logistics—is a good idea from a purely military standpoint. FDL envisions a fleet of thirty floating armories which, fully loaded, would be based at strategic points abroad, and at Pacific, Atlantic and Gulf ports where the vessels could take on the equipment of army divisions stationed nearby. In case of "trouble," the divisions would be flown to the affected area in C-5A aircraft, which can carry 345 men apiece. With the equipment already on the spot, or moving out at high speed, a division could be in action within three to twenty days. With advance knowledge of impending "trouble," the reaction time would range from one to ten days. This is a lot better than the situation in Korea, where the first U.S. division took fifty-six days to get into combat. And it's a bargain: $2 billion is the Pentagon's price tag.

That people like Seymour Melman should be aghast at this proposal is to be expected. Melman, Emile Benoit and others of that school are constantly assessing the human cost of military preparations and the dangers of ever deepening involvement in destruction of life and property. But who is this that now stamps into the forum arrayed in the senatorial toga and holding up the hand of warning? It is none other than Sen. Richard B. Russell, hawk of hawks, Chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, and himself a general in the reserve. Mr. Russell is presently agitating for the return of battleships to the active fleet, further to pulverize North Vietnam with their 16-inch guns. But to the FDL proposal, in which Secretary McNamara, and the civilian and military brains in the Pentagon have joined unanimously, Russell says nay. Following his lead, the Senate has rejected a Navy request for $233 million in fiscal 1968 for five FDL ships, and has revoked a previous authorization for two such vessels, on the ground that it was not apprised of the full extent of the program.

Senator Russell, joined by Senator Mansfield, argues that the FDL project would give the United States the capability of becoming a "global policeman," a role not likely to ingratiate us with the nations of the world. "If it is easy for us to go anywhere and do anything," says Russell, "we will always be going somewhere and doing something." To this the Pentagon reacts with hurt surprise. In effect, its lobbyists argue that this is precisely what they thought Congress wanted them to be prepared to do, and they are only proposing the most efficient way of doing it.

Mr. Russell added a comment hardly befitting a hawk. Three aerospace firms—General Dynamics, Litton and Lockheed—were the finalists in the FDL competition, freezing out the old-line shipyards with their Congressional friends. In this day of diversification all three own shipyards. But the Pentagon has tied the FDL ships to the C-5A transport, which is manufactured in Georgia, Senator Russell's home state. Somehow, Mr. Russell was made aware that if the FDL program was halted, production of C-5As might be reduced, which would grieve Senator Russell's constituents. "I suspect that there was at least a mild attempt to coerce me," Mr. Russell told the Senate. If he sticks to his position, which is essentially that of a discriminating hawk, the Senate may try to reclaim some of the power over foreign policy which it has relinquished to the military.

Anarchy at Sea

Generalizing on the Torrey Canyon disaster, one writer referred to it as "a problem confronting man in his relentless pursuit of progress." He might better have viewed it as a catastrophe inflicted on the innocent in the course of the oil industry's relentless pursuit of profits. The rationale of building bigger and bigger tankers is that it cuts the cost of transporting crude oil, but when has the industry reduced the cost of any of its end-products, such as fuel oil for residential heating or gasoline for motor cars? Any lowering of costs goes into making billionaires of Arabian and American potentates and various other international figures.

The Torrey Canyon was internationalized too. Owned by a Bermuda corporation, which is owned in turn by the Union Oil Company of California, she was carrying crude oil under Liberian registry, with an Italian captain and crew, subject therefore to Italian maritime law. For this particular voyage (from Kuwait to a port in Wales) she was under charter to British Petroleum, Ltd. As a result of her grounding, she polluted the beaches of England and France, and the ecological effects may be felt as far away as northwest Africa. The captain committed quite a feat in running his ship onto a rock described by a British writer as "a notorious oceanic fixture surrounded by warning lights." When it appeared that the ship was a loss, he departed for his homeland, presumably for legal reasons, and expressed his regrets from that sanctuary.

At 118,000 tons deadweight, the Torrey Canyon was big compared with World War II tankers but by no means a supertanker. The Japanese Idemitsu Maru carries 205,000 tons, and six tankers of 276,000 tons capacity are being built. Nor is this the end—designs for tankers of 600,000 tons are under study. The first question that arises is whether it would not be advisable to try to limit the size of future carriers by international agreement. Although it is not clear that four tankers of 50,000 tons would be less of a hazard than one of 200,000 tons, damage to the environment in any single mishap would be less extensive.

A second common-sense question is whether, while tankers are being enlarged and automated ad libitum, the technology of sailing them keeps abreast of the arts of navigation and position-fixing. Unlike the pilot of an airliner, the master of the Torrey Canyon was under no obligation to report his course, speed and position to sta-

(Continued on page 564)

On the March Again: New York

PAUL GOOD

Mr. Good is a free-lance writer who contributes frequently to The Nation.

On Saturday, April 15, a renowned baby doctor named Spock, a Sioux Indian named Henry Crow Dog, an anonymous girl with legs painted psychedelically, and a few hundred thousand other Americans, including Dr. Martin Luther King, staged the most massive peace demonstration in American history.

The full import of the sheer magnitude of the Spring Mobilization to End the War in Vietnam will become apparent only now that the emotional moment is over and results are produced. But there are immediate indications that some people in Washington—perhaps Nervous Nellies—are worried about the impact of demonstrations in New York and San Francisco. Paraders still were marching when President Johnson announced that the FBI was reporting to him on “antiwar activity.” This veiled intimidation recalled the President’s equally unbecoming reminder to Negroes last year that—in case they had forgotten—they were a minority.

Secretary of State Rusk also was counting and discounting. He said there were 200 million Americans, almost all of whom were behind the government’s Vietnamese policies. In any event, he said, the government would pay no attention to the demonstrators. This pride in unresponsiveness to a First Amendment exercise by a servant of a democracy was followed by his observation that the “Communist apparatus” was busy in all antiwar activity, although everyone against the war was not necessarily a Communist.

If antiwar sentiment was as inconsequential as the Administration claimed, why was there so much exertion to put it down? Even the New York City Police Department got into the act, announcing that demonstrators totaled only 125,000. The performance of the police, however, was admirable, and no fault could be found with the extent and character of the cooperation provided by Mayor Lindsay’s administration. Peace is not a numbers game, yet numbers give some indication of the strength of dissent. By 2 P.M., when the first police estimate of 125,000 was made, the United Nations Plaza, which easily holds that number, was filled. For the next two hours marchers continued pouring out of Central Park, fifteen to twenty abreast in a column whose end did not reach the plaza until ceremonies had closed in a driving rain at 6 P.M. At least 300,000 marched in New York, another 65,000 in San Francisco, and these formidable numbers help explain why President Johnson flaunted the FBI and Secretary Rusk his contempt.

The turn-out was all the more remarkable in face of the stress on dissension and warnings of violence from a universally hostile press. Two themes preoccupied the press, along with other critics. The first was Dr. King’s Riverside Church address of April 4, in which he re-committed himself to ending what he called an immoral war that murdered Vietnamese and expendable American youth, while blunting civil rights progress at home. UN Under Secretary Ralph Bunche, Sen. Jacob Javits, controlling elements of NAACP and The New York Times were among those publicly wringing their hands over the damage Dr. King allegedly was doing to civil rights by identifying with peace.

The second dissension theme stemmed from the Mobilization committee’s decision that anyone from Quaker to Communist to LSD tripper was welcome so long as he opposed the war.

The position of the Committee for a Sane Nuclear Policy provided an example of press obsession with divisiveness. Although Dr. Benjamin Spock, co-chairman of SANE, was a stalwart Mobilization sponsor, some SANE members opposed participation. They deplored Negro factions that said the war was genocidal in character, and they felt North Vietnam should be condemned equally with the United States. On April 13, the Times published a misleading and factually incorrect story under the headline: “SANE Votes To Shun Protest; Says Hanoi Shares War Guilt.” In fact, only the Northern California SANE chapter had done this, the national board having specifically condemned the United States, while leaving its 23,000 members free to demonstrate as they chose.

As it turned out, the scope of the Mobilization made it infinitely larger than the sum of its parts. SANE, Communists and acid heads varied greatly in motive and responsibility, but their absence or presence was absorbed in the grass-roots sweep of those participating. In January, when the Mobilization looked as if it would never get off the ground, Rev. James Bevel took over as national chairman, on loan from his work as an ace organizer for Dr. King’s Southern Christian Leadership Conference. Bevel is something of a practical mystic, a Baptist minister who wears a black-and-gold tapestried yarmulke out of respect for the Judaistic role of the prophet as an instrument for social justice. With his shaved head, Tartar mustache and spiritual cool, he helped galvanize the faltering Mobilization, and made himself the man to watch in the peace movement. Young and old audiences heard the following Bevel-isms:

Americans have never accepted nonwhites as people but as tools to be used. We murdered the Indians because they wouldn’t work as slaves. Now, the slaves we brought over are no longer assets, and if you don’t need a shoeshine boy, what do you do with him? Bevel is working hard because he doesn’t want to follow his Jewish brethren into an incinerator.

It’s mighty odd that certain people are so worried about the future of civil rights now that we’re in the peace movement. Where were they last year when a racist Senate and recalcitrant Congress were failing to pass a fair housing act?

If I went around the street cursing and throwing stones, I’d be more profound than Johnson and McNamara both. But we should stop getting mad at Johnson and try to get him well. When a psychiatrist sees a patient he doesn't beat him down but tries to help him up.

Despite the pacifistic and nonviolent commitment of most of the organizers, a radio and TV press conference in New York the day before the march bristled with the kind of reportorial hostility usually reserved for ax murderers. The first question referred to fear supposedly rampant in New York that the demonstrators would do violence, and it was repeated half a dozen times despite denials. What about charges of Communist control, asked a network man.

"That," said Dr. Spock, "is the most preposterous statement I have ever heard."

The representative of a radio group owned by avowed New York liberal R. Peter Straus asked Catholic Monsignor Charles Rice if he wanted to hand over Vietnamese Catholics to the Reds.

"It's better," replied Monsignor Rice, "than blowing them up." This bankrupt journalistic curiosity could be expected from a media whose coverage grows less responsible each year. What was alarming was the editorial attitude of The New York Times. In recent months, a subtle but sure erosion had been evident in the Times's once outspoken censure of America's Vietnamese role, and now—perhaps reflecting an internal struggle on the paper—it came to a head.

Dr. King's Riverside Church speech will rank as one of the most significant of his career. It was a carefully developed history of the Vietnamese intervention, laced with eloquence and morally uncompromising. He urged conscientious objection on those who agreed with him that the war was immoral and he called America "the greatest purveyor of violence in the world today."

It was strong stuff, and whether or not one agreed, the speech demanded examination. However, the Times did not see fit to publish a transcript. It was an ironic commentary on American journalism that many Mobilization marchers first read it in its entirety in a free copy distributed by the Communist Worker in Central Park. On April 7, a Times editorial headlined "Dr. King's Error" argued that Vietnam and civil rights were "distinct and separate" problems. It condemned as "slander" his juxtaposition of American and Nazi atrocities.

Yet during the previous month, Times news columns had reported that the Defense Department would spend $35 million in fiscal 1967 for defoliation and crop destruction in Vietnam. The same columns had described use of a new weapon to force air heated to 1,000 degrees into tunnels where Vietcong might be hiding. The paper had dutifully recorded the bombing of civilian areas in the North and the promiscuous leveling of villages in the South. The selective qualities of Nazi genocide were indefensible; was there a built-in justification to the kind of unselective warfare that the nature of the Vietnamese struggle induced America to employ there? And while support for Great Society programs crumbled in face of a $2 billion a month budgetary drain for Vietnam, where was the logic in the assertion that civil rights and the war were "separate and distinct"?

So it was against this background of widespread criticism and distrust that the demonstrators gathered in Central Park. It was a damp, gray Saturday, with a loamy spring smell coming off the lawns thickly sown with humanity gathered from twenty-odd states, three Indian reservations and Puerto Rico. The Cleveland Ethical Society had come with hundreds of others from that area in a ten-car train. Sioux and Iroquois, protesting dead-end Washington paternalism, were welcomed by Harlem Black Nationalists—Black Power and long moribund tribal resentments on the peace path together. A delegation of professors in academic robes and mortarboards displayed the banner: "They are our brothers whom we kill." Overhead the buzz of a police helicopter recalled the ubiquitous army choppers in Vietnam. Matronly members of Women Strike for Peace mingled with hippies passing out yellow hyacinths: Flower Power. Ministers and World War II veterans walked across the Sheep Meadow where a scruffy band of beatniks waved a desecrated American flag destined to be burned. In one corner, dozens of draft cards went up in smoke. A pretty young girl watched in a skirt made of tin foil, wearing a button that read, "War is a bad trip." And on a small hill, flags of the Liberation Front of South Vietnam fluttered, courtesy of the Ad Hoc (what else?) Committee for a Revolution contingent.

As the marchers poised to start out, a large photograph of A. J. Muste loomed over them, a poignant reminder that the man who had spent a lifetime working for the moment had died before he could live it. The parade seemed anticlimactic, somehow eclipsed by the coming together of a multitude for peace already accomplished in the park. Crowds were generally thin along the route, with boos and cheers evenly divided. The loudly heralded possibility of violence may have scared off New Yorkers. Or they may have been indifferent. There were only a few minor scuffles. Some teen-agers taunted the marchers with Communist accusations and one produced a sign: "Dr. Spock Smokes Bananas." The courtly doctor and his fellow provocateurs smiled.

A cold gloom was blowing off the East River as the program began with singer Pete Seeger telling of his dream that the world had called off war. Dr. Spock was stalwart and lucid as he warned: "If we allow ourselves to be split we will be chewed up, fragment by fragment, because we have powerful and relentless enemies."

Dr. King repeated the essence of his Riverside speech, ending his peroration with quotations from William Cullen Bryant and Carlyle that he had used hundreds of times in Southern churches. . . . "Truth, crushed to earth, shall rise again. . . . No lie can live forever." Stokely Carmichael then embraced him, but Dr. King left before SNCC's chairman made his familiar slashing attack on America's morality and its leaders, also repeating a well-worn line: "The draft is white people sending black people to make war on yellow people in order to defend the land they stole from the red people." CORE's Floyd McKissick called for demonstrations of disobedience, "some civil and some not so civil." SDS announced a "Student Summer" of protest, and Linus Pauling said in a quavering voice, "I am ashamed of my country."

As rain began bucketing down, Chairman Bevel sketched what might lie ahead in a series of staccato pronouncements.

We're going to organize high school students by the thousands to go to jail by the thousands. . . . We're going to close down New York City, say to the young people: "You must get out of schools and into the streets to end murder in Vietnam. . . ." We don't want c.o. status. . . . We going to see President Johnson at the White House next month and tell him to stop killing people.

And then the march disbanded, sodden but not dispirited. The future course was uncertain, but there was a strong sense of what Carmichael had called "the small hope in your great numbers." Local and national meetings are expected in the next few months to try to forge a unified peace-movement program. The range of thinking and the spectrum of personalities is so wide that anything like total cohesion is impossible. Activists already are pressing for the kind of direct confrontations with the government that moderates shun. The role of civil rights forces in the peace movement carries tremendous, unpredictable potential. The mood of the young in black ghettos is increasingly fatalistic, and those trying to lead them are not susceptible to cautionary pleas from white moderates. Much is going to depend on circumstance and, given Washington's grim response to the Mobilization, circumstances aren't bright. If peace advocates remain a small minority, repression may contain them at the cost of disorders and a weakening of civil liberties. With all this acknowledged, the magnitude of what took place on both coasts that Saturday suggests that more Americans than had been suspected believe with Herodotus: "No one is fool enough to choose war instead of peace. In peace sons bury fathers but in war fathers bury sons."

What Americans believe and how they act on those beliefs could make this summer a critical one, not only for the republic but for mankind.

San Francisco

MEL WAX

Mr. Wax is an urban affairs writer for the San Francisco Chronicle.

The largest protest march in the history of the West — more than 65,000 — paraded the 5½-mile route along Market Street, through the Negro ghetto of the Fillmore district, alongside the Haight-Ashbury district where the hippies live, and finally to Kezar Stadium in Golden Gate Park where the '49ers play football. It was a strange sort of parade, curiously dignified, joyous and peaceful. Most of the marchers carried flowers—daisies and daffodils. They were predominantly young, but there was an impressive number of the elderly—white-haired grandmothers, oldsters pushed in wheel chairs—and many children and stolid, straight, middle-class matrons.

The San Francisco Council of Churches had announced a boycott of the Spring Mobilization. The Episcopal Fellowship urged participation. "I am haunted by the horror of this war," Stanford University theologian Robert McAfee Brown told the Kezar rally, "but I am even more haunted by the timidity of the American religious community in its failure to condemn it."

There was no burning of draft cards, as there had been in New York, and there were few violent speeches. The most extreme came from Mrs. Mora Newman, whose brother is in Fort Leavenworth, dishonorably discharged from the army for refusing to fight in Vietnam. "After they get you in the army, and they make you inhuman, you'll come back to the same old crap," she said. "We won't get justice until the White House becomes the 'Black House.'"

There were few hecklers along the line of march. One group, waving American flags, held placards urging "Support for Vietnam." Monitors, with yellow ribbon arm bands, detoured the parade around them and there were no incidents. Occasionally a bystander shouted: "I can lick twenty of you punks." A dozen men with flags, one holding a "Support the War" placard, entered Kezar Stadium, and walked around the track, next to the jam-packed seats that held 62,000 people. Edward Keating, publisher of Ramparts and West Coast chairman of the Mobilization, urged the crowd to ignore the dissidents, and it did.

Around the platform on the 50-yard line, a banner read: "Vietcong-NLF Never Called Us Nigger." It was symbolic of the mélange of civil rights and peace speakers. There were twenty speakers all told—far too many. It was a chilly day, it had been a long march, and three and a half hours of talk—even if it is broken up a bit by folk singers, rock 'n' roll bands, and a parachute jumper who descended from the sky while state Assemblyman Willie Brown, Jr., the only Negro ever elected to public office in San Francisco, was making a pitch for money—is too much. By the time Mrs. Martin Luther King rose to talk, fewer than 20,000 demonstrators were left in the stands.

The organizing committee's dilemma had been whether to keep the program at manageable size, or to let all those who joined the "Peace Coalition" have their say. Speakers included—in addition to Mrs. King, Keating and Assemblyman Brown—Charles Duarte, president of Local Six of the International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union; Gerald Hill, president of the Volunteer California Democratic Council; Elijah Turner, Negro candidate for city council in Oakland; Robert Vaughn, television's Man From U.N.C.L.E.; Eldridge Cleaver, president of the Organization of African Unity; David Harris, former student body president of Stanford University; Robert Scheer, Managing Editor of Ramparts and a leading spokesman for the New Left, and Rabbi Abraham Feinberg of Toronto, who recently returned from a visit to Hanoi.

They talked in predictable terms, calling the war immoral, racist, illegal.

"We are fighting to avoid admitting we have failed in Vietnam," said Vaughn. "We begin to see a new brand of fascism, parading under the guise of Americanism."

"This war is morally unacceptable," said Mrs. King.

"No matter how much we are maligned by the military, and the right wing, we can say: 'Blessed are the Peacemakers.'"

The crowd at the stadium, predominantly young, predominantly draftable, responded routinely, but there was loud applause for Scheer:

There is something bizarre, something dangerous about this. There is too much self-congratulation. We are in danger of taking on the role of the Roman circus. Where are the people over 25? Where the hell are they? Where are the workers? Where is the middle class? It's not enough to leave it to the kids under 25 to stop the war.

All told, the march was more impressive than the rally. Somehow, words don't say it as well as 65,000 people, of all kinds, marching five and a half miles.

Strange Decorum of Lester Maddox

ROBERT G. SHERRILL

This article is the first of several written by Mr. Sherrill, The Nation's Washington correspondent, during a recent political tour of the South. An early issue will carry his observations on the fortunes of the Wallace family of Alabama.

What we need to do is to convince people in other parts of the country that Lester Maddox is not an aberration. He is not unusual or odd. We must convince them that in fact Maddox represents the popular point of view in racial matters in Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, South Carolina, Tennessee, Virginia, West Virginia, Pennsylvania and New York.

Julian Bond, speaking at Atlanta University

Atlanta

The most pathetic figure in Southern politics today—and perhaps in politics anywhere—is Lester Maddox, Georgia's new governor. Maddox spent a small fortune and several years building the image of a wild man and now he is having a terrible time persuading some important people that he is not, after all, off his rocker.

To put his plight in perspective, it should be remembered that the mental condition of its chief executives is something that periodically makes news in Dixie. The late Earl Long of Louisiana was in a constant brawl with psychiatrists during his last days as governor. Then a couple of years ago Sen. Wayne Morse of Oregon revealed that the Veterans Administration was paying George Wallace a 10 per cent disability pension because he was psychotic. A few years earlier, and not so widely publicized, was Arkansas Gov. Orval Faubus' charge that the Arkansas Gazette had secretly assigned a psychiatrist to study him in action. A public counting of gubernatorial marbles is, in short, nothing new.

But at the present time Georgia is the only Southern state wherein a number of responsible people are seriously concerned about the serenity of their Governor's mind, and the fact that Maddox's first ninety days in office have been marked by admirable decorum does not seem to lessen their concern. Obviously the 450,000 citizens who voted for him last fall were persuaded of his normalcy, but among the majority of Georgians (he was elected by a minority of the voters, with a run-off in the legislature) other judgments are heard, and they are not flippantly made. One of Atlanta's best-known attorneys, after a bleak psychoanalytical estimate of the Governor, recalled: "I remember seeing him charge up and down a picket line in front of an Atlanta restaurant, red-faced, wild, screaming, stopping to squeal at every Negro in line. And that's the man who now is in charge of the Georgia national guard." It's easy, around Atlanta, to turn up this kind of remembrance, with predictions of more to come. Fair or not, that's what they're saying.

Even Maddox's friends and supporters have acknowledged the question of his stability. During the Democratic run-off last fall, Roy Harris, president of the Citizens Councils of America and once a king maker in Georgia politics, told me privately that the reason Maddox had acted so extravagantly was that "he had had a stroke and it affected him, but he's all right now." Publicly, Harris set himself to the more difficult task of trying to convince the readers of his racist newspaper, The Augusta Courier, that Maddox was more stable than his opponent, ex-Governor Ellis Arnall, with whom Harris was a very close political ally in the 1940s. Harris wrote on this point: "I have seen him [Arnall] go wild on occasion. I have seen him lose his head more times than I have seen Lester do so. I have seen Arnall when he was at the point that I thought he was cracking up. . . . So, regardless of whatever the situation may be with respect to Lester Maddox, I will venture to say that Ellis Arnall is wilder and more radical than Lester Maddox ever dared to be. Now, I know that some people think that Lester is on the wild side. . . ."

Yes, they do think so, being persuaded not so much by the battle of the Ax Handles (a little violence in one's biography is nothing to be ashamed of among high-blooded Southerners) as by the many advertisements that he bought in the Atlanta Constitution and Atlanta Journal for several years. (They were propaganda missiles rather than advertising, the Internal Revenue Service decided, resisting Maddox's attempt to deduct them as legitimate business expenses.) These days his speeches are written by some very sophisticated fellows and he comes out sounding like the philosopher Santayana (whom he, in fact, did quote in a recent speech). But his Pickrick restaurant ads were the pure skillet-fried Maddox, full of searing hatred, perverse logic and bad grammar. A sample:

The mess they have this town [Atlanta] in, it is a wonder that many more people are not going on an African hunt. . . . And, like a customer suggested, "Why go to Africa for hunting when Atlanta could bear considerable hunting?"

One of his most incandescent outbursts followed the marriage of the first Negro girl admitted to the University of Georgia to a white man whom she met there.

Yes, in the face of being called demagogue, racist, rabble rouser, hate monger and all the ugly names, for years I said that school integration would lead to racial amalgamation. The race-mixing publisher, the editor, the public officials, and yes, the minister and the professor (in either case being stupid or renegade white) told you I was wrong. . . . They were knowingly, or unwittingly, lying to you fine people of Georgia who had placed your trust in them. Now that racial integration in the schools has led to racial amalgamation, the white renegades should be tarred and feathered and run out of Georgia. Those who boasted, a governor or so, and others, of how they peacefully integrated the great University of Georgia, should hang their heads in shame and ask the people for forgiveness. Oh, you rascals! And please listen, Mom, Dad and others: it could well be in your home next. Then what? Please wake up!

But Maddox's one-man crusade did not end there. He picketed the Old Post Office Building in Atlanta, marching alone, swinging back to his car periodically to change signs (discarding the sign reading "Treason Is the Reason" and taking up the sign reading "In Protest of President Johnson, Justice Department and Federal Courts"). He also distributed handbills, with a strange sense of largess. One man asked him for "a few" extra handbills to give to his office mates and Maddox happily handed him a bundle of 3,000. On another occasion Maddox packed up his handbills and picket signs and, all alone again, marched around the White House.

He did not always work alone. He helped organize People's Association for Selective Shopping (PASS), to boycott businesses that integrated or gave jobs to Negroes. (He quit doing business with two bakeries that gave jobs to Negroes, and warned in his column: "If we don't resist the Socialists and Communists now, it won't be long until a white man can't get a job unless there is a shortage of Negroes.") Next he organized the Citizens for Better Government Association with the same purposes, and distributed a list of Atlanta business establishments that had in any way befriended Negroes. Earlier he had helped put together one of the most descriptive organizations to enter the racial fray—GUTS (Georgians Unwilling To Surrender)—which had a briefly notorious flurry of rallies led by such Southern patriots as Leander Perez.

The high point in Maddox's career as a lay leader came in 1965 when he led 2,000 persons, eight abreast, down Peachtree Street to protest the pro-Negro legislation trickling in and out of Washington. To view Maddox in a moment of repose, one would not think the soft-fleshed, bald-headed fellow, with a face as innocent as a baby duck, could be a rabble rouser. But he has had his moments, and that parade was one of them. He started it off with the screaming assurance: "We are not going to have any sex orgies or anything like that! This is a march for freedom!" Most of the parade participants were the scrawny-necked, mean types that one sees at Klan rallies; Georgia's chief Klansman, Calvin Craig, was there in a bright red Model A Ford.

Because of activities such as these in his past, and despite the fact that running for mayor of Atlanta in 1961 he won more white votes than the victorious Ivan Allen, Maddox was waved aside by the political sophisticates. "Maddox? The fastest gun in the South? Ha-ha." He had virtually no financial support in either the Democratic primary or the run-off, and in the general election he received big money only from Mills B. Lane of the Citizens & Southern Bank, which signified no acceptance by the Atlanta establishment, since Lane is known as something of a wild gambler.

The horror and anger that seemed to grip some of Georgia's more prominent Democratic spokesmen at Maddox's election could not, however, be explained entirely by the fact that he was a symbol of racism nor that he had outmaneuvered the smug "top people" of the state. When Charles Weltner quit his Congressional seat rather than support a Democratic ticket that included Maddox, he explained, "I cannot compromise with hate; I cannot vote for Lester Maddox." That had a noble ring to it, but it did not exactly explain why, if he felt that way, he had been willing to support a ticket in 1962 which included the candidacy of Lieut. Gov. Peter Zack Geer, a close rival of Maddox as an unyielding racist and "hater." The same sort of questions were raised by Mayor Allen's candid denunciation of Maddox as "a symbol of hate" and his description of Maddox's nomination as "tarnishing the state seal," though Allen has been on the friendliest of terms with, for example, Sen. Herman Talmadge, a much more dangerously subtle demagogue than Maddox can ever hope to be, one who only a few years ago was the South's foremost symbol of anti-Negroism.

The explanation for their response lies partly in the fact that men like Weltner and Allen fear men like Maddox because they cannot understand them, and do not attempt to understand them. There is the cool, rational world of the country club on the one hand and, on the other, the world of Maddox, who remembers a boyhood when cardboard was used to half-sole his shoes, who finished high school by correspondence, who pinched pennies and drove his kitchen help unrelentingly until he became a nervous, permanently insecure but well-to-do restaurant owner, determined that, having come so far, no "niggers" or "Communists" or slick young lawyers or pompous mayors would ever get what he had. He would fight them with ax handles and pistols, if necessary. He would even become governor, if necessary. It was the success of desperate defensive reaction, and 450,000 desperately defensive Georgians were willing to support it.

Maddox was deserted by Weltner and disdained by Allen because they considered him to be, if not unhinged, at least highly irresponsible. Maddox's political creed seems to be quicksilver: try to pin it down and it breaks into a hundred little balls, squirting in every direction. Make a solemn pact with Maddox this week and next week, acting just as solemnly, he may break it. The University of Georgia regents sat down with him and got him to agree on a budget, which he promised to support with the legislature. A couple of weeks later, he had knocked about $30 million from the regents' figure. Then, when the heat was on, he stuck the money back in.

He has been just as squirmy about what he plans to do in 1968. He has privately promised several Georgia big-wigs that he will be faithful to the Democratic Party; he has publicly stated his unwillingness to support a third party. Then he has hedged on all this: "At least I never think I ever would" support a third party.

The federal school guidelines have kept him on a schizoid seesaw. One day he is raving, the next day he is being fatalistically calm. Campaigning for governor, he revived the stale promise, heard for a dozen years in every political campaign, to "go to jail" rather than integrate the schools according to a federal pattern. Yet in his inaugural address he promised to respect the authority of the federal government, and at no time during his first three months in office did he make more than an obliquely unhappy reference to the guidelines. Then he fell off the emotional wagon, condemning a Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals edict to integrate all schools next year as "Un-Godly, Un-Christian and Un-American," and vowing to team up with Gov. Lurleen Wallace of Alabama and Gov. Paul Johnson of Mississippi to do something about it. Next fall, he may be escorting Negro children to white schools.

Some of his inconsistencies are heartening. As a campaigner he also promised to reactivate an anti-integration commission set up in the 1950s under Governor Griffin, whose administration was the most gauche in the history of the modern South. As yet Maddox has shown no signs of making good on that promise; on the contrary, he has started making some of the standard efforts to be accepted as a "sensible bigot"—that is, he goes around shaking hands with colored voters and posing with Negro basketball teams. Julian Bond, the Negro who pried his way into the Georgia General Assembly only with the help of the U. S. Supreme Court, acknowledges that "verbally Maddox is a different man" (but he adds, "that handshaking doesn't fool us; he is basically the same fellow he's always been"). I asked an elevator operator who was looking at a picture of Maddox in one of the local Negro newspapers if she thought he had reformed. She agreed with Bond: "He ain't changed. But we're going along with him, acting like he's changed, hoping maybe if we act that way long enough he will change."

Maddox came into office trailing clouds of right-wing extremism. Everyone was certain that he would continue on that course when he appointed several known Klan sympathizers to important Democratic Party offices, and when it was revealed that the local Let Freedom Ring telephone propaganda crusade was housed in Maddox's furniture store. Maddox did not apologize; he said he was "shocked" that anyone could object to the telephone line, and acknowledged that he thought the John Birch Society might be the salvation of the nation, although he was not himself a member.

Yet last month, when he addressed the American Legion and had his ripest opportunity to cut loose with right-wing rhetoric, Maddox was as restrained as one could expect any Southern governor to be. He saw some "signs of decay in our democracy," but nothing that a little putty wouldn't fix. However he has also said he would set up a 1,000-citizen "watchdog committee" that would, in his words, "look and tell on people all over the state, and I am going to listen"—a political spy system akin to that established in Alabama by George Wallace, and more recently in Florida by the right-wing Governor, Claude Kirk.

His "nicer" side has not generally been accepted as permanent or stemming from deep conviction. The kindest of his critics puts it down to shrewd testing of the political winds. Just as often one hears it ascribed to the influence of Senator Talmadge, and this seems logical since several Talmadge men are close to Maddox and they would draw on their leader's experiences. When Talmadge went to Washington in 1956 after two big-mouthed terms as Georgia's governor, almost everyone in the country expected the worst from him. Many a newspaper columnist dolefully predicted that the nation was about to be subjected to another Theodore Bilbo. But Talmadge fooled them. He didn't take his style to Capitol Hill. He kept quiet; he was very decorous, almost retiring. Everyone was so shocked by this that almost overnight he became something of a minor hero on the Washington party circuit, and ever since Talmadge has been trading on the fact that he wasn't as big a heel as expected. In lieu of positive action, this isn't the worst way—and it is certainly the easiest way—to win acclaim. Maddox has started to benefit by the same kind of non-action. Since he has not yet hit anyone with an ax handle (in fact, his staff has been forbidden the very mention of ax handles), the national columnists are already cranking out appraisals of Maddox as a misjudged moderate.

He certainly is not that. On the other hand there does seem to be, as one of Atlanta's best newsmen put it, "a zone of decency" in the man. Exploiting and widening that zone before Maddox reverts to his old wild ways is the obvious tactic, but it is something else to get it done. Right now there are no advisers around him capable of the job, and the top people of Atlanta, in their usual bungling way, are not really trying to work with him. Instead, many of them are delighted to hail George L. Smith, Speaker of the House, as "the most powerful man in Georgia politics," and to use him and the lieutenant governor, George T. Smith, as wedges to pry Maddox away from the seat of power. They especially like George L. Smith because he is close to the bankers.

Not in modern times has a Georgia legislature been so independent of the governor. As a safety precaution, this may have some advantages, but if the top people mean to do battle with Maddox they might well remember the war whoop of this little man a couple of years ago—"So you screwballs, Socialists, Communists, mistaken and misguided who threaten me, let me say that you are wasting your time. I just plain don't scare." And he doesn't.

But he needs help. Left to his own devices, he showed and chose the duller sort of legislative leadership. Do not look for any great relief for the poor from Maddox. His impoverished upbringing whetted his instincts to the point that in his inaugural address he promised an administration of "compassion and concern" for "Georgians who cannot help themselves"; but that his much deeper training as a cutthroat merchant predominates is evidenced by the fact that he helped kill a proposed, and much needed, $5 a month increase for some welfare recipients. He implemented federal welfare aid under Title 19, but reportedly only because Mrs. Orville Shaefer, head of Family and Children Services, threatened to quit if he didn't.

Like Eugene Talmadge, Maddox combines a racist philosophy that appeals to the wool hats with an economic philosophy that should appeal to the urban businessmen. He plans to burden the poor with another penny sales tax next year while easing the property taxes of the wealthy. He promises to turn over all plans for the "formulation and execution of industrialization" of the state to the industrialists themselves. Will this mean shameless tax favoritism? Of course it will, and Maddox says he welcomes the prospect of Georgia's going further down the road of tax write-offs, of free sites and almost free utilities for industry. He will, in short, join Alabama and Mississippi in vying to see who can give away more to the industrialists while heaping higher the tax burden of those least able to pay.

The poor fools, the rednecks and the yahoos, with an eye only for the Negro, are grateful to Maddox; the businessmen are not, for they know they could get the same favoritism from a smoothie without the accompanying embarrassments that come with Maddox. But this haughty group apparently doesn't understand its basic problem, which is not to get more favoritism from Maddox than they could from another governor but to get more sanity from him than they had any reason to expect. And to this end they had better stop isolating him. Pride is the key to controlling his emotions, just as it is to controlling the Klan and the Black Muslims. During the campaign, whenever he could spare a few hours, Maddox would return to Atlanta and go out to the governor's mansion and just walk around the place, staring at it. He felt that he had to make the big leap if he was to stop being an outcast altogether. He was already a Scottish Rite Mason, a Moose, a member of the state chamber of commerce, of the Travelers Protective Association, of the Junior Order United American Mechanics, of the Buckhead Fifty Club, an honorary member of the Georgia Sheriff's Association, and president of the West Gate Merchants Association—but for some reason none of these alliances had ushered him through the best doors in Atlanta. His home precinct, in uppercrust Northside, voted overwhelmingly against him. He knew what the elite and the semi-elite of Atlanta thought of him, but if he could get in that mansion they would have to accept him.

So far, however, they haven't. Nor has the National Democratic Party, unless Vice President Humphrey's recent breakfast with Maddox is supposed to indicate club membership. The appointment of Weltner to a position in the national party hierarchy was seen by Maddox, and rightly, as an open insult. Twice Maddox has gone to Washington to seek reassurances from President Johnson that he has forgiven him for that sign ("Down with Johnson, Socialism and Communism") and that the National Democratic Party is going to give the Klan-larded Georgia Democratic Party consideration in planning campaign strategies and policies. Maddox says he received such promises from Johnson—yet he keeps wanting the President and his close aides to repeat them. Maddox's self-confidence is so shallow and his pride so total, covering his mind like an inflamed membrane, that he cannot be told such things often enough.

Those of influence who laugh at Maddox for this, and discount him as a buffoon, do a great disservice to what is probably the South's bellwether state. Without surrendering to his primitive concepts, this man must be humored; he must be coddled and led gently along until he becomes accustomed to living in a civilized way. The alternative will be another explosion that will throw Maddox back into the arms of George Wallace and Ross Barnett, who are waiting patiently and confidently for his return. There are three years and nine months left of his term.

SPACE / TIME IN MONTREAL

ERVIN GALANTAY

Mr. Galantay is an associate professor in architecture at Columbia University and practices as a consultant in urban design.

Montreal

Montreal is humming in cheerful anticipation of Expo 67, but the chances are that at this World's Fair the city itself will be an exhibit of greater interest than any of the temporary pavilions. In fact, Montreal secured the fair because the city has emerged like a splendid butterfly from its gray provincial cocoon to become a World City of the first order. World Cities are those that serve as models to towns of similar size; cities that attract delegations of administrators, businessmen, planners from other continents, that become part of the mental inventory of people who have never seen them. The list of World Cities is subject to constant reevaluation; proud names fade as they become more provincial and younger cities compete for a place. A decade ago Canada did not boast a single first-class metropolis, and in the competition with Toronto, most observers had written off Montreal as the loser. This contest is now decided: Canada has produced a World City and it is Montreal. The fact is reflected in the élan of its people: the Montreal Star's Pierre Desbarats exults: "We are creating a new way of life, we have solved the traffic problem and conquered the climate. . . . We are building a model for the city of the future."

It all happened very fast. I first saw Montreal nine years ago. I arrived at Windsor Station as the morning traffic jam was compacting on the snow-covered streets, and decided to walk the short distance to the new Queen Elizabeth Hotel across Dominion Square. Icy gales from the St. Lawrence River forced tears from my eyes as I passed the cathedral, a little country niece of Rome's St. Peter's. From my hotel room I saw a city dominated by church spires and square, pompous bank buildings. Below my window I could look into a 7-acre hole through which ran the sunken tracks of the Canadian National Railroad. It was this ungainly piece of real estate that turned into the "primum mobile" of Montreal's metamorphosis and became Place Ville Marie, the core of the new downtown.

Arriving at Windsor Station today, one is greeted by a totally changed skyline: above the dome of the cathedral looms the 51-story cruciform tower of Place Ville Marie, flanked by companion skyscrapers. Dominion Square sports the slim 43-story tower of the Imperial Bank of Commerce and its south side is defined by the "Place Victoria" development, consisting of a 38-floor hotel and a 30-floor office building connected to the square by a soaring pedestrian bridge. To the east squats the huge fortresslike Bonaventure Trade Mart, and beyond it rises the convincingly elegant tower of the stock exchange, designed by the Italian team of Moretti and Nervi. But more important than the skyline is the fact that one can now walk to any of these buildings without being exposed to rain, slush or sub-zero gusts of weather. From Windsor Station a pleasantly lit, impeccably clean tunnel leads to the Bonaventure Trade Mart and subway station, and there one can turn and walk through the concourse of the CNR's Central Station, continuing in a gay stream of pedestrians toward the undercover shopping promenade of Place Ville Marie. This level, sandwiched between the outdoor plaza and two levels of parking above the tracks, offers luxury shops and restaurants, barbershops and bakeries; even a unique "Instant Theatre" playing one-acters during the lunch hour for an entry fee of 75c.

The underplaza concourse has become the meeting place of Montreal, where even on Sundays some 30,000 people stroll and eye one another. Four large sunken courts with stairs leading up to the plaza offer glimpses of the buildings above, aid orientation, and provide a reassuring visual link with the outside environment. Shop fronts, signs, the paving pattern of the concourse are all designed with perfectionist care and form an elegant cadre for promenading. In the center of the promenade a cluster of bars and restaurants called "Carrefour des Canadiens" has become the "date exchange" for young people, crowded on Friday noons when the weekend programs are arranged. Such is the attraction of this environment that secretaries often take a cut in salary to get a job in the Place Ville Marie office buildings.

From the concourse one may ascend to the cruciform lobby of the Place Ville Marie tower, defined by the four quadrants of the Royal Bank's offices, which are connected above lobby level by open bridges. The lobby is an awe-inspiring 51 feet high to maintain a sense of continuity with the vast outside plaza. From here one may take an elevator to the roof-top lookout and an excellent penthouse restaurant. Thus the extraverted joys of town viewing from high vantage points complement the intraverted delights of window-shopping and girl watching, which at least in the winter are confined to the sub-surface system.

From a high point one quickly grasps the topography of Montreal; its dense core wedged between the St. Lawrence River and the rocky butte of Mt. Royal. Beyond the harbor one spots the narrow tongue of Mackay pier with the strange, clifflike "Habitat 67," symbol of the Expo. Further up river and separated by the St. Lawrence Seaway from the flat suburban south shore, the two fish-shaped islands of Ste Hélène and Notre Dame are crowded with the busy inventions of the exhibition pavilions. To the west, the new Champlain bridge crosses the mile-wide river, and from it the Bonaventure parkway branches off to follow the shore line, turning north toward the heart of the city where it plunges underground next to the new Trade Mart. East, toward the old French residential sectors, gleam the white buildings of the new Place des Artes; north, under the slopes of Mt. Royal and the solid buildings of McGill University, tower slim residential buildings. Cranes rise everywhere and the texture of the city is changing almost perceptibly before your eyes.

What released all this activity? The city has always had the potential to become a great metropolis: it had the port, a striking topography, traditions and an exciting mix of population. Today the competition between the French- and English-speaking segments of the population adds to the dynamism of the city, but ten years ago the two groups somehow paralyzed each other, and a major boost was needed to start the city's regeneration. The boost came when CNR president, George Gordon, called William Zeckendorf in from New York to develop the 22 acres owned by the railroad in the heart of the city. In 1922, Henry Thornton, then president of the CNR, laid down the principle that the entire area should be developed according to a comprehensive plan, and it is to Gordon's credit that CNR would not sell land piecemeal but required a master plan from the developer. Zeckendorf recognized that Montreal could become the future "Headquarters City" of Canada, and concluded a deal with CNR that was based on the old Roman-law concept of "emphyteutic lease"—a ninety-nine-year arrangement stipulating that the lessee should improve the property as specified in the agreement. The yearly lease for 7.5 acres of prime land consisted of a basic rent of $168,884, plus 10 per cent of the net profit made on the improved property. Obviously, maximum utilization of the land was called for, but also a major design statement that would at one stroke establish the old hole as a prestige office-retail area.

Zeckendorf brought in architect I. M. Pei, with Vincent Ponte as planner, and partner Henry Cobb in charge of design. Responding to Zeckendorf's call for a "major statement," Cobb and Ponte developed the Place Ville Marie scheme. At a time when in Montreal the yearly construction of 250,000 square feet of office space was

- | | |
|--------------------------------------|--------------------------------------|
| 1. Windsor Station | 12. CNR Station |
| 2. Place du Canada | 13. Place Bonaventure Trade Mart |
| 3. Cathedral | 14. Planned Expansion for Trade Mart |
| 4. Imperial Bank of Commerce | 15. Planned Second Tower |
| 5. Dominion Square | 16. Stock Exchange |
| 6. Old Bank Building | 17. Place Victoria Tower |
| 7. IBM Building | 18. Habitat 67 |
| 8. Place Ville Marie Building | 19. Beginning of Expo Area |
| 9. Place Ville Marie | 20, 21, 22. Grain Elevators |
| 9a. (inset) Underground Plazas (PVM) | 23. Place des Arts |
| 10. Queen Elizabeth Hotel | 24. Department Stores |
| 11. CIL Tower | 25. New Residential Buildings |

considered more than adequate, the PVM tower alone offered 1.5 million square feet of office space, 70,000 square feet of shops at plaza level, 130,000 square feet of retail space under the plaza and two parking levels for 1,500 cars. It was a $100-million gamble but it began to pay off when James Muir, president of the Royal Bank of Canada, signed a ninety-nine-year lease as the principal tenant of the tower and started the move of commerce from the old financial center to the new core.

Leasing retail space proved difficult at first; Ponte realized that the 10,000 workers in the tower could support only about 40,000 square feet of sales space, and the inclusion of additional shops had to be justified by "lateral inputs," i.e., pulling pedestrians into the plaza by its own appeal. It took eighteen months to find the first tenant for the underground promenade: it was viewed with mistrust as a basement, and as being too far from the crowds of Ste Catherine Street, Montreal's Fifth Avenue. Now there is a long waiting list for shops in the promenade, where gross sales figures are reported to exceed $400 per square foot, one of the world's highest rates. A key to the success of the plaza was the choice of its name. Many French Canadians had earlier been disgruntled when the CNR christened its new hotel the Queen Elizabeth. By contrast, Place Ville Marie, named for the first European settlement on the island of Montreal in 1642, won their immediate affection. The plaza was hardly finished when it served as the site for a chauvinistic demonstration against the hiring policies of the CNR and for the burning of President Gordon's effigy. Henry Cobb was delighted: the event marked the adoption of PVM as the place where the action is.

During the winter the vast plaza is deserted, but with the first suns of spring, people start flocking in and its scale seems justified. It is in relation to the plaza that the cruciform shape of the tower makes good architectural sense; seem from a distance it appears too high-shouldered, covering the view toward Mt. Royal. And the tower is very successful in terms of "image." Other buildings may compete with its height, but it is, and will presumably remain, the only one of its shape. The two companion structures on the plaza are perfect "backdrop" buildings, defining the space without trying to compete with the focal tower. I like best of all the long, low-rise building with its beautifully carved, well-proportioned arcades.

Although the plaza is practically on a level with busy, recently widened Dorchester Avenue, it has no appropriate access from the main shopping street, Ste Catherine. Cobb's original plan provided an excellent connection in the form of a wide ramp which would have made it easy for pedestrians on Ste Catherine to walk up onto the plaza, but due to objections from the owner of an adjacent building this ramp had to be eliminated. Now the connection between levels occurs through the shopping concourse.

Place Ville Marie might have remained an isolated gesture were it not for Vincent Ponte who provided the continuity between the PVM scheme and all later development. It is due to Ponte that Montreal's core renewal amounts to more than a collection of unrelated pieces like

New York's Third and Sixth Avenue developments, being instead a system in which each element adds to the impact of all the others.

Ponte is a maverick among planners. The profession has increasingly been turning toward complicated theoretical models, devised by specialists relying heavily on computers, but Ponte still values common sense and intuition. Among his insights in Montreal was the realization that the traditional loose east-west growth pattern of the city's core could be supplemented by a new concentrated north-south axis, the logical extension of Place Ville Marie to Mt. Royal and to the water front. He is committed to the idea of a dense urban core, which in his opinion should not exceed 200 acres even in the largest cities, but he early realized that in Montreal the addition of new office space would produce maximum congestion, since already 30 per cent of all traffic had to squeeze on east-west streets between Mt. Royal and the port. He proposed to remove the trucks from the streets by providing off-street docking points, and since pedestrian crossings also impede traffic movement, he devised a pedestrian system independent of the surface streets. The sloping ground-level of the downtown area provides good contact between the streets and the pedestrian way, which is not always underground but can also pass over the street where advantageous. The pedestrian way was Ponte's first brain child and remains his continued obsession: he likes walking through the system in dark glasses and a raccoon coat, cutting a familiar figure among the mini-skirted office workers.

The highly accessible, climate-controlled underground "market" is downtown Montreal's best defense against the lure of suburban shopping centers which sap the vitality of the retail core of cities like Detroit or Philadelphia. In Montreal the 2 miles of undercover streets now tie together 23 acres of the downtown area; by 1970, there will be 4 miles serving 44 acres, and if Ponte has his way, by 1972 the system will serve 11 million square feet of prime office space, all major hotels and department stores, ten cinemas, with 500,000 people pouring in each day from the railroad stations, the subway and 8,000 parking places. According to Ponte, the inevitable southward thrust of development will soon affect the Notre Dame area of low-rise warehouses which he sees as a reservoir for core-oriented housing. Upgrading this area will connect the core with the water front and Mackay pier, recently improved with the permanent structures of the Expo. Turning visionary, he sees the pier connected to the islands by vast suspended structures, and bridging over the seaway to the south shore. Ponte's system—which at times has been misnamed "3-D downtown"—is actually strikingly four-dimensional: it is not an abstract target plan aimed at some ultimate, crystalline balance but design in function of time; not a strait jacket but a set of rules for a game of action, permitting temporary disequilibriums to create dynamic, incremental growth.

The investment by the private sector of the economy in development projects will exceed $500 million by 1970. With its help the new downtown grows without government financing or urban renewal, but the boom could not have occurred without cooperation from city hall which cut red tape, found favorable interpretations of the bylaws and, above all, provided a modern transportation system. Equal in importance to the initiative of the private developers is the municipal rebirth of Montreal, which is largely due to Jean Drapeau, very probably the most effective mayor in North America.

Habitat 67 (a detail)

Drapeau's public career began after World War II when, as a young lawyer, he became enraged by the administration of easygoing boss Camilien Houde, under whose tenure almost the only local business that showed dynamic growth was the red-light sector of 100 bordellos. Campaigning on a reform platform, Drapeau was first elected in 1954, eased out of office by a reactionary combination in 1957 and—chaos then ensuing—was re-elected in 1960 with 88 per cent of the votes. In that campaign he committed himself to build a new subway system for Montreal. To finance the Metro he had $7 million a year in additional taxes generated by the new building boom and was able to borrow an initial $140 million to start construction. The Metro, now complete with four lines in operation, cost $213,700,000.

The fare on the subway is 25c and is valid for transfer to and from intracity buses which all terminate at the subway stations on the periphery of the downtown core. The vast commuter crowds transferring at these points enabled the Mayor to recoup part of the Metro's construction cost by offering air rights above the subway stations on the "emphyteutic" lease arrangement. Imaginative promotion of "two million people in your basement" has already bagged a $4-million development over Guy station, and other deals are being negotiated.

One subway line has been tunneled under the St. Lawrence River to terminate on Ste Hélène's Island and serve Expo. The city of Longueuil decided to pay for an extension of this line to the south shore, a farsighted move tying the underdeveloped south shore directly to downtown. Instead of building the subway in an open cut like New York's Sixth Avenue line—a method that impedes surface traffic during construction—the Montreal

Metro was tunneled deep enough to allow for spacious mezzanines between street and platform. The mezzanines are part of Ponte's continuous pedestrian-way system and from them the trains can be viewed without passing the turnstiles. The stations have been designed by different architects, and as a result each has a distinct identity, easy to remember. At Peel station, the popular local artist, Mousson, contributed brilliant abstract murals; at Bonaventure station, which lies very deep, it has been proved that high vaults can be built for the same cost as "back-filling" rubble in the excavation hole. The resulting sequence of vast domed chambers has the dignity of a Roman bath, or a Byzantine cathedral. In short, a complete tour of the stations is essential to a pilgrim of modern architecture. The subway cars designed by Jacques Gillon are of a deep blue enamel and the interiors are carefully detailed. The cars run smoothly and noiselessly on Michelin rubber tires, but at present the air intakes at the bottom drag in hot air from the brakes; this deficiency is scheduled to be corrected before the coming summer.

The people of Montreal react to the spotless environment of their Metro by respecting it. No graffiti disfigure the walls. From New York's subway, recently described in a report to Mayor Lindsay as "the world's most squalid public environment," 30 tons of litter are removed daily. In Montreal's Metro the litter is measurable in pounds.

The existence of Mayor Drapeau's subway system was a key factor in the selection of Montreal as the site for the 1967 World's Fair. Expo is a well-deserved windfall for the city, bringing some $700 million to the town, and the fringe benefit of accelerated construction of freeways and bridges by national and provincial authorities. Occupying some 1,000 acres, with seventy foreign nations participating, Expo 67 is going to be by far the biggest of postwar expositions. It is the only first-class world's fair since Brussels. Seattle was a second-echelon effort, while the unrecognized wildcat New York World's Fair was heavily commercial and attracted only thirteen foreign nations.

The news of the Expo started immediate wild land speculation in the few areas considered suitable for the purpose, but Mayor Drapeau outwitted the speculators. Instead of expropriating land for clearance, he decided to create new land in the St. Lawrence by doubling the size of Ste Hélène's Island and building the entirely new island of Notre Dame. Rubble from the subway excavation was used and for months a heavy truck full of rock passed the Cartier Bridge every four minutes. Expo excels in its site. The Brussels and New York fairs were located far from downtown. By contrast, Expo visitors will view Montreal from its most impressive side; looking across the river, they will see the harbor with its majestic grain elevators, recently cleaned for the occasion, and beyond them the competing skyscrapers of the new core with the green hump of Mt. Royal in the background.

Facing the harbor on the narrow strip of Mackay pier are the administrative buildings of Expo, a theatre, a temporary museum, and the most extraordinary of Canada's thematic pavilions: Habitat 67. World exhibitions generally select a central theme; rather typically, both Seattle and New York chose to feature "outer space." Montreal responded with "Man and His World." Habitat 67, which will remain as permanent evidence of this concern, is a prefabricated experimental housing project that aims to "bring the most attractive features of suburban living space, privacy and greenery" to high-density urban housing. Its designer is 29-year-old Moshe Safdi, and the solution is based on Safdi's master's thesis at the McGill School of Architecture. It is a sign of the youthful exuberance of Montreal that this important commission went to a young man who had no experience but only ideas to offer.

Habitat is built up with prefabricated concrete boxes that support one another in a seemingly random arrangement, forming an "instant hill town" of 158 houses made up of 354 geometrically identical boxes. These are 38.5 feet long, 17.5 feet wide and 10 feet high, and weigh between 80 to 120 tons each. Three boxes are needed to form a three-bedroom "house," while one box suffices for an efficiency apartment. Each box has windows on more than one wall, and each unit opens to a large patio or garden on top of the lower boxes. Apartments are approached on "airways"—open corridors at the sixth and tenth level, the only ones served by the elevator. Units were cast on the site, equipped with kitchens and bathrooms, lifted into position by an enormous custom-built derrick, and bolted together to form a monolithic whole.

The resulting configuration is unusual and dramatic. Undoubtedly it will become a landmark of Montreal, as the Eiffel Tower symbolizes Paris and the Marina Towers have become one of the sights of Chicago. It is somewhat less successful as a "demonstration of the economic advantages of mass-produced housing" or as an "answer to growing world populations and dwindling land areas," because it is not very high-density, and it turned out to be shockingly expensive. The average apartment unit cost about $120,000, more than ten times the cost of a comparable apartment built by conventional methods. The high cost is inherent in the design since, depending upon the position of a box in the pile, the loads vary and nearly every box required different reinforcement. Prefabrication is successful only if a maximum of identical pieces can be cast; the 156 apartments of Habitat required 2,850 elements, and the largest set of identical pieces was six.

During Expo, the apartments of Habitat will rent to exhibitors for $350 to $750 a month, except for a few model apartments open to visitors. After the fair, the project will be sold to the highest bidder. Its market value seems to be around $5 million and this will leave $11 to $13 million to be written off as experiment. This is

United States Pavilion

Director Guy Gresford points out that a certain number of the developed nations, including the United States, have created their own committees on the problems of development. Also the committee has been able to identify the areas most important for early consideration. Now that it has completed its first phase, which it calls the general philosophical approach, the committee is turning to investigations in detail and in depth. For instance, a meeting on proteins is now at work in Rome, and its report is expected to be of immediate use in all the areas where food shortages are a problem.

Like so many of the heads of the specialized agencies, Mr. Gresford stresses that in spite of all that has been accomplished, the rich nations are getting richer and the poor nations are getting poorer. This growing imbalance is basic to future planning and it is therefore essential to evaluate the reaction of the developed nations—and particularly that of the United States, whose wealth places it in a class by itself.

On the face of it, the United States would seem to be an enthusiastic supporter for development of the backward areas. It has an unbroken record of being the largest contributor to the overall United Nations Development Program. In 1966, it made a voluntary contribution of $63 million. It has also supported the specialized agencies. Yet the total donation is relatively small, when compared with what the United States is doing on its own. And though the trend is beginning to change, the country, and particularly Congress, which appropriates the money, still tends to give aid in the form of "things," rather than make funds available to the longer-term investment of training and research. Ideally, the two should go together; it makes little sense to produce the engineers if there are no machines for them to operate.

It is also a serious stumbling block that the United States is deeply involved in its own economic development and expansion and needs all the scientists and engineers and doctors it can get. It, like the other developed countries, competes for brains and weans them from the poor countries with better salaries and better research opportunities. And, though it is often denied, there is good reason to suspect that the developed countries use their benevolence as a lever to pry advantageous trade relations from the poor nations; this is particularly the case with respect to oil and other natural resources. It can best be done if the technicians and scientists on the site are not citizens of the nation concerned. In short, it would seem that though the modern and developed countries are now more aware of the world problem, basically they are still thinking of their own futures.

On the other hand, the pressure constantly rises. The underprivileged, undernourished, undereducated and underdeveloped nations are ever more urgently demanding attention for their plight. If the developed nations ignore this trend they court disaster. These poor nations will win their economic freedom, whether by peaceful means or through violence and war. The primary resources of the United Nations today are being spent on establishing alternatives to potential explosion.

EDITORIALS (Continued from page 549)

tions on shore. Obviously the master must retain control of the movements of his ship in detail, but should there not be well-defined routes for tankers and other ships capable of causing regional disasters? Should not these routes be monitored from shore, so that an error in navigation on the ship could be corrected? By all indications, there is too much rampant individualism in this field, both in technique and economics. Instead of merely jacking up the insurance rates on tankers, an intensive effort should be made in the wake of the Torrey Canyon disaster to bring order out of the existing confusion.

Teaching Peace

Just at the hour when the New York Spring Mobilization was brought to a close by a sudden thundershower over United Nations Plaza, another kind of peace meeting concluded two days of "workshop" discussions in a far corner of the city. The Pacem in Terris Institute of Manhattan College, organized last year by faculty members of this modest-sized Roman Catholic institution for men, held its inaugural convocation on "education for peace"; more than 250 academics, from an impressive variety of disciplines and a fair selection of Eastern campuses, participated.

Purpose of the conference: to promote "a place in the curriculum . . . for the study of the nature and problems of peace." In other words, to make peace a "legitimate" subject for formal courses and lectures, rather than merely the object of extracurricular political interest. Some examples, at Manhattan: a three-credit course called "The Anatomy of Peace," given last semester by the history department; lectures by Tom T. Stonier, director of the Institute, on the effects of radiation and on group aggression, given in a general biology course; "The Philosophies of War and Peace," to be offered next year by the philosophy department. Stonier, a cancer researcher, author of Nuclear Disaster, and secretary of the Federation of American Scientists, hopes that the exchange and confrontations at the conference may serve as "a model for broadening the educational process."

The coincidental conflict of dates reflected, inadvertently, a divergence of opinion on the relative importance of academic and political peace-seeking. But the nature of the group itself was at least an interesting political expression of coexistence. Not many peace gatherings are likely to collect, along with liberal and radical college teachers, staff members from West Point and the Hudson Institute (including director Herman Kahn himself), leading European Communist philosophers (including Roger Garaudy of France and Mihailo Markovic of Yugoslavia), eminent theologians (such as John Courtney Murray and John Coleman Bennett), and even Pope Paul, represented in a special personal letter of encouragement to the convocation.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

The High Cost of Professionalism

THE ARTIST IN AMERICAN SOCIETY: The Formative Years, 1790-1860. By Neil Harris. George Braziller. 432 pp. $7.50.

ALAN TRACHTENBERG

Mr. Trachtenberg teaches English at The Pennsylvania State University. He is the author of Brooklyn Bridge: Fact and Symbol (Oxford University Press).

By "artist in American society" Neil Harris means the figure cut by the producer of visible art objects—how he sees himself and how he is seen. Social perception, not aesthetic, is the material of this excellent book, and while the immediate object of scrutiny is the shifting outlines of the artist figure, its ultimate image is America itself in its formative years. The Artist in American Society, "an inquiry into the relationship between a community's values and its culture," brings into the sharpest focus yet achieved by an American scholar the framework of arguments, opinions and rationalizations which has fixed the artist's pose in the eyes of his countrymen.

Neil Harris, a young member of the History Department at Harvard University, tells a familiar story, but the manner of the telling adds more to our historical knowledge than one might expect of a scholarly method alone. Borrowing judiciously from the social sciences, especially from the sociology of Max Weber, Harris poses his central question: "By what confluence of ideas and events did the work of the artist become legitimate work in America?" The process, as the author painstakingly reconstructs it, was fascinating and chilling, and left a permanent pattern of responses.

In the early years the arts were clearly on the defensive; post-Revolutionary America was dedicated to a plan of action and a definition of goals (mainly to achieve a state of national virtue and benevolence) inherently hostile to the politically irrelevant, economically useless and morally doubtful performances of the artist. He was on the fringes of a new society which lacked any obvious ways of welcoming him into the fold, unclear himself of his function, wavering uncertainly between thinking of himself as a creative genius (as defined by Joshua Reynolds) or only an artisan, deprived, so far, of great native themes for historical or allegorical canvases or statuary. Isolated not only from the centers of training in Europe but from the great works of art themselves—suspected as an agent of aristocratic taste and the luxury of sensory indulgence—the artist was far from a leading contestant for a starring role in the American success story.

But as the plot develops, it turns out to be a success story, of a sort, after all. By 1860, the artist had found an apparently comfortable institutional role in American life. Increasing wealth and leisure, the birth of a class of patrons (merchants and lawyers especially), and wider European travel provided Americans with the need and the intellectual means to clarify the artist figure as combining devotion to "beauty"—the spiritual component—with entrepreneurial common sense and conservative social values. Popularized versions of Transcendentalism filtered into the public mind enough notions to assemble a version of nationalism based on native art. The consummate sanction appeared in the closing years of the period as the clergy embraced artists as partners in the service of public morality. And on this uneasy scene Harris draws his curtain.

Thus American art got its legitimacy by becoming, for its patrons, its consumers and frequently its producers, a perfectly safe—even necessary—way of passing one's time. The major discovery between 1790 and 1860 was that art objects can have a "moral efficacy" and thereby serve as instruments of "social control." Its putative spiritual values (once the artist figure purged itself of romantic excesses) might help uphold the virtuous order of things. "The cause of art was captured," writes the author, "by energetic conservatives, eager to bolster their harmonious ideology." Artists themselves, while "weak and dependent upon private aid, were only too happy to aid in campaigns of moralism." The costs of professionalism turned out to be loss of the very ideals of freedom and creativity which drew many into art—certainly a familiar American story.

The legacy created in these formative years can be described as the making of, and the artist's surrender to, a genteel tradition. This legacy became the burdensome facts of life for later artists like Eakins, Ryder and Sullivan. But the story after 1860 is another chapter, and the fact that the reader closes this book with a sense of an unfinished story testifies to the author's remarkable ability to animate his subject. Harris manages to make his points almost entirely through the voices of his speakers, who include dozens of obscure patrons, travelers and journalists, as well as famous artists, writers and clergymen. His book is a feat of organization and insinuation. Such governing abstractions as Veblen's "conspicuous consumption" and Santayana's "genteel tradition" are not mentioned, yet assume a vibrancy and a much needed freshness.

Although the book has little aesthetic analysis of specific art works, it does demonstrate how certain forms and styles emerged from social pressures and interactions. It demonstrates the relevance of such matters as the politics of commissions, the artist's choice of a place to live (city or country? which city? what street?), the availability of materials, the perils and turmoils of European travel. It relates the "strident realism" of American portraiture to the "occupational defensiveness" of artists and their social need to demonstrate mastery of literal representation. Harris persuades us that styles do not simply "happen," nor are they mystical emanations of national traits, but are, at least in part, the result of discernible social processes.

Most of all, The Artist in American Society persuades us of its own importance. Controversies about art are controversies about the most critical issues of community life and destiny. Not that Harris holds that art possesses a sentimental value as "high culture." "In the deepest sense," he reminds us, "art's ultimate legitimization—its ability to exist without one—was never achieved in nineteenth-century America." But insofar as a radically noninstrumental activity, such as art, challenged a highly instrumental minded society for a place therein, the history of the challenge records a crucial passage in the psyche of that society. Harris stops short of a full articulation of this issue, but I am not sure this is a fault; it may be the reader's own problem to bring the work's finest implications to the surface.

The book's virtually "dramatic" method avoids overt argument, and in effect invites the reader to participate in the dialectic of not-so-old controversies. The method does have a shortcoming. While it succeeds brilliantly in tracing the social and political conformations of Andrew Jackson Downing's thought, and his conservative uses of Transcendentalism, it does poorly in failing to indicate that that philosophy was also a serious body of thought, more than a group of socially relevant opinions. To associate Emerson and Thoreau with "beauty crusades" and "commitment to beautification" may expose a public misuse of ideas half understood, but fails to evaluate the independent power and scope of the ideas themselves. Yet, after all, the book does not set out to do this. It is vital, fresh and firm, and we could hardly ask for more.

who was remarkable for her outstanding moral qualities, who greatly loved the orphaned child, but who unwisely if unconsciously sought to dominate the children's moral outlook. Marriage itself seems to have thrown her into considerable perturbation; and she opposed Bertrand's marriage as injudiciously as she had his father's. "This gave me an uncanny feeling," is Russell's significant comment, "that I was not living my own life but my father's over again. . . ." Sharing a common mother with one's father must have a very unsettling effect on one's sense of identity, a subject which has greatly interested Russell in its logical aspects but not in its psychological ones.

The love of truth is the greatest of virtues. It calls for both courage and humility, and Russell esteems it very highly. He, too, is not without humility, while his courage is beyond question. Throughout his long life he has rarely ceased to assail those in power for sacrificing justice, equality and freedom to the claims of power. At the age of 91, he went uncomplaining to prison—not for the first time—in defiance of the government's nuclear "defense" depravities. By so doing he earned the profound respect and gratitude of multitudes opposing evil throughout the world. Courage of a rather different order is required, however, to state publicly the truth about oneself as distinct from the truth about public affairs. Earl Russell, by the extreme candor of his confessions concerning his sexual relations in the period down to 1914, compels us to wonder why he has chosen to publish these facts. Russell himself would doubtless echo Bishop Butler: "Things and actions are what they are, and their consequences will be what they will be; why then should we seek to be deceived?" If confession is good for the soul, presumably public confession that is sincere is even better. But although Russell's account of his relations with women, particularly with an unnamed American girl, frequently makes harsh and painful reading, there is no hint of contrition expressed. Sorrow on one occasion, but not contrition. His first wife is criticized on the ground that notwithstanding her great qualities, she was malicious, insincere and untruthful—grave charges—but she is nowhere enabled to speak on her own behalf.

The publishers claim that the book will establish itself as a classic, bearing comparison with Rousseau's celebrated Confessions in its freedom from inhibition. Here, it would seem to be implied, in the interests of truth,

Russell in His Prime

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF BERTRAND RUSSELL, 1872-1914. Little, Brown & Co. 356 pp. $7.95.

RONALD SAMPSON

Mr. Sampson is a lecturer in politics at the University of Bristol (England). His most recent book is The Psychology of Power (Pantheon).

Volume 1 of Earl Russell's autobiography is a straightforward, factual account of his first 42 years, lavishly anecdotal in style and amply documented with Cambridge "apostles" and the London Fabians, and on the history of professional British philosophy in the crucial phase when the idealism of the Hegelians gave way to the empiricism of the mathematical logicians.

Bertrand Russell had the grave misfortune to be orphaned before he was out of the nursery, so that he has no memory of his mother and only the barest recollection of his father. His father, son of the Prime Minister, Lord John Russell, caused great scandal by a public-spirited attempt to ventilate birth control. He detested his wife, one of whose papers he was notable for his ability to read and her ability to write.

His first wife was a blow to his pride. He was further humiliated by his father's consideration of the girl or acquiring the other "grannie" nothing is suppressed. If the warts portrayed are painful to behold, they bespeak at least the subjugation of vanity. Painful external facts are relentlessly recorded, it is true—the candor is admirable—but evidence concerning the much more important matter of the inner spiritual condition productive of the external facts is generally lacking in comparable candor. Earl Russell reveals, for instance, his mother's tragic and seemingly passionless adultery with the tutor of her eldest child while fatally ill of consumption, in the comparatively short period that elapsed between Bertrand's birth and her own death.

What he does not record is the great pain that this discovery concerning his mother must have caused him. His grandparents, when they made this posthumous discovery, reacted, he says, with "the utmost Victorian horror"—stuffy old puritans! But that most certainly could not have been his own manner of viewing it at the time. Nor do we merely have to infer this from our knowledge of the rigorous moral culture in which he was reared. We have his own avowal of his state of mind at the age of 16: "I became very Puritanical in my views, and decided that sex without deep love is beastly." And on marriage at the age of 22, he was at pains to assure himself that there was no element of lust in his love for his betrothed.

Precisely because Russell is sincere in his desire to record the truth about himself, failure at this point suggests that the emotions were so painful that they were relegated deep into the unconscious. His reference in a quite different context to his dreaming that he discovered his mother "to be mad, not dead, and that, on this ground, I felt it my duty not to marry," suggests a possibly different interpretation from the one which he himself puts upon it. Madness after all is a sufficient defense against badness. Russell belongs to a generation that was too early to be able to assimilate the painful truths of Freud. His book contains but two brief references to "Freudians"—a defiant challenge to make what they can out of a trifling, irrelevant episode, and a reference of unconcealed hostility to a psychoanalyst in a social context where he had the best of reasons for feeling guilty.

On the slender evidence available it is not possible adequately to understand the root causes of Russell's adult behavior. But it demands explanation. Himself a passionate moralist, his quest for love is so compulsive (and self-defeating)

PROGRESS

Confronting Vital Issues of Our Time

THE POLITICS OF COEXISTENCE Soviet Methods and Motives

by MICHAEL P. GEHLEN

Changing world conditions and domestic conflicts have forced the Soviet Union to revise traditional Marxist doctrines on foreign policy. Gehlen analyzes Soviet policies toward capitalist, neutralist, and Communist states in their ideological, political, military, and economic aspects. In relations with the West, he finds, the Russians have taken few serious risks. (Indiana University International Studies)

352 PAGES

$6.75

WILLIAM C. BULLITT AND THE SOVIET UNION

by BEATRICE FARNSWORTH

An engrossing account of Bullitt's stormy and controversial career in the diplomatic service between 1914 and 1945. Focusing on his role in Soviet-American relations during the Wilson and Roosevelt administrations, the book traces the process whereby Bullitt's political experiences gradually extinguished his hopes for a brave new world to follow the first World War. A fascinating portrait and an important chapter in diplomatic history. (Indiana University International Studies)

256 PAGES

$7.50

CONFLICT RESOLUTION AND WORLD EDUCATION

Edited by STUART MUDD

Creative thinking drawn from many disciplines and doctrines is imaginatively assembled in this volume to throw light on the most urgent problem of this century—the peaceful resolution of international conflict. Distinguished scientists and humanists probe the causes of conflict on many levels, ranging from antagonism in the animal world to the legal machinery for resolving international disputes, and explore the exciting possibilities of establishing a World University. (Published for the World Academy of Art and Science)

286 PAGES
$6.75

PROGRESS

INDIANA UNIVERSITY PRESS
Tenth & Morton Streets • Bloomington, Indiana 47401 BLOOMINGTON • LONDON

that he appears inordinately blind to his own relentless egoism. His contempt for what he would term the puritan view of love and marriage, takes no regard for a woman's profound need for emotional security in a relation so crucial that it may at any time become the source of new life. And the effects of emotional insecurity and deprivation of love on a child should be abundantly apparent to one whose own childhood bore eloquent and pathetic witness to the loneliness experienced when bereft of parental love.

The correspondence, laid bare in this volume, as already indicated, is rich in the variety of topics touched upon, and makes absorbing reading. Russell's own inimitable dry irony, wit, humanity and sadness, are clearly revealed. But they also betray a restless, febrile quality that fails to command the most serious attention. In a letter from Chelsea he writes to Gilbert Murray in 1902: "Modern life is very difficult: I wish I lived in a cloister wearing a hair shirt and sleeping on a crucifix." A fortnight later he writes from Florence (December 28): "The house has been furnished by Berenson with exquisite taste; it has some very good pictures, and a most absorbing library."

who understands his problem. He says:

The paralysis of doing nothing had caught up with us little by little, and the farther we strayed from reality the more helplessly we drowned . . . moral energy that remains unused turns into neurasthenia. The contrast between the subject and painting, dreams and reality, is so dizzying that people like Rafael, Ricardo and me eventually doubt our own sense. I said we were slowly going crazy, and I didn't see how the process could be stopped. I said all this mechanically, as if someone else were talking. Ana looked at me with her beautiful dark eyes, and now and then nodded. "Sleep, darling. We'll talk tomorrow."

But this turns out to be a whine, not a resolution. The lawyer hasn't the guts to wholeheartedly love either his wife or the girl, and his self-absorption makes him fail to respond to a poor man's plea for help.

The third story is about a couple who take on vacation with them the unsettled issue of letters between the wife and a lover. He claims to forgive her, and both are polite, even solicitous. But he hates her. She in turn suffers guilt and despises him; subtly she rejects him. He tries to bait her into further infidelity. She despises him more. They go on testing and wounding each other until they reach a peace that promises to be mere armed truce.

The fourth story is told by a man who has lived in France for some years and now returns to Spain to visit the companion of his youth. The friend has married a charming bitch with a fag-moll mentality—never possessed, never possessing enough to satisfy her. The husband has become bitter, ironic, withdrawn; he is half his wife's lackey and half her sniping enemy, unable either to quit or win. His brilliant scholarly career is at a standstill. The house is full of hangers-on who are agonizingly fashionable and banal, upper-middle-class collectors of Bessie Smith records who try to sleep with the peasant tenants and envy their "real life close to the soil." The story is a meticulous chronicle of human waste and the perversion of life. Everyone lives in a prison of spurned challenges, silly chatter, cynicism and masked anger. The visitor returns to France, to freedom of the heart.

At the end of each story, the title tolls with icy, unsparing irony; the subtitle becomes pins that hold four grotesque, wriggling insects on a mounting board. There are no winners in this book, among rich or poor, husbands or wives, old or young. It has become clear that the identical absence taints politics and love in Spain, giving both the angry incompleteness of masturbation. In both, real feel-

Definitions of Love

THE PARTY'S OVER. By Juan Goytisolo. Translated by Jose Yglesias. Grove Press. 188 pp. $3.95.

ARNO KARLEN

Mr. Karlen writes fiction and criticism. He is the author of a book of short stories, White Apples (Lippincott).

Juan Goytisolo, like his characters, grew up amid mute anger and futility. He was born into Spain's small comfortable class in 1931 in Barcelona. He came of age in a land of absences and avoidance, where men are poisoned by their unspent lives, knowing that authentic acts mean grave trouble. Goytisolo studied law at the Universities of Barcelona and Madrid, but gave it up for writing when, at 21, he saw his first book published. The Young Assassins was about middle-class delinquents such as he'd known at school—like many adolescents all over the world, vengeful toward a society that had surfeited them with everything but love and purpose. A gang of youths arbitrarily plot the assassination of a minor politician, ~~trick~~ the least violent among them into the job, murder him for failing, and break up in mutual betrayal. Like Salinger, Goytisolo used disaffected youth to expose the "phonies" of the older generation; unlike Salinger, he knew that the unloved cannot love, that the youth are not pure but themselves corrupted by their parents' emotional and moral bankruptcy. They are deprived souls, and their gesture is one of unfocused anger, not of reform or even indignation. Although the author denied political intent, and the book was not explicitly critical of the government, it was cut by censors.

Goytisolo's next books, La Resaca (The Undertow) and Fiestas, had to be published in Argentina. Fiestas was about children, shanty-town poor, outcasts, and the pious villainy of a church and state that refuse to admit their existence except to repress them. Another book, Children of Chaos, was about children brutalized by the Civil War; it too displeased the censors. In 1957, Goytisolo moved to France, where he has lived and worked ever since.

In Island of Women he stopped writing about the young. He told what the older "phonies" are like among themselves, rather than as their children see them. The characters are members of Spain's dolce vita set. They live on casual, angry sex; on alcohol; on sleeping pills; on fads; on play-acted emotion; on anything that will give them a moment's surcease from impotent self-hatred, staled ideals and soured affections.

The Party's Over—beautifully translated by Jose Yglesias—carries the same theme a step further in artistic refinement. The subtitle reads: "Four Attempts To Define a Love Story," and each section is about a summer vacation of the wealthy in Spain. The first is told by a youth in an Andalusian fishing village that has become a resort town, and describes its disruption by a visiting Swedish couple. The Swedes's marriage is a shambles; they drink a lot; the wife sleeps with the narrator's friend; the husband weeps or withdraws. The natives are narrow, bigoted, twisted by their poverty and by the Mediterranean tradition of machismo; they have turned into parasites, panders and studs to the tourists. The ending is inconclusive. Nothing has changed the misery of the Swedes or the intolerance and ignorance of the peasants.

The second story is about a prosperous, liberally inclined lawyer, his wife and a young girl infatuated with him. The lawyer is the only character in the book ings are best unspoken—or, safer still, unfelt. The corruption of the dictatorship has reached everywhere, from statute to bed. The situation is hopeless because the enemy is no longer a man or party but a society that has adapted—under duress, or out of exhaustion or in despair. People live both public and private lives like frantic somnambulists, not daring to awaken and pronounce the enemy's real name. In a land where so few are privileged, who would do so and chance losing privilege? Risk re-enacting a lost war? Love alone among the unfeeling? The men and women, like the rich and poor, suspect and exploit one another. The husbands are weak cheats, the women cunning and consuming bitches. They sandpaper one another's nerves, encouraging infidelity to justify their own cold hate; even their miserable confessions are frauds perpetrated upon themselves. It is in this world that the angry children of Goytisolo's early books grew up, never knowing what frank feeling is, or loyalty to people and ideas.

Goytisolo claims to be nonpolitical, and politics is not directly discussed by him or his characters. Instead of explaining, he brings to life. His callous rich live by fads, hypocrisy, self-centeredness and desperation; his brutalized poor find relief in tormenting those a little worse off than themselves. He is a master of indirection at showing the gap between social reality and its official versions, and the parallel gaps between marriage and sex and love. His genius is not polemic or documentary but in his power of magical portraiture.

It is a respectable cliché of critics and teachers that novelistic genius lies in the selection of details. But an artist does not edit reality; he creates it. When he must construct on paper a personality, a human climate, he must do so with his imagination, not by winnowing down a card file of information. In fiction, the dialogue, landscape and incident work as metaphors do in verse. Goytisolo's skill at inventing economical, suggestive details makes him a delight for other writers to read. His prose is cool, controlled, compact. The color of the sky, a boat being rowed, a snatch of conversation, a silence—all work like the techniques of perspective painting, where manipulating the surface creates a whole dimension in depth.

Goytisolo is still young, as novelists go, and still growing in the clarity of his vision, the force of his feeling and intellectual focus, the precision and power of his means. They are the gifts with which he promises to become one of the major world novelists of his generation.

Experts tell the China story— a case of evolution toward revolution

John King Fairbank CHINA

The People's Middle Kingdom and the U.S.A.

Any hope of understanding what molds China's modern revolution and its meaning to the rest of the world lies in a knowledge of her long past. One of today's foremost experts on Asia, author of the widely-acclaimed UNITED STATES AND CHINA, and a leading witness at the Senate Foreign Relations Committee hearings on China in 1966, provides a much-needed historical view of the "Middle Kingdom," as the Chinese traditionally call their country. In this book Mr. Fairbank expands on the major themes of his testimony, which received world-wide attention, and, in the light of his historical knowledge, illuminates present Maoist aims, the Taiwan problem, and U.S. policy toward Communist China.

Belknap. $3.95

Benjamin I. Schwartz

CHINESE COMMUNISM AND THE RISE OF MAO

6th printing

"Based in large part on Chinese and Communist sources.... In these pages [Schwartz] presents Mao and his movement as they probably are. Those of us who wonder where the world is going would do well to read this book." — The Washington Post
Russian Research Center Studies, 4. $5.50

IN SEARCH OF WEALTH AND POWER

Yen Fu and the West

"Professor Schwartz has applied the same brilliance . . . he brought to the study of Mao Tse-tung's evolution [above] . . . His book is an analytical biography of Yen-Fu (1853-1921) . . . explores with great perception all the ideas which excited Yen . . . For an understanding of the unresolved conflict between Chinese civilization and the outside world this study is no less illuminating and important than his analysis of Mao."

—The Times Literary Supplement.
Belknap. $5.95

HARVARD UNIVERSITY PRESS

TELEVISION / John Horn

Mr. Horn covers television daily for the Publishers Newspaper Syndicate, and theatre and popular entertainment for the weekly Rockland Independent. He has been television critic-reporter for the New York Herald Tribune, Variety and the New York Star, and a field producer on Edward R. Murrow's Person to Person.

With the majority of set owners voting against television's massive inanity by keeping screens dark most of the time, it is necessary these days to sound an alert when programing of merit appears in the offing. Such an event is Part II of the Senate Communications Subcommittee hearings, chaired by Sen. John Pastore (D., R.I.) on the Magnuson bill for public television, April 25 through 28.

Part I heard the noncommercial sector of American television—members of National Educational Television (NET), the National Association of Educational Broadcasters, the Ford Foundation, the Carnegie Commission on Educational Television, et al.—from April 11 through 14. Part II covers commercial television interests with taped highlights of the subcommittee hearings being telecast in prime-time hours by the NET network over some seventy affiliated stations.

"The future of noncommercial broadcasting in the United States is at stake in these hearings," says NET programing vice president, William H. Kobin. "The course it takes will affect all of broadcasting. The public interest is deeply involved." Those still stubborn and tenacious enough to cling to the view that television can be rescued as a potential national resource owe themselves a look.

What will be most instructive in the Part II hearings will be the pattern of attack commercial broadcasters mount against the central issue—the moving issue—in Sen. Warren G. Magnuson's bill, S. 1160. No quarrel is expected over extension and improvement of grants for noncommercial radio and television facility construction, or over authorization for a study of instructional television, or the establishment of a non-profit, noncommercial Public Television Corporation—though there may be some grumbling about the "political" complexion of the corporation's board of directors, to be appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate.

But a no-holds-barred alley fight is anticipated on the big question: who is to pay for public television? The Carnegie Commission foresees an ultimate annual public television budget of more than $100 million. Where will the money come from?

The Ford Foundation hitches the financial wagon for its more limited noncommercial network plan to a domestic communications satellite restricted to television, with commercial users paying disproportionately high fees to finance the noncommercial. The Carnegie Commission proposes an excise tax on TV sets, no doubt to be passed along to the public. But the public has already invested $20 billion in sets and is spending $2 billion annually. One lone, dissenting Carnegie commissioner, Joseph H. McConnell, a former N.B.C. president, thinks commercial television and advertisers should be taxed. That is the heresy that commercial television spokesmen will be denouncing.

The suggestion that commercial television should subsidize noncommercial television would have been laughed out of the court of public opinion five or more years ago. But in those days, television's promise was still believed, and the networks had not clearly embarked on a steady decline of program quality in pursuit of audience quantity. The current, regularly scheduled nighttime programs of the three national networks are overwhelmingly absurd twaddle. And the "give the public what it wants" philosophy, publicly espoused by all the network programing vice presidents a year and a half ago, has proved as fallacious in America as England's Pilkington report described it to be in 1962:

A service which caters only for majorities can never satisfy all, or even most of the needs of any individual. It cannot, therefore, satisfy all the needs of the public.

No one can say he is giving the public what it wants unless the public knows the whole range of possibilities which television can offer and, from this range, chooses what it wants to see. For a choice is only free if the field of choice is not unnecessarily restricted. . . .

"To give the public what it wants" is a misleading phrase, because it appears to appeal to democratic principle but does not. In fact, the slogan is "patronizing and arrogant" in that it claims to know what the public is, but defines it as no more than the mass audience.

If there is a sense in which the phrase may be used it is this: . . . what the public wants and what it has the right to get is the freedom to choose from the widest possible range of program matter. Anything less is deprivation.

The writer, David Karp, who did at one time get quality drama on the air, has summed up the basic aim and meaning of American commercial television: "TV shows are not supposed to be good. They are supposed to make money."

And money the networks have made. In 1965, according to Dr. Hyman H. Goldin of the Carnegie Commission, "network television billings were $338 million for A.B.C., $492 million for C.B.S. and $430 million for N.B.C. In the same year, advertising revenues for Life, Time and Look combined were $323 million." That year the Federal Communications Commission announced that the television industry was reporting almost $2 billion in total broadcast revenues and $447.9 million in pre-tax profits. The three networks and their owned and operated stations had pre-tax profits of $161.6 million.

Last year the trade magazine, Broadcasting, reported that radio and television had "more billings than in any other year of either's history," and estimated television's total billings to be up by 8 per cent.

Dr. Goldin estimates the budget of noncommercial television at 3 per cent of the aforementioned $2 billion. As long

GERMANY Through American Eyes

Impressions of a group of writers and editors who visited Germany earlier this year . . . what surprised — interested — disappointed — or disturbed:

Daniel P. Moynihan Harvey Swados
Richard Rovere Midge Decter
Diana Trilling George P. Elliott
Irving Kristol Stanley Kauffmann
Robert Manning

At Your Newsstand
NOW

Also: THE BATTLE OF
THE DEAD SEA SCROLLS
Another look — New discoveries

as the commercial and noncommercial branches of television are equally promising in their individual roles, such comparisons were not stressed. But the Carnegie Commission report, while refraining from explicit criticism, has condemned commercial television by implication: "Television has been fashioned into a miraculous instrument. The opportunity is at hand to turn the instrument to the best uses of American society, and to make it of new and increased service to the general public." To speak of impending miracles after almost twenty years of commercial television is to confess failure on a colossal scale.

An appraisal of American television, both commercial and noncommercial, is long overdue. Is the present dual system the one we really want? Shall we continue to condone the enormously lucrative milking of the public air waves (record network profits are being transferred into non-regulated businesses), while noncommercial and educational television subsists on handouts from private and government sources?

Our need is great and it is twofold: we should have a national noncommercial alternative to what the commercial suppliers now call entertainment—a service that would aspire to excellence instead of seeking the lowest basic appeal—and we should have solidly financed educational broadcasting on local, regional and network levels. Where are we to get the money, if not from the commercial operators and the advertisers? They are now using the air as though it belonged to them; indeed, they are the richest squatters in history, and we should consider charging them rent.

The question of long-range financing of public television does not actually come up for a year (a first-year sum of $9 million is proposed to get the corporation going) but the war of the air begins with the battle of April 25-28.

PHOTOGRAPHY / Max Kozloff

There has been much comment upon what the so-called "New American Cinema," and its sometime counterpart, serious American photography, aspire to, in the way of aesthetic impulse, as they grapple with our common experience in an anti-establishment context. But it is essential to see in a certain mutual iconography — Hell's Angels, campy, jewel-laden men and women, a fetishism of the skin, visceral or glutinous glances at fruit and meat, social estrangement—not so much a revelation of actuality as a harboring of special inclination, clichés masquerading as protest. On the one hand, these can be farfetched and erotic, but there is a whole school that tends, rather, to elevate the commonplace, the isolated, the transient, the trivial, the incidental, as if these were the real components that made up the American scene. Above all, the themes of abstracted faces in the crowd, of vacant, highly reflective or mirrored surfaces, catching in their planes only the vacuity of the life around them, a haunted loneliness and grotesquerie—such themes, fusing together in a kind of pointless, chance-ridden profusion, provide much of the material to which ambitious young photographers have addressed themselves.

They are, of course, clichés in their own right, stereotyped even when accidental. Yet, for the very reason of having insisted upon them in their obvious accessibility, a group of energetic and imaginative "social documenters" has forced us to reassess the temper and meaning of walking the streets of our cities. Such a development in photography has a dual origin. On one hand there is its own prior history, which is rampant with amateurs, snapshotters and candid photographers, who have unquestionably affected the way the urban and rural ambience rearranges and disports itself under the ultra-mobile camera gaze. On the other hand, there are larger cultural implications which seem to have come, partly from a view of America that has crystallized from Pop art, partly from the viewpoint of certain foreign observers of our scene. Already in the 1950s, Simone de Beauvoir, in America Day by Day, commented in repeated astonishment on the plethora of mirrors that everywhere confronted her in this country. About the same time, Robert Frank, a Swiss photographer who traveled the States on a Guggenheim fellowship, purveyed a sad and pungent scrutiny of the familiar, in terms of the unreal, the anomic, the mindlessness of a wayward technology, and a vastness of landscape, in which people still seem to be camping, instead of having long ago settled. In the view of François Reichenbach, who made, the film L'Amérique Insolite (1960), the very instability of American existence could be examined in terms of liturgies: beauty contests, rodeos, strip teasers, water-skiing, baton twirlers, etc., all

The Political Illusion

Has our passion for politics, and for "politicizing" everything, spawned a strange new world—a world of interlocking illusions—in which we are willingly trapped?

Do we live in a peculiar political trance in which we insist that the state be omnipotent, and expect it to solve all our problems, although in most cases it couldn't—even if it tried?

"In the 17th century we could have written of the comic illusion", says France's distinguished sociologist, Jacques Ellul, on the opening page of his devastating diagnosis (and prognosis) of modern life. "In our day the illusion has become tragic."

The Political Illusion

by Jacques Ellul

author of The Technological Society and Propaganda
Translated from the French,
with a Foreword, by Konrad Kellen

$8.95 • now at better bookstores
ALFRED • A • KNOFF

observed as if by some fabulous anthropologist. And, in a current exhibition of three young photographers—Gary Winogrand, Lee Friedlander and Diane Arbus—at the Museum of Modern Art, these liturgies, though sometimes unrecognizably broken down, still seem to inform, in fact, give remarkable life, to glimpses of our time and place.

What these photographers have in common is a complete loss of faith in the mass media as vehicle, or even market for their work. Newsiness, from the journalistic point of view, and "stories," from the literary one, in any event, do not interest them. They have long since agreed with the innocent message of Philip Roth, in his famous article, "Writing American Fiction" (Commentary, March, 1961), in which he despairs of the power of current fiction to surpass the incredibility of the American scene itself, a scene that had elected Eisenhower as its President. Now we have movie stars and racist restaurant owners for governors, and the novelists can't possibly invoke the look of an atmosphere that could ever have permitted them.

Photographs, being mute and visual, tend to abstract or give a curiously immobilized, arrested quality to the situation as it impinges upon us. In place of the Farm Security Administration photographs, perhaps the most archetypal visualizations of the American reality in the thirties, we now have Elliot Erwitt's empty Fontainebleau Hotel hall in Miami, with its swirled vinyl floor and its maddeningly floral-lattice wallpaper. What is caught superbly well is the latent, as well as the outright, hysteria and violence that immediately affect a viewer on his first visit, or after a long separation from these shores. Of course, novels like Selby's Last Exit to Brooklyn, can literally spell it out; and television, like a kinescoped Selma march, can drench us with it at its most hateful. But the photographs are, in the end, the more frightening because they are the more "unexplained" in their extrapolations from a reality too absurd and formless to confront in its whole.

One does not look at a photograph with the attentiveness and resources with which one encounters an ambitious painting. But it is nevertheless true that the photograph shares with painting the authority, direct or indirect, of the author's particular willfulness. In its special form of consciousness, camera work theoretically lies between fiction, with its narrative techniques, and painting, with its metaphoric ones.

Whenever photography transgresses this territory and moves toward the literary, it opens itself up to adverse criticism. Such would be Gary Winogrand's image of a little boy, bedecked with Mickey Mouse hat, traipsing through a Forest Lawn-like cemetery, in tow behind his mother. I do not quarrel with the mordancy or the justice of the comment, but with the fact that it is a comment, and, however caught by happenstance, a calculated one at that. Here the documentary is transcended by the didactic, with the effect of putting me, at least, in reverse emotional gear. There is a patness about such a situation, too quick and easy an invitation to see it as a foible. Similarly, I react negatively to all those scenes of muted despair, designed, it seems, to reveal the photographer's special sensitivity to the social attrition of American life. How mechanical an attitude it is to frame people in their habitual stances of boredom, distraction and vulgarity. It is a banal tripping of the shutter, with diminishing literary returns.

For all the sinuous nicety in the way he zones the countryside, Andrew Wyeth is the most celebrated perpetrator of this literary cliché, this stylized candor. It is not necessary to argue how much Wyeth (whose retrospective concluded recently at the Whitney Museum) has been affected by photography in structuring his pictorial apparatus. His (not so much respect for, but) indulgence in factuality has about it the incriminating cast of illustration. And yet, as Lawrence Alloway lately reaffirms, how insufferably pretentious are the symbolic aspirations of this farmyard soothsayer as he attempts to translate his isolated turfs and gnarled physiognomies into statements about man's condition, or at the very least, nostalgically sums up the spirit of a whole terrain. In their stiffish dignity, or aged pathos, his Negroes are particularly bad examples of a false consciousness that mollifies the uneasy prejudices of his middle-class audience. The effect of Wyeth's work is paternalistic, frequently in respect to his subjects, and almost always in its "reflex jabbing" (Alloway) at its spectators. The same goes for the more subtle of his affinities with photography: those overhead views and turned backs, coquettish, accidental shadows, "clever" cropping; the magnified pores of skin, the crumpled weeds, frayed curtains intimately seen, and preciously empty house corners. All these details are manipulated by an eye for sentimental pungency, just as photographers may lie in wait for similar subjects, like duck shooters for their prey. Studied or unstudied, these effects are alienating because they refuse to acknowledge their own premises, their own slightly vapid seriousness, concealed as a modesty of tone.

Without denying that there have been splendid examples of this genre in photography, without imputing dishonorable intentions to their creators or neglecting the extent that they have enriched the whole field, one turns with relief to an opposite or alternative mode in the medium. I mean that attitude which will always see spontaneity as inherently compromised, and which leans deliberately and unashamedly toward the controlled and the monumental, admitting, as it does so, the immobilized condition that photography imposes upon its motifs. Doubtless, this too is a cliché, or certainly a convention vulnerable to the judgment that it is out of keeping with the nominally intimate scale of photography. There have been as many mistakes in it, as many pretenses, as in the opposite style. In fact, they have a tendency to be more self-evident. However, the hieratic freezing of images has a reputable history. Quite aside from Brady, I can cite the recently published photos of Frances Johnson "document-

The Nation

SUBSCRIBERS' BOOK SERVICE

Offers the following at discount prices:

- | | Price |
|--|--------|
| <input type="checkbox"/> FRIENDSHIP AND FRATRICIDE: An Analysis of Whittaker Chambers and Alger Hiss by Dr. Meyer A. Zeligs (Viking, $8.95) | $7.15 |
| <input type="checkbox"/> THE NAKED IMAGE: Observations on the Modern Theatre by Harold Clurman (Macmillan, $6.50) | $5.20 |
| <input type="checkbox"/> DE GAULLE: A Political Biography by Alexander Werth (Simon and Schuster, $7.50) | $6.00 |
| <input type="checkbox"/> COLLECTED SHORTER POEMS of Kenneth Rexroth (New Directions, $7.50) | $6.00 |
| <input type="checkbox"/> LIBERATION OF THE JEW by Albert Memmi. Translated from the French (Grossman, $4.95) | $3.96 |
| <input type="checkbox"/> THE PSYCHOLOGY OF POWER by Ronald Sampson (Pantheon, $4.95) | $3.96 |

Remittance accompanying orders should be made payable to THE NATION, 333 6th Ave., N.Y. 10014

- ☐ Payment enclosed ☐ Please bill me

Readers can avail themselves of our regular offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S. at the retail price post-free. When ordering, please give title, author and publisher, if possible.

ing" (but more apparently, abstracting) the life of Negroes at the Hampton Institute (1900). Its chief European exponent was Eugene Atget. And its antecedents in painting go as far back as Piero della Francesca, though it is more relevant to think of its efflorescence in the thirties in the work of Paul Strand, Walker Evans and Dorothea Lange. Edward Hopper, for his part, inflected it with particular authority in his easel paintings. At their best, photographers of this persuasion have overcome embarrassment at the frozen, posed look of their images. On the contrary, formal control is as essential to their aesthetic, as accident is to their colleagues. In the work of Diane Arbus, this calculated frontality comes to have a striking modernity.

If Winogrand, from his moving car, lays claim to a reality that seems almost to have been inadvertently stopped in its tracks (the next instant might change it entirely), Arbus wants to heighten reality by its overt solicitation of response. Her transvestites and widows and nudists and Puerto Ricans look out upon us unflinchingly, as though, if not to countenance, to challenge the prurience of the photographic act. The psychological complexity of experiencing these photos has been acutely analyzed by Marion Magid in the current Arts magazine: "One does not look," she says, "with impunity, as anyone knows who has ever stared at the sleeping face of a familiar person and discovered its strangeness. Once having looked and not looked away, we are implicated. When we have met the gaze of a midget or a female impersonator, a transaction takes place between the photograph and the viewer. In a kind of healing process, we are cured of our criminal urgency by having dared to look. The picture forgives us, as it were, for looking. In the end, the great humanity of Diane Arbus' art is to sanctify that privacy which she seems at first to have violated."

Not only has the maimed or aberrated subject consented to be observed but in effect he seems to have gained a curious aplomb through being observed. Arbus' refusal to be compassionate, her revulsion against moral judgment, lends her work an extraordinary ethical conviction. The glazed eye of Lee Friedlander's television set, playing in an empty room, is not more meaningful than Arbus' hair-curlered fairy, returning our scrutiny, nor is it less of a "set-up"—though it pretends not to be. It does not have that urgent complicity by which the Arbus photo produces in us its characteristic shiver. These unflinching American personages, who are altered by what seem to be glandular disturbances, kinky exhibitionism and general malaise, have the peculiar quality, as the exhibition director, John Szarkowski, has noted, of displacing neurosis onto the unexpected large quotient of "normal" people in her gamut of types. And if they do that, they have also by implication the capacity to impute the same condition to their beholders. This too, is the American reality, but a reality that has risen from the status of cliché to that of hideous insight.

THEATRE / Robert Pasolli

Washington, D.C.

Until last summer when the Chichester Festival production of Armstrong's Last Goodnight made its author into a popular and critical success, John Arden had been England's most disprized major living playwright. Even more prolific than Albee, Arden had written seven full-length plays in ten years, plus three radio or television plays, an adaptation from Goethe, and two plays in collaboration with his wife, Margaretta D'Arcy. (This is taken from the production record and does not include unproduced work, if indeed there is any.) All the major plays before Armstrong had been more or less flops d'estime, to borrow John Russell Taylor's observation on the first Royal Court production of Serjeant Musgrave's Dance. This is to say that Arden's plays had created for their author partisans who, incidentally, were vindicated in the success of Armstrong. In America, where Musgrave was a flop d'estime and Live Like Pigs a flop plain, Arden is yet to emerge from the relative chill of admiration by university and theatre workshop coteries into the warm sun of popular and critical reception. Apparently a major American production of Armstrong's Last Goodnight is needed to bring that off.

Arden's ability to attract partisans no doubt kept him from being finished off early in his career; more than that, it provided the clearest indication before Armstrong that Arden could emerge as a major dramatist of our time. For partisanship is prophetic in that the disciple's unwillingness to admit of defects in his subject attests to the greater power of the subject's virtues. In Arden's case, the

Just Published

How 88,648 Heavy Smokers Stopped Smoking

NEW YORK—The Anti-Tobacco Center of America has just published a booklet which explains how 88,648 heavy smokers (of whom many are physicians) have stopped smoking without straining their will power. This booklet is available free of charge to smokers. All you need to do, to obtain it, is to send your name and address to The Anti-Tobacco Center of America, Dept. A-31-H, 366 Fifth Avenue, New York 1, New York. This offer is open while the supply of these booklets lasts.

AAACAAACAAACAAAC

How short-sighted can a super nuclear power afford to be?

Deploing our traditional distrust of power politics, a far-sighted political scientist looks ahead for almost fifty years, ventures some educated guesses about the probable development of foreign affairs, and maps out a brilliant long range foreign policy in which we would openly maintain a global balance of power.

THE NATION IS BURDENED

American Foreign Policy in a Changing World

by Roger D. Masters

$6.95 • now at better bookstores

ALFRED A. KNOPF

AAACAAACAAACAAAC

virtues are the vigor and wealth of his language, the poetic nature of his vision, the high seriousness of his concerns, and the variety of his imagination—qualities which are informed by his profound education and his moral largess. Such attributes, even when couched in plays of uncertain dramaturgy, are hard to resist. They account, I think, for the tenacity with which the Arden camp has maintained the defense. Furthermore, they have held out the promise of majestic plays to come as Arden's theatrical expertise increases, which Armstrong demonstrates it most assuredly is doing.

These observations, which enjoy the advantage of a backward look over Arden's ten-year career, are by way of explaining the curious effect made by Arden's first play, The Waters of Babylon, which the Washington Theater Club is giving its first full, professional staging in England or America. (The previous professional presentations have been workshop productions—in London at the Royal Court, and in New York at the New Theatre Workshop.) The Washington production could be better, as indeed the play could be easier to produce, but it is impossible not to admire both.

Arden's play is set in London—the modern Babylon—and concerns a man named Krank, short for Krankiewicz, a Pole who runs a low-class rooming house for refugees from other unfashionable places like Barbados and Ireland. His business, in short, is rent gouging, sanitary violations and, for some of his tenants, pimping. But there is gentleness in his nature, as well as toughness, and the other characters find him attractive. He is, in a word, a most unsavory individual with a most savory manner.

As the play opens Krank is moving out from a private, obscure life into the public arena, the protection of his interests requiring him to establish an easy intercourse with the crooked politicians and devious civic types of his district. A compatriot Pole, to whom Krank is in debt, suddenly accelerates this change in Krank's life by demanding to use his house as the headquarters for a plot to blow up the Russian delegation due for a state visit. In order to raise the money to pay off his debt and so avoid re-involvement with his past, Krank enters into a crooked municipal scheme, the rigging of a public lottery. Everything backfires at the drawing, and Krank is exposed for a dirty dealer. To top it off, the maniacal Pole accidentally shoots him dead. At this point, "notwithstanding Krank is dead," as someone puts it, everybody sings a roundelay about the tenacity of man, and the play ends.

While this gives the main line of Krank's little story, it only indicates the context that Arden heaps high around it—a series of sometimes satiric, sometimes boisterous, interludes involving such characters as a fatuous lady architect of fashion; a reforming West Indian councilman; two whores, one an Irish tart, the other a West Indian siren; a self-appointed protector of the commonweal from foreign undesirables; a bumbling Member of Parliament; a small-time political manipulator ("a Napoleon of Local Government"); and an intemperate, Irish comfort-station attendant. These ancillary characters, comprising everybody in the play except Krank and the mad Pole, mix liberally in Krank's story and provide a great variety of auxiliary action.

Arden uses several familiar techniques of Brecht's presentational style in projecting the play—direct address to the audience, recapitulating and descriptive song, generalized characters (everybody except Krank, in fact), scene changing by the actors, even a token bit of audience participation. But where Brecht's intention is to distance the audience from the action the better morally to persuade, Arden avoids making any moral point at all. He depicts his chosen milieu and its particular brand of humanity not only without making author's judgments but seemingly without inviting judgments from the audience. Once alienated (in Brecht's phrase), the audience is really on its own (in Arden's practice).

What is astounding about Babylon and marks it as great playwrighting is the variety, imagination and poeticism of the story of Krank and his company. It is characteristic of Arden's talent to depict a private life in a public arena with such richness; in fact, it is illuminating to have these concerns, which run through

WINDOWS

*On this wellnigh common day
I stand facing my window, and sigh as if someone were listening other windows away, someone invisibly receptive.*

*On my table lies a letter from another city, but with the selfsame doors and windows;
the letter must be answered later.
In its cage above it a golden pompon of a bird tries to echo what possibly it hears in other houses, three, four, or even six away, where other privacies pause for further implications.*

There are so many houses, and all those windows across which the familiar day writes its diffident meanings, and arranges them like texts for me to read and somewhat understand; but there are so many windows, each withholding or reflecting.

DAVID CORNEL DEJONG

all his work, so clearly set out in his first play. While Babylon is great playwrighting, however, it is not a great play. It is, in fact, a most unsatisfying play, as hard to enjoy as it is easy to admire. As with all basically impressive plays, the reasons for failure are difficult to pin down. Here they have to do with the flimsiness of Krank's story within the riot of public life engendered by the other characters, with the fact that much of the public and a good deal of the private commotion does not move Krank's story forward the distance of an inch, and with the awkward role in which Arden casts the audience—preventing it from submerging itself in the story, preventing it from standing outside and judging. These are aesthetic problems in which it is easy to lose one's way, so I will let it go at indicating their presence, suggesting that they account for the ultimate dissatisfactions of Arden's admirable first play.

The production at the Washington Theater Club is distinguished by William Goldstein's original music and by the performances of Bob Spencer, Colin Hamilton, Christopher Lloyd, Mary Lynn Kotz and John Hillerman. Haig Chobanian, whom I have admired at New York's Chelsea Theater Center, is properly attractive as Krank. His detachment, verging on neutralness, might be an extension of the way the play works.

EDUCATIONAL

FIVE DAY BOARDING SCHOOL. A unique program for people who have not even considered a boarding school. Grades five through eight. THE THOREAU SCHOOL. An intimate, cooperative community, combining study with the tasks and joys of country living. School bus brings your children home to NYC weekends. Small classes, individual instruction. Now enrolling for September. Write: Rodman, RD 1, Wallkill, N.Y. 12589. Phone: 914-895-5523.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

The Best Way To Get THE NATION

THE NATION 5-1-67
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

- ☐ One Year, $10
- ☐ Two Years, $18
- ☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Foreign and Canadian Postage
$1 a year extra)

NAME _____

ADDRESS _____

CITY _____

STATE _____ ZIP NO. _____

Crossword Puzzle No. 1199

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS:

- 1 and 6 Will some space refuse? Pan there at one time. (5-5, 4)
- 10 Casey Jones was not so square! (7)
- 11 With some early fighters they had to pull their blades to do it. (The battery is charged to do it now.) (5, 2)
- 12 See 13
- 13 and 12 The arm is broken, with those that are about out of bed, perhaps. (They could have fatal consequences.) (5, 8)
- 15 Tree in the category of poplar, chestnut, etc. (5)
- 17 Counts as what the host might pick up when a sloppy salute is given. (9)
- 19 It might describe some light in the entrance way. (9)
- 21 Want something? It takes a long time to get to the point. (5)
- 23 Your income had better cover it! (5)
- 24 See 3 down
- 27 Soup of this for Alice. (7)
- 28 Disturbances make this red. (7)
- 29 One might call for you to square them. (4)
- 30 Some musicians do like the piano, for instance, possibly in the nursery. (10)

DOWN:

- 1 An ending needed to typify William the Conqueror as a model. (4)
- 2 One could swear it might be to your credit! (7)
- 3 and 24 across A lot of 29 are on, perhaps. Let's hope the level doesn't rise.

- 4 A small home in a period far back—or in a period shortly to come, frankly. (9)
- 5 Sees a way to make it, and settles in gradually. (5)
- 7 Specifying the point occupied on a stretch of land, or draw. (7)
- 8 Lowering speed, rings for the answer.
- 9 Get the complement up to strength, in the manner of a proper hero! (8)
- 14 They're not to hide a faux pas—offering some protection to Morris, perhaps. (4, 6)
- 16 Monarch with one represented sort of consonant. (8)
- 18 Nelly the reporter is jubilant at heart, but somewhat behind the times. (9)
- 20 The winner is not likely to beat one. (7)
- 22 Diana got even with this hunter, but he gets to play a long time. (7)
- 24 A city loses out, leaving one of the team behind. (5)
- 25 A number cut out in the plant. (5)
- 26 She emphatically states the condition of being revered by some. (4)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1198

ACROSS: 1 Up to the minute; 10 Parades; 11 Secrete; 12 Laser beam; 13 Douse; 14 Grains; 16 Otoscope; 20 Tissue; 22 Conic; 23 Campcraft; 25 Primula; 26 Tuition; 27 Contact lenses. DOWN: 2 and 22 down Periscope; 3 Order in the court; 4 Hushed; 5 Messmate; 6 Nice distinction; 7 Tremulous; 8 Apologia; 9 and 19 Here and there; 15 Andantino; 17 Electing; 18 Trochaic; 21 Amato!; 24 Alice.

TRAVEL

The OTHER Israel—a three-week summer program for young people 21 to 35—a dialogue with young Israeli socialists—meet farmers, workers, Arabs, labor leaders, peace groups, parliament members—live and work in a kibbutz—tour the country. $625.00. For details write: Young Americans for Progressive Israel, 130 Fifth Avenue, Room 700, New York, N. Y. 10011.

ART

ORIGINALS COST LESS THAN REPRODUCTIONS! Contemporary original signed etchings, lithographs, woodcuts, $3.50. Guarantee. Free brochure. GRAPHIC CIRCLE (NA), 25 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10011.

KHAJURAHOS' EROTIC SCULPTURES: Thousand Year Old Temple Friezes of Hindu Arts, Carnal Love, Masterpieces Chandel Architecture. Twelve Color Slides $10. TEMPLEVIEWS, Box 25101, Cincinnati, Ohio 45225.

PUBLICATIONS

"SELECTED POEMS" of George Flynn (Villiers of London $2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound."—James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at 544-82 St., Brooklyn 9, N.Y.

THE IDLER. Lively, offbeat, liberal monthly. $1 brings four different sample back issues. Idler, 413B 6th St., N. E., Washington, D. C. 20002.

AMERICAN HAIKU magazine. Subscription—$3.00 yearly. Box 73, Platteville, Wisconsin 53818.

THE BLUFF OF DEGODDING THE HUMANS by Bibi Beebi, 116 pp., price $3.00. Popular Non-Newtonian, etc., physics, astronomy, culturology, philosophy. The Inventist, P. O. Box 17039, Los Angeles, Calif. 90017.

WORLD DEMOCRACY. By Bin Dir Woor, Self-Designated Symbolical World President. Unique, Entrancing. $2. Greenwich Book Publishers, 282 7th Avenue, New York City. As the first Symbolical World President, Bin Dir Woor calls on President Johnson to call a congress of the elected and other heads of all nations to arbitrate the Vietnam War, and all future wars.

PERSONALS

HIGHLY EXPERIENCED LIBRARIAN, more interested in books and people than pay or propriety, seeks work with Civil Rights movement, union, or libertarian group. Available September. Write (by air): S. Berman, Schiller College, 7121 Kleingersheim, West Germany.

USE LAWFUL DIRECT ACTION to repeal all abortion laws LEGALIZE ABORTION, POB 24163, Los Angeles, Calif. 90034.

$2.95

SAVE YOUR COPIES OF

The NATION

- Each file holds a full year's copies.
- Jesse Jones Volume Files for every publication.

- Covered in durable leather like Kivar, title embossed in 16 Kt gold.

Satisfaction guaranteed

Attractive and practical for your home or office
3 for $8.25

ORDER NOW—send check or money order.
MAGAZINE FILE CO.
520 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 36, N. Y.

FREE DESCRIPTIVE FOLDER UPON REQUEST

'The habit grew on me...'

So writes a subscriber, explaining why he has been reading The Nation for the past thirty years.

In an age of hyperbole, The Nation makes few claims for itself. It will not make you rich or alluring to the opposite sex.

Some readers buy it because it carries the toughest crossword puzzle now being printed in America. More buy it because the editors have a greedy curiosity about what really happens behind the velvet curtains of public relations and the pious admonitions of government.

The truth is not often given away free — you have to dig for it. The Nation has been digging for 101 years and its readers never seem to tire of watching the editors work.

subscribe to

THE NATION

America's most habit-forming magazine

"This book raises vital questions about our policy of escalation in relation to peace proposals."

Senator Vance Hartke,
Indiana

"A most important and revealing history, and a clear demonstration of what is wrong with the strategy of escalation."

John Kenneth Galbraith

FREE

 with each new subscription

THE NATION
333 6th Avenue
New York, N.Y. 10014

Herewith my order and payment for a NEW subscription to The Nation. Please send my FREE copy of THE POLITICS OF ESCALATION IN VIETNAM.

☐ 1 Year, $10 ☐ 2 Years, $18 ☐ 6 Months, $6
(Foreign and Canadian Postage: $1 per year extra)

name

address

city state zip no.

BRECHT'S GALILEO HAROLD CLURMAN

THE
NATION

MAY 8, 1967 35 cents

BURLINGAME

MAY 9 1967

LIBRARY

George Wallace
'Running for God'

ROBERT G. SHERRILL

The Weapon of Poverty

Birth of a Movement

RICHARD A. CLOWARD and FRANCES FOX PIVEN

British Labour

FROM DEFEAT TO DISASTER

THOMAS J. SPINNEIL, Jr.

Top of the Pops

TOLKIEN & HESSE

ROBERT SKLAR

S-22-67 PLS-801
BURLINGAME PUB LIBRARY
CALIFORNIA 94010

LETTERS

Ben Franklin's invention

San Francisco, Calif.

DEAR SIR: About your editorial comment, "News from the North" [Apr. 17] that "we should apply ourselves to finding an adjective form of 'United States' and desist from usurping the name 'American' to the dismay of our Canadian and Mexican neighbors": Ben Franklin anticipated the need for this term after the Constitutional Convention of 1787. . . . It was his hope that citizens of the young republic would take pride in becoming known throughout the world as Usonians.

Ralph Izard

motive

Rio Piedras, Puerto Rico

DEAR SIR: Your Mr. Clurman [The Nation, Apr. 10] has the exquisite good manners we have come to expect of The Nation, hasn't he? It would be rude to quarrel with his considerate appraisal of Miss Skinner's book. But must we therefore accept his reading of motives? He tells us that like the hipsters she is "seeking release from the dull savagery of our Great Society," that in fact she wrote Madame Sarah in order to escape.

He knows this? She confided in him, finding him ■ sympathetic listener? She didn't write her book simply because she wanted to, after a lifetime that, from long before she had ever heard of a Great Society, provided her with anecdote and delight in the subject? . . .

Robert C. Stephenson

poetry and protest

New York City

DEAR SIR: Louis Simpson gives an extremely misleading summary of some remarks of mine on the poetry of Frank O'Hara, published in the Sept. 25, 1966 issue of Book Week. Mr. Simpson writes [The Nation, Apr. 24]: "John Ashbery, in a recent article on another man's work, complimented him on not having written poetry about the war. This struck me as ■ new concept of merit—praising a man for things he has not written. But it was not amusing to see a poet sneering at the conscience of others."

Since Mr. Simpson does not bother to quote my article, may I be allowed to do so? What I wrote was this:

Frank O'Hara's poetry has no program and therefore it cannot be joined. It does not advocate sex and dope as a panacea for the ills of modern society; it does not speak out against the war in Vietnam or in favor of civil rights; it does not paint gothic vignettes of the post-atomic age; in a word, it does not attack the establishment. It merely ignores its right to exist, and is thus a source of annoyance to partisans of every stripe. . . . It is not surprising that critics have found him self-indulgent: his culte du moi is overpowering; the poems are all about him and the people and images who wheel through his consciousness, and they seek no further justification: "This is me and I'm poetry, Baby," seems to be their message, and unlike the message of committed poetry, it incites one to all the programs of commitment as well as to every other form of self-realization: interpersonal, dionysian, occult or abstract.

It should be evident from the foregoing that I was not "sneering at the conscience of other poets" but praising Frank O'Hara for giving a unique voice to his own conscience, far more effective than most of the protest "poetry" being written today. . . . Poetry is poetry. Protest is protest. I believe in both forms of action. . . . Incidentally, I signed and contributed money to the petition protesting the war.

John Ashbery

EDITORIALS

Speaking Out

Sen. George McGovern's speech of April 25 was a remarkable performance—but hardly surprising to those who know the Senator or who heard him at the Nation Institute Conference in Los Angeles on February 25. It was not only an act of political, moral and intellectual courage (unfortunately rare in our time) but—perhaps still rarer—it was so forthright that no one could mistake the speaker's meaning and no opponent could evade its challenge. Right at the start Mr. McGovern said that our deepening involvement in Vietnam represents the most tragic diplomatic and moral failure in our national experience, and that it is degenerating into an American defeat whether we "win" or "lose" on the battlefield. Indeed, the more complete our military conquest, the more tragic becomes our loss in everything that counts in the long run.

Senator McGovern will be up for re-election in '68. But does it follow that he has signed his political death warrant? We think not, and for specific reasons:

(1) He has been a notably fine Senator for his state. He has served its best interests in ways that can only enhance the pride of his constituents in their state. Good service is not always appreciated—not as much as it should be—but it is never entirely overlooked.

(2) Whether spontaneously or grudgingly, people admire acts of political courage. The small-town press of South Dakota has already in many instances paid McGovern the tribute of saying, "We don't necessarily agree . . . but we admire his courage."

(3) The President is not popular—no more in South Dakota than elsewhere. Even those who support his stand in the Vietnamese War have no love for him personally. By challenging a major Administration policy, the Senator may have helped rather than hurt his chances.

(4) Candor has its rewards as well as its risks. The chief reason for the President's unpopularity is nothing so superficial as his manner or his physiognomy. It is the fact, unmistakable from the beginning of his term as the elected President, that he has pretended to moderation and yielded to the hawks. McGovern's forthrightness stands out in contrast to Johnson's deviousness.

(5) Nothing is more uncertain than the fortunes of war. Neither McGovern nor anyone else expects the United States to be overwhelmed on the battlefield, but other frustrations are in prospect. By next year, McGovern may look like a prophet—and prophets are not always without honor among their own people.

However one may assess these matters, one may be sure that McGovern did not place the risks uppermost in his thinking. He did not play it cool and cautiously, like some of his colleagues. The contagion of courage was shown by the way in which Sen. Robert F. Kennedy came to his support. Kennedy was far more forthright than in his previous stand, which left him safely on the fence. Perhaps a score of Senators who have been revolted by the Administration's step-by-step enlargement of the war, and apprehensive of the consequences, must now be considering whether open opposition may not be in their interest as well as the nation's.

By them, as by ordinary citizens, McGovern's final warning will not be easily forgotten. "Congress," he said, "must never again surrender its power under our constitutional system by permitting an ill-advised, undeclared war of this kind. Our involvement in South Vietnam came about through a series of moves by the Executive branch—each one seemingly restrained and yet each one setting the stage for a deeper commitment. The complex of Administration moves involving the State Department, the CIA, the Pentagon, AID, and various private interests—all of these have played a greater role than has Congress. Congress cannot be very proud of its function in the dreary history of this steadily widening war. . . ."

No warning was ever more necessary or more timely.

More Escalation—Why?

The latest U.S. step-ups in Vietnam are not easy to decipher from the standpoint of military logic. On April 3, at a press conference, Secretary McNamara said the MIG bases in North Vietnam had been spared "to avoid widening the war." The possibility of such strikes had never been ruled out, he said, but "We think that at least under present circumstances, and this belief can change as time goes by, but we think the loss in U.S. lives would be less if we pursue our present target policy than they would be were we to attack these airfields. It is always a balancing of gains and losses in terms of U.S. lives and U.S. political objectives."

Making due allowance for the fact that Mr. McNamara was speaking extemporaneously, the confused wording nevertheless reflects the conflict within the Administration over the question of bombing the airfields. McNamara has never been very enthusiastic about bombing. In this instance he went so far as to suggest that the loss in American lives would be less if we refrained from attacking these bases. But the Joint Chiefs of Staff wanted to attack them, and their view prevailed. General Westmoreland was jubilant over the changed policy. All he wants now is another 100,000 men.

What do the military heads hope to accomplish, and why did they insist on this step, with its attendant risk of a clash with China? Writing in The Wall Street Journal, Frederick Taylor concludes that the civilians in the Pentagon, from McNamara down, are becoming increasingly convinced that "there are no further practical steps the U.S. can take that will have a meaningful effect on the war. Yet they will go along with a stepped-up pace simply for lack of alternative proposals—other than just waging

IN THIS ISSUE

May 8, 1967

EDITORIALS

578

ARTICLES

582 The Weapon of Poverty:
Birth of a Movement

Richard A. Cloward
and Frances Fox Piven

588 British Labour:
From Defeat to Disaster

Thomas J. Spinner, Jr.

589 George Wallace—"Running for God"

Robert G. Sherrill

596 The Perjury Routine

Irving Younger

BOOKS & THE ARTS

598 Tolkien & Hesse:
Top of the Pops

Robert Sklar

602 Marianne Moore's Magic

Sandra Hochman

603 Theatre

Harold Clurman

604 Spring Records 1

Benjamin Boretz

604 Variations on ■ Theme (poem)

Bruce Bennett

607 Crossword Puzzle

Frank W. Lewis

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Copy Editor
MARION HESS

Theatre
HAROLD CLURMAN

Art
MAX KOZLOFF

Music
BENJAMIN BORETZ

Science
CARL DREHER

Advertising Manager
MARY SIMON

Associate Publisher
GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Associate Editor
PHIL KERBY

Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIAS

Poetry Editor
MICHAEL GOLDMAN

Washington
ROBERT G. SHERRILL

Paris
ALEXANDER WERTH

London
RAYMOND WILLIAMS

Bonn
C. AMERY

Canberra
C. P. FITZGERALD

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July and August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1967 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N. Y. 10014. Tel.: CH 2-8400. West Coast office: 1256 Westwood Boulevard, Los Angeles, Calif. 90024. Tel.: GR 4-2533. Second class postage paid at New York, N. Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give four weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE NATION
Combined with FRONTIER

Volume 204
No. 19

■ long, mean war of attrition, which they see as politically impossible."

An experienced reporter with access to the Pentagon does not write such an amazing pair of sentences—amazing at least to the average American who pays little attention to the war—without considerable thought. The inescapable conclusion is that the military chiefs are so frustrated by the inconclusive development of the war that they are swinging wildly, in the hope that they can come up with something that will give them momentary relief from the constant needling and badgering which must be inflicted on them from the White House. The politically impossible nature of a war of attrition is even more keenly appreciated at the White House than at the Pentagon, where nobody has to stand for office next year.

And while the civilian thinkers in the Pentagon regard a war of attrition as a political monstrosity, General Westmoreland blandly says that it is the kind of war we are reduced to fighting. The alternative, he says, is a war of annihilation, which he regards as politically impossible, at least for the present. Kept up long enough and with enough pressure, a war of attrition becomes, as The New York Times pointed out editorially on April 26, a war of annihilation. Better evidence that the Pentagon and the White House have no idea where they are going, and what they will face next, could hardly be adduced.

What it all comes down to is that our military policy is as bankrupt as our political policy vis-à-vis Vietnam and China. More accurately, we have no policy, either military or political. We just try one thing after another, without any coherent plan, in the hope that something will work. It is not surprising that nothing has worked, and the forecast is that nothing will. Even old Clausewitz knew that war and diplomacy, if they are to make any sense, must have some unity. But if one has no sensible political objectives, if one has stumbled and blundered into a situation without any definable policy, how can military power remedy the basic defect?

We could "win" if we were willing to go all-out, i.e., if we were in a position to use the atomic bomb. But that would probably plunge us into World War III, and none of the hawks has suggested it so far. The alternative is the war of attrition, which leads Mr. Johnson into the political morass he fears, with good reason. He would be well advised to ponder Senator McGovern's speech and consider whether it does not contain better advice than any he has received from the Pentagon—or any that he is likely to receive this year, or next, or any time.

Adenauer's Tragedy

Munich

"He is dead for years now," the Zuñi priests say when the funeral rites are over: expression of the latent wish that pain of loss shall not burden the next of kin or the community. Judging from the thoroughness of the funeral rites, the West Germans hope to put at least a hundred years between themselves and their Great Ghost. Adenauer, it is true, was always something of a remnant—the living and vital ghost of a self-sufficient, patriarchal, non-imperialist Germany. He never understood Prussia and did not want to. He hated uniforms, and he was not keen on venerating authority. "It is not hygienic," he answered when asked why he did not kiss the ring of the Cardinal of Cologne.

His dry wit, his sometimes inane method of duping political enemies, his tendency to reduce everything to the simplest possible terms—above all, his utter inability to feel any responsibility for what happened under Hitler—made him the ideal carrier of the frightful postwar burden, an exemplar, as it were, of German capacities utterly unlike those displayed under the Third Reich. He was a man of the German West, of the Rhineland: that is why his hour could not come before 1945. He alone of all the German politicians had the detachment in that hour to see what had to be done, because he alone could envisage the future of a divided Germany. His political enemies (and I was one of them) blamed him not because of the line he followed but because he felt it necessary to deceive them rather than to convince them. He misled them by assuring them that, some day, Germany would be reunited as a consequence of his policy.

It is very probable that Adenauer knew one chief enemy—German nationalism. But he did not realize that he would have to crush it, not circumvent it. He certainly felt that the logic of history, the interest of the victors, the balance of power in Europe all favored a division of the Reich; he also felt that it was more important to assimilate his part of Germany to the civilized values of the West than to press for reunification. Nevertheless, he held a deep, perhaps an exaggerated, respect for the power of the opposing nationalist feeling. He managed easily to crush the fighting spirit of the Social Democrats; perhaps it would have been as easy to crush the cantankerousness of the All-Germans. He did not try it, hoping instead to create a fait accompli, a Western Federal Republic that would gradually dry out the old pools of vindictiveness.

But while he had a keen feeling for the historical German dilemma he had little understanding of the relevance of social contents. It is his tragedy that neither his friends nor his adversaries were strong enough to make up for this flaw in his splendid personality. In most important respects, Adenauer has been dead four years now: in some respects his type was dead since 1870, when Bismarck's Second Reich put a premium on rash overconfidence and thoughtless boasting. It was both the luck and the problem of Germany that one such man had survived the Wilhelmian reorientation of German society. He managed to rebuild a prosperous Germany—and thus, without wanting to, he reopened the avenue for the very Prussian attitudes he detested.

C. AMERY

In the Back of the Train

Germany's extreme right-wing National Democratic Party won representation in two more state parliaments in the April 23 elections. These gains were somewhat less than had been anticipated; even so, the new party, organized only a little more than two years, polled more than the minimum 5 per cent of the vote needed for representation and has now acquired eight more seats. A remarkable TV documentary released on April 24 ("Germany and Its Shadow," produced by Arthur Zegart and Peter McGhee for ETV) perceptively posed the real problem: how much has the new generation learned?

The novelist Hans Helmut Kirst, a soldier in World War II, is concerned by what he sees "under the surface" of life in West Germany and by the "apathetic attitude" of the public toward the new party. Christian Geissler, who wrote The Sins of Our Fathers, wonders whether the young generation really understands the danger of right-wing nationalism. "Either they have learned during the last twenty years or they have not. If they have not, things will go the same way." To Geissler, West Germany is like a train in motion. "The doors are locked, the train is a fine train; all the people are drinking and dancing . . . but what is in the back of our train?" Those who ask that question are "imprisoned in the end from the other ones, who do not like to question, who like to have their good time in the train but do not like to go out behind the door, the locked door."

The impression left by these thoughtful witnesses was only confirmed by the slick apologia of the official spokesman for the Bonn regime and the unctuousness of Adolph Von Thadden, Gauleiter of the new party. And the shadow deepened as one listened to Prof. Carl Horowitz of the empty Bonn synagogue and to Arno Hamburger, one of 230 Jews left in Nuremberg of the 9,000 who once lived there. To them the shadow is clear.

The Greek Coup

In its issue of March 27 The Nation carried an article by Stephen Rousseas which accurately forecast the brutal midnight Putsch carried out in Greece on April 21 ("Deadlock in Greece: Elections or Coup?"). The army operation was planned well in advance, and carried out in the classic tradition. Until some of the dust has settled, it would be unwise to predict the course of events, but already unmistakably clear is the responsibility of the King and of U. S. foreign policy for what has happened.

During the past two years, the King has stubbornly refused to allow democratic elections in Greece. Facing a constitutional limitation on his ability to continue postponing elections, he cooperated with the right-wing National Radical Union Party (ERE) to bring down his own puppet government (the Stephanopoulos regime) and, later, the caretaker government of Paraskevopoulos. When it became clear that ERE could not get the required vote of confidence, Parliament was dissolved, thus requiring elections under the constitution within a period of forty-five days. Thus, as a result of his clumsy politicking, the King found himself committed to elections which would unquestionably have resulted in a majority for the center-liberal party of George Papandreou even greater than the 53 per cent he received in 1964. A coup, in the King's view, became the only means of heading off the elections he did not want to call. It is significant that the Putsch came two days before the scheduled opening of the election campaign.

It is also significant that the present junta has chosen as its spokesman Nicholas Farmakis, whose last name in the Greek vernacular stands for "poison." Farmakis is a well-known rightist who came to America three months ago without any visible means of support — a vainglorious peacock who dropped hints to all and sundry about the hush-hush nature of his mission. It has been established that he made several trips to Washington and then returned to Athens. And then there is the case of the CIA agent who played such a prominent role in the July, 1965, crisis which brought down the Papandreou government. He turned up in Athens a few months ago, ostensibly as a private citizen in the employ of Esso-Pappas. For the record, the Pappas Foundation of Boston has been exposed as a conduit for CIA funds.

But Washington's responsibility for the coup rests on more substantial evidence than these circumstances. The Greek army is a satellite army. It is inconceivable that it would have acted without the knowledge, if not the direct approval, of American officials in Athens. By clear inference, Washington knew what was planned and did nothing to avert it. In fact Washington's involvement in the coup explains the current campaign to dissociate the King from the junta and to make it appear that he had no direct responsibility for the illegal events.

Even so, there are some indications that the coup may not have been carried out strictly according to plan. The young colonels, for example, may have jumped the gun—which, if true, would not relieve either the King or Washington of responsibility. Or these lower echelon officers may have been used as camouflage—that is, to be able to stage a coup without openly involving the King. The Papandreous, father and son, especially the son, would be gotten out of the way and the King could then be shown to have resisted the junta. Later the junta could be eased out and as a bonus the King would emerge as the savior of the constitution. In either reading, the Crown would remain intact, the Papandreous would be contained or eliminated (Andreas Papandreou, a product of American higher education, is to be tried for "high treason") and a "national unity"—ominous phrase—government installed with elections postponed for another year or so. A neat plot, and it may succeed temporarily, but in the end the gamble may well cost the King his throne and Washington a satellite regime.

BIRTH OF A MOVEMENT

RICHARD A. CLOWARD
and FRANCES FOX PIVEN

Mr. Cloward and Mrs. Piven are members of the faculty at the Columbia University School of Social Work.

It is never easy to fix the beginnings of a movement, but participants in the emerging welfare recipients movement will probably remember the last days of June, 1966. On June 20, about forty men and women on relief left Cleveland on the first lap of a 155-mile march to Columbus, there to present complaints about public welfare to Governor Rhodes. As the marchers passed through cities and towns on the route, local recipients, ministers, social workers and other sympathetic citizens, sometimes hundreds of them, fell in line for a short distance. (But in the town of Creston a cross was burned.) On the morning of June 30, when they finally reached Columbus, the forty marchers were joined by busloads of recipients from all over Ohio. Some 2,000 protesters paraded down Broad Street to the capitol to argue the case against Ohio's welfare system. Dick Gregory, one of those who addressed the crowd, announced: "This is not a civil rights movement; it's a human rights movement."

Ohio was not the only scene of demonstrations that day. In New York, 2,000 pickets, most of them on welfare, marched in the hot sun while their children played in City Hall park. And in fifteen other cities, including Baltimore, Washington, Los Angeles, Boston, Louisville, Chicago, Trenton and San Francisco, 2,500 more people in groups of 25 to 250 simultaneously demonstrated against "the welfare."

A great variety of demands were put forward on June 30 and continue to be reiterated in subsequent demonstrations. Chief among them is the call for higher grant levels. In Ohio, for example, recipients receive only 70 per cent of what the state itself has declared to be the minimum subsistence income by 1959 standards—73¢ per day per person for food, clothing and all other expenses except rent. The June marchers wanted the state to use its $30 million budget surplus to raise grant levels. Recently, 2,500 people in Greensboro, N. C., signed petitions to the state legislature calling for increases in grant levels; the maximum monthly payment which can be given a family of four is $152.50, but the actual average payment is only $96.00. Nationally, we spend about .7 per cent of our personal income for welfare, and the percentage is falling; personal income is rising rapidly, but grant levels are not. The average annual payment for an AFDC (Aid to Families with Dependent Children) family of four is about $1,800, ranging from $380 in Mississippi to about $2,700 in New York.

"Snooping" by welfare investigators is a bitter and constant grievance. In Cleveland, the police department's Bureau of Special Services (BOSS), whose main function is to hunt out "subversives," cooperates with the welfare department. A favorite BOSS tactic is to interrogate the children of AFDC families about undeclared family income or the male companions of their mothers. Similar invasions of privacy occur regularly throughout the country, and welfare recipients are beginning to resist them. At neighborhood meetings in the South Bronx, for example, one AFDC mother after another will rise to vow that she will no longer teach her children to lie to the investigator about having seen their father.

Women predominate at demonstrations, but some men turn out, and their numbers may increase. Unemployed single men rarely succeed in getting on the rolls, even though in many places they are eligible for general assistance. Welfare officials say it is not good for able-bodied men to be on relief; it undermines their initiative. Being chronically unemployed, one might counter, is not character building either, especially if there is no other source of income. Men on the picket lines carry signs reading: JOBS OR INCOME. Since many welfare departments also refuse (often contrary to their own regulations) to provide benefits to supplement low wages, other signs call for DECENT WAGES OR WELFARE.

The establishment of day-care centers for children, so that their mothers can work, is among the most popular demands, although its popularity may decline when recipients actually experience the type of employment, and the wage level, society has in store for them.

Some groups seek improvements in food-distribution programs which are administered locally by welfare departments. The Food Stamp Act of 1964 prohibits distribution of free surplus commodities in areas where bonus food stamps are sold. In the South, many people lack the money to buy food stamps, partly because they are illegally kept off welfare. Nevertheless, county after county is now switching from the distribution of free surplus commodities to the food-stamp plan. The result has been near starvation for tens of thousands. Two million Negroes left rural areas between 1960 and 1965 alone—driven out by traditional welfare policies and the unemployment produced by federal agricultural subsidies which reward mechanization by big landholders. When the Mississippi Advisory Committee held hearings in Jackson last February to investigate the food-distribution problem, 800 poor Negroes crowded in. At one point they seized the microphones and held them for two hours to condemn welfare and food-distribution practices.

Recipients are also plagued by restrictions in the food-stamp program, particularly prohibitions on the use of stamps to buy such items as soap powder, toilet paper, cigarettes and beer. Merchants in big cities do a thriving business by selling forbidden items (including toys at Christmas) at a high premium in extra stamps. And they'll oblige only if the recipient is a regular purchaser of their typically shoddy goods at inflated prices. More "ethical" merchants limit themselves to hiking prices twice a month, on "check days." In some places, welfare groups are joining forces with consumer boycott groups to combat these practices.

But of the many motives leading recipients to band together, none is more powerful than the hope of obtaining some relief from the distress of poverty. The most persistent theme of the movement is the demand that welfare departments abandon the widespread practices of rejecting legitimate applicants, summarily terminating the benefits of others, and failing to provide the full benefits prescribed by law to those who remain on the rolls. Groups which have concentrated on this issue have shown the most dramatic growth and the most stable membership.

Local groups have mounted a colorful variety of demonstrations to press their demands. Last September, nearly 1,000 recipients picketed the welfare department in New York, demanding increased grants for school clothing; the protest culminated in a three-day sit-in by AFDC mothers. Some 200 in Cleveland staged a "buy-in" at a local department store, carefully selecting children's books, scarves, winter coats and other items of children's clothing, for which they instructed the store manager to bill the department of welfare. In California recipients have organized "job-ins" to demand suitable employment at regular wages for men who are able to work. The state currently forces male heads of families to "work off" their grants by cutting brush in municipal and county drainage and irrigation ditches. If they refuse this peonage, they are dropped from the rolls. "Cook-ins" have been used. At a demonstration in Baltimore, a meal prepared from surplus foods was served the Mayor in his office; he declined to eat it. California officials and their wives, attending a "banquet" organized by recipients, were embarrassed when presented with a meal composed solely of varieties of beans. In some places, the names of especially punitive welfare workers are compiled and distributed on "louse lists"; elsewhere, their pictures are blown up in the style of "wanted" posters and nailed to telephone poles and tenement doors. By such techniques, private shame is being converted into public indignation.

National Link-Up

If the demonstrations on June 30 and subsequently result in the organization of some segment of the poor, much of the credit will belong to a national body formed in the spring of 1966—the Poverty/Rights Action Center. It is headed by George A. Wiley, a former professor of chemistry who joined CORE and later became its associate national director. After leaving CORE, Wiley wanted to promote organizations of the poor focused on economic deprivations; he recognized such possibilities in the proposal to build a movement by mobilizing people to claim benefits due them under law [Cloward and Piven: "A Strategy To End Poverty"; The Nation, May 2, 1966]. Wiley now believes that "the welfare movement is the most important development among low-income people since Rosa Parks refused to move to the back of a bus in Montgomery, Ala."

Wiley's achievements are worth noting. The simultaneous demonstrations in June were the result of strenuous efforts to establish links with the few scattered groups that already existed around the country and to spur local activists (many of whom were in limbo after the civil rights movement passed its peak) to begin organizing new groups. In August, about 100 recipient leaders attended a meeting convened by the Center to lay the groundwork for a national movement. As new groups develop, Wiley maintains contact, provides program materials, and offers advice on organizing strategies, fund-raising techniques, and ways of dealing with intractable public-welfare bureaucracies. Recently, a national newsletter was started. In February of this year, 350 people, representing more than 200 welfare groups in seventy cities of twenty-six states, attended a second national meeting of leaders [see editorial, "Poor Power," The Nation, February 20]. Participant groups ranged from the "Mothers of Watts" to "Mothers for Adequate Welfare" in Boston; from Chicago's "Welfare Union of the West Side Organization," composed of unemployed Negro males, to Eastern Kentucky's "Committee to Save Unemployed Fathers," consisting of white ex-miners. Wiley has also helped to develop a National Coordinating Committee of Welfare Rights Organizations.

In the past, welfare clients have not often dared to taunt the system, its retributive powers being what they are. Even though the risks to individuals are still great, groups are now holding firm in the face of harassment. Recipient organizers have been struck from the welfare rolls in some places, and this practice may spread if the movement grows sufficiently powerful to cause political difficulties. Demonstrators have been arrested in a dozen cities. In Washington, welfare investigators photograph pickets from ground-level office windows; they follow demonstrators on marches, taking motion pictures through small squares left in the paint-darkened windows of their station wagons. (These practices ceased, at least temporarily, when they were the subject of a Washington Post article, illustrated by a large picture of a welfare investigator photographing pickets.) Police photographers in New York (who also work for a division called BOSS) erect tripods in the midst of picket lines. Wiley stresses to local groups the critical importance of making alliances with lawyers who will defend recipients against retaliation.

Professionals Know Best

Figures prominent in the social-welfare establishment are cautioning civil rights leaders, foundation officials and other potential supporters of the movement that political controversy created by welfare groups may impel state legislators to retaliate, as by lowering grant levels. Welfare reform, they say, is best left to the professionals and other experts who know their way about the legislative corridors. By coincidence, recently increased federal payments to localities for professionally staffed rehabilitative programs have produced better salaries, higher standards of training and various professional embellishments; they have not provided much additional in the way of funds for food, clothing and household furnishings—at least not for recipients.

The unions of public-welfare employees also think clients should defer to their leadership, on the ground that unions fight for reforms that will benefit everyone. Some unions have given modest aid to recipients' organizations, and recipients have joined picket lines during union strikes. However, the alliances have been uneasy. In labor-management negotiations, the unions concentrate on wages and working conditions, and do not push hard on issues of concern to recipients. During the depression, unemployed men demanding relief and welfare employees joined in the Workers' Alliance, but today's recipients are not primarily unemployed workers, and welfare employees now want to be professionals. Unions of investigators bargain to be called "case workers" and to be relieved of paper work so that they can practice "rehabilitation." Most recipients do not need rehabilitation and submit to it only when it is made a condition for continuing to receive benefits. Such coercion is a major evil of the system. The only way to eliminate it is to divorce the administration of benefits from social services. Welfare employees resist such proposals, for to surrender control over benefits is to run the large risk that few clients will use the rehabilitative services. Recipients, in short, cannot expect the social-welfare establishment to advance their interests.

It is true that a strong welfare movement might evoke repressive actions by legislators. The danger would be greater if repression were not a two-edged sword. Although two of every three welfare recipients in America are white, the movement is now strongest in the swelling Negro ghettos of the North. It is one thing to deny the black urban masses decent housing, education and employment, for people do not always acutely miss what they have never had. But welfare has been putting bread and beans on the tenement kitchen table, and those items would be sharply missed by a great many people if grant levels were reduced. In New York City, more than 650,000 people would miss them. The black ghettos may not decide national elections, but a Democratic administration can hardly afford to alienate so many voters by permitting states and localities to inflict new penalties upon them.

But if repression is not a serious danger to the movement, other governmental responses may be. Learning from the methods used in public-housing and urban-renewal programs to quell rebellious tenants, some welfare departments are promoting their own forms of client participation. "Community coordinators," "community organizers," "community aides," or what-have-you are hired to develop "client advisory committees," in which recipients can air their discontent, discuss reforms, and presumably muster pressure for change. Membership on such committees confers prestige: more than one recipient leader has abandoned the picket line to have coffee and cake with well-known public officials. To be listened to by the powerful conveys a sense that one is at last wielding a measure of influence, that progress is being made, that genuine reforms will follow. All this is illusory, but until an autonomous movement can gather the strength to compel genuine reforms, the illusion will be difficult to dispel.

Even if such committees proved to be a source of power, the members are likely to be drawn from those whose sense of outrage is not strong enough to withstand the effect of intimate contact with welfare personnel skilled in redefining reality. Thus a member of one client advisory committee is quoted in a welfare department publication as follows:

I feel there are obviously two ways to work—either to be adamantly demanding, issuing ultimatums, making use of opportunism and perhaps exaggeration in order to press a point—or the slower, admittedly, but perhaps more effective eventually, way of using the techniques of gathering together, speaking frankly, continuing to ask, to question, to discuss, to learn, bringing faith and belief in each other and high hopes in our hearts that we will be fairly heard—and our recommendations and proposals, when found to be valid, acted upon.

Government programs to get clients off the rolls and into jobs are also a serious threat to the movement. AFDC mothers may turn out to be the last carriers of pure Calvinism, for above all else many of them want to work. "New careers" are being planned for them as "subprofessionals" in various governmental agencies. However, the number of jobs is not likely to be very great, for the cost of caring for the children of working mothers in publicly subsidized day-care centers is considerable. The few openings provided will probably be filled by client leaders, who are the most ambitious and the most agitated by their low status. Some will be hired as "public welfare aides"—that is, as instruments of the same corporate brutality they are now fighting.

Who Will Help?

Organizing takes money. For even minimal national leadership, the Poverty/Rights Action Center needs $5,000 per month. But fund raising has been slow in the welfare movement. People who gave to the civil rights movement remember the drama of Selma: the need to help unemployed men and welfare mothers to organize seems far less compelling.

In a growing number of places, people who have benefited from participation in the movement are willing to pay monthly dues. Wiley is now developing a national dues-payment system, including arrangements for formal membership, that could make the welfare movement self-sustaining.

It is remarkable that so much has been done thus far with so little money. The organizing accomplished by groups affiliated with the New York City-Wide Coordinating Committee of Welfare Groups is a case in point. Neighborhood units raise money where they can, mainly from dues, socials and occasional contributions. The City-Wide body, which now has a telephone and a one-room office donated by a Protestant church, has financed its nine months of operation with less than $5,000. Nevertheless, it staffs its office, holds biweekly meetings of neighborhood representatives, sends out a weekly newsletter, sponsors city-wide demonstrations (some of which have involved several thousand people) and cooperates with member groups in numerous local demonstrations. The chief accomplishment of the City-Wide committee, however, is the millions of dollars in benefits it has procured for members, mostly through "minimum-standards" campaigns.

In New York, as in many other states, people get money from welfare in two ways. Once certified as eligible, they are supposed to receive a regular "food and rent" check every fifteen days. Because the law recognizes that people also need clothing and household furnishings in order to live at a minimum standard, provision is made for special grants on an "as needed" basis. But the system does not inform people of this entitlement, it does little to help those who do know of it to make application, and it frequently turns down (or trims down) legitimate requests. A massive campaign has been under way since last summer to inform recipients about their right to these benefits and to overcome the reluctance of the system to make grants. Simple forms have been prepared, in English and Spanish, listing the many items to which people are entitled (e.g., galoshes and a bed and mattress for each child), with spaces left for people to check the items they need. Tens of thousands of these forms have been circulated in the welfare ghettos, along with fliers telling people to bring the completed check lists to the meeting place of a local recipients' organization. When the forms have been collected, a demonstration is held at the district welfare center in support of a delegation delivering the forms in bulk to the administrator.

Some 10,000 families have participated in these minimum-standards campaigns, and have received checks averaging about $300. This represents a total of $3 million wrested from the system. Nor does this large sum take account of the indirect results of the minimum-standards campaign: client organizing has encouraged well-motivated social investigators to fight harder for approval of minimum-standards applications (procedures for administrative approval become more cumbersome with the size of the request) and has prodded their unmotivated colleagues into being more attentive. The workers, it is said, reflect this new climate in the handling of their entire case loads, not just the cases of clients known to be members of recipients' organizations. It is impossible to estimate how many additional millions in benefits have been released in this fashion.

Although cash resources have been hard to find, welfare organizing has been supported by contributions of other kinds, mostly from anti-poverty agencies and churches. The Office of Economic Opportunity, with its rhetoric about community action, attracted hundreds of activists to its payrolls, and then harnessed them to traditional social-service programs. However, at least a few of the anti-poverty agencies have taken up welfare abuses as part of their programs. What usually happens is that alert staff members, once in contact with poor people, perceive that injustices perpetrated by welfare departments, especially the illegal withholding of financial benefits, must be remedied before other family problems can be attacked. And so the staff of a Head Start or youth-employment program may begin to ask the welfare department to "adjust" individual cases. As the volume of cases grows and the workers become more expert as advocates, a community of recipients sometimes emerges—stimulated, often, by news of the national movement. OEO money has been particularly instrumental in assisting welfare organizing in New York, Washington, St. Louis, New Orleans, Newark and Paterson, N. J., Pittsfield, Mass., and various cities in California and Kentucky. In addition, a number of VISTA members have become active organizers, and very effective ones.

A good many neighborhood ministers and priests have joined their welfare constituents on the picket lines and in sit-ins. In Chicago, churchmen have also given outright gifts of money to groups, and in Cleveland the Council of Churches is contributing to the support of welfare organizing by Students for a Democratic Society (SDS). In addition, the Council has sponsored a series of arresting ads in local newspapers. One shows only the distended belly of a pregnant woman, with the caption in 1-inch type. LET 'EM STARVE. The text then describes the niggardly sums available to Ohio's welfare families. And although it has contributed no funds, the National Council of Churches has been extremely helpful to Wiley in a number of ways; indeed, without its assistance, the Center might not have survived.

Civil rights groups are slowly becoming involved. A few Urban League groups have been organizing; the NAACP Legal Defense Fund is taking test cases in the welfare area and is helping organizers in the South. National CORE, its financial resources badly depleted, has been unable to do much, but local chapters in Providence, Baltimore, Newark, Lexington and Denver have been active. SDS has done intensive organizing, especially in Cleveland, Newark, Chicago, Baltimore, Jersey City and Boston, and there are signs that other SDS units may include this issue in their broader organizing programs. Organizations directed or influenced by Saul Alinsky have been effective in some places, especially Syracuse and Chicago, (where The Woodlawn Organization has built a welfare union with ten "locals"). And Martin Luther King announced in March the beginning of an intensive organizing drive in the Chicago slums to build "a base of power in order to bring about a guaranteed annual income."

Support is emerging in social-work communities. Some settlement houses — University in New York, Southside in Columbus, and Southeast Neighborhood in Washington—have been very active. Individual social workers (some of them public-welfare employees) are affiliated with welfare groups in most cities. The young professionals organized in New York as "Social Workers for Civil Rights Action" are raising funds for the city-wide welfare groups. A few local chapters of the National Association of Social Workers have provided travel money for recipient leaders to attend national organizing meetings. In late February, a consortium of students from the schools of social work in the New York metropolitan area sponsored an eight-hour teach-in on the welfare movement, attended by some 1,500 persons. The speakers included James Farmer, Kenneth Clark, George Wiley, Robert Theobald and several recipient leaders. The Poverty/Rights Action Center is raising money for students to do welfare organizing in the urban ghettos as "summer" projects, somewhat along the lines of projects previously sponsored by the civil rights movement in the South.

Welfare in the Courts

Concomitant with the development of a recipients' movement, an assault is being mounted in the courts against the laws, rules and procedures of public welfare; each drive has been reinforcing the other. The Scholarship, Education and Defense Fund for Racial Equality has been active in the courts. Its legal staff, headed by Carl Rachlin, advises welfare groups on strategy, represents individuals who have been arrested in demonstrations, and tries to persuade other lawyers to join the struggle. Last summer, the Law Students Civil Rights Research Council placed dozens of law students in Chicago, Cleveland, New York and throughout the South, many of them assigned to work exclusively with welfare groups.

The program will be repeated next summer, with a much sharper focus on welfare issues. A number of the legal-service projects sponsored by OEO are at work on welfare problems. The California Rural Legal Assistance Project, for example, moved vigorously against the welfare departments and has itself been attacked by the California bar.

A leader in the drive to establish the rule of law in the welfare field is Edward Sparer, director of the "law and social welfare center" of the Columbia University School of Social Work. Sparer and a large staff of lawyers try to persuade legal organizations and private attorneys throughout the country to take pivotal test cases against the system. They do exhaustive legal research and advise on the preparation of briefs. Several critical cases are now being taken by such organizations as the Legal Defense Fund and various OEO legal-service projects. One crucial case, now in the federal courts, is a test of Georgia's "employable mother" rule, which permits administrators to deny AFDC benefits to any mother who is deemed eligible for employment and whose children are older than 3 years, whether or not jobs are to be had. The rule also prohibits the payment of supplemental benefits to a mother who is employed at wages falling well below scheduled grant levels. By thus forcing people to take any job at any wage, this rule and similar practices in other Southern states encourage exploitation. Another matter, now being considered by the United States Supreme Court, deals with the question of whether a tenant can be evicted from a public-housing project without being given a statement of cause or a hearing; the implication for the thousands of recipients involuntarily dropped from the welfare rolls is clear. Indeed, many of the cases now being taken could substantially increase the number of people eligible for initial or continuing benefits. If the "employable mother" case is won, Georgia's rolls could double. But welfare departments will not comply with new rulings unless they are pressured to do so. The task of a movement is to organize that pressure.

Organizing for Crisis

What does the future hold for a movement of the welfare poor? Much depends on their ability to endure the frustrations of organizing, the drudgery of pounding the pavements and knocking on doors. Recipients want to bring the welfare system to its knees, here and now. Delegates to the national meeting in Washington last February, on hearing reports of starvation in Mississippi, were ready to abandon the conference and march on Jackson. Workshops on the details of organizing techniques turn into rallies where people rise one by one to "tell it like it is."

But marches, rallies and exhortations are not what has fueled the movement thus far and made it grow. Its appeal lies, rather, in its tangible achievements: extracting benefits prescribed by law, and giving protection against the untrammelled corporate power of "poor law" agencies. Welfare recipients share with people everywhere a tendency to affiliate with organizations that can hold out the promise of economic gains. Nor is anything else likely to induce mass participation.

However, merely drawing people into organizations will not yield much power, for welfare recipients are a numerical minority, and what little strength of numbers they have is diluted by racial divisiveness. Like organized labor, welfare recipients need a source of strength that goes beyond their numbers. Labor exerts economic leverage through the strike; welfare recipients can exercise power by claiming benefits held back by the system.

To wield this power, however, the movement must mobilize with single-minded determination to obtain benefits for its members—for those now eligible who have been illegally rejected or discharged from the rolls, and for those on the rolls who are not receiving the full benefits prescribed by law. Naturally, it must also begin recruiting the huge new groups which will become eligible if various test cases are won in the courts.

Each time a welfare group turns to some other issue—such as agitating for a day-care center—it wastes its one source of potential power. Campaigns to get benefits will produce pervasive and persistent turmoil: bureaucratic turmoil because cumbersome (and unconstitutional) procedures for review and surveillance will break down; fiscal turmoil as welfare costs rise in localities where existing sources of tax revenue are already overburdened; and political turmoil, especially within the urban Democratic coalition, as an alerted electorate divides on the question of how to overcome this disruption in local government. Reverberations of local trouble will be felt at the national level, and in the ensuing debate over remedies to relieve local conflict, the poor and their allies can press for fundamental reforms.

Such reforms could extend to a variety of economic policies. Unemployed men are usually turned away from "home relief" offices, even in jurisdictions where they are legally eligible for aid. If they confine themselves to protests and rallies they won't get much, if anything. But if they organize to demand legal benefits, local costs will mount sharply, and that may focus national attention on the need for a program of full employment. Similarly, when low-wage earners organize to get the supplementary welfare benefits to which they are entitled in many places, a new force for higher minimum wages will be felt. If recipient groups (and lawyers) can prevent Southern welfare departments from dropping thousands of families at cotton-chopping time, so that they may be exploited in the fields, pressure to review agricultural policies may mount. And the breakdown of welfare's archaic procedures may help draw attention to the need for a simplified, federally administered guaranteed income for those who should not work (e.g., mothers with small children) or cannot work (e.g., the disabled or those made temporarily unemployed through recession, automation or plant relocation).

Will current organizing strategies produce the massive benefits which are the movement's chief source of leverage for reform? The answer is mixed. Thus far, organizing has mainly concentrated on processing individual complaints. This method is useful in building core groups, but it cannot be employed to reach large numbers, for it requires virtually boundless manpower and patience. Organizing by this method requires that grievance committees of recipient groups first study the complex manuals which specify entitlements. But in many places officials refuse to release these manuals; to get them, recipients must go to court or find sympathetic investigators who will steal copies. Furthermore, the welfare system can forget, stall, harass and intimidate. It can correct an error one month and repeat it the next. It can resist interference on a case-by-case basis in dozens of ways.

Part of the answer to these problems is to make recipients themselves more effective plaintiffs by informing them of their rights. Simplified manuals, prepared by social workers and lawyers, are now available in about twelve Northern cities and in several Southern states. A broad distribution of such documents will go a long way toward overcoming the ignorance of entitlements by which recipients are now victimized. But had labor confined itself to negotiating for individual workers, it would have obtained little more than minor concessions from management. It took the economic power of the strike to bring about more substantial reforms. Unless welfare groups do more than adjust individual grievances and hold rallies, they too will obtain only minor concessions. These token concessions will weaken the movement by creating a momentary sense of victory, leaving untouched the real sources of poverty: unemployment and low wage levels, agricultural subsidies which enrich large landholders and drive small farmers and rural workers into the urban ghettos, and the lack of a guaranteed income to protect people against a variety of misfortunes.

A more efficient strategy to increase participation, and also to build toward a crisis in the welfare system, focuses on some common deprivation that affects many people and involves much money. The minimum-standards campaign in New York City is the best example, but even there the potential has hardly been tapped, for only about 5 per cent of the city's 650,000 recipients have so far been reached by the movement. In each jurisdiction, organizers need to study local rules to determine whether a given category of benefits is being regularly withheld, and then must mount mass campaigns to unlock these benefits. Such campaigns bring organizers into contact with a good many people, and people into contact with a good deal of money. A fair proportion of those helped maintain an affiliation with core organizing groups; some become formal members, others stand by to support mass meetings and demonstrations.

The movement's full impact will be felt when it turns to recruiting eligible persons to the welfare ranks. The reservoir is enormous, since only about half of those now eligible are on the rolls. Philadelphia groups are planning to station members in welfare centers to offer help to applicants who are rejected. (In Philadelphia, as in many other places, the department turns down half of all who apply, and lawyers estimate that half of these rejections are illegal.)

The recruitment potential is suggested by the experience of an anti-poverty agency in Baltimore. Having opened a new office in a ghetto area, agency staff members set out to do "case-finding" for their services by knocking on doors. In the process, they uncovered hundreds of poverty-stricken people whom they routinely referred to welfare, with the result that the AFDC rolls in the neighborhood doubled. When interviewed by newspaper men, the director of the Maryland state board of social welfare insisted: "It's not our responsibility to inform people of their entitlements." This is precisely government's responsibility, but it will not meet that obligation. An energetic recruitment campaign will have at least the same effect in other areas, and a public crisis will result.

Some participants in the movement (and some of its supporters) are offended by talk of creating a "crisis." What they fail to see is that the system has already been subverted by its continuous accommodation to powerful groups arrayed against the poor and the minorities in the local community. Consequently, recipients are victimized by the discrepancy between the statutes governing the system, which are bad enough, and day-to-day rules and practices, which are far worse. The purpose of a recipients' movement is not to subvert government any further but to reveal how other political forces have already succeeded in subverting it, and then to press for major economic reforms. The legitimacy of disrupting a system that is already so corrupt is unassailable.

BRITISH LABOUR

FROM DEFEAT TO DISASTER

THOMAS J. SPINNER, Jr.

Mr. Spinner is working at present in London on a book about English history during a leave of absence from the Department of History at the University of Vermont.

London

The tiny smile which began to play about the mouth of Edward Heath after the Conservative Party won back a Glasgow seat from Labour in early March has now become the gloating smirk of a potential Prime Minister. For Labour went from defeat to disaster during the week (April 10 to 14) of elections for county councils throughout the country. Wilson has consistently reminded his party of the way in which he has been personally responsible for the return to national power in 1964, and for the decisive mandate of March, 1966. But just over a year later the Labour Party received a massive rebuff from the voters. The Prime Minister's own constituency—Huyton in Lancashire—returned two Conservatives to replace two Labour members. A slight swing against the government in power at this stage of a Parliament is to be expected, but nothing of this dimension.

The most important result was in London where the Conservatives scored what can only be called a fantastic sweep. It should be remembered that the Labour Party had controlled the old London County Council (LCC) from 1934 until 1963. In that year the Conservatives, despairing of ever winning control, and also employing an argument about the need for larger areas of local government, set up the Greater London Council (GLC). They added a number of wealthy suburbs to the LCC area with the expectation that this would give them control of the new council. At that time their optimism was misplaced. The tide against the Conservatives was so great in early 1964, following Macmillan's resignation and the Profumo scandal, that the Labour Party won the first GLC election with sixty-four seats to the Conservatives' thirty-six. The Liberal and minor parties failed to win a single seat.

The GLC provides the London citizen with a governing body between his borough councilor and his Member of Parliament. It handles such matters as housing, traffic control and education. Labour's guidance of the old LCC led to many progressive social policies and had been a great source of pride to the labour movement. While local issues may often be of importance to these county elections, it is clear that this was not the case in London this time. The Wilson government was being served a decisive vote of no confidence from the electorate. The turn-out in London was just over 40 per cent which is low, of course, but just about what it was in 1964. A swing of about 12 per cent turned the previous Labour ascendancy of 64 to 36 into a Conservative landslide of 82 to 18. Many Labour voters stayed home, while the Conservatives brought out their supporters and, at the same time, gained the support of a number of people who had voted Labour in 1964 and 1966. Any hope that a progressive budget might stem the Conservative tide was dispelled by Callaghan's lackluster performance two days before the GLC election, when he once again demonstrated how un-Socialist a Socialist Chancellor of the Exchequer can be.

Waite, The Sun (London): Ben Roth
"At Last—Something in Common"

Unfortunately this means that the Tories will now push ahead with their typically selfish schemes in London—and in the other areas which they won—to sell Council Housing to the tenants, despite the shortages which still exist, and impede the development of comprehensive schooling. Labour even lost control of the Inner London Education Authority which the most wildly optimistic Conservative had not dared to think possible. While Heath and the Conservatives are jubilant, they know that this victory has come much too early in the life of the present Parliament. Elections for a new Parliament are not legally required until March of 1971 and in all likelihood they will be held some time in 1970. This means that if Labour should decide on elections in the fall of 1970, the Conservatives would have to defend their massive victory in these county elections just prior to a general election. It is unlikely that they would be able to hold all their gains, for Labour would long since have started to introduce policies designed to win a national election. So his recent big triumph carries certain built-in warnings for Heath.

As for Labour, its only consolation from this debacle will come if Harold Wilson and his cabinet sit down and reread their party platforms of 1964 and 1966. In an attempt to win over more of the middle class, and to please the business community, they have succeeded in alienating the working class, the trade unions, the intellectuals and the Socialist militants. The Wilson government has been conservative and orthodox in its economic policies of "squeeze" and "freeze." These deflationary policies have nothing to do with socialism and the creation of a society in which social justice has been achieved for every citizen. As one Socialist put it in a pub: "Bloody traitors! They care more for Johnson and the bankers than for their own people."

George Wallace: 'Running for God'

ROBERT G. SHERRILL

Mr. Sherrill, The Nation's Washington correspondent, is on a political tour of the South.

Montgomery

As long as George Wallace is dispensing what one critic called his "benign hatefulness" within the boundaries of Alabama, the 150-pound anarchist shows many talents, and they are all his own. But in national politics he can be taken semi-seriously only while he has the support of two props, both borrowed from the weaknesses of others.

First, there is the strange reluctance of the federal executive to enforce laws and of federal judges to protect the dignity of their courts. For most of Wallace's term as governor, he was under an injunction not to interfere with school integration; although he daily violated the injunction and was in contempt of court, federal judges who were asked to punish him steadfastly refused to do so. Now Wallace's wife is again flouting the courts and, to the extent that the Wallaces get by with this, his image will be artificially enlarged. Crush him as Orval Faubus was crushed at Little Rock, and his career will never again seriously seep past the boundaries of Alabama.

His second prop comes from the sentimental forgetfulness of the national press. Wallace's three-state campaign in 1964 was seen by most reporters as the most toxic kind of racism. They weren't fooled by the magnolia deodorant. But sometimes the national press now seems to be getting tolerant of scented bigotry. Typical of this dangerous shift is Tom Wicker's report in the April

Harper's, in which he apologized for Wallace ("what he has really 'stood up' for is the age-old streak of 'practicality' and earthy common sense in mankind") and, for bad measure, threw in an empirically unsound psychoanalysis of that element of society which has heretofore given its heart to him ("... it is not so blatant a thing as racism, or even violence, but the old basic natural instincts of self-preservation, survival of the fittest, kill or be killed, that George Corley Wallace Jr. appeals to in practical men...").

And who are the "practical men" who eagerly anticipate Wallace's Presidential campaign? Gerald L. K. Smith has alerted his followers across the nation to begin petitioning to put Wallace on the ballot. Klan czar Shelton, one of Wallace's confidants, has said: "We made him Governor and we must make him President." The imperial wizard of the Interstate Klans (Maryland and Virginia) has wired Wallace his "100 per cent support."

If top political writers fail to see a racist as a racist, Wallace's image will be cleaned off enough for him to become a potent national political figure. Remove his props in the press and Washington officialdom, however, and Wallace will very likely fall flat. If his campaign for the Presidency flounders, he will be in trouble at home; much of his popularity in Alabama is based on his being a successful nettle to Yankee politicians. On the other hand, if troubles spring up first at home from other causes—as now seems possible—the base for his national campaign will be weakened. The necessity of a perfect interplay of success both at home and "out yonder" probably demands more luck than even Wallace is able to muster.

Out yonder, the political fields are already bright with Wallace's dandelions: the Conservative Party of Alabama, the Constitution Party of Florida, the American Party of Georgia, the Independence Party of Illinois, the American Constitution Party of Iowa, as yet untitled but organized activities in Kansas and Massachusetts, the American Party of Michigan, the American Conservative Party of Missouri, the New Jersey Conservative Party, the New York Conservative Party, the Constitutional Party of Pennsylvania, the Conservative Party of Texas, the Virginia Conservative Party (which, by the way, considered Harry Byrd and Willis Robertson sellouts to the liberals), the Conservative Party of Washington and a new untitled movement in Wyoming.

Wallace's success with the more orthodox politicians of the South is much more iffy. Even Governor Maddox of Georgia [see Sherrill: "Strange Decorum of Lester Maddox," The Nation, May 1], strangely fickle, has announced that he doesn't like third parties. When Wallace heard about this, he told a group of Alabama political underlings that Maddox "doesn't have much character," and when Maddox heard about that he said Wallace was just sore "because he doesn't have me in his pocket"; and when Wallace heard about that he said something that can't be repeated here. It was a typical experience for Wallace at Presidential campaigning time. Politicians who court him at other times flee him then. He has been saying the same thing for three years, and what he says is meanly shallow.

To illustrate specifically, I quote a recent conversation I had with Wallace. It was a drop-in affair; this is one advantage Wallace has over just about every other major politician on the scene: he's accessible, amiable in argument, and loves to gab. I dropped in on him at the capitol at 5 P.M., without appointment, and he invited me in for three hours of rapid-fire talk and chain smoking (cigars). Because he routinely curses liberal newspapers and magazines, some local newsmen doubted that he would talk to me at all, which shows they don't know their governor de facto very well; in his strange journalistic pantheon, The Nation is viewed as no more liberal than the Birmingham News and the Alabama Journal, although these latter are about as liberal as the Chicago Tribune. "Let's go across the hall and talk," he said. "Maybe I can persuade you differently."

So we plunged in, and what we came up with is something that with only minor variations and expansions the nation is going to hear, again and again, during the coming months. Wallace seldom varies his tune.

Q. William J. Simmons, executive director of the Citizens Councils of America, said recently that he was discouraged because you still haven't formally declared your candidacy. Are you definitely going to run for President?

A. Absolutely.

Q. You'll get most of your support from the right wing, I suppose. Why don't you dissociate yourself from the kooks if you want to be taken seriously?

A. Well, Kennedy and Lyndon Johnson got support from the Daily Worker. Why didn't they disavow that?

Q. They would have, if anybody had asked them. I'm asking you about the Klan.

A. Well, I'm not going to say anything about it. I made my statement about the Klan in 1958.

Q. But four years later you had taken the Klan's side and the Klan was out nailing up your campaign posters. The Klan has been for you ever since.

A. I don't know who hammers up my posters, but I appreciate all the help I can get. Some of the people out soliciting help for us aren't authorized to do it, but I'm not criticizing them. I will determine the issues and the platform and the way we run our campaign; they won't. We've got some of the finest folks in the country writing us letters encouraging us, legislators in a great number of states, people in local Democrat and Republican committees telling us they will vote for us no matter what ticket we run on; bankers, businessmen, officials—not high up, you know—in local labor unions. [Selma's ex-Sheriff Jim Clark, arch reactionary Kent Courtney, and anti-Semite Gerald L. K. Smith are among those helping Wallace. His campaign manager, Bill Jones, told me later: "We'd refuse Gus Hall's support in a minute, but it isn't that easy with Shelton's support." He was speaking of Klan leader Robert Shelton.]

Q. On July 14, 1964, in Little Rock, you said you were definitely a candidate and that you had no plans to get out of the race. But five days later you withdrew. Is there a chance you will again withdraw at the last minute?

A. I am definitely going to run as a Presidential candidate.

Q. And you really think you can win?

A. Yessir, I could win the Presidency. I got 34 per cent of the vote in Wisconsin. That was three years ago. A lot has happened since then to show the people I'm not what the newspapers said I was. All you got to have to win is a plurality. Abe Lincoln only got 40 per cent of the vote. Go to Detroit and Youngstown and Los Angeles—ask them who they're going to vote for. Ask the taxi drivers and the policemen.

Q. It was widely believed that oil billionaire H. L. Hunt bankrolled your primary campaigns in 1964. Will he help you in 1968?

A. Mr. Hunt didn't contribute in any of the three-state primary campaigns. We will accept money from anybody that wants to help us. Of course, we wouldn't accept money from gangsters or subversives. You know how Mr. Hunt is. He went to the Southern Governors' Conference and wanted to meet everybody and pass out leaflets. That's what he gives politicians—leaflets, not money. I'm not making fun of him. But he didn't give us money. [Nevertheless, they are friends. HLH watched Johnson's inauguration from Wallace's suite. When Wallace addressed the Jaycees in Dallas, HLH accompanied him to the airport and talked with him at length before Wallace departed. They get together whenever possible.]

Q. There were many rumors of wealthy right wingers supporting you in 1964. Where did you get your money?

A. We got $396,000 from voluntary contributions: a road block at Americus, Ga., a radio program in Texas, that sort of thing. Just little friends everywhere. We paid the state of Alabama $7,000 for some phone calls. We were going to pay for the use of the state airplane, but the legislature passed a resolution forgiving that debt. So we took the $10,000 we were going to use for that and gave it to a private school. [Statements filed in Baltimore circuit court showed Wallace spent $90,000 in Maryland. The Indianapolis Times estimated the Wallace fund in Indiana at $50,000. If he spent as much in Wisconsin as in Maryland and Indiana together, that still would leave $100,000 unaccounted for. One rumor of 1964 was that Wallace was profiting nicely as a candidate.]

Q. What private school?

A. I forget the name. I don't recall.

Q. Was it the private school set up to beat desegregation in Tuskegee?

A. Yes, that was it.

Q. There was a rumor in 1964 that Roger Milliken, the South Carolina Republican mill owner, bought you out of the Presidential campaign. There was a rumor that he paid you $25,000 to get out so Goldwater would have a straight shoot at the South.

A. I don't even know Milliken. What's his name? Milliken? No. I don't even know him. Let me take that back. I've shaken so many thousands of hands, if he came through that door right there, I might know him. Goldwater didn't even know I was going to get out. A lot of my friends complained that I was splitting the conservatives. That's not going to bother me next time. [The idea that he could be bought off troubled him. He kept gnawing at it.] To take money to get out, that would indicate I was in the campaign to make money. Hell, if I wanted to make money, I could make plenty as governor.

Q. You've had nothing but racial troubles in Alabama. What are you going to suggest, as a Presidential candidate, to cure the nation's racial problems?

A. The first thing we've got to do to get rid of racial trouble is get rid of hypocrisy. The liberal says the nigger should be integrated, and then the liberal Congressman sends his kids to a private school. Harold Howe [U.S. Commissioner of Education] sends his kids to a private school. It makes the niggers wonder. In Madison, Wis., a woman come up to me and said it was awful the way niggers are treated. She said she knew a nigger with a college diploma running an elevator in that town. I told her if she would give me his name and address I would get him a job in a nigger college in Alabama. This is a state where a nigger can aspire to be a college president, but he can't in New York City.

My wife received 40 per cent of the nigger vote. She carried the nigger vote in Selma. These niggers know I want them to get educated. The only thing that stands between economic integration and the Alabama nigger is an education, and I want him to get it. The niggers are coming out of these trade schools and going to work for $40 a day, or at least $100 a week. I have them tell me, "Governor, we're for you because you educated us." I built eight trade schools just for niggers. They're segregated in a way, but if you want to go out there and enroll, they'll enroll you. A nigger woman cooking in a café called me back to the kitchen to thank me for the free textbooks her kids are getting.

Q. If education is all that stands between the Negro and economic integration, and if Alabama has so many good trade schools and junior colleges for Negroes, why are there no Negro secretaries and no Negro bookkeepers and other office help working here in the capitol?

A. We have more Negro employees in Alabama state government than in California and New York put together. [Yes, he did say "Negro"—the word sometimes passes his lips.] I forget the exact figure in those states, but I'm sure we have more. We have 8,000 Negro teachers, and their average pay check—because they're better educated than the white teachers—is higher than the whites'.

Q. You're talking only about teachers. Why aren't some of these well-trained Negroes working here in the capitol building? I don't see any.

A. Well, you say they should be hired, and then when I tell you we have hired them, you say they should be hired here. That's the way with you liberals. You want to tell people not only who to hire but where to hire them.

Q. Something must be wrong with your system of befriending the Negroes, since Alabama Negroes show one of the highest rates of venereal disease, illiteracy and poverty.

A. You have to understand their problem historically.

Q. All right, so you will campaign for more education for Negroes. What else?

A. The second thing you've got to do is give more protection. The Negroes want more "police-es" [this is Wallace's "Negroizing" of the plural for police], too. They hide under the beds in Harlem during those riots. They want strict law enforcement. The courts wouldn't let us limit the number of marchers in the Selma march, so 40,000 marchers came into this town of 140,000. But the courts let them limit the number of marchers in Chicago. There's a town of 5 or 6 million but they limited the march to 500. That's where the marchers need protection, in the North, not down here. That's where lots of police protection is necessary just for living.

If a white man poked, pinched and fiddled with a nigger woman on the street here, he'd get the hell knocked out of him by a policeman. Same if a nigger man did that to a white woman. We know how to live together down here. You can walk through the nigger section without fear. A nigger can walk through the white section. We've got good law enforcement in Alabama. [This was the day after the third church burning in a week in Lowndes County.] The intellectual morons think people should be forced to mingle. That's not the way to get along with each other. I don't think the niggers are inferior, but integration just doesn't work out. There have been twelve stabbings in schools in Alabama where the races are mixed.

I'm not just against the government telling you you've got to sell your home to a nigger. I would be just as much against the government telling you you can't sell your home to a nigger. I'm against the government telling you anything about selling your home. Manufacturers who move in here tell me: "We've got to hire some niggers, you know, Governor," and I say, "I don't care if you hire 100 per cent niggers. I think you should hire whoever you want to hire. That's your business, not the government's." If a local school board wanted to integrate, I wouldn't like it, I would be against it, but I wouldn't try to stop it. [This was about a week before he wrote the speech for Lurleen in which she implied that the state might seize forceably any school that was integrated to make it resume its segregated ways. About forty of 118 school districts in Alabama have complied with HEW guidelines voluntarily.] I'm not against a local school doing anything it wants, what I'm against is the intellectual morons trying to force their preferences on other people. I'm for what will work, not for theorizin', and we have found that segregation works best. All this theorizin' has got Cleveland and Detroit and New York in a lot of trouble.

Q. Why are you down on the "intellectual morons," as you call them? Why are you down on the intellectuals?

A. They're always trying to get their theorizin' forced on people. They think everything that HEW wants it should get, and I don't think HEW is any smarter than the people of Alabama. The intellectual morons in New York wanted to recognize Castro, and I used to tell the folks during my campaign: "Those intellectual morons couldn't see Castro was a Communist, but you people with just common sense could see that just by looking at his picture, just by instincts." The instincts of a common-sense Alabamian is better than the brains of a New York intellectual moron.

Q. Your distaste for intellectuals, does that mean you didn't do very well in college?

A. I made average grades.

Q. Do you read much? What do you read?

A. (After a long pause.) I read mostly magazines but I read some books.

Q. What books do you read?

A. Well, I even read Das Kapital once, but I couldn't understand it. Can you? [Three years ago in Baltimore he was asked a similar question; his head snapped back as though he were dodging a punch and he answered: "That question is 'bout to get me. Course I read Socrates, Plato and Aristotle and all those folks. And Machiavelli."] I like to read books like Lee's Lieutenants. I like books about the Civil War best, about people dying for a cause, brave men, North and South.

Q. Brave people like the protesters who came South and got knocked in the head by Al Lingo's policemen?

A. No, they got more protection here than they would have got in the North, and besides they wanted to be hurt to embarrass the South. Northern politicians are always complaining because we don't give protection down here. Hell, Martin Luther King can come to Alabama without protection, but when I go to Boston they have to lead me through tunnels for protection.

Couple of years ago, Governor Dempsey of Connecticut wired me criticizing, and they were about to tear down New Haven around his ears right then. Pat Brown wired me that they knew how to live together out there—Nigger-Americans, Spanish-Americans, Polish-Americans, Italian-Americans, French-Americans and all sorts of hyphenated Americans—and while I was reading his wire, the niggers was burning down Watts. A lot of people told me I should wire him back, "I told you so," but I don't believe in making political capital out of that sort of thing. A reporter asked me if it didn't please me to see Brown's troubles, and I said it certainly did not please me to have that sort of thing happen. Governor Egan of Alaska wired me and said I should stop causing all the racial trouble and I drafted a wire saying he must have caused the Alaska earthquake with all his loud talk, but I didn't send it. I don't like to stoop to that level.

Q. What has President Johnson failed to do that you would have done if you were President?

A. If I was President, I would have the Justice Department grab them by the long hair—these intellectual morons, these professors, these students tearing up their draft cards, raising money and blood for the Vietcong—and have them charged with treason, have them tried and put away. I'm not talking about the men who write we shouldn't be over there or dissenters in Congress. I'm talking about those who actually help the enemy. We're at war. It doesn't matter whether Johnson had the legal right to send the troops over there.

Q. You didn't like it when President Kennedy sent the National Guard to Tuscaloosa to throw you out of the schoolhouse door. In fact, you thought Kennedy was acting illegally and you have said so a thousand times. If you are on the side of the soldiers in Vietnam, whether or not the President was legally correct in sending them there, why weren't you on the side of the soldiers and what they were doing at Tuscaloosa, whether Kennedy was legally right or not?

A. That was different. I didn't have to be on the soldiers' side. They were on my side. As [Deputy Attorney General Nicholas] Katzenbach walked by them, some of the soldiers called him a dirty bastard and a sonofabitch. They said: "Why don't you get out of here, you dirty bastard," and things like that. I think if Katzenbach and his crowd had laid a hand on me, the soldiers and the troopers there, well, they just wouldn't have allowed it. I know that General Graham, we didn't see eye to eye in all things, but I think he would have asked to be relieved before he would have ordered the troops to lay a hand on me. The Birmingham papers reported he said: "It is my duty to take over." Why, hell, everybody knows he said: "It is my sad duty."

Q. Many people say that little episode at the University of Alabama was rehearsed by you and the U. S. Attorney General. Bob Gilchrist [a former Alabama state Senator] said everybody in the legislature knew what script you were going to follow.

A. That scene wasn't worked out beforehand. Robert Kennedy wanted to, but I wouldn't do it. I have a record of our discussion. If he consents to release the record, so will I.

Q. Anyway, you lost that fuss at the University, just as you have lost all your other segregation fusses with the government.

A. I didn't say we could win it. I just said we would call attention to the liberties that are being stolen all over this country. That's all. That's why I stood in the door.

Q. How do you get along with the President?

A. He's always been very pleasant to me. I've always been treated real nice in Washington. The last time I was up there I sat at a table with Mrs. [Sargent] Shriver and she was kind enough to remember that I had escorted her into the Alabama delegation at the 1956 convention, and they gave her a standing ovation. I was for Kennedy. I have a lot of friends in Washington.

Q. Has Lyndon Johnson encouraged you to get in the race to draw right-wing votes away from the Republicans?

A. My candidacy won't help Johnson. That's where you fellows in the liberal press are all wrong. I carried Gary, Ind. I carried the Southside of Milwaukee. Go to Baltimore and see where I'm popular. I'm popular in the workingman's neighborhoods. I'm popular where they ordinarily would vote Democratic. [It's true he did well in some Democratic redoubts in 1964 but he also carried, for example, solid Republican suburbs near Milwaukee and Madison.]

Q. On my way here I stopped by to see [ex-Governor]

Folsom and he said you and Lyndon are "thick as thieves." He said Johnson stirred up the guidelines issue just before the primaries last year to swing the white voters solidly behind you. And Big Jim isn't the only one in Alabama saying that.

A. You think LBJ got the guidelines to come out at that point to help me? That's ridiculous. You know better than that. He probably didn't know the guidelines were even out.

Q. You aren't saying that Jim Folsom would lie about it, are you? You used to be a Folsom man. In fact, he got you started in big-time politics, didn't he?

A. No, I wasn't for Folsom. I was against him in 1946. But then I got five trade schools through the legislature, and I was thinking about running for Congress, although I would never have run against George Andrews—he is the greatest Congressman, so far as I am concerned, and I stand for everything he does—but I was thinking about it, and I asked Folsom to put one of those schools in my Congressional District in case I ran, and he said he would. I guess I told him I would do anything he wanted, if he would do that. So six or seven years later he decided to run again, and he came to me and said: "You remember what you promised." and I said: "Yes, I said I would give you my support." and he said: "No, you said you would do anything I asked, and I am asking you to be my south Alabama manager." Well, I went to Governor Chauncy Sparks and asked him what I should do, because I didn't want to do it, and he said: "Did you promise?" and I said: "Yes, I guess I did," and he said: "Well, you'd better go ahead and do it then because you can't break your word in politics." So I said to myself: "Well, maybe I can have a good effect on Jim's administration"—that's how I salved my conscience.

Well, so Jim was elected, but then I saw that those who was around him was drinking and stealing, and I got out because I figured they would all wind up in the penitentiary. Course, I don't like to go into that now, because Jim is sick in the head and all that. He supported Lurleen. [Folsom, who ran again for governor in 1966, used an old movie in his primary campaign showing Wallace standing before a crowd yelling: "If it's Folsomism, I'm for Folsomism!" But the Folsom administration had its shady episodes, and Wallace doesn't like to be reminded of how close he was to Folsom at one time.]

Q. Even some of your enemies concede that your administration was fairly honest. Gilchrist said you are too ambitious to be crooked.

A. There may have been some stealing in this administration, but none of it took place in this office. [Attorney General Richmond] Flowers would send over word that he wanted to look at all the books in some office and I would tell the official in that office: "You give him everything he wants—everything—and if he finds something wrong, you're out." I told my cabinet I'm not keeping crooks.

Q. You made quite a to-do over the Supreme Court decision on school prayers. Are you a religious man?

A. My family upbringing was religious. My uncle was ■ Populist and a doctor who treated everyone whether they could pay or not. He was a religious man, a Methodist, who had a prayer session in his office every day. I'm a Methodist too, but not as good a Christian as I want to be. I go to church, but not as regularly as I want to.

Q. You think it might be a Christian gesture not to mistreat Negroes?

A. The Christian thing is to get along with them, and the South does this, although there might be a little paternalism.

Q. The way you've floated bond issues and put the state in debt to build roads and schools, some people in Alabama call you a red-eyed liberal.

A. I'm not a liberal. A liberal is one who used to be against laws infringing on the rights of the individual. Now the liberal wants the government to lay down all sorts of guidelines, telling us to send our kids to this school or that school, not to build that school, to tear down another school. I believe in spending on schools. I believe in teaching niggers a trade to get them so they can support themselves and not be a drag. I believe in spending for aid to dependent children, but we had a campaign in my administration to find out if all those missing daddies was really missing, and we found that a lot of those missing daddies was living in the same town, and we took them to court and made them start supporting their own kids. I believe in good pensions. The average of our Alabama pensioners is 75, and 3 per cent of them are over 90 years old. These people are destitute. We've got to help them. I want to help them. Our average pension payment is $80 a month, the highest in the Deep South, and I'm not ashamed of it. I'm proud of that. [Former Congressman Carl Elliott claims that the average old-age pension has actually dropped from $75 to $72 a month during Wallace's control of the capitol.]

I'm proud to borrow money for highways. We borrowed $125 million during my administration, and if I had been governor forty years ago I'd have borrowed it forty years ago so we could have had our good highways a lot sooner. You borrow $100 million to build roads, and you've got to pay a lot of interest, but the land that road goes through increases in value by $150 million or $200 million, and we get taxes on that. And it brings in industry. Things spring up all along these new highways, and that means jobs.

Q. You spend a lot of that money to help industries that don't need any help, don't you? And make the poor people pay for the cost of those bonds and high interest?

A. We used $5 million of one bond issue to build a bridge over the Alabama River because we promised a Canadian paper company we would do it if they came down here, and they came down here, and they are building a $100 million plant. Of course, they got a tax advantage on that investment. I guess you could call me a Populist. That's probably not a bad definition. One reason these flaming liberals are afraid of me is that I'm not against helping people who need help.

Q. The poor people pay for their own help in this state. You've strapped them with a 4 per cent sales tax, across the board, plus a 2 per cent local sales tax in some cities. You don't tax industry that hard.

A. I'm sorry about the sales tax. I was against it when I was in the legislature. I filibustered against it. But I'm going to get a bill through this legislature to charge banks interest on state money deposited with them. That'll be a first, and it will bring in $4 million a year and we'll use that to upgrade our hospital system. We're also going to rebuild the prison system from the ground up. And we're putting in a trade school in the prison big enough to handle the younger inmates who are there because they couldn't earn a living in the first place.

Q. You keep complaining that the press has written insulting things about your personal habits. I haven't read any such accounts. What has been written about you that you don't like?

A. Time magazine said I picked my teeth with a soiled toothpick. Phil Carter of Newsweek said to me: "I'm a good Mississippi boy and I understand you, Governor, so let me travel with you and give you a good story," and I said: "O. K., come along, podnuh; I know you won't write it right, but come along." And I took him in to eat with me, and he wrote in his story that I ate with a sucking sound.

Q. Are you thin-skinned about what is written about you?

A. Oh, no. If I cared what people say about me, I'd have had a heart attack long ago. After I spoke at the National Press Club in Washington they voted not to give me a citation. They gave them to Khrushchev and Castro, but they wouldn't give one to me.

Q. As a matter of fact, in a subtle way, you abuse the press sometimes, don't you?

A. No. I protect the press. Sometime I used to talk about a particular reporter being in the crowd and what his paper or magazine had said about Alabama. I would say: "And here's Esquire"—their reporter had more hair than you ever seen—and I would point him out and say something about him, or about the Los Angeles Times man. After a while, when a little woman with an umbrella came up and threatened the reporters, and some steelworkers said, "Here's the sonsofbitches, let's get 'em," the reporters came to me and said: "Governor, these people are going to harm us if you don't help us"; so thereafter I would tell the crowds: "Now, let's treat these reporters polite and show 'em and the rest of the world that we are just as cultivated and refined as anybody anywhere." [This trick of "protecting" reporters after arousing the crowd against them is something Wallace picked up from Faubus, who often used it in the hot days after Little Rock.]

Wallace asked me to stay for supper, but three hours of ideological bombardment from the Governor's husband is enough for one sitting. Well, that's his line. It is 1964 warmed over on a very low flame. "Niggers" need to be given a trade-school education and then isolated; he believes in local determination, so long as it coincides with the whim of the state's chief executive; he thinks this country is still sending supplies to Cuba; anyone in Washington who disagrees with him is a "pinknik" or "intellectual moron." It just doesn't seem likely that this, as a national platform, will thrill the 40 per cent of the electorate that Wallace is counting on.

Meanwhile, at home the Wallace cult is not as solid as it might seem. The state Democratic Executive Committee is headed by Robert S. Vance of Birmingham, who is a "national" Democrat. He was elected chairman over Wallace's opposition, and in October Wallace tried to get a majority of the seventy-two members to sign a petition to convene and kick out Vance. This was Wallace's opening move in his latest Presidential bid. But he failed to get a majority to sign; in fact, he got only thirty-two. This was a blow. He may still try to take over the Democratic committee, buying a majority with paving contracts, insurance premiums and appointments to public office.

But if he succeeds, he will meet immediate opposition from forces that are still in a disorganized, guerrilla condition, but ready to organize. The leadership will come from Judge Roy Mayhall of Jasper, the former chairman of the committee, once a Wallace supporter but now a blood enemy. Mayhall swings a great deal of weight among national Democrats of the state. He told The Nation that if Wallace takes over the state Democratic Party apparatus, he and a dozen other members of the committee are prepared to reorganize under the title "National Democratic Party" and get on the Alabama ballot under the donkey emblem (the traditional Democratic emblem in that state is the cock). He is convinced that their Democratic organization would be recognized over Wallace's at the national convention and that it would pull one-third of the votes in the primary—sufficient to bruise Wallace's image heavily enough for the whole country to see.

If, on the other hand, Wallace chooses to disregard the executive committee and go the third-party route even in his own state, says Mayhall, this would leave the nationally oriented Democrats in control of the party machinery and the party funds.

Allan Shivers, at one time one of the most powerful politicians in the South, professed to be a Democrat for local purposes but deserted his national leaders in 1952, 1956 and 1960. Today Shivers is completely discredited. "Wallace is following the Shivers line," said Mayhall, "and when things swing, he'll be as dead as Shivers."

At the capitol, Wallace has other problems. The Alabama Highway Department is bankrupt. It is staying in business solely with some funds left over from an old bond issue. When a Highway Department (the most important patronage slush fund at a governor's disposal) operates on bond money, things are in a bad shape. Furthermore, the big city legislators—who, through reapportionment, can finally match the strength of the rural bloc—are determined to get a better cut of the highway money. If one of their plans succeeds, it will mean the end of the farm-to-market program. When those farmers no longer see the fresh asphalt being poured in stringy strips through the backwoods, they are going to be unhappy. More unhappiness will be aroused when Wallace, as he must, pushes up taxes on either gasoline, or registration tags, or trucks—or all of them.

Wallace holds complete control over the legislature in emotional areas like the Negro question, but in economic matters it is another thing. State Sen. Hugh Morrow, a Birmingham banker who heads the powerful

Jefferson County delegation (one-fifth of the Senate, enough to keep a filibuster going till doomsday), says flatly that the urban crowd is willing to do battle with Wallace's country backers. "We're going to be sonof-bitches like they've been all these years," he says. "We've been pushed around long enough. Up to reapportionment, they didn't care if we had time to read a bill before they passed it."

In four years of the previous Wallace administration, the Alabama House was such a rubber-stamp affair that only one Wallace bill—an insignificant one, at that—was voted down. Things may be different this time.

The potential of rebellion was seen most dramatically when the legislature gave itself a generous pay raise by overriding a George and Lurleen veto. The legislature also spat back Lurleen's nomination for the directorship of the liquor control board, on a technicality that in the old days could easily have been worked out. And whereas in 1963 Wallace got his highway bond program accepted in two weeks, this time it has taken two months.

Does this kind of recalcitrance mean that the solid Wallace front is cracking at home? Cracking, perhaps; no more than that. But it is causing talk. As a Birmingham newspaper editor put it privately: "Look, this is amazing. Wallace holds all the cards. He owns the speaker in the House and the lieutenant governor in the Senate. For the first time in modern history, the governor controls the committee-naming mechanism in the Senate. Yet, here at the outset of the legislative session he has a full-scale rebellion on his hands! The way things look from the outside, this legislature should be rigged for Wallace. And yet I hear about the governor's floor leader walking up to a small county legislator and saying about the bond program: 'This is the governor's program,' and the small county legislator saying, 'So what?' and walking away. That's very, very interesting."

If Wallace manipulates the legislature into another rubber-stamp session, the victory will be his. But if the cracks begin to widen and his program falls through, the scorn also will be his—not Lurleen's. For after ninety days of the new regime, the pretense of Mrs. Wallace's being called "Governor" except for ceremonial occasions is transparent to even the thickest of Alabamians. For a while a flurry of stories was spun around the question of whether or not she would have anything to say about how things go in the state. The Wall Street Journal story of December 1 was typical: "Who will wear the pants in the governor's mansion here? Surprisingly, that's a matter for speculation. At first, nearly everyone here assumed that if Mrs. George Wallace was elected to succeed her husband as governor of Alabama, Mr. Wallace simply would continue in charge. But now that she has been elected, some people aren't so sure." If they still aren't so sure, then they are either blind or very dull. Wallace runs everything; Mrs. Wallace is a ribbon cutter. Alabama newspaper reporters would no more think of querying her on an important governmental issue than they would think of going to one of the capitol custodians. Legislators and lobbyists deal with him altogether. Wallace's office is across the hall from hers, but he still uses the antechamber to the governor's office as if it were his own. He leaves his office and goes through a door on her side of the hall that allows him to emerge into the governor's antechamber, howdying and shaking hands with all the folks waiting there, just as in the old days.

Bill Jones, Wallace's former press aide and now his Presidential campaign manager, claims that "Wallace never pretended that Mrs. Wallace would act as governor except for ceremonies." As a matter of fact, though it was always stressed during her campaign that he would be her number-one adviser, it was also stressed that she is capable of running the state herself and that he would be busy, much of the time, "running for God," as one Alabama legislator put it.

Things have not turned out that way. Mrs. Wallace is not capable of running the legislature, much less the state. As this becomes increasingly evident to Alabamians, Wallace, not his wife, will have to assume public responsibility for the mistakes of this administration. And as he steps up his Presidential campaign, he will have to relax his hold on state government and the fumbles will become more numerous. Also, if one judges by past Alabama history, the real looting will begin. The two administrations prior to Wallace's coming to power were well larded with crooks; ambition, if nothing else, has kept Wallace clean, but not all the men around him have shown the same disposition. With him out of the state, they can be expected to start grabbing. Some of them have already tried, but it was promptly quieted. Open scandal is something Alabamians will not forgive. They did not forgive the sins of the Patterson and Folsom administrations. It is not likely that Wallace, for all his present popularity, could survive it either. In the late 1950s, Gov. Marvin Griffin of Georgia was the loudest segregationist in the South, but his administration was also one of the most corrupt. Today, he could not win the lowest office in that state. And the longer a governor is in office, the harder it is to control his grabby followers. Faubus, who set a record in Arkansas for unbroken service as a Southern governor, managed to keep down the scandal until his last months in office, but then things began falling. Sadly, Faubus told Roy Reed of The New York Times that the more success a governor has at the ballot box, the more difficulties he has maintaining discipline among the troops. Now this will begin to be Wallace's big problem. And he must lick it, for while no state loves its segregation more than Alabama, most Southerners are not sold on what the great political writer Charles Pou once described as the "if-you-ain't-for-stealing-you-ain't-for-segregation" rationale.

THE PERJURY ROUTINE

IRVING YOUNGER

Mr. Younger is professor of law at New York University School of Law. He was formerly Assistant United States Attorney for the Southern District of New York.

On March 20, in McCray v. Illinois, the Supreme Court held that when, on being questioned as to whether there was probable cause to arrest a defendant, a policeman testifies that a "reliable informant" told him that the defendant was committing a crime, the policeman need not name the informant. Justice Stewart, for himself and four other members of the Court, said that "nothing in the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment requires a state court judge in every such hearing to assume the arresting officers are committing perjury."

Why not? Every lawyer who practices in the criminal courts knows that police perjury is commonplace.

The reason is not hard to find. Policemen see themselves as fighting a two-front war—against criminals in the street and against "liberal" rules of law in court. All's fair in this war, including the use of perjury to subvert "liberal" rules of law that might free those who "ought" to be jailed. And even if his lies are exposed in the courtroom, the policeman is as likely to be indicted for perjury by his co-worker, the prosecutor, as he is to be struck down by thunderbolts from an avenging heaven.

It is a peculiarity of our legal system that the police have unique opportunities (and unique temptations) to give false testimony. When the Supreme Court lays down a rule to govern the conduct of the police, the rule does not enforce itself. Some further proceeding, such as the "probable cause" hearing in McCray, is almost always necessary to determine what actually happened. In Mapp v. Ohio, for example, the Supreme Court laid down the rule that evidence obtained by the police through an unreasonable search and seizure may not be used in a state criminal prosecution. But before applying the rule to any particular case, a hearing must be held to establish the facts. Then the judge decides whether those facts constitute an unreasonable search and seizure. In Miranda v. Arizona, the Court held that a suspect must be fully warned of his right to remain silent and to the assistance of counsel before his statements will be admissible against him. But in any particular case, as under Mapp, a hearing must first be held to determine whether the suspect was in fact properly warned. Only if the judge concludes that he was properly warned do his statements come into evidence against him.

Such hearings usually follow a standard pattern. The policemen testify to their version of the circumstances of the search or of the interrogation, always reflecting perfect legality. The defendant testifies to his version, always reflecting egregious illegality. The judge must choose between two statements, and, not surprisingly, he almost always accepts the policeman's word.

The difficulty arises when one stands back from the particular case and looks at a series of cases. It then becomes apparent that policemen are committing perjury at least in some of them, and perhaps in nearly all of them. Narcotics prosecutions in New York City can be so viewed. Before Mapp, the policeman typically testified that he stopped the defendant for little or no reason, searched him, and found narcotics on his person. This had the ring of truth. It was an illegal search (not based upon "probable cause"), but the evidence was admissible because Mapp had not yet been decided. Since it made no difference, the policeman testified truthfully. After the decision in Mapp, it made a great deal of difference. For the first few months, New York policemen continued to tell the truth about the circumstances of their searches, with the result that evidence was suppressed. Then the police made the great discovery that if the defendant drops the narcotics on the ground, after which the policeman arrests him, then the search is reasonable and the evidence is admissible. Spend a few hours in the New York City Criminal Court nowadays, and you will hear case after case in which a policeman testifies that the defendant dropped the narcotics on the ground, whereupon the policeman arrested him. Usually the very language of the testimony is identical from one case to another.

This is now known among defense lawyers and prosecutors as "dropsy" testimony. The judge has no reason to disbelieve it in any particular case, and of course the judge must decide each case on its own evidence, without regard to the testimony in other cases. Surely, though, not in every case was the defendant unlucky enough to drop his narcotics at the feet of a policeman. It follows that at least in some of these cases the police are lying.

Precisely because a judge is limited to the evidence in the particular case before him, judicial recognition of the problem of police perjury is extremely rare. It happened in 1965, however, in the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia. In Veney v. United States, the prosecutor offered evidence that each defendant had spontaneously apologized to the victim. Such spontaneous apologies had, six years before, been held admissible despite unlawful delay in arraigning the defendant. Judge J. Skelly Wright, in a concurring opinion, wrote:

For some time now I have been curious and concerned about evidence offered by the Government, appearing again and again in criminal cases, showing that the defendant, at the lineup or other confrontation with the complaining witness, had, while in the presence and custody of the police, "spontaneously and voluntarily" apologized for his misdeed. The word "apologize" would not ordinarily be expected to be in the vocabularies of most of the poorly educated defendants. And even if it were, it seemed more than passing strange, to me at least, that this phenomenon of contrition should assert itself so soon after the offensive act. I began a search to solve the mystery. My efforts were first rewarded by my discovery of the case [in which the court had held spontaneous apologies by defendants admissible despite delay in arraigning them]. . . . Since our ruling in [that case], and, particularly in the more recent past, "spontaneous" apologies by defendants have been offered by the Government and received in evidence in criminal cases with unusual frequency—usually supported by testimony that the apologies were not suggested or inspired by the police. . . . In view of the above, it appears to me that the time is ripe for some soul searching in the prosecutor's office before it offers any more "spontaneous" apologies in evidence.

This year has also seen the beginning of official attempts to cope with the problem of police perjury. In March, 1966, the American Law Institute promulgated a Model Code of Pre-Arrest Procedure, which provides that the police must make a tape recording of their questioning of an arrested person in order "to help eliminate factual disputes concerning what was said." More recently, the 20th police precinct in New York City has begun to tape-record all interviews with suspects.

But there will be no tape recordings on the streets, and perhaps the Supreme Court in McCray should not so casually have rejected the idea of a constitutional presumption that policemen commit perjury. There is ample factual basis for the presumption, and the courts, despite their reticence, are no strangers to those facts. Indeed, the dissenters in McCray hinted as much when they pointed out that "it is not unknown for the arresting officer to misrepresent his connection with the informer, his knowledge of the informer's reliability, or the information allegedly obtained from the informer."

Far from adopting a presumption of perjury, the McCray case almost guarantees wholesale police perjury. When his conduct is challenged as constituting an unreasonable search and seizure, all the policeman need say is that an unnamed "reliable informant" told him that the defendant was committing a crime. Henceforth, every policeman will have a genie-like informer to legalize his master's arrests.

This affronts the dignity of the administration of justice. And since there will now always be an informer to establish "probable cause," hence making all searches and seizures reasonable and all evidence admissible, however obtained, McCray marks the end of the short life of Mapp v. Ohio.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Tolkien & Hesse: Top of the Pops

ROBERT SKLAR

Mr. Sklar is the author of F. Scott Fitzgerald: The Last Laocoön, just published by Oxford. He teaches at the University of Michigan.

Even for those who believe strongly, as I do, that the present-day young generation differs significantly from any that has come before, there are moments when the whole concept of a new and distinctive young generation threatens to collapse into a concoction of advertising acturaries and slick-magazine moralists. These are the moments when their taste in literature—if nothing else—redeems the young. Books are commodities as much as underarm deodorants, but as yet no monopolies limit the brands and no market research has come up with a package sure to sell. You can lead students to books, as any teacher can tell you, but they can't be forced to drink. Reading remains, like dying, a task most people have to do alone. The immense popularity of J. R. R. Tolkien's fantasies and the growing interest in Hermann Hesse's novels are better guides than most to the styles and moods of young people today.

The Tolkien fad began just at the time when young people sensed their own identity as a generation, when SNCC was breaking off from older civil rights groups, and the Free Speech Movement at Berkeley passed on the word: "You can't trust anyone over 30." But Tolkien himself, a retired professor of Anglo-Saxon, was in his 70s when students began to mine nicknames, epithets, slogans, and even complete languages from his books. And Hesse, a German writer born in the Bismarck era, who had been popular among the young before Marconi invented the wireless, had died at 85 in 1962. Neither in poetry, nor in prophecy, nor in any other sphere of imagination or intellect have the young taken so readily to guides and entertainers ancient enough to be their great-grandfathers.

There are enough sociological, psychological and literary hypotheses readily at hand to produce an explanation as scholarly and detailed as Tolkien's genealogies. But let us rest content with a simple truth: Tolkien and Hesse's visions of life accord with the contemporary visions of youth. In the same way, Sal-inger's The Catcher in the Rye and Golding's Lord of the Flies mirrored the youthful imagination of the past decade. And now that their popularity belongs to history we can see how blessedly far we have come. The Catcher in the Rye and Lord of the Flies reflected the fear young people felt in that era of McCarthy and the bomb, their helplessness, their hopelessness. Their tone matched the cynical style of those years, and raised to the level of art the bitter compromises youth managed then to make with such ease. Even the most pessimistic critics of long hair and sexual freedom would not want to return us to that.

One is tempted to add another hypothesis because it reflects a little credit on adults. Parents who panicked after Sputnik may find proof in the popularity of Tolkien and Hesse that our schools have brought about a whole new range of literacy. The best extracurricular reading students could manage fifteen years ago usually reached its peak at The Fountainhead. Salinger and Golding at least marked a step up to good writing; with Tolkien and Hesse we have attained an astonishing goal, with implications we have yet to grasp: youngsters reading as their favorites, by their own free choice, great works of literature.

You may not bridle to hear the works of a Nobel Prize winner called great. But what of The Lord of the Rings trilogy, with its enormous bulk, strange creatures, and stranger scholarly paraphernalia, language grammars, tables of dates, genealogies? I can say only this: initially I was put off by the cults and fetishes which surround it, by the crescendo of praise coming from hands grown gnarled with the beating of drums. But reading it won me over. I found The Lord of the Rings a work of immense narrative power that can sweep the unresisting reader up and hold him enthralled for days and weeks as he lives the story through.

Everyone must have heard by now a little of the ringbearer's tale. The ring first appeared in Tolkien's earlier, more simple story, The Hobbit, where Bilbo, the plump 3-foot-high creature after whom the book is named, finds it in a mountain cave. The ring makes its wearer invisible, and Bilbo uses it to good advantage during his adventures with the wizard Gandalf and a band of dwarfs. But by the first book of the trilogy, when the ring is owned by Frodo, Bilbo's nephew and heir, it has been revealed as the One Ring, key

Works of J. R. R. Tolkien

THE HOBBIT, or There and Back Again. Houghton Mifflin Co. 287 pp. $3.95. Ballantine Books. Paper 95c.

THE LORD OF THE RINGS. 3 Vols: The Fellowship of the Ring. 423 pp. The Two Towers. 352 pp. The Return of the King. Houghton Mifflin Co. 440 pp. $6 per vol. $17.50 the set. All available singly in paper: Ballantine Books. 95c each.

THE TOLKIEN READER: The Homecoming of Beorhtnoth Beorht-helm's Son. Tree and Leaf. Farmer Giles of Ham. The Adventures of Tom Bombadil. Ballantine Books. Paper 95c.

TREE AND LEAF. Houghton Mifflin Co. Illustrated. 112 pp. $4.

FARMER GILES OF HAM. Houghton Mifflin Co. Illustrated. 79 pp. $3.

THE ADVENTURES OF TOM BOMBADIL. Houghton Mifflin Co. Illustrated. 64 pp. $3.75.

Hermann Hesse in Paperback

SIDDHARTHA. Translated by Hilda Rosner. New Directions. 153 pp. $1.25.

DEMIAN. The Story of Emil Sinclair's Youth. Translated by Michael Roloff and Michael Lebeck. Bantam Books. 141 pp. 95c.

THE JOURNEY TO THE EAST. Translated by Hilda Rosner. Noonday Press. 118 pp. $1.25.

MAGISTER LUDI. Translated by Mervyn Savill. Frederick Ungar. 502 pp. $2.75.

STEPPENWOLF. Translated by Basil Creighton. Rinehart Editions. 218 pp. $1.65.

to supreme power over all Middle Earth. Evil Sauron had forged the ring. In his first bid for power, when his forces were defeated, he had lost it. But in his desolate land, Mordor, he prepares for a new attempt to conquer Middle Earth. With the ring he would be invincible; and though his opponents possess the ring it does them little good, for its powers work only for evil.

The one way to defeat Sauron is to destroy the ring, and the only way to destroy it is to throw it into the Crack of Doom, the fiery cauldron at the heart of Mordor where it was forged. This is the appalling task Frodo undertakes, with a small company of hobbits, men, an elf, a dwarf, and Gandalf the wizard. What happens to them on their journeys is the story Tolkien tells in The Lord of the Rings, with a vigor of language, a complexity of history and character and, above all, a pace and drive of action, adventure and excitement that make the reader feel he sits at the feet of an ancient bard.

Tolkien's trilogy indeed resembles the Anglo-Saxon chronicles he studied as a scholar. The Lord of the Rings is a work of art but it is also history—even if invented history—and it bears comparison to works of Gibbon or Parkman more readily than it does to other novels. The great historians are equally artists and builders of worlds. Gibbon's Rome and Parkman's French America are worlds as strange and distant from our own as Tolkien's Middle Earth. On the level of great historical narrative it matters little whether the events described can be absolutely verified; what matters far more is the historian's attitude toward his world and his treatment of it.

As a work of history The Lord of the Rings is distinctly Spenglerian in tone. Tolkien has created a historical world with a comprehensive erudition and a philosophical audacity few historians since Spengler have been able to match—and with a sense of tragic destiny nearly equal to Spengler's.

For at its core The Lord of the Rings is the story of civilization's decline. Good may finally triumph over evil, but good is never unalloyed—in men or in hobbits or in cultures. The Third Age of Middle Earth, which the trilogy brings to a close, was founded on the powers of lesser rings, rings for dwarfs, elves and men. But the One Ring rules them all. Were Sauron to recover the ring he could only subjugate Middle Earth; when Frodo succeeds in destroying it the other rings must lose their power, too. Frodo and his company know from

JUST PUBLISHED

A fascinating and profound illumination of a people... a nation... and the terrifying forces unleashed by a continuing revolution

THIS is the basic source for all Americans on China. The China Reader is a brilliant and distinguished work of documentary history in three volumes, prepared by two outstanding authorities on the Far East. FRANZ SCHURMANN is Director of the Center for Chinese Studies at the University of California, Berkeley. ORVILLE SCHELL is a graduate fellow associated with Dr. Schurmann.

Here, is the whole incomparable drama of the emergence of modern China — from the last days of the old Empire—through the Opium War and the Sino-Japanese War that led to the 1911 Revolution . . . to the Japanese invasion, the civil war, the triumph of Mao, and the internal and external crises of Communist China that are making headlines today.

The editors have woven into their story a rich variety of writing from original Chinese sources, as well as the work of leading political, historical, and literary figures — such as Edgar Snow, André Malraux, Theodore H. White, C. K. Yang, Mao Tse-tung, Dean Rusk, John K. Fairbank, Mark Gayn, Mary C. Wright, and A. Doak Barnett.

Exciting in its presentation, impeccable in its scholarship, THE CHINA READER is urgent reading for every informed American.

These are the three volumes:

I. IMPERIAL CHINA. The Decline of the Last Dynasty and the Origins of Modern China. The 18th and 19th Centuries. Cloth $6.95; Vintage Book paperback $1.95

II. REPUBLICAN CHINA. Nationalism, War, and the Rise of Communism, 1911-1949. Cloth $6.95; Vintage Book paperback $1.95

III. COMMUNIST CHINA. Revolutionary Reconstruction and International Confrontation, 1949 to the Present. Cloth $7.95; Vintage Book paperback $2.45

THE CHINA READER

Edited by FRANZ SCHURMANN and ORVILLE SCHELL

Now at your bookstore. Published by Random House.

Send this coupon to your bookstore or mail directly to RANDOM HOUSE MAIL SERVICE, INC., Dept. CR-7
239 Great Neck Road, Great Neck, New York 11022

Please send me the volume(s) of THE CHINA Reader that I have checked below, for which I enclose check or money order in the amount indicated.

IMPERIAL CHINA. #1973 Cloth $6.95 ☐
#V375 Paper $1.95 ☐
REPUBLICAN CHINA. #1975 Cloth $6.95 ☐
#V376 Paper $1.95 ☐
COMMUNIST CHINA. #1977 Cloth $7.95 ☐
#V377 Paper $2.45 ☐

Name.....

Address.....

City.....State.....Zip.....

(New York residents please add sales tax.)

the start, whether they should succeed or fail, that ■ 3,000-year era is doomed to end.

In many ways the Third Age had been ■ time of peace and beauty. Yet Tolkien's historical panorama is too vast to allow mourning over the passing of an age. The elves had "attempted nothing new, living in memory of the past." The dwarfs selfishly hoarded their treasures. Their time now was passed, and they were fated to depart, leaving Middle Earth to men.

For the hobbits, too, time in Middle Earth is drawing to an end. But these little people, with their provincial narrowness, their agelong inconsequence, their simple love of beer and pipe smoking, provide the moral center and the humor of Tolkien's trilogy, and the deep recognition young people feel when they read it. Ignored and underrated by others; hedonistic and isolationist by choice—suddenly ■ handful of them, Frodo and Samwise, Pippin and Merry, are chosen; or choose themselves. Their moment on the great stage of history has come: to act, to dare, to be brave, to endure hardship, risk their lives, and lose forever their comfort and anonymity. This challenge, and their response, is the true moral drama in The Lord of the Rings.

If young people identify more with the hobbits than with the warriors and kings of men in Tolkien's tale, surely one reason—though of course Tolkien could not have envisioned such a remarkable coincidence—lies in the resemblance of the hobbits' situation to their own. Many in the present generation of American youth see themselves as just such a chosen band, called upon to leave behind a way of life equally as self-serving and as oblivious to social truths.

This represents in part a vast metaphor for coming of age—The Lord of the Rings provides a most dramatic and mythic analogy for the rite of passage to maturity. But it also suggests a distinctive attitude toward the present. Young people are not so saddened by the Third Age's passing, perhaps because they envision the present as a time when another outmoded era is being left behind—an era when humans are as selfish as dwarfs and as self-satisfied as elves. Like the hobbit band, they can rise above the limitations of their own society and thus prepare themselves to inherit the future.

Above all, what matters is the act of choosing to take part, of participating in company with others. This is a significant distinguishing feature of the present generation of youth—not to take refuge in private life, or in institutions, or in dogmas but to become involved in life. This impulse finds expression just as much among hippies or dropouts or acid heads—drugs too are an aspect of the desire to tune in on life, not to retreat from it—as it does in more conventional forms of political or social action. And the hobbits perfectly reflect their concern, not with the power of kings or knights or presidents or generals but with the power that resides in simple lives and everyday people.

The fantasy and imagination and other-worldliness of Tolkien's work are all important, but what is most important is not that it serves as an escape, or leads to contemplation, or makes for livelier dreams but that it provides a paradigm for action. It asks not who you are, or your pedigree, or your past associations but simply states: this is the task; are you willing to carry it through?

None of the enormous enthusiasm for Tolkien has spilled over onto other fantasy writers or into science fiction. Rather, the young have taken up the novels of Hermann Hesse, where fantasy plays a role strikingly similar to Tolkien's; instead of dreams or separation, fantasy provides new mysteries for our normal state of consciousness and creates new possibilities in the quotidian world.

The most unusual aspect of Tolkien's popularity is his complete unconcern with the traditional and conventional issues of adolescence, particularly that ontological stumper, "who am I?" In the trilogy, characters may change their names and identities several times over, but they are the last ones to stew over it. They know who they are and what they must do, and if they use disguises or pseudonyms it is simply part of the job. Young people do not miss the usual questions in Tolkien because the immediacy of action cancels out all Hamlet-like musings on the self. But in Hesse's novels they find contemplation and a goodly share of action, too.

Hesse's recent popularity rests primarily on one work, Siddhartha. Any seeker of self who has looked into Zen or Oriental mysticism is likely to have read it. A paperback edition of Demian came out last fall and was boosted to immediate success in no little part by its romantically evocative, mystical cover drawing (artist unidentified). Steppenwolf and Magister Ludi, the two novels which established Hesse's literary reputation, are also available in inexpensive editions, as well as The Journey to the East; so far, though, Hesse appeals to the young through Siddhartha and Demian.

Siddhartha and Demian, like The Lord of the Rings, are quest books. But their quests turn far away from the battlefields of Middle Earth, the deserts and mountain peaks of Mordor, turn and tunnel deep down into "the innermost, the Self." Why Hesse, one may ask, among so many competing versions of peering at the looking glass? Precisely because wherever one ends when the search is done, whatever dark tunnels and winding corridors have been traversed, there, at the end, Hesse provides a door into the world.

Siddhartha is a simple story, told in the limpid prose of an oral tale. A handsome boy, son of wealthy Brahmins, Siddhartha is yet unhappy. In his religion and his social position he cannot find the True, the Eternal. "One must find the source within one's own Self," he thinks, "one must possess it." He wants to overcome the Self and find the mystery deep within. Self-denial provides no solution, either. He must discover his Self by bringing it to life in the world. However, the moment comes when he is as satiated by life in the world as he was by self-denial. He leaves all behind, and again wanders, seeking. In the end, Siddhartha concludes that "love is the most important thing in the world. It may be important to great thinkers to examine the world, to explain and despise it. But I think it is only important to love the world, not to despise it, not for us to hate each other, but to be able to regard the world and ourselves and all beings with love, admiration, and respect."

Demian appeared in 1919, three years before Siddhartha. While the story of Siddhartha is a parable for all individual and historical ages, a resolution for Hesse of the active and the contemplative life, of seeking and of knowing, the earlier story of the German youth is ■ work intensely involved with a particular generation and a particular time, resolved not so much by art as by the intervention of catastrophe.

Hesse had been a pacifist during the First World War and had spent the war years in Switzerland. Reviled by his own countrymen, he suffered through the breakup of his marriage and the breakdown of his health. It was a time of personal crisis, a crisis of loyalty and identity we call adolescence, though in an independent, questioning life it may occur several times. Demian is the product of that crisis, a novel for and about German youth. Published under a pseudonym, it became a great success. Its author was then 42 years old.

Demian is "the story of Emil Sinclair's youth." Narrating his own story, Sinclair describes how his conventional middle-class youth fell apart when he told a boastful lie and left himself open to blackmail and humiliation by an evil youth, Kromer. But he is unexpectedly rescued by Max Demian, an older boy who lives mysteriously with his widowed mother. Sinclair first notices Demian when he takes Cain's side in a Biblical discussion. Later Demian talks to Sinclair about persons who bear the mark of Cain on their foreheads.

Those who wear the sign of Cain, like Tolkien's Fellowship of the Ring, are a chosen band. "We represented the will of Nature to something new, to the individualism of the future," says Sinclair, while "the others sought to perpetuate the status quo." Humanity was not something to be maintained and protected; it "was a distant goal toward which all men were moving, whose image no one knew, whose laws were nowhere written down." Demian ends with the World War, marking an end to the old, and a new beginning.

Hesse's Freudian and Jungian symbolism is clangorous and ultimately opaque. His treatment of the war is equivocal enough to be acceptable both to those who loved it and those who deplored it—a secret of the book's widespread success. Nevertheless, in the prologue to Demian, Hesse sharply outlined his own nonviolent humanism. If men truly knew the value of a living human being, he wrote, they would not shoot one another wholesale. We must love all, good or bad, Siddhartha says; all-pervading love surely will create more good than bad.

To the question, "who am I?" Demian and Siddhartha say: you must look only within your innermost self, but you will find an answer only in the midst of life. To many of the young this is precisely the answer fashioned by their own call, their desire for personal authenticity, separate from, yet expressed through, common action. Each of the chosen chooses himself; the whole is exactly the sum of its parts.

For those young people who heed this call, who seek their selves in the world, word of Tolkien's trilogy and Hesse's novels is passed from mouth to ear. The Lord of the Rings, Siddhartha, and now Demian have become their guides, their expression, their pleasure. Delight in Tolkien and Hesse signifies a new delight in human mysteries, in life's possibilities, in the power of will and the pleasures of imagination. Life imitates art; may the taste of the young, and our luck, hold.

Why the white mask?

What is he hiding?

What does he fear?

FRANTZ FANON'S BLACK SKIN, WHITE MASKS — available at last in English — gives the answers.

Fanon, himself a Negro, and a brilliant psychiatrist, was the author of The Wretched of the Earth — which has become a handbook for black revolutionaries throughout the world. Now, in his boldest yet most subtle contribution to the understanding of the Negro psyche, he analyzes the suicidal pattern by which black men strive to become "white" — through adopting as their own the white man's most vicious prejudices.

"BLACK SKIN, WHITE MASKS should be read by every black man with a desire to understand himself and the forces which conspire against him. Fanon in this attempt to record the reality of blackness renders a service to both black and white."

—FLOYD B. MCKISSICK, National Director, CORE

BLACK SKIN, WHITE MASKS

By FRANTZ FANON/Translated by Charles Lam Markmann. $5.00

Now at your bookstore,
or direct from the publisher.
(Please enclose payment with order.)

GROVE PRESS
315 Hudson Street,
New York, N. Y. 10013

Now available in Evergreen Paperback:
THE WRETCHED OF THE EARTH
By FRANTZ FANON. $1.95

Marianne Moore's Magic

TELL ME, TELL ME. By Marianne Moore. The Viking Press. 57 pp. $3.95.

SANDRA HOCHMAN

Miss Hochman's most recent book of poems is The Vaudeville Marriage (Viking). An earlier book, Manhattan Pastures (Yale), won the Yale Younger Poets Award in 1963.

The title of Marianne Moore's most recent book of poems, Tell Me, Tell Me, is characteristically humble and, at the same time, ironic. Humble, because she is always complaining that she has much to learn about poetry as in "The Mind, Intractable Thing" which ends "craft with which I don't know how to deal." Ironic because, after all, she has so much to tell us, to teach us about her own magical craftsmanship. In "Granite and Steel," which bears the subtitle of the book, Miss Moore defines the Brooklyn Bridge for us as a "path amid the stars" and later as a "romantic passage-way"; then, finally, as an "actuality." This progression from the florid to the sparse is equally ironic. The usual procedure in modern verse is to lead us from reality to a visionary ending. Miss Moore reverses this procedure. But for her the "actual" is always the "extraordinary." Like the bridge itself, all of her poems have structural possibilities. They are written in a speech that is often as terse and ordinary and strong as granite or steel. Yet these poems have a light and airy feeling—a dimension of grace. They lead us from the confused disorder of our world into a new space of order.

The art of Marianne Moore is not just the valuable art of observation. She is magical. Her poems do have riddles. They can irk us. But they finally carry us forward by the strength of language and, in her own words, the poet's "burning desire to be explicit." Nothing is wasted. All is transformed.

Tell Me, Tell Me includes prose as well as poetry. The prose is didactic and instructive. It is almost as if the unanswerable question is always about the creation of poetry itself. Why does one write poetry? Of what value is this art? Marianne Moore answers these questions by quoting questions. The "quote" becomes her own. She rescues it from obscurity and turns the quote itself into a form of poetry. She writes:

When John Freeman asked Lord Birkett (the British judge), "Why did you leave your father's business, to study law?" he said, "I think it was the fascination of using words in a way that would be effective"—true indication of indigenous talent.

To "be effective" is not only the aim of this poet—it is also her achievement. For Marianne Moore all things are suitable and enchanting subjects for her poems. It is the same sentiment that Kenneth Burke applied to himself: "all things are grist for my mill including my mill." Miss Moore writes about Dr. Fang, Yul Brynner, The Harvard Advocate, Bach, Jerome S. Shipman's comment concerning academic appointments for artists, Mickey Mantle and a score of other people and things with an easy authority for linking unlike things with detail, conversation and humor. In her Notes and Acknowledgments—which reads like a prolonged Marianne Moore poem and is, indeed, just that—she cites her sources with pride:

A book on the Brooklyn Bridge: Fact & Symbol, by Alan Trachtenberg,
Lu Chi's Wen Fu,
A book on Leonardo da Vinci by Sir
Kenneth Clark,

The Diary Of Helena Morley, translated by Elizabeth Bishop
Saint Valentine
A Late Fifteenth Century Tapestry
Post-game baseball broadcasts to list (and jumble) just a few books, saints, and other things that have served as inspirations. We meet in her poems a crow called Pluto—and we can never forget him. We learn about Subject, Predicate, Object, and we cannot forget our lesson. Nor can we forget that it is an endless curiosity which illuminates everything she, the poet and divine-observer, chooses to point out to us.

These poems depend strongly on music. Miss Moore not only writes about musical things and musical people and places (there are sprinklings of musical names—Carnegie Hall, Gillels, Isaac Stern, the Symphonia Hungarica—all find a place in her poems) but, more than that, the poems gather their strength from a music of their own. The triumph of Marianne Moore is her agility with lines and rhythms so that she writes what is seemingly conversational or natural verse but is actually controlling her diction and stanza in a wizardly, secretive way. There is clarity in each line:

O magnifico

wizard in words—poet, was it, as Alfredo Panzini defined you?

Weren't you refracting just now on my eye's half-closed triptych the image, enhanced, of a glen—
"the foxglove festoon as sere leaves fell"

on the sand-pale dark byroad, one leaf adrift
from the thin-twigged persimmon;
again,

a bird—Arizona caught-up-with, uncatchable cuckoo after two hours pursuit, zigzagging road-runner, stenciled in black stripes, all over the tail windmilling up to defy me?

Here, we have a master who can turn a breath into a world of sound that's musical and perfectly orchestrated. In the final poem of the book—which illuminates the collection with its special sound and radiance—Miss Moore fashions a poem out of a hymn to the sun that is intricate and amazingly unlike her previous work.

Like that other poet—John Donne—whose music was fierce and echoes even now in our ears to tell of the wonder of the Elizabethan tongue—Miss Moore pursues perfection. She has glorified the musical possibilities locked within our common speech; and in her exaltation of ordinary things, from the inert to the energetic and enchanted, she tells us something new about where we can go in the realm of sight and language.

The Nation

SUBSCRIBERS' BOOK SERVICE

Offers the following at discount prices:

- | | Price |
|---|--------|
| <input type="checkbox"/> THE FREE WORLD COLOSSUS: A Critique of American Foreign Policy in the Cold War by David Horowitz (Hill and Wang, $6.95) | $5.55 |
| <input type="checkbox"/> FRIENDSHIP AND FRATRICIDE: An Analysis of Whittaker Chambers and Alger Hiss by Dr. Meyer A. Zeligs (Viking, $8.95) | $7.15 |
| <input type="checkbox"/> THE NAKED IMAGE: Observations on the Modern Theatre by Harold Clurman (Macmillan, $6.50) | $5.20 |
| <input type="checkbox"/> DE GAULLE: A Political Biography by Alexander Werth (Simon and Schuster, $7.50) | $6.00 |
| <input type="checkbox"/> LIBERATION OF THE JEW by Albert Memmi. Translated from the French (Grossman, $4.95) | $3.00 |
| <input type="checkbox"/> THE PSYCHOLOGY OF POWER by Ronald Sampson (Pantheon, $4.95) | $3.96 |

Remittance accompanying orders should be made payable to THE NATION, 333 6th Ave., N.Y. 10014

- ☐ Payment enclosed ☐ Please bill me

Readers can avail themselves of our regular offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S. at the retail price post-free. When ordering, please give title, author and publisher, if possible.

THEATRE

HAROLD CLURMAN

Whether because of the pressure of time or of weariness, the daily reviewers are capable of various kinds of injustice. In the case of the Repertory Theater of Lincoln Center's production of Brecht's Galileo the reviewers have conceded that it was the organization's best production to date. Even if they had declared it to be the only one of their productions adequate to the material, it would be a slight to Brecht's play of which almost nothing was said. Galileo is one of the very few truly fine dramatic works of the past thirty years.

Written between 1938-39, it is a play of classic stature and ever increasing relevance. When it was first produced as part of ANTA's Experimental Season in New York in a revised version (1947), all but one of the daily reviewers treated it with indifference, if not with open disdain. There was some suspicion of Brecht on various counts: the play was "Marxist," it was rather "cold" and, though Brecht himself had supervised the production, it was somewhat drab. Hardly anyone referred to the play's nobility, the subtlety of its simplicity, the force of its idea.

Now once again we hear it spoken of as an "intellectual" play. For many theatregoers this spells anathema. One might as readily speak of the Parthenon or of the fugues in Bach's Well Tempered Clavichord as "intellectual" (not that Brecht occupies so exalted a level but the comparison makes clear the misunderstanding in the use of the word).

The play's central figure is a scientist. He is, if you like, its "anti-hero." He may be called that because he vilifies himself for having recanted his doctrine in terror and for having too late come to realize that scientific truth is not an absolute value. "I take it," Galileo says, "the interest of science is to ease human existence. If you give way to coercion, science can be crippled, and your new machines may simply suggest new drudgeries. Should you then, in time, discover all there is to be discovered your progress must become a progress away from the bulk of humanity. The gulf might even grow so wide that the sound of your cheering at some new achievement would be echoed by a universal cry of horror."

This is only part of the play's "message." But at the moment what I wish to emphasize is that calling a play "intellectual" for most of us implies that it is without "emotion." In his day, Shaw gave vent to a comic exasperation at the fact that we make dramatic heroes only out of hysterical kids like Romeo and Juliet and neurotic maniacs like Tristan and Isolde, never of men like Newton or Darwin!

This was something more than a joke. For when we speak of "emotion" in the theatre we mean visceral disturbance, passion, pathos or just tear-jerking. But there are many kinds of emotion: the grandeur of a conception may inspire the most elevated feeling, as may also the majesty of the mountain or the sea, a courageous act, the recognition of beautiful craftsmanship, the splendor of an abstract design, or what once was called "significant form."

For all its earthiness and humor—the language of the original German is simpler and more robust than the translation—Galileo has a dignity, a loftiness, a purity which moves the spirit: heart and mind in unity. This quality is evident in speech after speech, in scene after scene.

Take the point at which the Little Monk, in humble compassion for his hard-worked peasant parents, speaks of the need for consolation which the Faith provides, and Galileo's deeply felt, lucid and brilliant answer which ends: "I can see their divine patience, but where is their divine fury?" Consider too the scene in which the liberal and knowledgeable Pope, the naked man before he is attired in his ceremonial robes, refuses to acquiesce in the threat of torture against Galileo requested by the Cardinal Inquisitor. When finally he stands in full ecclesiastic raiment he pronounces his papal decision. "It is clearly understood: he is not to be tortured. At the very most he may be shown the instruments," to which the Inquisitor replies: "That will be adequate, Your Holiness. Mr. Galileo understands machinery." The eye instructs the mind as to the meaning.

The play is a dramatic paradigm of an idea and the trials it encounters in piercing the inertia and resistance of habit, tradition and interests of established institutions. In the scene in which Galileo is hailed as a "Bible killer," the play shows the distortion of every idea by ordinary folk who seize on its most vulgar aspect. Brecht regarded skepticism, since it counsels caution and therefore balance, as a key to wisdom. His play therefore warns us that any new idea isolated from the broadest human concerns involves us in a new danger.

No word is wasted in the play; no moment is without its contribution to the total effect. The incidental figures (priests and prelates, students, merchants, aristocrats and beggars) are colorful without caricature. A sense of humankind in its most familiar traits informs every character. Galileo—here Brecht drew on several phases of his own nature—is shown as "foxy," opportunistic, given to creature comforts, gluttony, the ordinary man's sensuality, and the canny playfulness often found in men of common origin. All this is enacted against the pageantry of the Renaissance, all the more impressive because of the restraint with which Brecht employs it.

The last observation is based in part on the memory of the great production by the Berliner Ensemble, in which the scenic atmosphere was conveyed through the deeply glowing bronze which enclosed the entire proceedings. A muted opulence must also exist in the text itself, for when I reviewed the earlier New York production—in which Charles Laughton played Galileo—I complained of its barren asceticism. What I thought the play required was a masculine and severe sumptuousness.

The production at the Lincoln Center (directed by John Hirsch, designed by Robin Wagner) aims at and achieves a little of the necessary magnificence. But 80,000 sold

New, enlarged edition
just off the press

PEACE IN VIETNAM

An approach to peace in Asia based on hard facts and nonpartisan sanity prepared for the American Friends Service Committee

by Bronson P. Clark, Woodruff J. Emley,
Dorothy Hutchinson, George McT. Kahin,
Jonathan Mirsky, A. J. Muste,
W. Allyn Rickett, Clarence H. Yarrow.

Paperback, $1.25 (Clothbound, $3.00)

At bookstores

HILL & WANG
141 Fifth Avenue
New York, N.Y. 10010

I shall try not to belabor the production with my recollection of the Berlin presentation. (No theatre organization in our country, England or France commands the resources in time, money and extraordinary care of the Berliner Ensemble.) In general, the present production is respectable in its intelligence and devotion to the text. This despite the uncoordinated jumble of the carnival procession, much more tellingly managed in Herbert Blau's Actors' Workshop production in San Francisco.

For those interested in "comparative theatre," a paradox may be discerned in the fact that the acting in the Brecht production was much closer to simple realism than the one at Lincoln Center. The Brecht production contained more individual detail and personal savor. Brecht's actors were quieter, more like real folk unconscious of both their roles in history or on a public platform. The small parts at Lincoln Center are all decently done, but they tend to become "block" figures rather than particularized persons.

The sharpest contrast—I speak of style not of ability—is manifest in Anthony Quayle's Galileo. He speaks with admirable conviction in fine voice. Without rant he is more elocutionary than his Brechtian counterpart. As a result the character's speeches sound more like "propaganda" than they do in Berlin. There, Galileo speaks in a tone of the most intimate, man-to-man common sense. Quayle's Galileo is a convincing spokesman for genius; the other Galileo is as unassuming as some little man who might prove to be Einstein! Everything he says and thinks (together with his relish for food) appears ingrained in his entire being. Quayle comes close to this Galileo—in any case never pompous or stuffy—in the last scene where he shows Galileo in his old age and partial blindness. All in all, an honorable performance.

Spring Records 1

BENJAMIN BORETZ

HANDEL: Organ Concerti (complete). Edward Müller, organ; Schola Cantorum Basiliensis, August Wenzinger, cond. Archiv SKL 917/21. Twelve Concerti Grossi, Op. 6. Chamber Orchestra, Alexander Schneider, cond.

TCHAIKOWSKY: Four Suites for Orchestra. New Philharmonia Orchestra, Antal Dorati, cond. Mercury SR3 9018.

RACHMANINOFF: Twenty-Four Preludes for piano (complete). Constance Keene, piano. Philips PHC 2-006.

Handel, Tchaikowsky, Rachmaninoff: a less than immediately obvious chain of historical association, perhaps, but all three were major compositional figures whose work is interesting less for the great profundity or originality of its compositional discoveries than for the sheer élan of its compositional virtuosity, which projects a quality analogous to that of the mechanical virtuosity and control of performers like Horowitz, Heifetz, or, indeed, Rachmaninoff himself. In Handel, particularly, one finds an extraordinary immediacy of transmission through a presentational surface that is always precisely configured to provide maximum transparency for a constant flow of brilliant local ideas of contour, sonority and continuity without the interposition of irrelevant complexities. His mastery in this regard is perhaps most impressively evident in purely instrumental works, where the sense of an "idea" must be generated entirely from musical components, without the assistance of verbal-context associations. And of this literature, the Op. 6 Concerti Grossi for strings are perhaps the most inventive, especially in the creation of striking rhythmic and pitch profiles with a minimum of activity. The present recording, however, is too disfigured by "interpretive" eccentricity and gratuitous mannerisms to serve as coherent representation of the pieces; of earlier recordings, Hermann Scherchen's on Westminster is the most perceptive I have heard. The organ concertos, taken as a whole, are rather less inexhaustible in their variety and ingenuity; but individual movements and concertos that project special and interesting qualities are evident throughout in the admirable and probably definitive performances on the Archiv set.

The Tchaikowsky orchestral Suites also appear as their composer's purest exploration of sheer compositional facility, free of imputations of symphonic profundity, choreographic pictorialism, or operatic theatrics. The resultant variety of orchestral skills—especially in the domains of rhythmic-accentual subtleties and sonorous particularity—were probably predictable from Tchaikowsky's other work, but the wide-ranging exploration of ideas of texture and continuity is unique in his output, from the "fugal" movement in the First Suite, whose elaborate "contrapuntal" texture is followed immediately by an extended passage for solo clarinet, to the remarkably experimental "Jeu de sons" that opens the Second Suite, to the "neoclassicism" of the Mozart paraphrases and arrangements that constitute the Fourth Suite. To be sure, nothing in the Suites achieves the intensity of articulative or sonorous or rhythmic particularity that appear in sections of the late Tchaikowsky symphonies, but they sustain such a high level of interest throughout that it seems incomprehensible—though characteristically symptomatic—that this is their first complete recording. Dorati's performance is literal but accurate,

VARIATIONS ON A THEME

"Honor . . ." began the wolf
"Excuse me, please," said the sheep
"I hear the shepherd."

"If sheep had honor"
Said a lean and red-eyed wolf
"I would respect them."

"Our honor's at stake!"
Cried the leader of the pack
"The sheep have snubbed us!"

Sheep have the notion
That honor is a concept
Invented by wolves.

BRUCE BENNETT

FOR WRITERS!

Enrich your style through Herbert Spencer's and Edgar Allan Poe's classic principles that have influenced many of the world's great authors. A help for writers eager to get published. Send $1.00 to

PAGEANT PRESS

101 5th Ave. N.Y. 3 Dept. N

The Best Way To Get

THE NATION

THE NATION 5-8-67
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

- ☐ One Year, $10
- ☐ Two Years, $18
- ☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Foreign and Canadian Postage
$1 a year extra)

NAME _____

ADDRESS _____

CITY _____

STATE _____ ZIP NO. _____

and the New Philharmonia's playing is as good as the old.

In works like the twenty-four piano preludes (rather than in his often unfortunately pretentious symphonies and choral works), Rachmaninoff appears as the traditional counterpart to Stravinsky in somewhat the sense that Strauss's music is a traditional (tonal) analogue of Schoenberg's. The brilliance of rhythm and accent in some of these preludes, carried out against a sonorous and articulative background only minimally extended from the late 19th century, rather than with Stravinsky's radical reshaping and refocusing of those realms, nevertheless approaches qualities that one associates with Stravinsky piano literature. The prelude in E minor, Op. 32, No. 4, is especially interesting from this point of view. The complete recording of the preludes in the present Philips album is a welcome event, particularly since Constance Keene's performances sustain an unusual level of brilliance and coherence throughout.

BACH: St. John Passion. Peter Pears, Elizabeth Harwood, Helen Watts, Alexander Young, Hervey Alan, David Ward, vocal soloists; Choir of Kings College, Cambridge. Philomusica Orchestra of London; David Willcocks, cond. Argo ZRG 5270-2.

This musically acceptable performance is seriously marred by the misguided procedure of using an English translation of the text. The words are of no particular interest except as a succession of linguistic sonorities that becomes embedded within and articulated by the sonorous structure of the musical context. But in any translation this essential aspect is sacrificed for a trivial comprehensibility (a point that one wishes would end all the "opera-in-English" agitation, whose possible success raises fearful specters of future acoustical incongruities). In other respects, the playing and singing are responsibly coherent, if not distinguished—it is another "choralistic" performance of the kind discussed here frequently, but does avoid the pitfall of dwelling on choral sonority and detail to the sacrifice of continuity-shape, even though the latter is somewhat perfunctorily projected through an almost exclusive reliance on brisk unfolding.

MONTEVERDI: Vespro della Beata Vergine (1610). Soloists, Monteverdi-Chorus of Hamburg. Concentus Musicus. Vienna; Jürgen Jürgens, cond. Telefunken SAWT 9501-02-A.

The Monteverdi Vespers of 1610 was sacred music of unprecedented richness, in the direct aftermath of the brilliant sonority and continuity discoveries of the Orfeo of 1607. In particular, the Vespers is full of vocal-instrumental concertato ingenuities that represented the fundamental dimension-expanding discovery in the work of Gabrieli and Monteverdi whereby—in contradistinction to the one-to-one relation of presentational surface and interior structure of earlier music—different parts have intersecting functions, and single parts have multiple functions in determining the sense of each event. In the Vespers, this is combined with a fluency and inventiveness in the stile antico choral technique that makes this a dimension of a varied textural succession rather than, as previously, the invariant textural language of an entire work—and, in fact, of all music.

The performance, which includes the Gregorian antiphons appropriate to the service involved, is far superior to either the old Oiseau-Lyre recording of the "modernized" Leo Schrade edition of the work, or the grimly out-of-tune playing of old instruments on the "authentic" Archiv recording of the "Sonata Sopra Sancta Maria" section. Here, the original instruments and dimensions are maintained, but are controlled with an adequacy approximating performances on "modern" instruments. Interpretively, End government sponsored poverty!

The Poverty/Rights Action Center serves as national headquarters for over 200 welfare rights groups in 70 cities from Boston to Los Angeles.

Your support will provide training, information, and technical assistance to these groups and connect you with this exciting new movement.

SEND MONEY!

NOW!

Poverty/Rights Action Center
National Headquarters of the Welfare Rights Movement
1713 R St. N.W., Washington, D.C. 20009

Enclosed is my contribution of $..... to support the Welfare Rights Movement.

NAME

STREET

CITY STATE ZIP

☐ Also send literature

things are mostly rather straightforward and unparticularized, but this is vastly preferable to the ill-considered "expressivity" of most Monteverdi performances in concert or on recordings.

MAHLER: Das Lied von der Erde. James King, Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau, vocal soloists. Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra; Leonard Bernstein, cond. London OM 36005/ OS 26005.

A remarkably mature and sophisticated performance of what is perhaps Mahler's most completely realized large-scale work, if it is not his most exploratory, problematic or original one. The substitution of a baritone voice for the specified contralto, while traditionally acceptable, does appear to upset at least the long-range timbral balance of the work, and probably the sonorous balance within the individual numbers. Otherwise, Bernstein's control is relevant and rational, and results in a nicely tight articulation of multiple detail (rather than the crude "one big line" assertions of many of his earlier Mahler performances), and a concurrent intensification of interest. The orchestra, too, is superior in refinement and balance to others with which Bernstein has recorded, and the recorded sound much less exaggerated than is Columbia's custom, all of which seems to me to have conjoined to produce Mr. Bernstein's most valuable recording thus far.

MOZART: Così fan Tutte. Teresa Stich-Randall, Graziella Sciutti, Ira Maianiuk, Waldemar Kmentt, Walter Berry, Dezsö Ernster, vocal soloists. Vienna State Opera Chorus, Vienna Symphony; Rudolf Moralt, cond. Philips PHC 3-005 (stereo version "Electronically Reprocessed").

Don Giovanni. Nicolai Ghiaurov, Claire Watson, Nicolai Gedda, Christa Ludwig, Walter Berry, Mirella Freni, vocal soloists. New Philharmonia Orchestra and Chorus; Otto Klemperer, cond. Angel (S) DL 3700.

Die Entführung aus dem Serail. Erika Köth, Fritz Wunderlich, Kurt Böhme, vocal soloists. Bavarian State Opera Chorus and Orchestra; Eugen Jochum, cond. Bastien und Bastienne. Adele Stolte, Peter Schreier, Theo Adam, soloists. Berlin Chamber Orchestra; Helmut Koch, cond. DGG 139 213/15.

Così fan Tutte represents a degree and kind of sophistication that had never existed in music—and probably not in any other domain—before. It presents a musical analogue of cool, Wilde-like, verbal and associational wit far beyond that of its own libretto, in which every flick of an inflection becomes dramatically elaborating detail. Così is, unmistakably, the purest manifestation in Mozart's work of music-theatrical craft, the purest construction of dramatic contours in musical terms, especially through sonority (primarily in vocal-ensemble terms) and rhythm (particularly in terms of patterns of unfolding in solo and ensemble passages). The refinement of this approach generates such remarkable ideas as the modulating inflection of timbral sonorities as the content of an event, without pitch change—an idea that Wagner was supposed to have discovered in the Rheingold prelude. And the adjustment of all this is so precise that, while it obviously rewards more stunningly than most other operas a really superb performance, its contextual functions seem to project almost better without any interpretive overlay—certainly better than with an inappropriate one. This is evident in the present performance, resurrected from an out-of-print release, which proceeds considerably but without much distinction, and yet projects a sense of the work's qualities that is superior in many respects to the far more obviously "performed" Angel recording under Karl Böhm. Individually, Teresa Stich-Randall's early singing is a vivid reminder of how painful a deterioration was evident in her recent Metropolitan appearances, and Walter Berry asserts a Bert Lahr buffoonery that is devastatingly inappropriate. Mr. Moralt stays out of the score's way, which suffices.

Don Giovanni, of all operas, was given a paradigmatic recorded performance under maximally adverse conditions by the late Hans Rosbaud (available in a Vox Box), whose sense of the music-theatrical rhythm of sound and sense is a paradigm for operatic performance altogether. This recording by Klemperer will provide no such model; it is a performance of a very special kind, illuminating a special aspect of the work that, however unsuitable to theatrical performances of this or any other opera, is still a remarkable experience. In particular, Klemperer develops an extraordinarily "Wagnerian" approach to the work's continuity, developing an auditory analogue to the flow of chronological time against which the very different time-flows of the context are counterpointed. He achieves this by maximizing the work's continuousness, eliding all the customary rhythmic abruptness that conventionally "push" articulation, so that aria-recitative boundaries are melted, and accentual bumps become subtle differences in time-quantity. (Listen, if to nothing else, to Elvira's cross-accented entrance in "Ah, chi mi dice mai.") The perceptual result is a sense of continuity as a frictionless medium in which the music-dramatic succession unfolds with its own, internally generated articulation. And this is accomplished through an extraordinary resourcefulness in orchestral and ensemble technique; instrumental and vocal attacks are breathtakingly subtle, transitions and contrasts are made precisely and in unison without ever producing unmodulated accentuations, and the blending and projecting of orchestral and vocal sonorities as highly individual qualities is even more resourceful than Rosbaud's. Moreover, despite journalistic complaint, the tempos are not actually slower than is customary; one suspects that this impression results from the unpushed continuity of the performance. The vocalists make no individually brilliant impressions, but that itself is precisely appropriate to this most curious and fascinating production.

The early Die Entführung is mainly valuable as an index of how truly remarkable the depth of Mozart's mature works was, and of the incredible extent of his growth in his last years, after a long career as a facile and inventive practitioner giving no particular promise of deep originality or complexity. Die Entführung has its moments, but they make even more vivid the realization of what the level and abundance of "moments" in, particularly, The Magic Flute, signify. Bastien und Bastienne is skillful juvenilia, unremarkable except for the composer's age.

ART

ORIGINALS COST LESS THAN REPRODUCTIONS! Contemporary original signed etchings, lithographs, woodcuts, $3.50. Guarantee. Free brochure. GRAPHIC CIRCLE (NA), 68 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10011.

KHAJURAH'S EROTIC SCULPTURES: Thousand Year Old Temple Friezes of Hindu Arts, Carnal Love, Masterpieces Chandela Architecture. Twelve Color Slides $10. TEMPLE VIEWS, Box 25101, Cincinnati, Ohio 45225.

EDUCATIONAL

FIVE DAY BOARDING SCHOOL. A unique program for people who have not even considered a boarding school. Grades five through eight. THE THOREAU SCHOOL. An intimate, cooperative community, combining study with the tasks and joys of farm living. School bus brings your children home to NYC week-ends. Small classes, individual instruction. Now enrolling for September. Write: Rodman, RD 1, Wallkill, N.Y. 12589. Phone: 914-895-5523.

TRAVEL

The OTHER Israel—a three-week summer program for young people 21 to 35—a dialogue with young Israeli socialists—meet farmers, workers, Arabs, labor leaders, peace groups, parliament members—live and work in a Kibbutz—tour the country, $625.00. For details write: Young Americans for Progressive Israel, 150 Fifth Avenue, Room 700, New York, N.Y. 10011.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1200

FRANK W. LEWIS

Puzzle Fans: See box at right.

ACROSS:

- 1 Capital "A" is a bad, bad combination! (5, 5)
- 6 Pack traveling point to point. (4)
- 10 Suggesting a pneumatic jack that helped out Berlin. (3, 4)
- 11 One with a consuming interest might. (7)
- 12 Proving there's at least one Red in our country. (4)
- 13 Shaker—but not necessarily a convincing one. (4-6)
- 15 In such condition. ■ ring might or might not be likely. (7)
- 16 Light and portable, possibly. (7)
- 17 Certainly not dressers in high fashion. (7)
- 20 Where they were responsible for order in the capital, despite the connotation of luxurious dissipation. (7)
- 22 Is the busy Woman's Club Hospitality Committee Chairman frequently so effusive? (10)
- 23 Wrap-around considered unsuitable in social gatherings? (4)
- 25 Concerned with a leaning towards the pragmatic side, certainly. (7)
- 26 The English take a cow to 3 down for it. (7)
- 27 The reason that some people drink? (4)
- 28 False scent, or the one that made a certain detective famous? (10)

DOWN:

- 1 Novel way of stating a ban on weapons? (1, 8, 2, 4)

- 2 Casting mild imprecations on woman's work? (7)
- 3 The landing place might be accidental.
- 4 Tweedledum and Tweedledee would have, had not their resolution been broken. (7)
- 5 A fair number typical of troubadours?
- 7 With sewers, one might have called for good foot-work. (7)
- 8 Lost in the desert, might one suffer from it? (5, 2, 3, 5)
- 9 Those who keep things in service? (9)
- 14 A coming or going into what might describe the pursuit of a well-known delldweller? (9)
- 18 Dropped your smokes in the drink? This might alleviate your suffering. (3, 4)
- 19 Time for mild exercise. (7)
- 20 Able to work as a star? (7)
- 21 The eruption of the sun into this is a case at point, if unestablished. (7)
- 24 Cut up and rolled, looking for the most favorable spots. (4)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1199

ACROSS: 1 and 6 Never-never Land; 10 Rounder; 11 Start up; 13 and 12 Flame throwers; 15 Larch; 17 Tabulates; 19 Portrayal; 21 Yearn; 23 Outgo; 27 Evening; 28 Dithers; 29 Sets; 30 Playthings. DOWN: 1 Norm; 2 Voucher; 3 and 24 across Radio-activity; 4 Earnestly; 5 Eases; 7 Attract; 8 Depressing; 9 Manfully; 14 Slip covers; 16 Harmonic; 18 Belatedly; 20 Retreat; 22 Actaeon; 24 Angel; 25 Vetch; 26 Isis.

PUBLICATIONS

ARE YOU ELIGIBLE? 170,000 scholarships, fellowships, exchange programs, 120 countries, how, where to apply, Unesco's directory. STUDY ABROAD, $4.00. Summer courses, study tours, work camps, hostels, VACATIONS ABROAD, $2.00. Employment opportunities, TEACHERS ABROAD, $4.50. Payment with order—we'll pay postage. Unesco Publications Center, 323 East 34th Street, New York 10016.

FACTUAL, informative, objective research report: "PROPAGANDA METHODS OF THE JOHN BIRCH SOCIETY," by Alain Revon, 2030 G Street, N. W., Washington, D. C. Send $1 for mailing.

THE BLUFF OF DEGODDING THE HUMANS by Bibi Beebi, 116 pp., price $3.00. Popular Non-Newtonian, etc., physics, astronomy, culturology, philosophy. The Inventor, P. O. Box 17039, Los Angeles, Calif. 90017.

THE IDLER. Lively, offbeat, liberal monthly. $1 brings four different sample back issues. Idler, 413B 6th St., N. E., Washington, D. C. 20002.

"SELECTED POEMS" of George Flynn (Villiers of London $2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound."—James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at 544—82 St., Brooklyn 9, N.Y.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALGONQUIN 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

APARTMENTS—UNFURNISHED

Live in a Mies van der Rohe Apartment . . . adjacent to Branch Brook Park . . . 25 minutes from Manhattan. Community activities: Little Theatre, newspaper, classes, clubs. Rentals from $99. Request brochure "N." COLONNADE, 381 Broad, Newark, N. J.

PERSONALS

HIGHLY EXPERIENCED LIBRARIAN, more interested in books and people than pay or propriety, seeks work with Civil Rights movement, union, or libertarian group. Available September. Write (by air): S. Berman, Schiller College, 7121 Kleiningersheim, West Germany.

LIBERAL student political organization needs full-time director and campus traveler. Must be available for ■ year. Send resume to Campus ADA, 1223 Connecticut Avenue, N.W., Washington, D.C. 20036.

STAMP OUT HAND-RULED VACATION SCHEDULES! Dozen 1967 typewriter forms, 11 x 8½, $3.00. Space for 24 names; use carbon for other departments. Idea Co., 178-T, Rye, N.Y. 10580.

HELP Appalachian people to help themselves by supporting the Council of the Southern Mountains, Inc. Membership, $5.00, includes a subscription to MOUNTAIN LIFE & WORK. Write: Council of the Southern Mountains, Inc., College Box 2307, Berea, Kentucky 40403.

USE LAWFUL DIRECT ACTION to repeal all abortion laws LEGALIZE ABORTION, POB 24163, Los Angeles, Calif. 90024.

"ESCHEW OBFUSCATION" PLAQUE, 8½" x 4", typographically baroque, $1.50, deluxe edition, $2.50. Wry Idea Co., Box 178-T, Rye, N.Y. 10580.

Puzzle Fans

You are invited once again to meet our puzzle maker, Frank Lewis. The Nation will hold a buffet supper on the evening of Thursday, June 1, from 6 o'clock on, at the Harvard Club, 27 West 44 Street. All devotees of Mr. Lewis will be welcome guests. Please let us know as soon as possible if you intend to come. Write or call The Nation, 333 Sixth Avenue, N. Y. 10014. Telephone 242-8400.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

Martin Luther King, Jr.

salutes

THE NATION

"Through its journalistic integrity and its genuine liberalism, The Nation has carved for itself an imperishable niche in the annals of journalistic history in our nation. And I know those of us who are readers and subscribers of The Nation are deeply indebted to it for all that it has done to make the discussion of the vital issues of our day and our age a reality. Certainly in these days of emotional tension, when the problems of the world are gigantic in extent and chaotic in detail, there is no greater need than for sober thinking, healthy debate, creative dissent and enlightened discussion."*

*Address, Los Angeles
on February 25, 1967

"Only now, 100 years later, is ('The South As It Is') available in a book although THE NATION published the pieces as Dennett wrote them. The book was intensely interesting to me. It is vivid, honest, warm, full of concrete instances and has few generalizations and few abstractions."

Lillian Smith, Chicago Tribune

"His (Dennett's) articles give us a revealing and sensitive portrait of the Southern land and people caught in the agony, physical and spiritual, of war's backlash."

Martin Abbott, Journal of Southern History

"One is immediately struck here with the objective description of Southern views. As a reporter (Dennett) conveys with care the outlook of many Southerners from all walks of life."

Wendell D. Garrett, Boston Globe

FREE with each NEW subscription

The NATION
333 6th Avenue
New York, N.Y. 10014

Herewith my order and payment for a NEW subscription to The Nation. Please send my FREE copy of THE SOUTH AS IT IS.

☐ 1 Year, $10 ☐ 2 Years, $18 ☐ 6 Mos., $6
(Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 per year extra)

name

address

city state zip no.

5-8-67

Fill out the subscription coupon at left, and start receiving The Nation, this country's oldest weekly journal of opinion.

THE NATION

MAY 15, 1967 35 cents

BURLINGAME

MAY 15 1967

LIBRARY

The Florida Vigilantes

GOVERNOR KIRK'S PRIVATE EYES

FRED J. COOK

Honor and Image

Why the Cadets Cheat

J. ARTHUR HEISE

Reuther vs. Meany

Background to Labor's Showdown

B. J. WIDICK

McLUHAN'S POT OF MESSAGE / NEIL COMPTON

GOODMAN'S MIDDLE-AGE BLUES / SHERMAN PAUL

5-22-67 PLS-801
BURLINGAME PUB LIBRARY
BURLINGAME
CALIFORNIA 94010

LETTERS

our boys in Vietnam

Miami, Fla.

DEAR SIR: My state's Sen. George Smathers has now joined the crusade of Administration voices aimed at stifling protest of its Vietnamese War policy and to pave the way for a much greater expansion of the war. The Senator says that every war protest is "a slap in the face" to our fighting men. Perhaps.

But this statement of the Senator's misses the point. As one who has long protested our war policy in Vietnam, I must say that the point of our protest is to save the lives of our fighting men, not to spare their feelings. . . .

We shall continue to say to the present Administration (including Senator Smathers), "drive the war machine with care, the life you save may be someone else's."

Reynolds Moody
Lt. Col. USMC (Ret.)

methadone

Boston, Mass.

DEAR SIR: Methadone, says Anthony Prisendorf ["New York's Dope Nostrum," The Nation, Apr. 17], is "a long-lasting synthetic substitute for heroin." It is not.

My authority for this contradictory statement is none other than Dr. Marie Nyswander who describes her pioneering Methadone Maintenance Research Project in Hospital Practice (April, 1967) a new, authoritative monthly for "staff and community physicians." Methadone, Dr. Nyswander says, acts by "blockading the narcotic effects of heroin." It frees the addict of drug hunger without producing the "high" (euphoria) of heroin and without requiring constantly increased dosage. Methadone is therefore not a substitute for heroin but is an agent that interrupts the vicious cycle of heroin addiction. . . .

Daniel S. Gillmor

New York City

DEAR SIR: In his New Yorker profile of Dr. Nyswander, Nat Hentoff says, "a long-acting synthetic narcotic called methadone is substituted for heroin." Dr. Nyswander's associates at Manhattan General Hospital, with whom I checked after reading Mr. Gillmor's letter, assure me that this is the definition customarily used. "The non-euphoric aspect is usually left out," one told me, "because it's obvious that we're not using something that will make people 'high.'"

Anthony Prisendorf

no strings

Toronto, Can.

DEAR SIR: C. W. Gonick states in "Canada Fights Its Orbit" [The Nation, Apr. 17] that my book, Foreign Ownership of Canadian Industry, was financed by the Ford Foundation, and he implies that the funds were granted because of a priori acceptance on my part of the necessity for continentalism. Gonick presumably got his information on the grant from the acknowledgment in the preface to my book. Why did he fail to point out that aid from two Canadian foundations and three Canadian universities was also acknowledged in the preface? Had he bothered to ask me he would have discovered that all of the considerable research costs and about 90 per cent of the salary support involved in my study were from sources in Canada. . . . At the time the Ford Foundation award was made in 1962, I had not announced any of the conclusions of my study, nor was the underlying statistical work completed until some time later.

A. E. Safarian

EDITORIALS

War on the Third Front

If the country were united in its support of the Vietnamese War—to the extent say, of its support of World War II—it would not have been necessary for President Johnson to take the unprecedented step of bringing General Westmoreland back to the States on a bareface propaganda mission. That the General carried out his assignment, from the standpoint of immediate results, not to be denied. His looks, his ribbons (six bars high) and the mystique of the uniform proved irresistible—as long as he was on stage. He was applauded at the Waldorf-Astoria by the newspaper publishers, at the joint session of Congress by the legislators and, of course, in his home state of South Carolina. At the Waldorf he made the faux pas of accusing critics of the Administration of being unpatriotic; he dropped this charge before his Washington appearance. This attack, which Westmoreland, unlike the President, made forthrightly, must have aroused some misgivings among the press lords, but did not prevent both Time and Newsweek from featuring him in the same pose on their covers, hand upraised in salute and smiling at the Congressional ovation, while behind him Vice President Humphrey and Speaker McCormack solemnly applaud.

But then the magic wore off. Just as in the shooting war, escalation breeds escalation, and an excessive sales campaign of the Westmoreland type brings unintended results:

(1) In Mark Twain's phrase, the staging was "too palpable." In a democracy, men in uniform, however resplendent, are expected to fight a war, not justify it. General Westmoreland's aim had been to inform the country, he would have accepted the invitation of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to appear before it and answer questions. His schedule, it is said, did not permit this session of give-and-take.

(2) This slighting of the Senate, which has become standard procedure during the Johnson Administration, offended not only Fulbright, Church, Gruening, McGovern, McCarthy, Kennedy and other oppositionists, but perturbed Senators of varying views. Thruston Morton, a dead-center Republican and supporter of the Administration's Vietnamese policy, spoke angrily of "verbal overkill" and asserted that more and more people were beginning to think that Westmoreland was there to stir debate rather than to illuminate the problems the country faces. Senator Percy complained of the bombing of the MIG bases which Westmoreland had applauded. The most intense flak came from Sen. Mark Hatfield, also a Republican, who accused the Administration of "political blackmail" and "vicious attempts" to "gag the voices of opposition by impugning their patriotism."

(3) The Rev. Dr. Eugene Carson Blake, general secretary

retary of the 400-million-member World Council of Churches, raised another of those questions that General Westmoreland was not eager to answer. "... when the swamps of the Mekong Delta are filled up with dead Vietnamese," said Dr. Blake, "and when the flower of our youth lies dead with them, what victory will have been won?" Such a question no general has ever answered. Again on the political side, the Senate Republican Policy Committee's "white paper," which so perturbed Senator Dirksen, set the stage for a future assault on the Johnson Administration's policy in Vietnam.

(4) Walter Lippmann pointed out that there had never been a need to rally the American people to a war in which they believed. The reason for the current doubts and apathy is that this is a misbegotten war, militarily as well as morally, and no amount of sophistry, with whatever stage trappings, can change the fact.

The President's subsequent speech, defending the right to dissent while still saying, in effect, that the dissenters risk killing American soldiers, shows that the effort to stampede the opposition fell flat. The most absurd proposition of all, in which Mr. Johnson was joined by Hubert Humphrey, is that the Administration is being abused, that its right of rejoinder is in jeopardy. Both the President and the Vice President verge on logorrhea in their ceaseless defense of the war. The press and the networks cooperate with them to the fullest extent. Every facility is at their disposal and they have taken maximum advantage of every means. But none of it avails, and they ascribe their failure to every cause but the real one—that this is the wrong war, in the wrong place, for the wrong reason.

In its nature, it is a political war, and it will never be won—neither militarily with the additional 150,000 men Westmoreland is now demanding, nor by any degree of propaganda bludgeoning at home. That is the lesson of the General's visit. Whatever advantage the Administration gained will be swamped by the troubles to come.

Message to Mao

Jack Bell has covered Washington for the Associated Press since 1937 and long since has established himself as an astute observer and commentator. His book, The Johnson Treatment (Harper & Row, 1965), contains a prescient forecast of the troubles which the personality of Lyndon Baines Johnson was to bring on the United States and the world. The political mentality of Johnson, or any other American President, is by no means the sole determinant in the affairs of nations, but Bell's account leaves little doubt that the accession to the Presidency of a politician of Johnson's temperament was one of the more malign accidents of fate.

In October, 1964, less than a year after Kennedy's assassination, the Chinese exploded their first nuclear device. In a telecast, Johnson discussed this event and

IN THIS ISSUE

May 15, 1967

EDITORIALS

610

ARTICLES

614 Reuther vs. Meany:
Background to Labor's Showdown

B. J. Widick

616 Governor Kirk's Private Eyes

Fred J. Cook

622 Why the Cadets Cheat

J. Arthur Heise

626 The Road to Trade

*Harold J. Berman
and John R. Garson*

BOOKS & THE ARTS

629 The Art of Human Use

Nathan Silver

630 The Paralytic (poem)

Ned O'Gorman

631 A Pot of Message

Neil Compton

632 The Middle-Age Blues

Sherman Paul

634 Art

Maurice Grosser

636 Theatre

Julius Novick

637 Summer Telegram: A Painting
(poem)

Steven Osterlund

638 Films

Robert Hatch

639 Crossword Puzzle

Frank W. Lewis

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Copy Editor
MARION HESS

Theatre
HAROLD CLURMAN

Art
MAX KOZLOFF

Music
BENJAMIN BORETZ

Science
CARL DREHER

Advertising Manager
MARY SIMON

Associate Publisher
GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Associate Editor
PHIL KERBY

Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIAS

Poetry Editor
MICHAEL GOLDMAN

Washington
ROBERT G. SHERRILL

Paris
ALEXANDER WERTH

London
RAYMOND WILLIAMS

Bonn
C. AMERY

Canberra
C. P. FITZGERALD

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July and August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1967 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel.: CH 2-8400. West Coast office: 1256 Westwood Boulevard, Los Angeles, Calif. 90024. Tel.: GR 4-2533. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give four weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers Guide Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE
NATION
Combined with FRONTIER

Volume 204
No. 20

the almost simultaneous dismissal of Nikita Khrushchev. Bell contends that on this occasion Johnson made it clear that he intended to be a "strong President," making foreign policy on his own and "without interference from critics in Congress." Shunning consultation with Senators who had been his colleagues and whose competence in foreign affairs far exceeded his own, Johnson announced: "The nations which do not seek nuclear weapons can be sure that if they need our strong support against some threat of nuclear blackmail, they will have it." Thus India, Pakistan and Japan, in particular, were put on notice that the United States expected them to stand up against any future Chinese nuclear threat; in return, they could expect shelter under the U.S. nuclear umbrella.

An aspect of this commitment which Bell does not mention is that it was bound to reproduce in China's neighbors the same doubts that had long tormented our allies in NATO. Would the United States expose its homeland to the perils of an ICBM exchange with a China that had become a major nuclear power, over an issue which in itself had only local Asian significance? Would an American President in the seventies honor the commitment made by President Johnson in the sixties?

Misgivings on this score would be allayed in considerable measure if Johnson maintained, and bequeathed to his successor, a hard line against the Chinese Reds and their allies. Johnson has not failed to give such assurance. He has carried out the hard line in defiance not only of the Chinese but of Congressional critics and all who dissented from his policy of massive military intervention in Southeast Asia.

While protesting his ardent desire for peace, Johnson has seized every opportunity to widen and intensify the war against Vietnam—and China. His actions leave no doubt that his objective is total victory over the Vietnamese, and the abject humiliation of the Chinese. His snare has been to give the North Vietnamese one chance after another to come to the conference table, provided they came as the Japanese came to the Missouri at the end of World War II. Every time the enemy has refused, he has been treated to a bigger dose of bombing and burning. The message will not be lost on the National Liberation Front, the North Vietnamese, the Chinese and, incidentally, the Russians.

But the basic problem is not solved. In Bell's view, Johnson is acting to "neutralize" the threat to world peace posed by Mao Tse-tung and his "equally paranoid" associates. But the threat is not being neutralized, it is being exacerbated. The Mao faction, which was on the verge of eclipse when Johnson decided on a major war in Southeast Asia, is now well on the way to purging the anti-Mao moderates. The only manner in which Johnson can actually "neutralize" the Chinese nuclear threat is to bomb the Chinese nuclear plants at the first pretext afforded by the Vietnamese War. This may well be his purpose. If so, it may prove to be only a temporary solution, unless he can "neutralize" 700 million Chinese in the aftermath.

"As he marched down the corridors of the years ahead of him," Jack Bell writes, "it would be Lyndon Baines Johnson's destiny to preside over a peaceful reorganization of the world's power structure, or over the dissolution of civilization." If the President has any design for the former, it is obscured by the U.S. bombings. The more likely outcome is the "dissolution of civilization."

Science Versus Spectaculars

Sir Bernard Lovell is professor of radio astronomy at the University of Manchester and director of the famed Jodrell Bank Observatory. He is also one of the most thoughtful of scientists, as he proved once more in an interview with David Perlman, the science correspondent of the San Francisco Chronicle (April 24). The two central problems of astronomy, Sir Bernard pointed out, are to understand our solar system, a tiny speck in the universe, and to grasp the universe as a whole—if man can ever encompass it in its totality. From the standpoint of science the solar system is no more than a local environment, while the great questions center around the origin, nature and dynamics of the universe. Yet astronomical science is starved, while billions are spent annually on attempts to land men on the moon. This is the space version of anthropocentricity.

Sir Bernard, and the equally famous theoretical astronomer Fred Hoyle, deplore the lack of large telescopes, both optical and radio; Hoyle points out that this scarcity is especially handicapping in the Southern Hemisphere, which offers sites superior for some purposes to those available in Europe and North America. The cost range of major installations of this kind is $10 million to $20 million apiece, or just about what our National Aeronautics and Space Agency spends in a single day. Double this amount to include the parallel expenditure of the Soviet space efforts, and the shabby treatment accorded to astronomical science in both countries becomes evident. It is true that last year NASA sent up an orbiting astronomical observatory at a cost of about $60 million, but the telescope failed to work and not a single observation was obtained. Astronomers are generally agreed that in the foreseeable future earth-based telescopes will continue to be the principal source of information about the universe; in this instance, the funds which might have bought three 200-inch optical telescopes were wasted.

Sir Bernard does not decry the valuable results that space exploration has yielded in the sun-moon-earth environment. We know far more about the emanations from the sun, the radiation bands girdling the earth, and the surface of the moon than we did before the era of man-made satellites. He gives more credit to the United States than to the Soviet Union in this respect, and indeour lead in instrumentation and electronics, and their utilization in space, should offset some of the criticism that is now being heaped on NASA and its contractors. But the fact remains that the bulk of the available funds, in both the Soviet Union and the United States, is going into a contest of money and might based, in Sir Bernard's words, "on extraneous political and military requirements." In the perspective of history, it will not make the slightest difference whether a man lands on the moon in 1969 or 1972, or whether he wears a Russian or an American uniform. What will be of significance is the further accumulation of knowledge of the kind that Galileo and Newton, Kepler and Einstein contributed when men only dreamed of venturing into space.

Salisbury in '68

Not that they deserve it, but the establishmentarians who control the distribution of Pulitzer Prizes may get a chance to redeem themselves for having withheld the award that the journalism jury so properly, indeed—almost inevitably—bestowed on Harrison E. Salisbury. It happens that his series from North Vietnam was published in The New York Times from late in December, 1966, until well into January, 1967; it is thus as eligible for consideration in 1968 as it was in 1967. The Times should certainly resubmit the material, and the press of the country, supporting one of its most distinguished members, should demand in advance that this time there be no tampering with the jury's decision.

This sort of thing has happened before, and in broader perspective candidates for the various professional Pulitzer juries should in future refuse to serve if their decisions are to be subject to bureaucratic review. It is absurd to submit a man's work to a jury of his peers, only to have their opinion cast out by men who know little and care less about professional criteria, but who are set trembling by every draft in this windy nation.

The Judge and the Agitator

When the domestic history of the cold war is written—if it ever is—a section should be reserved for the depressing story of the way in which federal judges who presided with exceptional severity at successful Smith Act prosecutions and similar cases were uniformly promoted, just as the prosecutors, in these same cases, were with equal uniformity rewarded with judicial appointments. To underscore the pattern, future historians should then tell the story of what happened to Delbert E. Metzger, who died April 24 in Honolulu. Once the danger of invasion had passed, Judge Metzger decided that martial law, which had been in effect in the islands since December 7, 1941, should be lifted and he so ruled on March 31, 1944. The military disagreed but Judge Metzger did not hesitate to impose a $5,000 fine against General Richardson, who had refused to honor a writ of habeas corpus based on the ruling.

Prior to statehood, federal judges in the islands were appointed not for life but for specific terms. Judge Metzger's term had expired on September 28, 1951, and—as punishment for his defiance of the military—he had not been reappointed although he continued to serve. But the delicate position in which he found himself did not deter him from reducing the bail of seven Smith Act defendants from $75,000 each—demanded by the U. S. District Attorney—to $5,000 each. In reducing the bail, Judge Metzger said he had always understood that bail was not intended as a form of punishment. The ruling was promptly denounced as "outrageous" by Senator O'Mahoney, who then chaired the committee having jurisdiction of island affairs, by Senator McCarran of the Judiciary Committee, and by J. Howard McGrath who was then Attorney General. This imposing trio went further and made it quite clear that Judge Metzger would not be reappointed. But so much support flowed to him—the Hawaiian Bar Association gave him an overwhelming endorsement—that President Truman felt it expedient to wait until the protest had abated before announcing that Metzger would not be reappointed (see editorials in The Nation September 15, 1951, and December 29, 1951).

At a later date, Judge Metzger wrote two articles for The Nation that should be required reading for future historians of the domestic cold war: "No Longer a Judge: An Ex-Jurist Tells Why," July 18, 1953; and "Duty of the Lawyer: Defense of Heresy," May 1, 1954, in which he wrote: "Let us not permit the silencing of the courageous few who speak out against oppression. Let us rather join them to drive back into history this new age of the informer and the demagogue and restore our great legal tradition."

Aldino Felicani, who died in Boston the same week as Judge Metzger, was an Italian immigrant who came to this country in 1914 and settled in Cleveland where he edited an anarchist journal. Later he moved to Boston and joined the staff of La Notizia, an Italian-language newspaper. On the day following the arrests of Sacco and Vanzetti on May 5, 1920, Felicani founded the Sacco-Vanzetti Defense Committee and served as its treasurer from then until 1931. During this period he edited L'Agitazione, an Italian-language publication devoted to news about the case, which circulated throughout the world and was translated into many languages. He also edited, with Mary Donovan and Gardner Jackson, the official bulletin of the defense committee. A notably honest man, Felicani was as devoted to his principles as Judge Metzger was to his and, in some respects, the principles were the same. When the test came for him as it did for Judge Metzger, Aldino Felicani, an anarchist and a pacifist, exhibited a devotion to the safeguards of individual freedom that should have shamed (but didn't) the bench and bar of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

Background to Labor's Showdown

B. J. WIDICK

Mr. Widick is the author of Labor Today: The Triumphs and Failures of Unionism in the United States (Houghton Mifflin). He teaches at Columbia and Wayne State Universities.

Detroit

The storms engulfing the major collective bargaining issues of 1967 provide a suitable backdrop for, and in part explain, the determination of Walter P. Reuther, the Auto Workers' union president, to challenge the domination of George Meany, president of the AFL-CIO, over the American trade union movement. Current turbulence in the trucking, railroad, rubber and auto industries is at a pitch unprecedented since the early post-World War II strike wave. It seems a long time ago and yet it was just last year that so-called labor experts and government officials were arguing that unions should restrict their demands for wage gains to the guideline rule of 3.2 per cent annually. Today, participants in the major negotiations are puzzled how to mollify the rank and file with gains approaching 5 to 6 per cent.

Signs of the new mood in labor's ranks, which began to appear in the 1966 wage settlements, abound everywhere. Just a few weeks ago white-collar workers carried out a successful radio and television strike on a national scale. Symbolic of the new feelings in America was the sight of Hugh Downs, a popular TV personality, walking a picket line which prominent national figures like David Brinkley and Walter Cronkite respected as members of the striking union. A recent Harris poll reported that 77 per cent of the American public supported labor's right to strike. And the frustrations and escalations, as well as the inflationary impact of the war in Vietnam, have stirred uneasy feelings everywhere in American society, including the collective bargaining front.

It is probable that only some form of compulsory arbitration dictated by Congressional pressure or legislation will prevent a nation-wide railroad strike. The unions had voted to go out on April 13, but special legislation delayed the strike to May 3 and then to June 19. Settlement must be attempted in the face of mounting rank-and-file pressure against accepting a 5 per cent increase.

Three of the four major rubber companies in the United States have been shut down by a national strike; the new union leadership, backed by the UAW, is determined to win far more substantial gains than the rubber companies had assumed would be enough to bring labor peace. Latest returns from the vote of the Teamsters indicate that the rank and file may reject the recently negotiated nation-wide agreement. In Chicago, a strike by a segment of the drivers has provoked an area-wide lockout, thereby indicating that the trucking industry does not yet grasp the effects of its recent nation-wide lockout during contract negotiations. It exploded dissatisfaction about the modest gains achieved in national negotiations into a flaming revolt.

James Hoffa's home local 299 in Detroit rejected the pact, and that was a serious setback to Frank Fitzsimmons, acting president of the union and chief negotiator in Hoffa's absence. It is difficult, if not impossible, to convince the Teamsters' rank and file that they would not have gotten more "if Jimmy had been there." Now the monolithic leadership pattern is broken up, and settling problems in the trucking industry will be a far more complex undertaking.

The economic prosperity, high profits and inflationary pressures behind the upsurge within the trade unions will be felt with particular force when contract negotiations come up in September between the UAW and General Motors, Ford and Chrysler. The persistent skilled-trades unrest in the auto industry constitutes a potential threat and a challenge which Reuther skillfully utilized at a national skilled-trades meeting and the special UAW convention in April.

Seldom has the union movement seen as impressive a demonstration of solidarity as the 1.5-million-member UAW displayed. Reuther received a free hand in bargaining for a variety of demands with the industry and in pursuing the UAW's strained relations with the AFL-CIO. The convention's 3,000 delegates were reminders to the auto industry of the calculations it will have to make in arriving at the price of labor peace in this rich industry which has never had to use the argument that it could not afford to pay the package demanded by the union.

The UAW convention also provided Reuther with a national forum to outline a devastating indictment of the leadership of George Meany and his docile majority of the AFL-CIO council. Not since John L. Lewis excoriated William Green and the AFL council in the 1930s has a major union leader delivered such a commentary on his colleagues in labor's hierarchy. The standing ovation given Reuther at the conclusion of his philippic suggests that the UAW's secondary leaders did not need much convincing. But important as Reuther's analysis of the AFL-CIO may be, the significant event for him in the next few months will be the outcome of the 1967 auto negotiations.

Because the auto industry is the most profitable in our economy, because there is a skilled-trades shortage and the economic outlook for the latter half of 1967 is bullish, conditions are favorable for Reuther to obtain the greatest gains of any contract in the past decade. It is by his role as a successful union negotiator that he expects to attract many secondary and higher officials to his way of thinking about the general problems of the union movement. Although many commentators felt that Reuther was losing his touch when the Mansfield (Ohio) local went on a wildcat strike and almost shut down the General Motors empire, the fact is that the incident gave Reuther an opportunity to solidify the union ranks behind his leadership and to show the industry, if it needed an example, what tactics the UAW could employ to win substantial gains. For General Motors, of course, the wildcat strike wasn't an unhappy event either since it enabled the company to reduce excessive car inventories without unpleasant layoffs.

An interesting piece of strategy has already been outlined in the talk about a possible auto shutdown this fall. Reuther pointed out that if there were any strike against GM it would be selective, because GM supplies parts to other car, truck and farm implements makers. In the national interest, the UAW would also avoid striking any GM plant involved in defense production. "I take the position that, if we protect defense production, no one can make a national emergency out of the fact that somebody driving a 1967 Cadillac is in an emergency situation because he can't get his 1968 Cadillac for a few months."

Industry's reaction to Reuther's views was reported in The Wall Street Journal:

By coincidence, James Roche, president of GM, called for "equitable agreements peacefully arrived at" in a Janesville, Wis., speech shortly after Mr. Reuther's convention comments. Mr. Roche said that the economy would be hurt by auto strikes next fall but that a peaceful settlement "could do wonders in strengthening public confidence in the future. It would be a breath of fresh air—a powerful and positive stimulus toward the scale of economic progress which we need to maintain this nation's leadership against growing and impressive foreign competition."

Asked afterward about Mr. Reuther's selective-strike comments, Mr. Roche said that even a selective strike would close down GM and he cited recent walkouts at GM's Mansfield, O., parts plant as an example (it turned off most of GM's auto production for several days).

Although everyone in Detroit labor circles predicts a fall strike, the flexible approach which Reuther adopted at the special convention has given both management and labor far more elbow room in seeking an amicable agreement this summer. Reuther has dropped the idea of placing blue-collar workers on salary as a high priority item; instead, the UAW's three main goals are substantial pay increases, guaranteed annual income for all workers and elimination of the 43c-an-hour differential between United States and Canadian auto wages.

Until that special April convention of the UAW, many union leaders misjudged the significance of the decision by Reuther and his colleagues to resign from all posts in the AFL-CIO.

The UAW decision to have its officers resign from their posts in the AFL-CIO does not mean that the UAW is running from a fight. To run away from a fight on program, policy and principle would be incompatible with the whole tradition and history of the UAW. We are choosing rather to make the fight for sound programs, policies and principles in the broad arena of the whole labor movement and not within the narrow, private and exclusive structure of the AFL-CIO.

So states the policy letter that the UAW mailed, along with floods of other material, to broad sections of the union leadership in America.

Walter P. Reuther

In brief form, the UAW indictment of the AFL-CIO hierarchy is as follows: (a) the AFL-CIO as a federation has failed to do the job for which it was created; (b) the AFL-CIO has become stagnant; (c) it has too much of a banker's mentality; (d) it drags its feet on the civil rights struggle, and (e) its stature in society is damaged, with only Madison Avenue hucksters rating lower in popular dislike. Those are just the main points Reuther made in his lengthy indictment which the UAW delegates cheered.

Once the September bargaining is over, the UAW leadership will seek a meeting with the AFL-CIO council to hammer home this bill of particulars and to propose radical reforms in the parent body. Besides the ordinary trade union programs like coordinated organizing drives, a new feature will be introduced. The UAW is proposing that the AFL-CIO create a Public Review Board similar to the one functioning in the auto union—an independent body given power to reverse union decisions taken against rank and filers (in many cases dissenters). This would replace the so-called Ethical Practices Code and Committee of the AFL-CIO, whose functioning has been on a par with the surroundings in which its provisions were accepted. "We adopted them in the Roulette Room of the Monte Carlo Hotel in Miami Beach," Reuther pointed out. One can scarcely imagine the painters, carpenters or operating engineers unions accepting anything even resembling a Supreme Court available to critics.

Unless there is a far greater spirit of adjustment on the part of George Meany than any current evidence suggests, there is little chance of avoiding a complete split between the UAW and the AFL-CIO. In almost every phase of union activity, as well as public and international work, the Meany forces, while retaining total control of the federation, have lost ground and progressively isolated themselves from new streams of social forces stirring in the country.

In the area of civil rights, the Meany group is busy defending the dismal record of the building trades; while the UAW begins a campaign to organize the poor in the ghettos, and keeps close liaison with Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., including a new development wherein King and Joseph Rauh, Jr., UAW counsel in Washington, have announced a new group seeking international peace.

Reports from abroad, confirmed by visiting foreign trade unionists, indicate that the recent disclosure of ties between the CIA and some AFL-CIO unions has further damaged Meany's already low reputation in the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions. Victor Reuther's bitter allegations of CIA connections were substantiated by the exposés, even though the AFL-CIO and George Meany have denied the charges.

Early in April the UAW won a significant victory over the hard-line policies of Meany when five high-level Russian union leaders were brought to this country with the approval of the State Department to meet with UAW leaders—a visit that had been blocked last June because of the objections of Meany and Jay Lovestone, the AFL-CIO international affairs director. Because the UAW has not been tarred with the CIA brush, and because of its criticism of Meany's hard policy in Vietnam, it is presently enjoying a close rapport with most leaders of the West European trade union movement, and its world auto workers' councils seem likely to become a permanent organization. This provides Reuther with an independent base for international activities. The two most important and largest unions in America, the Teamsters and the Auto Workers, whose membership consists of about 20 per cent of the entire union membership in the country, are now independent of the influence and direction of George Meany. That makes him something less than the spokesman for American labor he has always assumed himself to be.

By the time the next AFL-CIO convention takes place in December, the main events on the collective bargaining program will be over, the arguments and the debates about UAW's criticisms of the AFL-CIO will have engaged the entire union movement, and the gestures of conciliation or repudiation will have made their effect. Almost the only thing certain now about that year-end gathering is that the UAW isn't going to accept the American Legion type of convention that was staged two years ago in San Francisco, with the self-praise and iron grip of George Meany dominating the proceedings. In that sense, the days of the AFL-CIO as the strong arm of the status quo in America are numbered.

GOVERNOR KIRK'S PRIVATE EYES

FRED J. COOK

Mr. Cook is the author of many important articles for The Nation.

Miami

Gov. Claude Roy Kirk, Jr., of Florida, is a tall, beefy, big-business type with a mentality to match. His political and social convictions are of the sort that have sent witch hunters storming up and down the country in recent years, spotting Communists under every throw rug. But last fall Claude Kirk—sometimes called, not without reason, "Kissing Claude," and more recently dubbed by the Florida press "Governor à Go-Go"—discovered a menace better than communism. Crime. Mounting a white purity charger, Claude Kirk rode hard in the lists, and a grass-roots revulsion against crime made him the state's first Republican governor since Reconstruction.

The event was significant far beyond the borders of Florida, for signs multiply that large segments of the American electorate are becoming fed up with crime and are ready to take matters into their own hands. The mood of the vigilante threatens to become the mood of the nation.

In Detroit in early January, some 200 grocers, victimized by a series of holdups, banded together for instruction in the use of firearms—and since then they have gunned down five stick-up men. West Side Chicago merchants formed their own protection groups to prevent the looting of their stores during the blizzards of late January. In Dallas, sporting-goods stores have been practically denuded of a choice item, a .25 caliber pistol that takes up about the same space as a king-sized pack of cigarettes, and fits neatly into a purse.

The greatest outbreak of crime-busting passion occurred, however, in Orlando, Fla. The city was rocked last fall by a series of rapes in beauty parlors, motels and apartments, some taking place practically on the street at high noon. Hand-gun sales promptly zoomed to 200 and 300 a week, and soon startled policemen on patrol were being approached by pistol-packing mamas who wanted to know how to load and fire their newly acquired artillery. Fearing that these armed amateurs might blow off their own heads or hands, the police set up a free instructional course in the proper use of firearms. They anticipated an attendance of about 150 women, but 2,400 stormed the classroom.

Such are some of the manifestations of a mood that seems to be sweeping the nation, and astute politicians, with Governor Kirk in the van, may be expected to heed that old American cry, DO SOMETHING QUICK. The form this action takes will be all-important. Governor Kirk's solution has been to go outside the established agencies of the law and hire George A. Wackenhut's army of private detectives for a much ballyhooed "crusade" to root out crime in Florida. Other governors of right-wing persuasion have been toying with similar ideas. Gov. Ronald Reagan has wondered out loud about the possibility of setting up a private crime-fighting foundation, and Gov. Lester Maddox has commented that he hopes to "uphold the moral status" of Georgians by getting private citizens involved in a campaign against crime.

There is in all this a curious and dangerous ambivalence on the part of a long indifferent American public toward the problem that now so concerns it. The reality of a criminal underworld whose income in billions of dollars dwarfs that of the Detroit motor industry has been pointed out many times—and Americans, on the whole, couldn't care less. They have still wanted to play the numbers, bet on the horses with the bookie, borrow money from the loan shark, get their fix from the narcotics pusher, or pick up a phone and obtain the obliging services of a call girl—all indulgences that pour fantastic billions into the treasury of organized crime.

Now, at a ludicrously late hour, with the evils of an undermined law and ethic boiling out in overt, individual assault, a lot of Americans are becoming piously horrified at the ogreish aspects of their society.

The dangers implicit in using devious means for laudable purposes, the hazards inseparable from putting the power of the law into hands not accountable to any structure of law, do not disturb the suddenly panicked. What happens and what may be expected to happen is most vividly demonstrated in Florida, where the new "Governor à Go-Go," to the heady sound of public applause, has by-passed all the legally constituted agencies of law enforcement and organized his own private constabulary.

The general election of 1966, which in effect turned Florida into a two-party state, was marked by the spectacle of knights swapping horses in the middle of the joust. At the start, Robert King High, the Mayor of Miami, campaigned furiously for the Democratic nomination so mistakenly believed to be tantamount to election. An underdog, High made a big issue of crime and corruption; evidently touching a responsive chord, he became his party's designee. Then, apparently believing he could coast, he muted the issue in the general election campaign. Kirk picked up the fallen banner, and rode with it into the Governor's mansion in Tallahassee.

Kirk was a get-rich-quick product of Florida's booming economy. He had founded an insurance company in Jacksonville, amassed a personal fortune, and then gone into the brokerage business, purchasing a Florida partnership in Hayden Stone. Politically, he had been conspicuous for his right-wing leanings. He and Wackenhut, a one-time FBI employee, joined forces for an unsuccessful 1964 campaign to unseat Sen. Spessard L. Holland, a mild-mannered Democrat of quite conservative persuasion. They barnstormed the state, accusing Holland of being "ultra-liberal," but Florida voters knew better. In 1966, Wackenhut and Kirk again joined forces, backing Barry Goldwater for President.

Wackenhut, now the Governor's private eye, is a powerfully built man, about 6 feet tall, with the bulk of a professional wrestler, steel-trap lips and a cleft, granite-looking chin. When he sweeps into one of the numerous Wackenhut offices on a whirlwind meet-the-boys tour, he crushes hands right and left in his powerful grip, exudes inspirational phrases, and departs after delivering to each loyal employee a disabling thwack across the shoulders. Wackenhut keeps in the kind of trim that enables him to stage such boisterous performances by eschewing smoking and drinking and running a mile every other night.

"He thinks with his muscles," a former aide says of Wackenhut, but there can be little question of his astuteness where the main chance is concerned. He spent just three years in the FBI, not as an investigator but as a physical education instructor. Nevertheless, when he left the bureau in 1954, he parlayed the image of FBI super-sleuth into a private detective business that is now the third largest in the nation, ranked right behind Pinkerton and Burns. This spectacular growth is attributable to just one factor—Wackenhut's way with federal contracts.

The early years were hard. When Wackenhut set up his private-eye business in the Miami area, he had three ex-FBI men for partners, but they dropped out one by one and Wackenhut struggled along, sometimes on an income of no more than $9,000 a year. Then, in 1960, he mined the mother lode. In that year, the law firm of Sen. George A. Smathers, a conservative Florida Democrat, wangled a way around the law for the benefit of the Wackenhut pocketbook. Federal bureaus are forbidden by statute from hiring private detective agencies, but Smathers' firm neatly solved this difficulty by splitting the Wackenhut Corporation like the amoeba—one part for investigation; a second, housed in a subsidiary corporation, for guard and security duties.

Once this Smathers legerdemain had been performed, federal agencies seemed to become fascinated by the previously little-known Wackenhut Corporation. The National Aeronautics and Space Administration, the Atomic Energy Commission and other federal enclaves poured millions of dollars into Wackenhut's lap to protect them from subversion and intrusion. A public peek at the size of this bonanza was furnished in April, 1966, when blocs of the privately held Wackenhut stock were placed on the market. The prospectus showed that Wackenhut had done $17,755,514 worth of business in 1965. About 95 per cent of sales came from guard activities, and 38 per cent of total sales derived from direct contracts with the federal government or subcontracts for the protection of government installations. From this public offering of stock, Wackenhut cleaned up an estimated $1.3 million in capital gains—and still retained ironclad voting control over his corporation.

Such was the state of Wackenhut affairs when, on January 3, 1967, Governor Kirk announced that he was going to conduct his own war on crime. The battle was also to be privately financed, Kirk's big-business friends and associates pledging hundreds of thousands of dollars, and was to be masterminded by the Governor's good friend, George R. Wackenhut. Even as the news broke, a significant detail emphasized the close rapport between the new Governor and his chosen investigator. One of the less publicized biographical details of the Florida gubernatorial campaign had been the fact that Kirk had been twice divorced by his first wife, who had uncharitably accused him of gallivanting with others throughout the course of their two marriages. Even many knowledgeable Florida voters had not been aware of the Kirk divorces and their background, and virtually none suspected that he had already picked his wife's successor, a blonde German-born divorcee, Erika Mattfeld, then in the process of being liberated from a wealthy Brazilian. So it came as something of a shock when, in the midst of the first controversy over the new Governor's private war on crime, it was disclosed that he and blonde Erika were off on a little pre-honeymoon cruise, with Wackenhut for chaperone, on Wackenhut's yacht, aptly named the Security Risk.

The Kirk-Wackenhut design for a crime crusade that would by-pass established agencies of the law caused instant alarm. Democrats in Florida feared that the Governor's political enemies, not the underworld moguls who have infested the state for decades, would be the prime targets of the new private police force; and far beyond the borders of Florida, other Democratic leaders viewed with alarm. Sen. Edward V. Long (D., Mo.) declared in a speech made in Boston: "This is the way the Gestapo and the secret police operate." And Sen. Gaylord Nelson (D., Wis.) lashed out in Congress on February 23 at "the alarming trend in this country toward the use of police state tactics." Citing a number of examples, he denounced especially "the secret, reprehensible tactics" being employed in Florida, and argued that when investigators are given extralegal authority, "then the people given these special, secret powers become a kind of new government all their own."

Governor Kirk counterattacked. Only newspapers and Democratic politicians viewed with alarm, he said: "the people don't have any criticism." Samplings of public opinion indicated he was right; the public in Florida, almost to a man, wanted "something done" about crime.

Playing up to these aroused expectations, Kirk and Wackenhut began an operation that, at least in its opening round, was more farce than menace. Hank Messick, a veteran and dedicated crime reporter, has since given an insider's view of what he has termed "a cruel hoax." Now 44 years old, Messick won his journalistic spurs exposing the underworld in Newport and Covington, Ky. Financed by two $25,000 grants from the Ford Foundation, he pursued his researches into big-league crime (an endeavor that produced a recent book, The Silent Syndicate), then signed a contract with the Miami Herald to search out the mob in Florida.

"Wackenhut certainly sold me," Messick says now, with a rueful shake of the head. "I'm convinced he could sell anybody anything. He certainly had me believing that this was going to be the greatest thing that had ever happened."

Disillusionment set in almost at once. When he reported for work right after the New Year, Messick found there was no office for the anti-crime unit and precious few investigators. A small private office just about large enough to accommodate one desk and a telephone was cleared out and, says Messick, "the three or four of us engaged on the project had to stand around waiting turns to use that one line."

Messick thought at first that this was just the inevitable shakedown difficulties any new endeavor would encounter, but time passed and matters failed to improve. Messick couldn't get a secretary. When he and his best undercover man had worked up a memorandum on bolita (the big Cuban-oriented numbers game that is the rage in Miami), he would have to hunt around for the loan of a stenographer. She would often be snowed under with other work, and it might be a week before the memo got typed. By that time, the location of the game might have changed. Few new investigators were added to the great crime drive, and all of these were on a rigid forty-hour week. "Can you imagine fighting crime on forty hours a week?" Messick asks.

Wackenhut, he says, had been eager to have him bring down his files containing all the background details he had amassed during the years of his Ford Foundation and Miami Herald sleuthings, and Messick says he told Wackenhut in essence: "All right, get me a filing cabinet and I'll bring down my files and you can copy them." But even so he couldn't get a filing cabinet and his files remained at home.

Then, toward the end of January, Governor Kirk announced that he was coming to Miami and would drop in at the Wackenhut headquarters in Coral Gables to inspect his crime-fighting forces. The announcement, Messick says, caused a near panic. A large room was cleared out, desks were moved in, telephones hooked up. Paint was dashed on the walls. "Literally," Messick says, "it hadn't had time to dry; it was still damp in places when the Governor arrived."

Files were urgently needed (especially since Wackenhut had been telling the Governor and the public that the great crime drive was costing $1,000 a day), and so at last a filing cabinet was procured. Messick brought down some file folders and placed them in the cabinet. "They filled up maybe a third of the cabinet," he recalls. This didn't seem too impressive for a $1,000-a-day operation, so a second filing cabinet, empty, was moved in alongside the first one, and an iron bar that could be removed only by manipulating a combination lock was placed across the two cabinets as if to insure the safety of their ultra-secret contents.

Kirk arrived. Oblivious of hoax, he gave the boys a short pep talk, the essence of which was that if the bastards didn't impeach him or get him first, they were all going to be in the crime-fighting business for a long time—and they were going to clean up Florida. "These FBI types," Messick says, "stood around afterwards murmuring admiringly, 'My, he's a fine man, isn't he? What a fine man!'"

Things were no better after the Governor's inspection, though by the middle of February the staff had been increased to some eight investigators. "You wouldn't believe some of the types they hired," says an informant who was then connected with the operation. "It would take some of these birds a week to find Flagler Street."

At this point, Messick quit in disgust. "The Governor is hoaxing the public, and Wackenhut is hoaxing the Governor," he said. In the seven weeks he had been with the "Keystone cops," as he called the Wackenhuts, the most notable achievement had been the nailing down of charges against a county superintendent of schools.

The superintendent was Woodrow A. Darden, of Titusville, in Brevard County. The crime drive had just been announced, Messick recalls, when a telephone call came in from Orlando, tipping the Wackencops, as they are sometimes called, that Darden had in his possession a washing machine and drier purchased with school funds. Today, a Brevard County newspaper, had built the case against Darden. "The information was all there," Messick recalls. "It was just a question of confirming it. The only problem was we didn't have any investigator to send."

Finally, a live body was scrounged up from one of the Wackenhut outposts and dispatched to Orlando. Just how this operative, James White, handled the assignment later became a matter of dispute. Darden and his wife, Jeanette, subsequently filed suit against the Wackenhut Corporation and White, asking damages because White "unlawfully, maliciously, willfully, wantonly and fraudulently" invaded their home without a warrant.

There were suggestive overtones to the case. Darden was not only superintendent of schools in Brevard but also a member of the State Board of Regents, which has jurisdiction over the University of Florida; and Governor Kirk was believed to be eager to wrest control of this board from the Democrats. Therefore, it was important that the charges against Darden be made to stick, but the state's attorney in Brevard, perhaps dubious himself about the manner in which the evidence had been obtained, protested against finding an indictment. At this point, according to Wackenhut sources, Governor Kirk took a hand, storming and raging and demanding Darden's indictment. The indictment was then obtained, and the Governor promptly bounced Darden off the State Board of Regents.

It was the Wackenhuts' first triumph, but what was its significance? "There are a thousand petty situations like this in Florida," Hank Messick says. "But is this really fighting crime?" The question leads to others. Just what is the crime problem in Florida? Just what is needed to combat it?

The simple fact of life is that Florida has been a virtual fief of the syndicate for the last thirty years. No area of the United States, not even Las Vegas, has a greater concentration of hoods in residence, a greater cross-hatching of gangster ties and influence. The New York mob, the Detroit, the Cleveland, the Chicago mobs—all have their stakes here. Florida was the staging point for the great underworld gambling venture in Havana when Batista ran Cuba, and it is now the nerve center for the operation of the new Bahama gambling casinos.

The idea that an army of amateur sleuths can work any overnight miracle against this sort of corruption becomes ludicrous when one considers the massive crime campaign already waged by federal authorities. That endeavor dates back to the earliest days of the regime of Robert F. Kennedy as U. S. Attorney General. Edwin L. Silberling, who headed Kennedy's Organized Crime Group in the Justice Department, kept some forty to fifty experts—Justice Department lawyers, FBI agents, Internal Revenue accountants, customs and narcotics agents—working full time in the Miami area for more than two years. After he left the department, the effort continued. But the results have been minimal.

"This is something that takes a lot of time and a lot of people," says Silberling. "If you go into it with the idea that you are going to get sudden, dramatic results, this is all wrong because you're just not going to get them. The only way is to make an investment, a permanent investment in time and men and money, and then maybe eventually, bit by bit, you'll get somewhere."

The prescription bears scant resemblance to the Wackenhut crusade that has aroused such widespread public anticipation in Florida. The whole Wackenhut background, the organization's emphasis and skills, make the present endeavor suspect.

Until Governor Kirk picked him to rid Florida of crime, Wackenhut's organization had exhibited little passion about the crime menace but an enormous energy for the ferreting out of possible subversives. Last year, of 4,100 employees scattered in twenty-eight Wackenhut offices in the continental United States, Puerto Rico, Venezuela and Colombia, some 3,800 were engaged in guard work and protective services. The overwhelming emphasis was on the amassing of millions of dossiers. The Wackenhut files are said to contain more than 3 million names of intellectual and political mavericks, and the organization during the past winter purchased one of the largest independent collections of such materials extant—a compilation said, among other things, to contain every name that ever found its way into the files of the House Committee on Un-American Activities. The Wackenhut boast is that it has at its command more dossiers than any organization in the country outside the FBI.

The right-wing fixation shows in other ways. One Wackenhut director is Ralph E. Davis, of Los Angeles, a member of the National Council of the John Birch Society. Another is Loyd Wright, a former president of the American Bar Association who praised the Birch Society when he ran against liberal Sen. Thomas H. Kuchel in 1962. Wright is on the national strategy committee of another far-Right outfit, the American Security Council, as is another Wackenhut director, Gen. Mark Clark. Still another member of the Wackenhut board is Edward V. Rickenbacker, retired board chairman of Eastern Airlines and a crusader against the income tax and the United Nations.

The taint of fanaticism, which runs like an insidious thread through the Wackenhut record, raises the fear that political opponents and predetermined evildoers may be hounded, regardless of facts and evidence. The great Wackenhut crime drive is still so new that it is impossible to tell to what degree these fears may be justified, but there are some disturbing indications.

One of these dates back to 1957 when Wackenhut made his first stab at a big crime investigation for the May term Dade County grand jury. John Adams Baker, a Miami businessman who was foreman of that jury, says bluntly: "My impressions were that you couldn't have a sorrier investigator."

Baker had served previously on federal grand juries, had been president of the Grand Jury Association, and had been active in getting the state to pass a law permitting grand juries to hire special counsel to advise them—an act that was to play a prominent part in what was about to happen.

Wackenhut had been engaged by the Miami Beach City Council to make a study of crime and police corruption, and Baker asked Wackenhut if the grand jury might have a copy of his report when it was finished. Wackenhut agreed. Baker informed the grand jury and state's attorney Richard Gerstein, who was directing its deliberations, and he invited Gerstein to send a representative with him to get the report. When Wackenhut learned of this, Baker says, he made "an urgent request" that neither Gerstein nor anyone connected with his office be permitted to see his findings. "This was a bombshell to me," Baker says. "The inference was loud and clear that there was something wrong with the state's attorney's office."

Baker was in the embarrassing position of having to rescind his invitation to Gerstein. When he saw Wackenhut alone, he says, Wackenhut advised him that conditions were terrible; that his Miami Beach probe had opened up important avenues of investigation; that he would pursue these as a special investigator for the grand jury if the jury wished to hire him; and that, if the jury did go ahead, he felt he could assure it sufficient evidence to indict the kingpins of the underworld. But Wackenhut was insistent—"he sat there and he practically had tears in his eyes," Baker says—that Gerstein be kept in the dark, that the grand jury must hire special counsel.

"We were over a barrel," Baker goes on. "We didn't know what to do. Here was this big FBI man, with all the prestige and everything behind him; we couldn't doubt him, and if he was right, we had a tremendously important situation on our hands."

The jury agreed to hire Wackenhut, but hesitated about employing a special counsel. Then, one Sunday night while Baker was sitting at home, his telephone rang, and a lawyer calling from New York introduced himself. He said he had just finished an important case; he understood the grand jury wanted a special counsel; and he was ready to fly back to Miami right away to consult with the jury if it wished.

This was all news to Baker, as the jury hadn't made any such decision, but the lawyer came—and the jury wound up hiring him. "It was completely stupid of us," Baker says now, for the attorney, it turned out, was the private lawyer of Wackenhut. "Nobody could have put themselves more in a strait jacket than we did," Baker continues, "for it is obvious that, if Wackenhut's report turned out to be 95 per cent rumor and comparatively worthless, the last person in the world who might be expected to point out its inadequacies would be Wackenhut's own attorney."

Baker adds: "The next few months were a nightmare to me. I began to wonder: Am I in Dade County? Nazi Berlin? Moscow?"

"Wackenhut would more than once call me up at 2 or 3 A.M. and whisper over the phone: 'Jack, this is George. . . . I'm working on something real hot . . . if you don't see me in the morning, well . . . I can't talk too much now.'"

The result of all this cloak-and-dagger work was that Wackenhut produced a 340-page report for a fee of some $2,500. "You read a lot of stuff and you saw really big names mentioned, and you thought to yourself, 'my God, this is awful,'" Baker says. "But then you tried to weed out the hearsay from the facts, and they just didn't have a thing to go on. There wasn't one solid fact on which to base an indictment. There wasn't anything in the report that you couldn't have gotten out of the files of Dan Sullivan's Crime Commission or the newspapers. Any reporter could have written it."

Still the Wackenhuts are riding high, and expectations of mighty achievements are undiminished. Many competent observers are impressed by what they call the "gung-ho" spirit of the outfit, a kind of righteous fanaticism in the pursuit of evil in all its forms. So far, this fierce righteousness seems to have been exhibited more against political adversaries than emperors of the mob. A couple of examples illustrate the spirit—and the cause for worry.

At the end of 1966, when the Administration subcommittee of the House of Representatives was engaged in a rush run-down on the affairs of Adam Clayton Powell, the Wackenhuts were employed to check out Powell's payroll. There were 149 names on the list, and Washington was rife with reports that many of these had been cadged off tombstones. So the Wackenhuts were asked to establish two vital points: Did these people actually exist? And had they performed any work for the government?

Almost immediately there was a backfire that disturbed Rep. Wayne L. Hays (D., O.), chairman of the subcommittee. Reading investigators' reports, Hays discovered that the Wackenhuts apparently had been inquiring into the sleeping arrangements of Powell's entourage in Bimini. Shortly afterward, one of the girls on Powell's staff walked into Hays's office, complaining that the Wackenhuts had been questioning her about her age. There are two versions of Hays's reaction. Members of his committee say that he was incensed, bawled the Wackenhuts out, and ordered them to leave Powell's private life alone and to concentrate on the items that mattered. Hays himself now belittles the whole controversy. He acknowledges that he protested, but he says the Wackenhuts explained that the information was "volunteered" by one of Powell's girls who "thought" this was the kind of information the committee wanted.

A similar kind of puritanical nosiness, especially where a political opponent is concerned, was exhibited shortly afterward in Florida. Hank Messick recalls the day when one of his agents came to him with a set of notes on a yellow pad. A tipster had called in some information about one of the most prominent Florida Democrats, who had gotten himself mixed up with some girls of tarnished virtue during a trip to the Bahamas. Messick was appalled, he says, and went directly to Wackenhut, protesting that the crime unit would be laughed out of Florida if it went chasing every personal peccadillo of this sort. But Wackenhut, according to Messick, was all gung-ho. "We're out to fight crime, all kinds of crime," he quotes Wackenhut as saying.

Other instances reinforce the suspicion that the "crime drive" may be used to cloak other purposes. Florida Secretary of State Thomas B. Adams, a Democrat, has charged bluntly that he and other officials have been trailed by Wackenhut private eyes. Friendly hotel owners have warned him, he says, that the Wackenhuts have asked them to keep a record of his visitors and telephone calls. Richard Gerstein, the state's attorney who was the target of Wackenhut in 1957, remains admittedly one of the major objects of the new crime drive. In all, by early April, sources close to the Wackenhut probe said that 356 investigations had been undertaken—the majority involving public officials.

At least one Republican who had disagreed with Governor Kirk politically has already felt the heat—and, he insists, has paid the penalty. James Gregory, of Fort Lauderdale, a state Senator, states that private detectives began to investigate him before the party primaries in February. They snooped around asking so many questions of his neighbors and political associates, Gregory says, that supporters became suspicious and fell away, and he was defeated for renomination.

The Gregory incident, like the Darden case, is of special significance because both Governor Kirk and Wackenhut have protested that they are not really bypassing established law-enforcement agencies, that they are not really organizing a powerful secret police. They point out that the Wackenhuts have no authority to obtain warrants, to arrest; they can only investigate. The results of their investigations are turned over to properly constituted authorities for action. But as the Darden and Gregory incidents would indicate, the power to investigate is itself a potent tool.

Just how far the controversial Wackenhut-Kirk crime war will go, how long it will last, remains problematical. The original ballyhoo pictured a huge fund, raised from private sources, and a campaign that would go on indefinitely. Not until March 22, when Governor Kirk met the Democratic-controlled state cabinet, were the cards laid on the table, the list of actual contributions disclosed. It was then learned that all the Governor had in hand was $8,400—a little more than a week's pay at Wackenhut's rate. Kirk insisted that pledges for some $150,000 would be made good as soon as Internal Revenue ruled that contributions to the crime drive were tax deductible. In the meantime accounts were indisputably in the red.

The Governor suggested that, in this crisis, the state should undertake the financing. His Democratic opponents, figuratively licking their chops, proclaimed that they would be only too happy to begin financing the drive out of a $700,000 state contingency fund. Only, of course, in that event, they would insist that the investigators be regular state employees, operating under regularly constituted authority. Governor Kirk retorted that it was his crime war and he intended to retain control of it. And in this impasse the matter rested.

A flood of bills has since been introduced in the Florida legislature to create a state crime commission, or a state police force which Florida does not now have, or a state crime-fighting force under the attorney general. Most political observers agree that, out of the stew, will come some kind of state crime effort, if only for the reason that the public is clamoring for action and there are votes to be garnered. But only wild-eyed optimists think that Florida will be suddenly and sweetly purified.

WHY THE CADETS CHEAT

J. ARTHUR HEISE

Mr. Heise, formerly a faculty staff officer at the Air Force Academy, was more recently a guest lecturer at the Free University of West Berlin. He is now a reporter in Buffalo, N. Y.

Colorado Springs

Official investigations are under way for the second time in two years to determine what causes cheating en masse at the U. S. Air Force Academy. Information independently gathered points to shortcomings in the academic program of the newest service academy as the broad and basic cause of this dishonesty. Interviews with more than a dozen past and present faculty members, plus other material assembled since the biggest cheating scandal in U. S. college history occurred at the Academy in 1965, single out two aspects of the academic program as having produced an atmosphere conducive to cheating.

First, "teaching by the numbers" in many of the academic courses turns instructors into "human teaching machines." Because of this centralized system, the faculty enjoys little of the authority and bears few of the responsibilities customary among their civilian colleagues: they work in an atmosphere described in terms ranging from "subservient" to "Machiavellian." The cadets, for their part, try to beat the highly standardized, impersonal system, some apparently by cheating. Second, to create an image of scholarly achievement, the Academy itself has employed practices that set a dubious example for cadets bound by an honor code stating: "We will not lie, or cheat, nor tolerate among us anyone who does."

As a result of the two cheating scandals, 155 budding Air Force careers were cut short when cadets involved were dismissed from the mile-high, 18,000-acre campus hugging the feet of the Rocky Mountains just north of Colorado Springs. In addition to the effect on the lives of the students, the two incidents bear a price tag of more than $5 million (reckoned from what it costs per year to educate a cadet). After the 1965 scandal, the Academy's military and athletic programs bore the brunt of the criticisms handed down by an Air Force investigation committee, headed by the late Gen. Thomas D. White, retired Air Force chief of staff. Changes duly made in the military program included the premature transfer of a former commandant of cadets. The athletic program was also revised, and athletes were not as conspicuous in the recent scandal as they had been in 1965.

However, the academic program, which commands three-fourths of the cadets' time (and where the cheating on exams occurred during both episodes) was diagnosed "basically sound" by the White committee, and no major changes have been made. That division of the Academy has been headed by Brig. Gen. Robert F. McDermott, dean of the faculty, for more than ten years. Primarily under his direction, the Air Force Academy has moved several notches away from the very rigid academic system General McDermott experienced as a cadet at West Point. Air Force cadets today can major in a score of academic fields, are given credit for previous college work, can accelerate their studies with enrichment courses, and begin work toward a master's degree while still at the Academy—all changes from the former systems of the other service academies. Cadets have won dozens of scholarships, and the Academy itself boasts that it received accreditation even before graduating its first class in 1959. Nevertheless, many of the regimented and highly centralized teaching methods that prevailed at the older service academies were built into the Air Force Academy's more modern academic program.

Many Air Force Academy faculty members—possibly most—accept the present academic program with little question. Some are deeply troubled, however, and several were willing to talk—on being promised complete anonymity. During the weeks following the 1965 and the recent scandal, more than a dozen of these of Officers were interviewed at the Academy. About one-third of the interviewed officers are still there; the others have been transferred or have resigned from the Air Force. They included junior and senior officers, combat pilots and service academy graduates, some who had been on the Academy faculty for years, others who were relatively new. They were not a group of young Turks conspiring in dissent: some did not know one another at all, others were barely acquainted. How did these faculty members evaluate the academic program which the White committee report called "basically sound"?

"We are a production line in a factory, rather than an academic institution. This would contribute to an atmosphere of indifference and irresponsibility in which a cheating ring could exist," bluntly stated one officer who had been several years on the faculty. "The program here closely resembles one of indoctrination rather than one which stimulates intellectual curiosity and creative thinking," replied another faculty member.

"When one considers that the individual instructor in many courses does not determine the course he will teach, or the text, or the course outline, or the content of the individual lessons, or the examinations, how does he proceed to teach?" This officer's rhetorical question about the Academy's prescribed courses—most of the curriculum—is silently supported by hundreds of volumes containing copies of the standardized course material, neatly bound in Air Force blue and lining an archival section of the Academy library. Such limitations encourage "that military propensity to avoid responsibility," said a former Academy faculty member, now teaching at a small Eastern college. The standardization of the prescribed courses also demands little independent study from the students, and the well-equipped, 230,000-volume library is little used. Further, the standardization of prescribed courses assures that the cadets will all work along the same predetermined lines, often taking similar tests in different sections of the same course, making cheating possible by passing on information to cadets who have not yet taken the test. It is no surprise then, that it was "mainly in the prescribed courses" that the recent cheating occurred, as General McDermott revealed in an interview. Significantly, only four cadets who confessed to cheating in 1965 were in academic trouble. This year, "only one guy cheated because of academic deficiencies," General McDermott said. Apparently, cadets try to beat the "teaching by the numbers" system, some by cheating to get jump on their classmates.

In 1965, almost fifty cadets cheated with "varying degrees of regularity" for about a year before the incident was reported by a cadet. A year later, it was again a cadet who reported the cheating. Faculty members obviously knew little of what was happening in their small classes, normally limited to sixteen students. A former Academy officer, today teaching at one of America's most respected universities, commented on the impersonal teaching situation at the Academy:

Perhaps the most remarkable characteristic of teaching at the Air Force Academy compared to my teaching experiences at civilian institutions was a lack of real student-faculty involvement. This is paradoxical as the Academy makes a big thing in its public relations handouts of the highly personalized teaching there. They make invidious comparisons with the diploma mills of large universities where classes may have several hundred students. The basis for this smugness is the sixteen-man syndrome. The fact that sections of each course were to have no more than sixteen cadets by edict was held out and mistaken for close faculty-student relationships. The fact of the matter is that it was enormously difficult to find time when you and the cadet were not in class.

The gap between student and teacher is further widened by the "resectioning" of cadets, who in many courses are shifted once or twice during a semester to different sections of the same course, according to academic performance. As a result, cadets may work under three different instructors in the same course during one term.

Cadets who were interviewed said that they were still being bombarded with a barrage of tests. Estimated one: "You can probably expect between five and ten quizzes a week." To this must be added longer examinations, similar to midterm and final exams at civilian institutions. Discussing the policy of frequent testing, faculty members were concerned that it created "expert test takers," to whom the score is more important than substantive learning. The frequent testing is "designed to make the cadets study," but, said one faculty member, "instead of getting the student interested, instead of challenging him, we force him to do the work. It's an easy substitute for teaching." Tied to the testing is the policy of grading on a curve. It has been changed from "prescribed" to "suggested" since the 1965 scandal. Faculty members still at the Academy indicated that in some departments the change of emphasis has helped, but in others many military officers still read "suggested" in a very detailed faculty regulation as "prescribed." Cadets have frankly admitted to a "beat-the-curve" attitude.

The problem of rank arises within the Academy's all-military, 440-officer faculty. Differences over purely academic matters, faculty members reported, have been settled between officers junior and senior in military rank, but not in academic standing, with "that's an order." Awareness of the rank problem is compounded by inbreeding: one-third of the faculty listed in the current Academy catalogue—including the dean and vice dean—are service academy graduates. One officer, himself a West Point graduate, said during an interview: "They create pressure groups because of the positions many of them hold." He also felt that the "average level of the West Pointer is way below the average level of the college graduate from a civilian school who teaches here.

The attitude of the administration to the faculty accentuates the problems of the academic program. General McDermott clearly stated the administration's position during his first session with the faculty after the White committee found in its report that his academic program was "basically sound." Quoting carefully selected passages from the accrediting manual of the North Central Association of Colleges & Secondary Schools—which accredits the Academy—he suggested that because of its "mission of educating career officers," the Academy had the right, "such as religious organizations" to "define appropriate limitations of instructional freedom." Further citing from the manual, General McDermott made it clear to faculty members that their role was limited to their "area of . . . scholarship," and left no doubt that determining educational policies was not in that area. "If you can't live with that policy you are free to leave." Standing tall and erect on the stage of the lecture hall, a star embroidered on each epaulet of his uniform, he added: "Let's not push for anarchy. Let's not try to overthrow all policies." Highly praised in public, the all-military faculty learned in a dimly lit 1,000-man lecture hall that afternoon that educational policies were tightly controlled—as attested by a three-ring binder jammed full of faculty directives—and knew that most of them would have to "live with" it, because they could "not get tenure at another university." Reflecting the impact of the General's remarks, one officer said after the meeting: "I left feeling like a punished puppy."

Ironically, the White committee report, then less than a month old, had suggested more "meaningful dialogue" between faculty and administration. Further turning the knife, one faculty member recalled, was the fact that the accrediting manual General McDermott cited called for faculty meetings to be "primarily devoted to the discussion of long-term educational policies, and decisions should be made only after adequate deliberation." In contrast, the current Academy faculty directive on "Monthly Faculty Meetings" describes their primary purpose merely as "bringing to the attention of all faculty members policy decisions affecting the Academy's academic program." These meetings, supposed to be held monthly, are rarely needed and rarely called.

But the problems of the academic program go beyond the regimented instruction and highly centralized administration. The program exists in an atmosphere where criticism does not fare well, and is supported by practices which, some teachers feel, create an unrealistic setting for students expected to adhere to a strict honor code. Discussing the atmosphere within the faculty, one officer, sitting in his office on the sixth floor of Fairchild Hall, the city-block-long classroom building on the glass, concrete and aluminum campus, described the situation as: "Machiavellian, manipulative. It's administration by divide and conquer." Taking his eyes from one of the bulldozers tearing up the campus for construction of buildings to accommodate expansion of the cadet wing from 2,500 to 4,400 men, he gestured at the telephone on his desk: "You know, if I really have to make an important call, I go to the nearest public telephone." Did he have proof that the phone was tapped? "No, I don't, but the way things are around here, anything is possible."

The word "intimidation" was used. One officer described it as "a feeling that if one says things in class which differ from the mores, policies and morality of the administration, he will be transferred." Even though he had not been threatened personally while still at the Academy, "there was such an atmosphere." Another officer had been so threatened when he disagreed with senior officers over educational policies. After a lengthy hassle, he said, the threat was averted and he was later routinely reassigned. Other aspects of the Academy's arbitrary personnel policy have not helped to boost faculty morale. For instance, in 1964, a captain on the faculty was jumped in rank to lieutenant colonel without—even for a day—wearing the gold leaves of a major. There was nothing illegal about the promotion, although none like it have been reported from Vietnam nor from the NASA program. By law, several officers can be permanently appointed to the Academy faculty, as was done with the captain in this case. Along with the permanent status goes the rank of lieutenant colonel. What puzzled many faculty members—especially those in the rank of major—is exactly how officers are selected for such choice appointments.

Other practices in the relationship between the faculty and its administration may have helped to create an atmosphere less than perfect for an honor code. For instance, visitors ranging from foreign heads of state to private tourists descend upon the Academy regularly; among them are hundreds of educators who are frequently briefed by faculty members on the academic program.

At one time such briefings included a series of slides to make various points. One of these showed that an incoming class of cadets ranked fourteenth on a standardized aptitude test, bettered only by such schools as Columbia, Yale, Princeton, Dartmouth, etc. Subsequent slides contained graphs indicating that cadets, after four years at the Academy and on the basis of another standardized test, were now second among more than 200 schools. The inference was impressive: when the cadets came to the Academy they ranked fourteenth after Yale, Princeton, etc. After four years they had moved up to second place in such distinguished company. However, in the first comparison, the schools were identified by name. In the second they were not, and according to a list obtained from an Academy office in 1965, there was no Yale, Cornell, Princeton, etc., among them.

Tricky statistics recur in the Academy's self-evaluation. After the 1965 cheating incident there were questions as to whether the academic program applied too much pressure, thus forcing some cadets to cheat. The Academy had been boasting of the heavy load the cadets carried. The Academy catalogue published before the 1965 episode proclaimed that "188 semester hours [are] included in the four-year prescribed curriculum . . . at least 35 hours greater" than required by most engineering schools and "60 hours above that of a liberal arts school." Very quietly, in fact classified "For Official Use Only," a lengthy memorandum from General McDermott was circulated after the 1965 scandal to dispel any idea that the heavy course load may have led to cheating. The memo bluntly admitted that there was "something misleading about the figure of 188 semester hours we advertise as the prescribed cadet load," because it contained physical education and military training courses, some conducted during the summer, and because the Academy's program is spread over a longer academic year than other schools use. Therefore, "comparisons of this kind are valid, if at all, only if they are made on a weekly basis." Under these ground rules, the most surprising statement in the lengthy memo claimed that cadets "carry a lighter weekly work load than their counterparts paying their own way and working toward a B.S. degree in the college of engineering at the University of Wisconsin," used as an example. Citing only academic credit hours in comparisons with other schools—rather than all semester hours as was the case before 1965—recent Academy catalogues reflect the new emphasis: ". . . five to ten more academic semester hours than most engineering schools and about 15 hours above . . . liberal arts schools." But the total required cadet work load, according to the catalogues, has not changed. They took 188 semester hours before the 1965 scandal and still do.

Other examples of academic image building set what faculty members fear are poor precedents for the cadets. Officers in one academic department—not among those interviewed—who were studying for their doctorates under Air Force auspices, but taking more time than was deemed necessary, received letters from their department, containing a "very unofficial comment." Urging the officers that, "barring acts of God or other calamities," they should get their degrees in the extra year granted them, the identical letters stated: "In fact, if it comes to this, a less than excellent dissertation would be the better choice" than taking more time. The officer who told of this nudging added: "It seems the most important thing is getting the Ph.D. into the [Academy] catalogue."

According to that catalogue, the dean of the faculty has an "LL.D., St. Louis University." Official news releases for several years have said: "He holds a master's degree from the oldest university, Harvard, and a Doctor of Laws degree from St. Louis University, the oldest university west of the Mississippi." Result: One prominent newspaper in a story about the recent scandal said General McDermott ". . . has a master's degree from Harvard and a doctorate from St. Louis University." None of these sources indicated whether the latter degree was earned or honorary. Asked about it, the General acknowledged that it was honorary.

Summarizing the image-building efforts at the Air Force Academy, one faculty officer said: "The motto of the Academy seems to be public relations über alles." One naturally asks what effect this emphasis on questionable symbols of academic success may have on cadets, especially since they work under the pressure of a heavy academic program, whose accent is on the score rather than on substantive learning. It results in a "corner-cutting attitude about academics," said one officer with regret, noting the "extremely high caliber" of the incoming cadets. "We are so delighted to get this sort of student and to be able to help him that we will do anything within our ability to see this type of cadet realize his full potential." In the prescribed courses, he said, with their many restrictions on the teacher, and multitude of standardized procedures, that is difficult to achieve. In the Academy's enrichment and graduate courses—with fewer or none of the restrictive measures such as the "suggested" curve or resectioning—it is possible, because these courses, "in part, instill the idea in the boys that education is more than finding short cuts."

Primarily, faculty members emphasized the need for more freedom—authority as well as responsibility—in the prescribed courses. They wanted to get away from the emphasis on “looking good, no matter what the cost.” They were eager to drop the idea, as one officer put it, that the “counterpart to having a spotless shoeshine, a clean uniform and clean underwear is the score on the test, no matter how.” They realized a better faculty would be needed to reach these goals. Judged by degrees alone, the Air Force Academy—with about one-fifth of the faculty holding doctorates—is superior to either of its sister service academies. However, after several years on the Academy faculty, one officer expressed a concern shared by others: “Those [faculty members] who cared most for the students, felt most strongly about the Academy and cared most for education, were those most likely to leave. It appeared that those who cared the least about these matters were most willing to stay because they were willing to surrender their responsibilities to others.” Another officer added: “Unfortunately, although we have moved away from West Point, we are only halfway to where we must be if we are to realize our intellectual ambitions. And I’m afraid this halfway point combines the worst of both the military and intellectual worlds. Unless we are willing to pay the price of creating an intellectual environment, namely tolerating independence instead of conducting a headlong pursuit of the symbols of academic success, our aspirations . . . to produce the kind of officer demanded by the Air Force of the future, a man for whom intellectual skills will be equal or greater in importance than the traditional military skills . . . will remain unrealized.”

The Academy’s Board of Visitors—its most important supervisory body, composed of members of Congress, educators and military experts who report to the President—in brief annual visits to the campus has discerned little or nothing of what ails the Air Force Academy. Rep. Burt L. Talcott of California—who has a son who went to the Academy—has been the only member of a Board of Visitors to note that something may be wrong with the academic program. His comments, appended to the 1965 report as a dissenting opinion, matched many of the views of faculty officers interviewed. Only one other member of the 1965 board, Sen. Gordon Allott of Colorado, concurred with Representative Talcott’s observations. Since the recent scandal, some present board members have become very critical in private. One said that the dean of the faculty is guilty of “horrible misdirection of emphasis at the Academy.”

After the 1965 scandal, General McDermott told the faculty “a society where moral fibers are weakening,” and where respect for “law and honor and morality is decaying” was responsible for the cheating. Urging tighter security for testing material, he quoted: “Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil.” He also asked that everything he said “stay in the Academy family,” because “we do not want members of Congress to interfere with this thing.” After the second scandal, faculty members reported, he again cited the Lord’s Prayer at a meeting with cadets and faculty and the term “mortal sin” was mentioned in connection with cheating. The recent scandal, a high-ranking Academy administration source said, is largely due to press criticism of the honor code’s toleration clause after the 1965 scandal. Unwilling to be named while investigations are continuing, he noted that forty-three of the forty-six cadets involved in the recent incident were freshmen in 1965. He maintained that the newspapers had impressed on these young men that reporting a fellow cadet who cheated was “tattling.”

Testifying before Congress about the 1965 cheating incident, Vice Admiral Hyman G. Rickover, father of the nuclear submarine, Annapolis graduate and frequent critic of service academies, presented a less esoteric view: “Pious platitudes about honor and leadership constantly emanate from the service academies. These have led to a situation not unlike a game of cops and robbers where the aim of the student is somehow to find ways to beat the system.”

THE ROAD TO TRADE

HAROLD J. BERMAN
and JOHN R. GARSON

Mr. Berman is a professor of law, and Mr. Garson a research associate in law, at the Harvard Law School.

Now that the consular treaty with the Soviet Union has been ratified, one of the next important steps in the improvement of our relations with Russia and the Communist countries of Eastern Europe is to enact the East-West Trade Relations Act, first proposed by the Administration in 1966.

The immediate effect of the Act would be to permit the President to abolish discriminatory import restrictions on the products of various Communist countries, in the context of bilateral commercial agreements designed (in the language of the proposed Trade Relations Act) to “provide a framework helpful to private United States firms conducting business relations with Communist state trading agencies.”

The Administration does not need permission from Congress to enter into commercial agreements with any country. However, in order to make it possible for the countries which would be affected by the proposed Act to sell their goods in the United States, and in order to induce concessions from them favorable to American exporters, the President needs Congressional authority to overcome the effect of existing legislation, under which duties three or four times higher than normal are imposed on imports from certain Communist countries. Also the proposed Act would permit the President to eliminate the existing Congressional prohibition against the importation of several kinds of furs and skins from the Soviet Union.

By imposing unusually high tariffs on imports from Communist countries we are not only denying American importers and consumers the opportunity to purchase various products on favorable terms but we are also restricting the opportunity of those countries to acquire foreign exchange needed to purchase our goods. The principal beneficiaries of our discriminatory practices are not, as might be supposed, competing American industries but exporters of similar goods (e.g., watches, cars, cameras, manganese, textiles and a host of other products) in non-Communist countries.

With respect to furs and skins, the existing restriction is simply vested-interest legislation, adopted in 1951 in the shadow of the Korean War. Congress at that time banned the importation from the Soviet Union and Communist China of ermine, fox, kolinsky, marten, mink, muskrat and weasel furs and skins. We can and do continue to import other Soviet furs, among them sable, which are not on the proscribed list.

Congress did not require the withdrawal of most-favored-nation treatment from Yugoslavia and Poland, so the proposed Act does not affect our trade relations with those two countries. Also the Act would expressly exclude East Germany, as well as the Communist countries of Asia. The term "East," in the Act, thus refers to the Soviet Union, Rumania, Hungary, Czechoslovakia, Bulgaria and Albania.

It is anticipated that, on being granted most-favored-nation treatment by us, the affected Communist countries would make reciprocal concessions. Normally, in international trade, most-favored-nation treatment by one side is bargained for most-favored-nation treatment by the other. However, the reciprocal reduction of customs duties by a country whose entire trade is conducted by state agencies does not necessarily assure exporters in the other country of a greater opportunity to sell their goods. In a state-trading country, decisions to import are not substantially influenced by customs duties, which are in any event paid by one state agency (the import corporation) to another (the treasury). The proposed East-West Trade Relations Act, therefore, seeks more significant concessions.

In particular, it lists as "matters of mutual interest" that may be covered in the commercial agreements various types of obstacles encountered by Americans seeking to do business with Communist state trading agencies. These include, but are not restricted to:

(1) Satisfactory arrangements for the protection of industrial rights and processes.

(2) Satisfactory arrangements for the settlement of commercial differences and disputes.

(3) Arrangements for establishment or expansion of United States trade and tourist promotion offices, for facilitation of such efforts as the trade promotion activities of United States commercial officers, participating in trade fairs and exhibits, the sending of trade missions, and for facilitation of entry and travel of commercial representatives as necessary.

(4) Most-favored-nation treatment with respect to duties or other restrictions on the imports of the products of the United States, and other arrangements that may secure market access and assure fair treatment for products of the United States.

(5) Satisfactory arrangements covering other matters affecting relations between the United States and the country concerned, such as the settlement of financial and property claims and the improvement of consular relations.

The Act thus implicitly accepts the idea that reciprocal most-favored-nation treatment in trade agreements with Communist countries should take the form of a series of particularized nondiscrimination or "fair treatment" provisions relating to specific areas of trade relations, and it adds to this the possibility of obtaining special commitments of a concrete nature. In particular, the United States will be concerned to obtain better arrangements for the protection of industrial rights and processes and to reach understandings with respect to the settlement of commercial differences and disputes.

The Soviet Union and the Communist nations of Eastern Europe have not yet provided the same kind of protection to patented inventions as is assured by the United States and other industrial states of the West. In recent years, a relatively large number of American (and West European) firms have filed patent applications in Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, East Germany, Hungary, Poland, Rumania and the Soviet Union—usually in connection with a licensing agreement for the use or application of Western industrial technology. While most of the East European patent statutes and that of the Soviet Union state that the granting of a patent gives the right to the exclusive use of the invention industrially and commercially throughout the country—and provide that the owner of a patent is entitled to a negotiated royalty income for its use—the lack of means to enforce such rights may destroy their force and effect. For example, the Soviet Union will not permit the inspection of production facilities and does not provide ways to prevent unauthorized firms from manufacturing and utilizing the patented invention.

Thus in entering into licensing agreements for patents or for unpatentable know-how and other information, the American (or West European) supplier has no guarantee that the importing firm will not make the information available to other state enterprises or, indeed, to other Communist countries. Although some American firms have admitted that the royalties charged for processes, patents, data and know-how (often capitalized in a lump sum) include an amount allocable to the risk of unauthorized disclosure, most firms cannot charge enough to protect themselves completely against this contingency, and must rely to some extent on the apparent willingness of the East European nations to adopt the accepted commercial practices of the West. Intergovernmental negotiations between the United States and individual Communist countries would provide an opportunity to bargain the range and scope of the devices by which American firms can be protected against technological piracy and other intrusions on their proprietary rights.

Bilateral negotiations between the United States and the individual Communist countries will also provide a forum for negotiating superior procedures for the settlement of commercial disputes between American firms and the state trading organizations. As a practical matter, international trade contracts usually provide for the arbitration of differences and disputes, but in the case of East-West trade each side is often suspicious of arbitration boards in the other's forum. They may both accept the principle of arbitration in a third country, but even then the selection of the arbitral board and its members can be perplexing. One form of arbitration which could be discussed in intergovernmental negotiations is that of mixed tribunals consisting of citizens appointed from both countries. The Italians and Soviets now have such a tribunal.

In addition to solving these and other problems, it may be supposed that regular government-to-government negotiations would lead to commitments by Communist countries to purchase particular American products, and commitments by the United States Government to issue export licenses for these products. There is already a certain precedent for this in our trade negotiations with Rumania in 1964, when the Rumanian delegation gave our government a "shopping list" of products it wished to purchase, and our government indicated which items it would be willing to license for export. Other countries which do business with Communist countries generally establish bilateral trade agreements containing programs of exchanges of particular goods in particular quantities over a period of years. We may be able to adapt some aspects of this type of arrangement to our own needs and circumstances.

In any event, we can no longer afford to be smug about our trade practices with the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe. In 1965, Western Europe exported $4 billion worth of goods to Communist countries, while the United States sold them a grand total of $139 million. Our policy reminds one of the traditional Chinese form of revenge: committing suicide on one's enemy's doorstep.

The diversion of potential American trade to other non-Communist countries has been one of the principal motivating factors in the present re-evaluation of our East-West Trade Policy. Another factor is the Administration's declared policy of "widening constructive relations with the countries of Eastern Europe and the USSR." But a third factor, conflicting with the first two, is the belief that trade can be used as a flexible foreign policy instrument and, more particularly, as a means of weaning selected Communist countries from the Soviet sphere of influence.

Our government has often explained its limited trade concessions to Poland in 1957 and 1960, and to Rumania in 1964, as part of its larger effort to diminish the homogeneity of the "Soviet bloc." Conversely, as recently as October, 1966, trade controls on East Germany were tightened relative to the other countries of Eastern Europe to demonstrate our continued hostility to the government of that country.

It is regrettable that the Miller Report (the 1965 report by twelve prominent representatives of business, labor and the academic community, selected by the President, which provided the rationale for the proposed East-West Trade Relations Act) concludes that "the case for expanding peaceful trade comes down to the proposition that we can use trade to influence the internal evolution and external behavior of Communist countries." It is also regrettable that the Miller Report suggests (and the proposed Act adopted the suggestion) that the kind of most-favored-nation treatment granted to Communist countries should differ from that granted to "free-world" countries. Most-favored-nation treatment will be granted to Communist countries only for the duration of the trade agreement of which it is a part and will be subject to periodic review. By creating this second-class kind of most-favored-nation treatment—especially when Poland and Yugoslavia have already been extended the first-class variety—the Miller Report and the proposed Act may have indulged in some unnecessary political mischief. No other nation in the world has thought to create such grades of most-favored-nation treatment.

Normalization of our trade relations with Communist countries—even if inspired by mistaken political assumptions—will help to overcome the widespread American myth that our exports constitute a kind of foreign aid program. If we were to repeat Great Britain's experience with the Soviet Union, we should find that the Communist countries are not in a position to take as much of our exports as we might like, and that they, at least, are fully aware that a sale is not a gift, that imports must eventually be paid for out of the proceeds of exports, and that in general satisfactory trade relations are a matter of mutual advantage.

Above all, commercial agreements with Communist countries, negotiated on the basis of mutual advantage, can help to prove to them that their own long-range interests are linked with the stability and integrity of the international economic and legal order, which in turn is an essential part of healthy political relations. If we may take the liberty of quoting what one of us has written elsewhere:

In the 1920's and 1930's one of the principal charges leveled against the Soviet leaders was that they had withdrawn from the world economy, that their foreign trade system was inherently restrictive and discriminatory, and that their goal was self-sufficiency. In the 1950's and 1960's, the Soviet leaders have come out of their shell, have abandoned their earlier tendency toward economic isolationism, and have sought to establish firmer ties with the West. It is strange indeed that they should now be able to charge the United States with subverting economics to politics, with refusal to trade, and with discriminatory trade practices.

This applies, of course, with added force to the other Communist countries of Europe, which are, in fact, Western countries, and which now are openly striving to lessen their economic dependence upon the Soviet Union and upon one another. The Communist countries can no longer afford to view trade as a political weapon for isolating themselves from the "capitalist camp," and by the same token we can no longer afford to use trade as a political weapon for containing or dispersing communism. The proposed East-West Trade Relations Act is a belated recognition of these historic facts, but at least it provides an opportunity to create legal and commercial institutions that reflect their significance.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

The Art of Human Use

THE NEW BRUTALISM: Ethic or Aesthetic? By Reyner Banham. Reinhold Publishing Corp. 196 pp. Illustrated. $15.

WHO DESIGNS AMERICA?: The American Civilization Conference at Princeton. Edited by Laurence B. Holland. Doubleday & Co. 357 pp. Paper $1.45.

ARCHITECTS ON ARCHITECTURE: New Directions in America. By Paul Heyer. Walker and Co. 415 pp. Illustrated. $17.50.

AMERICAN BUILDING: The Historical Forces That Shaped It. Second Edition. Revised and Enlarged. By James Marston Fitch. Houghton Mifflin Co. 350 pp. Illustrated. $12.50.

NATHAN SILVER

Mr. Silver is an American architect on the faculty of the School of Architecture, Cambridge University. His book Lost New York will be published by Houghton Mifflin.

Reyner Banham's new book is about the work of some good English architects who wrestled with ideas about what they were doing in the fifties and sixties, while American architects at the same time were mostly wrestling with appearances. Peter and Alison Smithson come in for the closest examination, though many working in England (including me) would argue about the importance of their leadership on the front lines of architectural theory. The subtitle—Ethic or Aesthetic?—is meant to indicate the Smithsons' concern with values as well as with forms, and also Dr. Banham's own misgivings about the clearly stylistic inference of New Brutalism. Yet Brutalism is, in ethic at least, largely classic Functionalism; it is a new term invented by some who forget what the old one meant. This is a gossipy book for insiders, but even inside gossip can be inaccurate, and the Smithsons recently blasted it with a long criticism of its historical detail in the British Architects' Journal. In the article, the Smithsons continued to insist on their aesthetic brand name "Brutalism." They concluded, "those who still cannot see what Brutalism is about should consider this: the E type Jaguar, the jeep, the Deux Chevaux and the DS 19 are all Brutalist cars." Get it? No?

I have the impression that Dr. Banham can hardly wait to drop the whole subject and move on to what he calls une architecture autre, another art-historical label and category. As he briefly states it, this would be the extremely radical—so he thinks—view that architecture ought to abandon "composition, symmetry, order [?] module, proportion . . . even the idea of structure and space—or rather, it ought to abandon the idea that the prime function of an architect is to employ structure and make spaces." I agree with most of this, and I'll return to the idea of this counter-Renaissance attack in a moment; but I'd better say at once that the Resistance Movement is already digging in, and its Maquis bear no relation to some Flash Gordon architectural technologists that Banham now fancies.

The 1964 Princeton conference recorded in the engrossing Who Designs America? bogs down in controversy about what Functionalism is supposed to mean. Humphry Osmond, an otherwise admirably informed psychiatrist, says the idea of function is indeed very mysterious. When my exploration of it started I came to the conclusion that I didn't understand it at all. As I understand it originally the idea was—and I'd like to be corrected here—that if you looked at the building you'd see why it stood up.

A designer asks, "is there anything wrong with the idea that beauty is part of the function of what an architect or designer does?" Then Morton White, professor of philosophy at Harvard, thinks that the bold quality of the Functionalism of Sullivan and Wright lay in their "narrow goal" of "architectural utility." Since the four books I am reviewing here are primarily about a current crisis in understanding of Functionalism—its informing principle in architecture and design; and on what principles, if different ones, architects should now rely—I made myself check back to the source, as we were once taught it in theory lectures at architectural school.

My old notes say that the classical origin of Functionalism as an approach to beauty is found in a disputation between Socrates and Aristippus, recorded in Xenophon's Memorabilia, where Socrates at length called a dung basket beautiful and a golden shield ugly, if the one was well made for its special work and the other badly. On architecture, Socrates was succinct: "The house in which the owner can find a pleasant retreat at all seasons and can store his belongings safely is presumably at once the pleasantest and most beautiful." This disputation was the basis for a theory of art that endured. Elements of the ideas of Socrates later appeared in the theories of Horatio Greenough, Louis Sullivan, Walter Gropius and a thousand others, and these ideas came to be called Functionalism. Included were the notions that there need be only one explanation for all beauty of whatever occurrence; that according to this explanation, beauty is relative; and that what a thing called beautiful is relative to are the things for which it is useful. (Even painting and sculpture could be judged in terms of use, because their uses—said Socrates—were to express character and the activities of the soul.)

Exactly what is the problem lately with Functionalism? It was not meant to be another name for expediency. It is supposed to be an immutable idea about the nature of art. Yet even Professor White of Harvard Philosophy puts a limiting construction on what we at Columbia Architecture believed was a philosophically complete idea. And Banham, Osmond and White aren't the only ones. Despite all the vulgar talk about "functional architecture" since Bauhaus days, since (even earlier) The Ladies' Home Journal discovered Wright in 1907, Functionalism doesn't seem to have thrived.

For instance, I take it as a Socratic corollary that all things must be beautiful if they can be judged as having satisfied the conditions of their use. But Louis Kahn, one of Paul Heyer's heroes in Architects on Architecture (whose newspaper plant in Pennsylvania is, I think, beautiful), is quoted in this wise: "All buildings do not belong to Architecture. A work of architecture is presented as an offering to Architecture and to its Treasury of spaces." Kahn believes that in architecture there are elevated and base works. Also the architectural profession (on presumably similar theoretical grounds) claims that a twentieth of all building, which is the proportion that architects are now responsible for, represents all the "significant" building. Only these buildings which are "offered" are going to make our "Treasury."

So who designs America, indeed? On the one hand (the one that's nineteen times bigger) there are developers, engineering departments, real estate companies, package builders, local contractors. I don't think I can bring myself to try to describe their aesthetic theories, but they are certainly the people who are engaged in building the increasingly man-made world which is described by 4 pages of exponential curves in Who Designs America? On the other hand we have the architects. They aren't really smug about their low productivity, are they? What new approach are they offering against the onrushing, living crisis in building and design? This is what some of them are saying in Architects on Architecture:

"[I am not a] narrow functionalist; you cannot consider function without producing a good plan, and I put a great deal of emphasis on abstract beauty in a plan." (Ralph Rapson.) "I approach environmental considerations in two ways: the pure, aesthetic approach, which is only theoretical, and the traditional craft approach. . . . In the arts, self-expression generally comes first." (Paolo Soleri.) "I like to think of architecture as an individual creative expression." (Edward D. Stone.) "Purpose is not necessary to make a building beautiful . . . sooner or later we will fit our buildings so that they can be used . . . where form comes from I don't know, but it has nothing at all to do with the functional or sociological aspects of architecture." (Philip Johnson.) "Some architects in the United States are searching for beauty, but I am not one of them" (says John M. Johansen; and Paul Heyer helpfully concludes, "His search is for character").

Heyer is no deep thinker and no great writer, and his choice of pictures makes a most unsatisfactory presentation of these architects' work. But in fact, I am not claiming that all the work of those I have quoted is divorced from use objectives. However, the forty-odd architects he presents imply our forty best (he passes up Shadrach Woods, William Conklin, Louis Sauer, Romaldo Giurgola, Peter and Claude Sampton, Serge Chermayeff and a dozen first-rate firms), and at least half of Heyer's virtuosos are saying what Alexander Jackson Downing, an American landscape architect, wrote in 1849: "The Beautiful is, intrinsically, something quite different from the Useful. It appeals to a wholly different part of our nature; it requires another portion of our being to receive and enjoy it." Downing, mentioned by Prof. John W. Ward in Who Designs America?, was a sort of Functionalist in distress. He was one of the first American writers on art to express doubts about mere necessity, even while up against the realities of his practice. The beauty of human use, including human ideals, didn't seem artistic enough to him. And so our architecture has been going, virtually ever since.

I may as well come out in the open. What bothers me is not really that American architects are planting flowers but not corn. The trouble is that we seem to be willing to side-step enormous new challenges of growth and change. Artistic intuition and self-expression just aren't good enough, aren't really creative enough, to take account of the exciting possibilities of the future. Since in a short time all of us will be living our lives almost entirely within man-made environments, architects have to enlarge the scope of their intentions out of sheer necessity. Like Banham, I think that architecture is on the threshold of its first new beginning since Brunelleschi and Alberti; though I don't see it as a "style," nor does it rely on technological visual aids in principle. Banham's hip prototypes—the "Endless House," Buckminster Fuller, highway Baroque, plug-in cities—aren't pertinent to this new beginning in architecture; they are not to the point at all. Instead of fixing on these pretty preconceptions, we ought to be keeping our choices open by considering that the radical new beginning needs to be based on what many architects seem to have temporarily forgotten: the sensibility of use.

A new beginning has been falsely claimed many times before, most especially for the Vienna-Chicago-Dessau modern movement, which I think was not a beginning but an end—as it turned out, it was the last attempt at a purely visual symbolization of architectural form. The change has been held off for a long time by Le Corbusier, the greatest artist of form in architecture since Palladio; and through the visual prejudice of architectural historians. The signs have been clear for only about fifteen or twenty years, but I now think they are definite.

One sign was Professor Fitch's classic American Building of 1947, which insisted on discussing not the Architectural Treasury but all kinds of building; and not so much in terms of "historical forces," as the book is subtitled in its timely reissue, but in the principles of actual human experience. He ends his newly revised and expanded book (significantly, to be followed by a second volume on "environmental forces") by saying: "It is now apparent that the external limitations which held historic architecture, so to say, 'in shape' are no longer operative. They have disappeared forever and must be replaced

THE PARALYTIC

*I have waited now ten years to hear this pool speak through my tears.
Legs bent under me,
my neck a hangman's noose, I cannot see but what the inside of my eyes watches of the brain's flood. I am a golden face beneath an iron mask. There is a case to be made for me: ten years on this pallet; each time the angel hissed through the surface some rich man knocked me over and stepped, rotten in the can, puce-lipped, into the green water and stepped out pure as any rabbi's virgin daughter.
I stay a wreck on the water's edge;
nose running, face agape and no pledge from the priest to move me up one place closer to the edge. That bastard takes money for the race into the pool—a change of pallet to the right or left and when the angel coughs upon the light he who was quickest with the gold falls splashing to his cure. I'll jump the gun some day, swallow the burley pollen of the pool and rise up like a fern from moss, lithe, reposed, floating, erect and cool.*

NED O'GORMAN

by a new internally generated discipline. This discipline can only derive from the most scrupulous re-examination of man and his relation to his environment; and this examination must fully utilize both the norms and the substance of modern scientific knowledge."

Also in the past fifteen or twenty years, an increasing number of architects have begun systematically to seek information from the social sciences. These may not be most of Paul Heyer's "leading" ones, but perhaps they are more reliable leaders. Joseph Esherick, a 52-year-old architect who teaches and works in Berkeley, is one of the most promising points of origin for an architectural new beginning. He collaborated on the recently built University of California School of Environmental Design, and did a house (the Bermak house) that seems to have insight into the future.

Heyer fortunately interviewed him. Esherick says that "beauty is a consequential thing," and he is gripped by "the very ambiguity of the social science problem, and I take design to be a social science problem; its wooliness, its vagueness, all of these elements of the problem are in fact elements of life itself."

To adopt a social science attitude means to move beyond the old role of the architect as virtuoso artist. Is this traumatic leap into the future going to be worth it? I would expect a radically Functionalist architecture to create eventually an environment where one is in a balanced normal state, free of formal instruction except in terms of use-situations or potential use-situations. The best of this architecture would be that which defines, with high sensibility, normality without uniformity (because the human normal state is not uniform), and formality without deformity (meaning inappropriate exaggeration). The result of this would be art, in the old Socratic sense; not the post-Renaissance "art of beautiful buildings" but the radical re-discovery of architecture as the art of human use. This also suggests that architecture may leave the uncomfortable formal or technological annex where it has been placed by some aestheticians, and take its rightful place again in the center of the existential situation—as it was thought of when it was once called Mother of the Arts.

A Pot of Message

THE MEDIUM IS THE MESSAGE: An Inventory of Effects. By Marshall McLuhan and Quentin Fiore. Random House. 157 pp. $10.95.

NEIL COMPTON

Mr. Compton is chairman of the English Department at Sir George Williams University in Montreal. He writes frequently on contemporary culture and the popular arts.

The medium is the what? Please do not adjust your (psychological) set. This is no misprint but Marshall McLuhan's latest gnomic utterance, orchestrated with graphics by Quentin Fiore in a book "co-ordinated" (whatever that may mean) by Jerome Agel. Those who, like me, have been hoping that McLuhan would return to the iconographic mode of his brilliant proto-pop picture book The Mechanical Bride (1951) now have their wish. However, they should brace themselves. The prophet of Total Change has learned, like his favorite hero, the sailor in Poe's "Descent into the Maelstrom," how to remain contemplative at the heart of the flux. The man who rebuffed the mass-produced and stereotyped enticements of The Mechanical Bride now joyfully surrenders to the polymorphous perversities of her electronic progeny.

The medium is the message because it works us over completely. The media are "so pervasive in their personal, political, economic, aesthetic, psychological, moral, ethical and social consequences that they leave no part of us untouched, unaffected and unaltered." This book is a "collide-oscope of interfaced situations" designed to chart the "worldpool of information" which swirls around us. Now that "all the world's a sage" most schools are obsolete, and such archaic educational fumblers as mom and dad must either retire gracefully from the scene or submit themselves to brainwashing by their offspring who understand instinctively the electric drama which involves everyone alive today. (Old McLuhan hands will note that the master has lost neither his apocalyptic manner nor his proclivity for outrageous puns.)

There is not much in The Medium is the Message that will be new to those who know their Understanding Media (1964). In a way, the new book seems to be an attempt to translate the linear prose of its predecessor into a sort of post-alphabetic, non-syntactical language more appropriate to a vision which trumpets the end of the Gutenberg era.

While modern science is diligently seeking a cure for all diseases, it is also making the earth uninhabitable for man. But you can do something about it.

BARRY COMMONER, an eminent scientist, shows how dangerous flaws in the structure of science threaten our existence and suggests what might be done to avert the ultimate blunder.

"If America's policy makers take his central doctrine to heart, we can enjoy the fruits of science without destroying the tree of life."

—STEWART L. UDALL,
Secretary of the Interior

"This is a significant book—perhaps even a great one—because it is a distillation of the kind of thinking that could truly democratize science and offer a way out of the technological morass man has made for himself."

—EARL C. GOTTSCHALK,
St. Louis Post-Dispatch

"It is difficult, within a brief space, to suggest the wealth of ideas and stimulation that Science and Survival affords. . . . An enlightening and important work."

—DANIEL LANG, N.Y. Times

Science and Survival

by Barry Commoner

At all bookstores $4.50

THE VIKING PRESS
625 Madison Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10022

Whatever the case, it is a crazy, exhilarating, imaginative piece of book making. On the very first page a bizarre and oddly disturbing image establishes a mood which is expertly sustained throughout the volume—a raw egg, its yolk trademarked by a new no-contact, no-pressure printing technique, stares unwinkingly up from a plate. What can be the message of this medium?

After that, I was easy game for the bewildering variety of devices used by Fiore to complement McLuhan's assault on conventional sensibilities—the passages, printed upside down, back to front (like Leonardo's notebooks) or white on black; the dramatic variations in pictorial and typographical scale from page to page; and the enigmatic illustrations. A stagecoach reflected in a rear-view mirror? This shows how "we march backwards into the future [and] suburbia lives imaginatively in Bonanzaland." A close-up of a pair of crossed meshstockinged legs, and the photo of a girl whose navel peeks through the O in a large vertical LOVE down the front of her dress? Symbols of the disturbing consequences of brushing information against information. A quattrocento painting of an urban scene? Characteristic of the detached, non-involved nature of renaissance art ("a piazza for everything, and everything in its piazza"). Two blank pages? Symbolic of the way in which environments invisibly distort our apprehension of reality.

The counterpoint between word and image makes The Medium is the Massage a more engaging work than Understanding Media. In spite of the brilliant aperçus which illuminated almost every chapter of the earlier book, it was written in incredibly graceless prose for a literary scholar who believes that eloquence is the mark of a truly educated man. The need for economy dictated by the alternation of picture and text in the present work probably imposed a healthy discipline on the author's naturally discursive imagination.

Nevertheless, The Medium is the Massage, which is probably going to be a great popular success, reawakens some of the doubts and fears aroused by McLuhan's rocketing fame after the publication of Understanding Media. Surely the rise of instantaneous circuitry does not oblige us to take McLuhan on his own terms as an instant philosopher whose views on every conceivable subject need not be supported by any argument more substantial than a pun or half a syllogism. He needs to be approached in a more critical spirit than the extremes of adulation and blank incomprehension with which his work has usually been greeted. He himself is remarkably unself-critical (perhaps identifying introspection with the kind of "fixed, unchangeable point of view" which he abhors), and is never at a loss for an explanation of any phenomenon about which he may be asked. (Admittedly, he has told interviewers that he doesn't believe everything he says.)

The main distorting element in McLuhan's thought is his hatred for the individualistic, detached, fragmented, visual bias of Western culture in the Gutenberg era (see The Gutenberg Galaxy, 1962). The strength of this emotion is so great that he tends to write as though the eye were the cause of all the ills that bedevil the world. He approves of television, though, and is therefore forced to argue that it is not a visual medium but haptic or tactile because the shifting mosaic mesh of the television image is totally different from the sharply defined, mechanically repeated pictures projected on a cinema.

Such absurdities aside, McLuhan's unexpressed bias invariably leads him to scoff at attempts to exercise independent judgment or control of media content. Because "societies have always been shaped more by the nature of the media by which they communicate than by the content of the communication," he derides politicians who try to campaign "on the issues," reformers who worry about the intellectual level of television programs, and teachers who are upset because Johnny can't read. He seems to confuse the very real problems posed by the media with the millennium—and embraces the new "global village culture" with hardly a qualm about the notorious intellectual illiberality of village life, whether global or otherwise.

Like most millenarians, he tends to disparage the uncomfortable present in favor of the beatific future. He often writes as though the living moment were unreal, and only the future actual. How much trust dare we repose in the humane concern of a man who, in a discussion of recent educational trends, can write that "Vietnam, as the content of the teach-in, is a very small and perhaps misleading Red Herring. It really has little to do with the teach-in, as such, anymore than with the dropout." I should be hard put to decide what is most repellent in that flip statement—the apparent indifference to human suffering, the sinister implications of the capital letters in the red-herring image, or the attempt to deprive the students' moral concern of any real validity. We can all learn a lot from McLuhan, but I for one will cop out with the dropouts if his pop utopia ever comes to pass.

The Middle-Age Blues

FIVE YEARS: Thoughts During a Useless Time. By Paul Goodman. Introduction by Harold Rosenberg. Brussel & Brussel. 257 pp. $5.

SHERMAN PAUL

Mr. Paul teaches English at the University of Illinois. His most recent book is Edmund Wilson: A Study of Literary Vocation in Our Time (University of Illinois Press). He is also the author of Louis Sullivan: An Architect in American Thought (Prentice-Hall).

In these notebooks Paul Goodman talks to himself in the ad hominem way in which we find him elsewhere talking to the rest of us, and he does so because during the years 1955-60, he had, he says, "no one else to write for or talk to." These were Eisenhower years, though that aspect of this "useless time" is not in the foreground. The times, it is true, were useless because Goodman, the social thinker who became famous in 1960 with the publication of Growing Up Absurd, wasn't being used; but they were grievously useless because he was painfully aware of his age, his "ugliness," his failure as a writer (no one would publish his novel, Empire City), and his dispossession from paradise—"his only world" that "wouldn't come across."

These years from age 45 to 50 were disheartening, but no less so, it seems, than those that followed. The 53-year-old "tired man" of Making Do is being used (up) and has advanced a rung on Plato's ladder, but he has not yet found the satisfactions of self and world that constitute his paradise; he makes do because he doesn't make out. In this novel of the breakdown of a private community where friends use one another as resources, Goodman, who uses himself in art in the direct way of the contemporary confessional poets, speaks of his erotic nature and progress on the ladder of love. Though his Eros has turned now to "the institutions and the customs of the city"—who can doubt his love affair with his city?—he has not quite gone beyond the lower rung where one is attracted to "the beautiful bodies he sees." Much of Making Do concerns, and celebrates, this erotic attachment, and Five Years is dominated by the need for it. One might characterize these notebooks by saying that they concern a man of the streets whose failures to satisfy his homosexual hunger test his theory that "satisfaction is the necessary ground for the full exercise of power." As Goodman says of the beautiful bodies in Making Do, "I had certainly been wondrously attracted to them, though with indifferent success in ever getting to touch them." For one whose mental life was so dependent on the physical, it was a very bad time.

There is more than this in the notebooks but not very much thematically that is new to Goodman's readers. Their importance is of another kind: they give us a more intimate feeling of the author's way of being in the world. ("It is not hard," Goodman rightly says, "to reconstruct the man in the city who had these thoughts.") They also deepen our awareness of the filiation of such disparate forms as the novels Empire City and Making Do (with Five Years, these provide a personal and social history of Goodman's times); the poems (especially the "Sentences and Prayers" of The Lordly Hudson); social treatises like Growing Up Absurd and Communitas, and the psychological manual Gestalt Therapy. In them we find a Utopian who is much of the time hopelessly sad, a writer old-fashioned enough to have a heroic humanist ambition, and (like many thinkers who respect man's relation to nature and history) a profound conservative. Students may admire Goodman because he makes good in the very system he attacks, but he sees himself otherwise: "Probably my chief use is that I carefully preserve the conventional structure for the young and prove that one can maintain some vitality and honor within it. This gives them the possibility of having a past, which they have come to doubt."

The notebooks confirm Goodman's intense sense of a sustaining past and his joy in its human victories. They also present a thinker whose thought, however much advanced it seems, goes back to the generation of World War I, whose unfinished revolution he has undertaken to complete. Goodman is a literary radical (the term is Randolph Bourne's), an artist with a sociological imagination and open devotion to community—in our time a rare and valuable kind of intellectual. The reader of Compulsory Mis-Education and The Community of Scholars will recognize the debt to John Dewey's theories of progressive education and perhaps the

The world outlook embodied in Marx's major work continues to inspire social movements that are transforming the world

A NEW SCHOLARLY EDITION OF ALL THREE VOLUMES

Complete and Unabridged, in Paperback

Centennial Edition

Paperback, Three Volumes, 2,338 pages, boxed, $9.95
The same set, Hardback, Library Binding, $22.50

One hundred years after CAPITAL first appeared, it remains the most incisive critique of capitalism ever published. For a century advocates of the free enterprise system have attempted, time and again, to refute it. Today a vast portion of mankind accepts it as authoritative.

The publication of the full three volumes of this germinal work in a scholarly and handsome edition is a landmark in book publishing. No one who is seriously interested in social change can be without it.

The superb complete edition of CAPITAL is printed on good book paper, in legible type, sturdily bound in a soft cover and boxed, to withstand years of use.

CAPITAL by Karl Marx (Unabridged)

Process of Capitalist Production (820 pages)

Process of Circulation of Capital (558 pages)

Process of Capitalist Production ■ ■ ■ Whole (1960 pages)

For over 42 years International Publishers has been the principal publisher in this country of the classical works of Marxism-Leninism and of books by contemporary Marxist authors. Be sure to ask for a complete catalog (free).

The most scientifically accurate edition available, it is the result of years of painstaking labor by specialists at the Institutes of Marxism-Leninism in Berlin and Moscow. Many inaccuracies that appeared in earlier editions are corrected. Each volume has biographical sketches, a list of sources, and indexes.

Try your bookshop, or you may order directly from the publisher.

International Publishers		N1
381 Park Avenue South, New York, N. Y. 10016
Enclosed find ■ for the unabridged, three-volume CAPITAL by Karl Marx, as checked below. If not completely satisfied, I may return within 10 days for a complete refund. <input type="checkbox"/> Send Catalog
.....sets paperback, boxed @ $9.95
Plus 50c for Postage and Handling
.....sets hardback, library ed. @ $22.50
Plus 75c for Postage and Handling
NAME
ADDRESS
CITY	STATE	ZIP
Add 5% sales tax for NYC or tax prevailing in areas where applicable.
<input type="checkbox"/> Check <input type="checkbox"/> Money Order similarity in aim to Bourne's Education and Living. For Goodman is a pragmatist who acquired, along with the method of pragmatism, the democratic vision of its pioneers; like them he seeks by means of "practical proposals" (alternative ideas worthy to be tested) "the society of justice and the culture of paradise." "The reader will see," he says in Utopian Essays and Practical Proposals, "that . . . I prefer the language of pragmatism and . . . an organism/environment psychology of novelty, excitement, and growth. The existing is prior to hopes and plans; and the 'Right Method' is to find in the existing the occasion that has future, freedom to act."

This describes Goodman's essential approach but not the criticism of functions that he has employed along with it. "Let us," he says in Communitas, "subject the function itself to a formal critique. Is the function good? Bona fide? Is it worthwhile? Is it worthy of a man to do that? What are the consequences? Is it compatible with other, basic, human functions?" The candor and daring of such questions are aspects of the advanced style of Goodman's thought, and they are most effective, at least to those who agree with Santayana that "it is essential to the validity of a moral maxim that it should be framed in the interest of natural impulses."

There are no idle thoughts in these notebooks, and if there were, Goodman has put them to work by structuring them, taking them from their original disorder, and placing them in loose categories: "Psychology," "Art," "Method," "God," etc. Structure is the sin of his didacticism ("me who structure everything") or perhaps the result of an unconscious wish to make the useless time more worth while than it appeared. It may even account for the failure of this religious man, who implores and relies on the Creator Spirit, to reach the highest rung of the ladder of love: "I was frozen on the ladder. . . . There was a risk that I was afraid to take. I did not trust to let the nature of things be. . . ."

ART / Maurice Grosser

Mr. Grosser, artist and writer, is the author of The Critic's Eye (Bobbs-Merrill).

Tunis

The Tunisian national museum, the Bardo, lies outside the gates of Tunis on the road to Bizerte. It occupies the harem wing of a 19th-century palace, a commodious and undistinguished building set beside the present house of parliament in a park full of trees, Roman statuary, and Spahis on guard in their flowing, burnt-vermilion uniforms. The collection, begun by the French in the 1880s, was acquired entirely in Tunisia. There are Punic remains, Arabo-Muslim ceramics, Roman sculpture, a celebrated shipment of Hellenistic marbles and bronzes recovered from a sunken galley, and the largest and finest assembly of Roman mosaics in the world. A selection of all this will be going to America this summer under the auspices of the Smithsonian Institution, to remain two years and to be exhibited in museums around the country.

Tunis and its suburbs occupy the site of what was once Carthage, a city larger even than Rome and Rome's greatest maritime enemy. Conquered and taken over by the republic, the territory Carthage had dominated became, under the name of Africa, the richest of the Roman provinces. It was filled, from its mountainous north to the deserts in the south, with cities, farms, villas—a tranquil and prosperous backwater, importing its art and fashions from the capital, building its towns and houses on Italian models, and decorating them with the commonplaces of mythology that appear throughout the Roman world. The Carthaginian culture that Rome destroyed was certainly less stereotyped, if one can judge by the two remarkable Punic terra cottas discovered on Cape Bon: one of a woman nursing a child who, with her broad, round face and placid, earthy grin, might be Juliet's nurse herself; the other, a lion-headed goddess, wears the sweetly malicious smile of an all too understanding maiden aunt.

Only in their portrait heads did the Romans exhibit any comparable interest in human characterization. Everywhere else they patronized a neutral and decorative classicism. How busy must have been the workshops that supplied them, turning out production lines of copies, some good and some indifferent, of the great masterpieces—Phidean Venuses, athletes after Scopas, Apollos with lizards, Hercules with club by the dozens—to be distributed from one end to the other of the Roman world; whole Iliads and Odysseys in stone, like those the hero of the Satyricon found in the millionaire Tremalchio's palace. From such a workshop must have come the columns and urns recovered from a galley sunk off Mahdia, and perhaps some of the marble statues found there as well.

The sponge fishermen who first saw the columns lying on the sandy bottom thought they were cannons. This was in 1907. The wreck lay at 17 fathoms, which is deep for diving, even today, and it took five years to salvage it. There were some sixty columns with capitals, intended for the construction of a villa: marble and bronze statues; the fragments of eight huge marble garden urns with friezes of Satyrs and Bacchantes; along with the bronze fittings and other remains of a set of those luxurious and uncomfortable dining-room couches, to our eyes the most puzzling feature of Roman upper-class living. The marble objects are all badly and oddly eroded. The parts exposed to sea water are bored and pitted by mollusks; the parts protected by the sand they lie in have preserved an almost shocking newness, capitals and urns still showing the workmen's chisel marks. The fragile volutes of the capitals are not entirely disengaged from the block and were probably intended to

The Nation SUBSCRIBERS' BOOK SERVICE

Offers the following at discount prices:

- | | Price |
|---|--------|
| <input type="checkbox"/> THE FREE WORLD COLOSSUS: A Critique of American Foreign Policy in the Cold War by David Horowitz (Hill and Wang, $6.95) | $5.55 |
| <input type="checkbox"/> FRIENDSHIP AND FRATRICIDE: An Analysis of Whittaker Chambers and Alger Hiss by Dr. Meyer A. Zeligs (Viking, $8.95) | $7.15 |
| <input type="checkbox"/> THE NAKED IMAGE: Observations on the Modern Theatre by Harold Clurman (Macmillan, $6.50) | $5.20 |
| <input type="checkbox"/> DE GAULLE: A Political Biography by Alexander Werth (Simon and Schuster, $7.50) | $6.00 |
| <input type="checkbox"/> LIBERATION OF THE JEW by Albert Memmi. Translated from the French (Grossman, $4.95) | $3.96 |
| <input type="checkbox"/> THE PSYCHOLOGY OF POWER by Ronald Sampson (Pantheon, $4.95) .. | $3.96 |

Remittance accompanying orders should be made payable to THE NATION, 333 6th Ave., N.Y. 10014

- ☐ Payment enclosed ☐ Please bill me

Readers can avail themselves of our regular offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S. at the retail price post-free. When ordering, please give title, author and publisher, if possible.

be finished in place. Two of the urns have the same friezes as two similar urns, one in the Louvre and one in Pisa. Handsome as they are, all eight are undoubtedly mass-produced copies of what must have been famous originals.

The bronzes are less conventional pieces; in fact, so little conventional that since the wreck is thought to have taken place in 81 B.C., it is conceivable that some of them might come from Sulla's sack of Athens in 86. The best of all the pieces, one of the very finest Greek bronzes in existence, is that rarest of all objects, a Greek original: it bears the signature of the third-century sculptor, Boethos Calchidionios. It is a boundary marker of the type known as a Hermes, a rectangular column topped with a bearded, archaic head coiffed with formal curls and elegant, stiff folds of ribbon. There is a larger bronze of a child with wings, an Argon, presumed to be by the same sculptor but in a softer and quite dissimilar style, along with a number of small Hellenistic figures of highest quality, notably a pursuing Satyr, a Hermes in the role of herald and three dancing dwarfs, amiably comic and quite unclassical.

The museum displays a great deal of sculpture besides this; almost every Tunisian village is a Roman site. The best pieces are probably importations, since the local work, to judge from the capitals and columns of standing ruins, seems cruder in design and execution than similar work in Greece, Italy or Sicily. The unique treasure here is the mosaics. Just as Roman wall painting can be seen only at Naples, only in the Bardo is there such a collection of Roman mosaics. Remembering the Byzantine style of the mosaics of Ravenna or St. Mark's in Venice, one is inclined to think of mosaic as wall decoration, executed in fragile tesserae of glazed ceramic and bright bits of brilliant colored glass and glass inset with gold. The Roman mosaics, on the other hand, are composed of small pieces of rock in natural colors—earth reds, tawny yellows, sage greens, dusty blues, whites and blacks, along with an occasional brighter bit of tough ceramic, all set in the most impervious cement—as hard as iron, and made to last forever as floor or pavement. One of the displays here is the ground plan of a house excavated in Uthina, the plan made up of photographs of the actual mosaics found in place: a central court surrounded by some twenty or thirty rooms of varying sizes, each with its mosaic pavement, each one beautiful, each different, and all perfectly preserved. Some of the mosaics, and quite fine ones, are set in the floor of the Bardo as pavements to be walked on. And why not? There are so many of them—hundreds here on display, more in the museum's reserves, in the museum at Sousse, on the original sites, in Roman towns not yet excavated or even identified.

It is supposed that the art came here from Antioch and Alexandria, arriving at the end of the first century of our epoch, and continuing to flourish through the fourth. The oldest of the mosaics have mythological subjects. The composition is invariably well designed, the decorative details, borders and garlands beautifully executed. The drawing of the figures and faces is sometimes extremely skillful, sometimes much less so, as would happen in work done after cartoons imported from the capital and copied by local artisans with varying degrees of skill. Toward the end of the second century, local subjects begin to appear. The earliest of these, from Oudna, exhibits a country house surrounded by trees, pheasants and geese. Little by little, the mythological subjects make way for local ones. There are hunts with dogs and horses, a company of bears, racing scenes from the hippodrome, and even the portrait of a favorite driver with his four horses. There are seas with fish and fishermen, water birds and boats. A pavement from Médenine depicts all types of embarkations, each with its Greek or Latin name attached. In fact, it is principally from these African mosaics that we derive our ideas of Roman ships and shipping. Another mosaic from El Djem divides into rectangles, each containing a still life—a basket of bread, a bird in cage, two red mullets. One dating from the end of the fourth century describes the estate of a certain Lord Julius. In the center is his baronial castle flanked by towers. Below in one corner is the lord himself receiving accounts from his steward, in the other his lady being handed a necklace by her maid. Around are scenes of olive picking, hunting, harvesting, a guest arriving—all the concomitants of country life.

After the fourth century, both execution and design become less skillful and the subject matter exclusively Christian—principally church decoration and mortuary inscriptions, portraits of the deceased inscribed with pious sentiments, and intended rather as wall decoration than as pavement. And here begins to appear the glass and ceramic technique characteristic of Byzantine work.

It would be difficult to consider any of these mosaics, Roman, African or Paleo-Christian, as great works of art. None, for example, has the grace of

An Encore for Reform

THE OLD PROGRESSIVES AND THE NEW DEAL

By OTIS L. GRAHAM, Jr., University of California, Santa Barbara. The author delves into an important source of the reform tradition—the reformers of the Progressive era who survived into the days of the New Deal. Through interviews with over 100 of them, he discovered that more than half opposed the New Deal in whole or in part. "A fine monograph covering a subject which has needed the intense examination and thoughtful analysis which Mr. Graham has brought [it]."—FRANK FREIDEL, Harvard University
Cloth, $6.00. A Galaxy Book, GB 193, paper, $1.95

New, from OXFORD

The Puritan Ethic and Woman Suffrage

By ALAN P. GRIMES, Michigan State University. The woman suffrage movement in America has usually been seen as a progressive force; this book reveals another, generally ignored, side of the movement. Professor Grimes shows how it actually became a major weapon in the hands of the nativist forces that were organizing against the large blocs of foreign immigrants who entered the country around the turn of the century. "One of the few studies of women and woman suffrage which advance beyond guesswork and anecdote to real historical analysis."—CHRISTOPHER LASCH, Northwestern University
$4.75

At all bookstores
OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS
200 Madison Avenue,
New York, N. Y. 10016

FREE with every new subscription to THE NATION

["The Politics of Escalation in Vietnam] is probably the best single investment anyone can make in the literature on Vietnam. It is a work I would like to see seriously and thoughtfully debated by Administration advocates. . . . It presents clearly much of the story of the failure of the American government to pursue a diplomacy that would lead to a negotiated settlement: the peace feelers that were missed, the ignored appeals, the 'cues' that were not given, the tendency of the US to escalate the war when chances for détente were most hopeful."

Bernard Fall

New York Review of Books, Feb. 9, 1967

"This book raises vital questions about our policy of escalation in relation to peace proposals."

Senator Vance Hartke,
Indiana

"This study of the American role in Vietnam seems to me very important, and one that deserves the attention of both supporters and opponents of the war."

Irving Howe

For your FREE copy of THE POLITICS OF ESCALATION IN VIETNAM fill out the subscription coupon below, and start receiving The Nation, this country's oldest (1865) weekly journal of dissenting opinion.

THE NATION
333 SIXTH AVENUE
NEW YORK, N.Y. 10014

Herewith my order and payment for a NEW subscription to The Nation. Please send my FREE copy of THE POLITICS OF ESCALATION IN VIETNAM.

☐ 1 Year, $10 ☐ 2 Years, $18 ☐ 6 Months, $6
(Foreign and Canadian Postage: $1 per year extra)

name _____

address _____

city _____ state _____ zip no. _____

5-15-67

the mosaic in small, sea-worn pebbles, showing Aphrodite on a leopard and found in Alexander's Macedonian capital, Pella; nor is there any of the virtuosity, of the, so to speak, fine brushwork, of the mosaics in Naples which depict the warring Greeks and Persians; nor of the psychological insight and compositional complexity of the mosaic at St. Vitale in Ravenna portraying Justinian and his court. This material in Tunis is a decorator's art, and a provincial version at that. Just the same, its richness of color, the stiff skill of its delineations and, above all, its decorative invention and the endless variety of its ornamental devices are a delight. Even more gratifying is the charming aspect it presents of Roman life in a peaceful province. The American traveling collection will be well worth seeing,

THEATRE

JULIUS NOVICK

Hartford, Conn.

The Hartford Stage Company (HSC) is a small resident professional theatre located in a refurbished warehouse just off the main street of Hartford, Conn.; The Servant of Two Masters by Carlo Goldoni was the hit of the Venetian theatre season of 1743. I had two good reasons for not going to see the production of the latter recently mounted by the former: the last HSC production I had seen had been a labored, ponderous, smirking version of a Victorian melodrama; and the last time I had seen The Servant of Two Masters (just a week previously, in a clumsily acted production by the professional company of the McCarter Theatre at Princeton), I was moved to wonder why any modern American company would bother with it.

Sighing lovers, bumbling servants, far-fetched coincidences, all the conventional paraphernalia of classical comedy, are less in demand nowadays than they were in Goldoni's time—especially when, as in this case, they are adorned with no poetry and very little wit. Unless it has suffered severely in all three of the translations I have encountered, the play is a piece of good-hearted, simple-minded fooling, heavily dependent upon the comic resources of its executants. It is firmly rooted, moreover, in the Commedia dell'Arte tradition, about which American actors know even less than they know about most kinds of theatre. (This was almost pathetically obvious at Princeton.)

But I went to Hartford all the same

(it was on my way to Boston, and I had a free night), and saw their Servant of Two Masters. It turned out to be, in its modest and cheerful fashion, something of a revelation. The Hartford performers were not highly experienced, specially skilled actor-acrobats, like the troupe for which The Servant was written, but Paul Weidner, the director and translator for the Hartford production, found a kind of life in Goldoni's old farce that American actors can project.

He realized that the commedia was fundamentally a popular art form. Its natural habitat was the streets, where traveling companies, most of them grubby and second-rate, would set up a stage and do their stuff before a noisy, rowdy, macaroni-and-garlic crowd. Mr. Weidner's production used Goldoni's play as a means of evoking the vigorous, exuberant life of the Italian streets which, it is implied, has not changed very much over the last 200 years.

As you came into the theatre, the thrust stage was bare except for a large rubber-tired cart, piled high with junk and surmounted by a crate of live chickens. At about 8:15, a couple of ragazzi, looking like the laborers and loafers you see in working-class neighborhoods of Italy today, appeared and started to unload the cart; one of them chewed bubble gum, making popping noises as he worked. As they arranged the stage for the performance, other men and women drifted in: they were the actors. Some of them called "Bon giorno" to the house. One girl was wearing a mini-skirt; another, whose breasts were practically jumping out of a scoop-necked blouse, offered her small dog to be petted by members of the audience. Tinny music started coming out of a loud-speaker: Santa Lucia, mandolin selections and Verdi.

The actors drifted off again to put on their costumes. To beguile the time, one of the scene-shifters did some second-rate acrobatics, first stopping to tuck in his shirt, and yelling "bravo!" for himself whenever he brought off some simple feat. Actors drifted on again; there were arguments; a fight broke out and was quelled; and by not too long after 8:30 an attractive scruffy aggregation—contemporary Italian traveling players (or so we are willing to believe) was ready to present The Servant of Two Masters.

It was all a gimmick, of course, and by no means an original one, but yielded more fun before the play proper began than some productions manage in an entire evening. Furthermore, it provided a context within which both actors and audience could relax and be comfort-

SUMMER TELEGRAM: A PAINTING

*Is a good way to be happy while eating breakfast—cabin on the left spouts green puff of smoke into yellow sky;
sun is all face and hands;*

funny tree

*on right grows coral shrimp instead of leaves—
that's a tree worth watching!*

STEVEN OSTERLUND

able with each other and with Goldoni's play, which through all the goings-on was never, so far as I could tell, distorted or demeaned.

The performance itself was in keeping with what went before: earthy and energetic, with little time wasted on subtleties, and no precious powdered-wiggery. A porter, underpaid, makes the "Va fongui!" sign, fist to inside of elbow, as he walks off; a servant steals a half-eaten apple; traveling players understand about hunger.

Goldoni's script demands to be elaborated with a great deal of business, and Weidner supplied it, drawing upon the traditional lazzi (sight-gags) of the commedia, and upon the immemorial repertory of pratfalls, kicks and other kinds of mayhem that unite Aristophanes with Tom and Jerry.

Truffaldino, the eponymous servant who causes so much confusion, was played by Macon McCalman, a veteran of ten seasons at the Front Street Theatre in Memphis. Much of the more elaborate business fell to him: it was he who became so hungry that he killed an invisible fly, cooked it over a match, and ate it (this is very traditional); it was he who got his face pushed into a bowl of pudding, from which it emerged covered with goo (this, of course, is even more traditional). McCalman was as funny as he needed to be, and had an agreeable, easygoing, country-boy quality. The evening's one really brilliant performance, however, was given by Henry Thomas as Pantalone, the father of one of the lovers. Thomas provided a conventional old-man characterization, raised to a hilarious pitch by sheer comic virtuosity.

But the production succeeded as an ensemble effort. All the actors appeared to be functioning on the same easy, informal, happy wave length. The initial convention was never forgotten. Caley Summers' costumes were just the kind of gaudy but dubious 18th-century outfits that a hand-to-mouth company in Italy today might improvise: one of the lovers, for instance, wore a scarlet 18th-century coat over a brown T-shirt and green corduroy pants. The set changes featured the same seedy ragazzi who began the evening. Even Weidner's translation was flavored with a combination of operatic and ice-cream Italian: "Piano, piano, momento, signor," "Me misericordia!" "Buon dio!" "Si," "Bella," "Prego," "Scusi," "Molto honorato," "Maledetto!" "Assassino!"

The atmosphere was maintained right through the happy ending, when all the confusions are cleared up and all the lovers reunited, to the waltzing finale and curtain call (to the tune of the Brindisi from Traviata). By presenting to us the idealized image of a sunny, expansive style of life, at the opposite pole from our tight bourgeois ways, the production serves, I think, a purpose beyond simple merrymaking. It is about time that somebody besides the hippies reminded us of what we miss by being good, busy, success-oriented Americans.

I ought to admit that Weidner, the man behind all this, is an old acquaintance of mine, though I have hardly seen him in the past few years. I acted in his thesis production at the Yale School of

Now in Paperback $1.95, Cloth $5.75

BIOGRAPHY OF THE GODS by
A. Eustace Haydon, former Head,
Religion Dept., Univ. of Chicago,
Leader Emeritus, Ethical Culture Society
FREDERICK UNGAR PUBLISHING CO.
250 Park Ave., S., New York 10003

"A fascinating study . . ." N.Y. Times

Play an "IN" GAME

FROM AVALON HILL

(TOUGH ENOUGH TO BE CONSIDERED A DARE!)

D-DAY is an authentic re-creation of the World War II battle for a continent, with YOU commanding all major battle units. YOUR skill and judgment in maneuvering troops and supplies available during actual battle determine victory or defeat! Historically accurate, with table-size map-board and detailed instructions for 2 players or teams. Playing time: 2 to 5 hours. A challenge and a dare for ages 12 through adult. $5.98

Available at local game counters, or send $5.98 to Dept. D-1,

Avalon Hill, 4517 Harford Rd., Balto., Md. 21214

Name _____

Address _____

City _____ State _____ Zip _____

☐ Send FREE brochure Sorry, no C.O.D.

Drama; I was pretty bad, and he had no idea of what to do about me. Since then, he appears to have become a better director, and nowadays he has better actors working for him.

All prejudices aside, however, I tend to get tired of the uninspired semi-competence that prevails in most of the regional theatres. The general attitude often seems to be: "This is a classic, whether we like it or not; let's get it on somehow." Weidner has gone beyond that and done some genuinely creative work. His production concept, moreover, is not merely a frivolous Bright Idea, designed to aggrandize the director at the expense of the play; it is a spritely and responsible notion that takes into account the script, the actors and the audience, and justifies itself in relation to all three.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

PERSONALS

AUTOMOBILE TROUBLE GUIDE and GASOLINE MILEAGE CALCULATOR

Dial trouble and solution appears.
Gasoline mileage easily computed.
Price: $1.00

Handy First Aid dial free with order
Bodega, Box 6217, Oakland, Calif. 94603

USE LAWFUL DIRECT ACTION to repeal all abortion laws. LEGALIZE ABORTION, POB 24163, Los Angeles, Calif. 90024.

LIBERAL student political organization needs full-time director and campus traveler. Must be available for a year. Send resume to Campus ADA, 1223 Connecticut Avenue, N.W., Washington, D.C. 20036.

The Best Way To Get THE NATION

THE NATION 5-15-67
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

- ☐ One Year, $10
- ☐ Two Years, $18
- ☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Foreign and Canadian Postage
$1 a year extra)

NAME _____

ADDRESS _____

CITY _____

STATE _____ ZIP NO. _____

FILMS/Robert Hatch

Back about the time of Richardson's Tom Jones, British films began coming to us with an exceedingly high polish in them. The shine of what seems to be the highest luster plastic finish lends a brighter than life smartness to such proceedings and makes all the lovingly placed objects look "interesting." This is acceptable enough; it accords with the pop and camp glossiness of the art galleries, the fluorescent bang of the mini-skirt generation. But when all that attention is paid to surface, it becomes particularly important that something should be going on down in the interior—as was the case, for example, with Blow Up, a film very much in the current British idiom, though made by Antonioni.

Sad little lyrics about the human condition won't justify the expensive look of the showcase, and that is the trouble with Accident, which Harold Pinter wrote and Joseph Losey directed from some novel that must surely have skidded rapidly to the remainder table. The picture glows with visual ravishments, as though Oxford and London had been converted into one huge film set, with hidden lights warming up the texture of centuries for the filtered lenses, and with every foot of the way as filled with ingenious amusements as a roadside gift shop. But all this is in behalf of a story that in its general statement is a platitude—middle-aged professors stand in some peril of becoming emotionally involved with their female students—and which one hopes in vain will take on some life-giving particularity. There is occasional good dialogue (Pinter) and the cast is fashion-page handsome (Dirk Bogarde, Jacqueline Sassard and Michael York in particular). But the spectacle of a pair of rivalrous dons dangerously tiring themselves over a bit of narcissistic fluff is too miserably commonplace to be animated by lavish décor and cunning photography. Nor is it given much point by a fortuitous motor fatality, even when the accident is employed as a rousing opener, with everything else occurring as flashback.

And I could not quite kid myself that I was watching dextrous academics, for all the gowns and sherry and Gothic towers. Bogarde and Stanley Baker are vivid actors, but a thing they are incapable of suggesting is intellectual enterprise. They behave throughout as though an amatory flare-up had complicated their plans to rob a bank. York, as an undergraduate who, if he hadn't died in a ditch, would clearly have caught the girl when the dons had wearied of tossing her about, at least handles a cricket bat with authority. However if I hadn't been told he was playing a young aristocrat, I would have supposed him a strayed teddy boy. Accident falls into the trap of setting up a problem about which it finds nothing to say. But how it shines!

Carlos Saura's The Hunt was made in Spain and has been shown there, apparently with no official retaliation. Its implicit statement is that men who in their youth killed Loyalists for Franco ever after have murder in their hearts—and murder will out. It must still take some courage to say this in Spain today, and the impact of the film on its countrymen should have been considerable.

But despite the historical allusions and despite the obvious military parallels of much of the action, this generalization is more effective as a political challenge than as the presupposition for a work of fiction. It is certainly possible that the three protagonists of the film carry the sickness of homicide in their blood, but it is at least as likely that the immediate situation produces the slaughter. And that situation seems quite rigidly manipulated to produce an exercise in implacable grimness.

In any case, I felt from the start that these men were behaving in obedience to the script rather than according to logic or their own inclinations. One of them is a rich bully, another is a nervously exhausted bankrupt, the third is a cynical toady. They go off rabbit hunting in a brutal scorpion valley where years before they had hunted men. The rabbit slaughter is repulsive and pointless, but the old men fire away in a mood of pumped-up virility, though with no pleasure and little interest, and only the young nephew of one of them is repelled by the avalanche of broken fur rolling down the hillocks. As they shoot, they drink brandy under the violent sun, and as they drink they begin to taunt one another. It is not long before the men are as dead as the rabbits.

The fault in such a picture as The Hunt is that it depresses to no purpose. It is in the nature of evidence for a coroner's jury, a meticulous description of what happened. But why we should care that it happened does not emerge from the imposed misery. Carlos Saura is a young director with a very strong command of the medium and he has chosen in his first picture to make a bold statement to his countrymen. But he has also allowed his purpose to outweigh his art, and the picture has not exported well.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1201

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS:

- 1 Polling places? (6, 5)
- 9, 10 and 11 What might be spent in asylum is immemorial. (4, 3, 2, 4)
- 12 Little enough given to 9 without direction for the character! (4, 3)
- 13 Bill might get it in the journey. (7)
- 15 Might one be buried in it? Note the contents of what presumably only gangsters were buried in! (8)
- 16 Such linen wasn't worn about the neck. (6)
- 18 This way for 13! (6)
- 21 Where the steersmen are in regions of conflict. (8)
- 24 One has been told to 7, to do it. (7)
- 26 Certainly not the price of amateur activity to 7, proportionately. (7)
- 28 See 25 down
- 29 One might think it pertains to Troy, but the region is more local. (5)
- 30 Had an obligation to poetry, by the sound of it. (4)
- 31 It might convey what an outclassed fighter seems to suffer. (7, 4)

DOWN:

- 2 A false eye can let burning light out of it. (9)
- 3 A flat statement "you'll feel better taking it"? (7)
- 4 The party you're invited to on this page is becoming an annual one. Does that sound correct? (4)

- 5 The pianist is not quite so loud in the middle passage as the subject of Offenbach might dictate. (7)
- 6 Asks for information in the matter of footwear? (5)
- 7 Great in the west, when cut up. (6)
- 8 An animal objects to be thrown by it! (6)
- 14 and 27 down Jewelry the malevolent do into the bottom of 17. (9)
- 17 Cut out the childish fancy! (5, 4)
- 19 In the mouth, in the purse, or on the head? (6)
- 20 A disguised place is not ordinary for it. (7)
- 22 Fodder given the horse might require light now and then. (7)
- 23 One who makes fancy material or rag. (6)
- 25 and 28 across Her lace is too wild to be made by a 23. (5, 4)
- 27 See 14 down

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1200

ACROSS: 1 Addis Ababa; 6 Stow; 10 Air lift; 11 Overeat; 12 Eric; 13 Glad-hander; 15 Engaged; 16 Lantern; 17 Lowboys; 20 Corinth; 22 Outpouring; 23 Snub; 25 Realist; 26 Primula; 27 Sake; 28 Chesterton. DOWN: 1 A Farewell to Arms; 2 Darning; 3 Slip; 4 Battled; 5 Blondel; 7 Treadle; 8 Water on the brain; 9 Retainers; 14 Agnomic; 18 Wet pack; 19 Stretch; 20 Canopus; 21 Nonsuit; 24 Dice.

PUBLICATIONS

WORLD DEMOCRACY. By Bln Dir Woor. Self-Designated Symbolical World President. Unique. Entrancing. Greenwich Book Publishers, 282 7th Avenue, N.Y.C. Bln Dir Woor says that every time you pronounce the creative phrase, "World Democracy", in prayer or otherwise, the world grows a shade whiter, brighter, more human, and more divine.

"SELECTED POEMS" of George Flynn (Villiers of London $2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound."—James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at 544—82 St., Brooklyn 9, N.Y.

THE IDLER. Lively, offbeat, liberal monthly. $1 brings four different sample back issues. Idler, 413B 6th St., N.E., Washington, D.C. 20002.

AMERICAN HAIKU magazine. Subscription —$3.00 yearly. Box 73, Platteville, Wisconsin 53818.

THE BLUFF OF DEGODDING THE HUMANS by Bibi Beebi, 116 pp., price $3.00. Popular Non-Newtonian, etc., physics, astronomy, culturology, philosophy. The Inventist, P.O. Box 17039, Los Angeles, Calif. 90017.

FACTUAL, informative, objective research report: "PROPAGANDA METHODS OF THE JOHN BIRCH SOCIETY," by Alain Revon, 2030 G Street, N.W., Washington, D.C. Send $1 for mailing.

EDUCATIONAL

FIVE DAY BOARDING SCHOOL. A unique program for people who have not even considered a boarding school. Grades five through eight. THE THOREAU SCHOOL. An intimate, cooperative community, combining study with the tasks and joys of farm living. School bus brings your children home to NYC weekends. Small classes, individual instruction. Now enrolling for September. Write: Rodman, RD 1, Wallkill, N.Y. 12589. Phone: 914-895-5523.

BLAKE COLLEGE—Experimental, self-motivated, 'pataphysical students. 342 East 10, Eugene, Oregon 97401.

TRAVEL

The OTHER Israel—a three-week summer program for young people 21 to 35—a dialogue with young Israeli socialists—meet farmers, workers, Arabs, labor leaders, peace groups, parliament members—live and work in a kibbutz—tour the country, $625.00. For details write: Young Americans for Progressive Israel, 150 Fifth Avenue, Room 700, New York, N.Y. 10011.

ART

KHAJURAHOS' EROTIC SCULPTURES: Thousand Year Old Temple Friezes of Hindu Arts, Carnal Love, Masterpieces Chandel Architecture. Twelve Color Slides $10. TEMPLE VIEWS, Box 25101, Cincinnati, Ohio 45225.

ORIGINALS COST LESS THAN REPRODUCTIONS! Contemporary original signed etchings, lithographs, woodcuts, $3.50. Guarantee. Free brochure. GRAPHIC CIRCLE (NA), 68 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10011.

Puzzle Fans

You are invited once again to meet our puzzle maker, Frank Lewis. The Nation will hold a buffet supper on the evening of Thursday, June 1, from 6 o'clock on, at the Harvard Club, 27 West 44 Street. All devotees of Mr. Lewis will be welcome guests. Please let us know as soon as possible if you intend to come. Write or call The Nation, 333 Sixth Avenue, N. Y. 10014. Telephone 242-8400.

Bernard B. Fall's

THE TWO VIET-NAMS

A Political and Military Analysis
Second Revised Edition

"Of the first edition of this book [now in its 9th printing] I said at the time that it struck me as the best balanced analysis of a complex situation I had yet read. I repeat it of this second (and, lamentably, last) edition. A good book has been made better, driving home how severe a loss Dr. Fall's death has been to objective reporting and analysis from Vietnam."—John Barkham, Saturday Review Syndicate. This extensively revised and expanded new edition remains the most authoritative and up-to-date work currently available. $7.95

VICTOR CHARLIE

The Face of War in Vietnam

By KUNO KNOEBL. Introduction by Bernard B. Fall. "What we have here is the firsthand testimony, from direct observation in both camps, by a European neutral who is more concerned with people and what war does to them than with grand strategy. . . . He describes in detail the death by torture at Viet-Cong hands of a South Vietnamese Government informer. But Knoebel, firsthand observer, can also write that the South Vietnamese, and the American observers who advised them, 'failed miserably' in rising to the Viet-Cong challenge and were prisoners of their own self-delusions." — Bernard B. Fall, in the Introduction

"The great virtue of Kuno Knoebel's Victor Charlie is that he has seen the Viet-Cong from both sides of the lines—from the jungles where the Viet-Cong guerrillas operate and from the American lines where we attempt to grapple with them. . . . Kuno Knoebel's impressionistic reporting seems to me to bring out the feeling of the confused and tragic conflict as well as any reporting which I have seen lately." — Harrison E. Salisbury of The New York Times. $5.95

...on VIETNAM

Four vital new books from PRAEGER

VIETNAM: A DRAGON EMBATTLED

Volume I: From Colonialism to the Vietminh

Volume II: Vietnam at War

By JOSEPH BUTTINGER, author of The Smaller Dragon. A noted authority presents a monumental study of Vietnam from the beginning of the French colonial period to the fall of Diem in 1963. "No other work in English covers critical events in Vietnam in this century in such detail." — Library Journal. 1,352 pp., maps, notes, appendixes, bibliog., index. Two vols., boxed, $18.50

HO CHI MINH ON REVOLUTION

Selected Writings, 1920-66

Edited and with an Introduction by BERNARD B. FALL. Little is known of the mysterious 77-year-old Ho Chi Minh, President of the "Democratic Republic of Vietnam," and until now Ho's writings have not been easily obtainable in this country. This wide-ranging selection covers five decades of speeches, articles, pamphlets, interviews, and even poetry (written while in Chinese jails), and presents both a record of Ho's participation on the world political scene and a revealing self-portrait. "The style throughout is vivid, and the insights are those of an exceptional man. Bernard Fall has done an expectedly impressive job." — Kirkus Service. $6.95

NOW AT YOUR BOOKSTORE

FREDERICK A. PRAEGER, Publishers

A subsidiary of Encyclopaedia Britannica

New York, N. Y. 10003

TROUBLE IN EGYPT VERN L. BULLOUGH

THE NATION

MAY 22, 1967 35 cents

BURLINGAME
MAY 2 1969
LIBRARY

FIRST OF A SERIES

The Supersonic Transport

Billion-Dollar Dilemma

KARL M. RUPPENTHAL

Battle Line of Welfare

The Hungry Can't Wait

CHARLES I. SCHOTTLAND

SDS: Protest Is Not Enough

RICHARD BLUMENTHAL

'The Absurdity of the Jewish Condition'

DAVID JORAVSKY

F L P D
MR W W DAVIDSON
THE GEORGIA REVIEW
UNIV OF GEORGIA PRESS
ATHENS GA 30602
EX

LETTERS

time to appeal

Los Angeles, Calif.

DEAR SIR: Paul Good's otherwise excellent article, "Laying Freedom On The Line" [The Nation, Mar. 20] contains one misleading statement which should be called to the attention of potential draft protesters. The U.S. Court of Appeals has not, as Mr. Good asserts, ruled out a Selective Service Law regulation that a draftee must appeal his classification within ten days of receiving notice. The author apparently is referring to the recent decision of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit in U.S. v. Gearey which held that after a registrant receives an order to report for induction, he may have a conscientious objector claim considered if he makes a showing that his conscientious objector status did not crystallize in his mind until after receipt of the induction order. The decision of the court in no way affected the regulation requiring notice of appeal or request for a personal appearance within ten days of the mailing of a new classification. Local boards continue to enforce the regulation quite literally, and any registrant who fails to appeal a new classification within the ten-day period may find himself in a precarious position.

William G. Smith

Canadian nationalism

Regina, Sask.

DEAR SIR: C. W. Gonick's thoughtful analysis of the current Canadian debate over U.S. control of Canada's economy ["Canada Fights Its Orbit," The Nation, Apr. 17] fairly describes a situation that has aroused deep feelings among many Canadians. A recent public opinion poll conducted by the Toronto Star showed that 60 per cent of Canadians interviewed agreed that foreign control of Canadian industry endangers the country's political independence, and more than two-thirds felt the Canadian Government should act to reduce foreign control. . . . But Professor Gonick suggests that Canada is without "an effective vehicle for Canadian nationalism." Such an opinion must ignore the role of the New Democratic Party in vigorously advocating the cause of Canadian economic and political independence. The NDP has in fact become Canada's only effective vehicle for nationalism, although the Liberal Party from time to time renders lip service to the concept. . . .

William Deverell, Special Asst.
Office of the Leader of the Opposition youth in Cicero

Cicero, Ill.

DEAR SIR: The Mar. 27 issue of The Nation published "The Siege of Cicero" by Bruce J. Oudes. As a high school student and non-homeowner, I feel less inclined to be subjective in my view of the race situation in Cicero and, therefore, support the thesis of Mr. Oudes that Cicero, my community, is characterized by such extreme racial bigotry that eventually it will become a black ghetto. Although I feel his general thesis is correct, it seems quite evident that many of his statements have been contrived from hearsay or from biased literature. Being a teenager, I must attack his statement concerning the adolescents of Cicero whom he dared to generalize and to classify as "youths who wore their hair long before anyone ever heard of the Beatles and who proudly waved Nazi posters during the CORE march." Was it in an attempt to impress his viewpoint that Mr. Oudes overlooked the merit of Cicero youths? The Human Relations Club, for example which, by the way, exceeds the membership quota of five which was emphasized in the article, travels to

(Continued on page 660)

EDITORIALS

The GOP White Paper

According to reports from Washington, the policy report that sought to prepare the Republican Party for a strong dissent on Vietnam in 1968 has been laid to rest. Senator Dirksen, the minority leader, says the report was not discussed at the weekly lunch meeting of the Senate Republican Policy Committee, for whose edification it was prepared. In this matter Senator Dirksen is in accord with President Johnson, who must regard the document with equal aversion. The situation is not without irony: an analysis prepared by Republicans for Republicans, with formidable potential for a Republican victory in 1968, is viewed with the same distaste by the Republican leadership as by the President whose continuance in office it threatens.

Senator Dirksen is not alone in his rejection of the White Paper. Sen. Thomas H. Kuchel, regarded as a member of the moderate wing of the party and up for re-election in 1968, also would like to see the report forgotten as soon as possible. "The issue before us now," he says, "is not the origin of our involvement in the conflict but bringing it to a conclusion honorably, and, hopefully, peacefully." He counsels against trying to gain possession of the White House in 1968 at the cost of Republican support of the "system of collective security against Communist expansion in Asia." He does not seem to realize—or at least does not choose to say publicly—that the only way to end the war may be for the Republicans to win in 1968, and the only chance they have to win is by precisely the kind of cogent analysis the White Paper represents.

The genesis of the report is significant. It was not the work of senior, superannuated politicians. It was prepared by a group of staff people in the offices of a number of Senators, who began with no particular bias or restraint on their thinking. They did something inherently dangerous to established doctrine—they looked at the facts, then drew the inescapable conclusions.

Private reaction to the White Paper is quite different from the pooh-poohing of the Republican high command. Several hawkish Senators have said that while they did not necessarily agree (it would be difficult to agree and remain in the hawk camp), they found it impressive and "quite interesting" to have the pattern of the facts set forth in this fashion. The report will continue to influence Republican and Democratic thought, no matter how summarily it is dismissed in public utterances. It has also served an important purpose: it reveals the width of the split in the Republican Party on the issue of Vietnam—a split which parallels that among the Democrats and which promises to play a major role in the 1968 campaigning. It is difficult to see how Senators on one side of the aisle will be able to maintain an intransigent partisan attitude.

toward colleagues on the other side with whom they agree on the issue of Vietnam, nor how the hawks will maintain a brotherly accord with doves in their own party. By all indications, despite all efforts to relegate it to the background, Vietnam will dominate the campaign.

This tendency is already clearly in evidence. In the editorial "Speaking Out" (May 8) we forecast that Sen. George McGovern would gain, not lose, through his remarkable speech of April 25, which followed similar utterances at the Nation Institute Conference in Los Angeles on February 25. The Washington Evening Star of May 2 reports that McGovern's mail is averaging 1,000 letters a day and running 60 to 1 in favor of his position. Of course, people who are opposed to U.S. policy in Asia would write in greater volume after the kind of speech McGovern made; nevertheless, the ratio is an indication of what is going on in the minds of a great many voters. "I don't see how any Republican can touch [McGovern] after that speech," one Congressional staff member commented, which is precisely the point made in the editorial.

To the same effect, Sen. George D. Aiken, dean of Senate Republicans and second ranking Republican on the Foreign Relations Committee, said on May 2 he had become convinced that "the present Administration cannot achieve an honorable peace in Vietnam." With a polite obeisance to his good intentions, Aiken said that the President "predicates peace on the capitulation of the enemy, and that solution seems far in the distance, if at all." Senator Hatfield agreed with Senator Aiken that "this Administration does not have the capacity to conduct negotiations." And Sen. J. W. Fulbright, a Democrat, remarked that the GOP White Paper was the first break in the clouds he had seen in a long time. "If my committee staff had put it out," he added, "all hell would have broken loose."

Bipartisanship in foreign affairs is generally conceived as blind support of any warlike policy that a President of either party chooses to initiate. It can also be conceived as an agreement, despite party allegiances, among politicians who foresee the dire consequences of a mistaken policy so initiated, and pressed in defiance of statesman-like prudence. As the Vietnamese War drags on, to America's discomfiture and disgrace, this type of bipartisanship is coming to the fore.

Our Tragedy in Greece

In "The Deadlock in Greece — Elections or Coup?" (The Nation, March 27, 1967) Stephen Rousseas related the activities of CIA agents, suspected or known to be such, in the tense situation then existing in Greece. In the July, 1965, crisis one of the suspected agents had returned to Athens after service with the State Department's Middle East desk, reported to be rife with CIA people. Both the CIA and the Pentagon, Rousseas wrote, continued to play important and often decisive roles in Greek

IN THIS ISSUE

May 22, 1967

EDITORIALS

642

ARTICLES

647 Trouble in Egypt

Vern L. Bullough

649 Battle Line of Welfare:
The Hungry Can't Wait

Charles I. Schottland

652 The Supersonic Transport:
Billion-Dollar Dilemma

Karl M. Ruppenthal

656 SDS: Protest Is Not Enough

Richard Blumenthal

BOOKS & THE ARTS

661 "The Absurdity of the Jewish Condition"

David Joravsky

662 Embroidery at Bayeux
(poem)

John Frederick Nims

663 Massacre of the Innocents

Raphael Rothstein

664 Reform or Revolution?

James O'Connor

665 Tractors (poem)

Harvey Shapiro

667 Television

John Horn

669 Spring Records 2

Benjamin Boretz

671 Crossword Puzzle

Frank W. Lewis

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Copy Editor
MARION HESS

Theatre
HAROLD CLURMAN

Art
MAX KOZLOFF

Music
BENJAMIN BORETZ

Science
CARL DREHER

Advertising Manager
MARY SIMON

Associate Publisher
GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Associate Editor
PHIL KERBY

Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIAS

Poetry Editor
MICHAEL GOLDMAN

Washington
ROBERT G. SHERRILL

Paris
ALEXANDER WERTH

London
RAYMOND WILLIAMS

Bonn
C. AMERY

Canberra
C. P. FITZGERALD

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July and August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1967 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel.: CH 2-8400. West Coast office: 1256 Westwood Boulevard, Los Angeles, Calif. 90024. Tel.: GR 4-2533. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give four weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and Public Affairs Information Service.

THE NATION
Combined with FRONTIER

Volume 204
No. 21

politics. Evidence is presently lacking that the CIA engineered the current seizure of power by a reactionary army junta, but the situation was surely one in which it would have been happy to lend a hand.

Even if this is an exceptional instance and the CIA proves to be completely innocent, the affair exposes the futility of American policy in that part of the world—and elsewhere. The danger of a Communist take-over in Greece was the occasion for the promulgation of the Truman Doctrine and armed intervention by the United States, with British and other Western support. The Communist movement was suppressed, and this success set the pattern for anti-Communist U.S. action on a world-wide scale. And the result in Greece is the establishment of the first openly Fascist regime in Europe since Hitler took power in Germany in 1933.

That the Patakos-Papadopoulos-Makarezas colonels' regime is Fascist is, in the light of its actions, hardly open to doubt. A violent usurpation is not necessarily Fascist; there are other forms of dictatorship. But when an army faction seizes power, proceeds to suppress all Left and centrist organizations, abolishes parliamentary institutions, muzzles the press, and promises a radical reorganization of society along rightist lines—that is fascism. The excuse is familiar: the country must be saved from communism, which turns out to be anything and everything that might interfere with the naked exercise of power by the self-appointed saviors. By some mysterious alchemy, also, personal rectitude—as defined by the rulers—will establish social justice and abolish all the evils that have befallen the country under democracy.

The antics of the Greek rulers would be funny if their decrees were not symbols of tyranny, with worse to come. Girls are forbidden to wear miniskirts, the female thigh having been discovered to be related to subversion. Boys must not sport long hair. For the young of both sexes church attendance is to be compulsory. Beards will be tolerated on Greek males, but a bearded tourist must shave so long as he remains in the country, and tourists "clothed in rags or slovenly dress" will not be admitted.

While resistance to the coup has been completely lacking, there is considerable evidence that the conspirators do not know what to do with the power they have seized. Probably without reason (at least for the present), they fear a hostile popular reaction. They banned soccer games and horse racing, apparently on the supposition that any gathering, even of sports fans, might be dangerous. They lifted the ban, then imposed it once more.

For some of the 5,000 or more Greeks who have been put under arrest, the situation is by no means farcical. The Moscow radio broadcast reported late in April that Manolis Glezos, a Communist who was a hero of the resistance against the Nazi occupation, was in imminent danger of death at the hands of the junta. Another possible victim is Andreas Papandreou. He was an American citizen for many years, served in the U.S. Navy in World War II, and has many friends among American economists. He has been charged with conspiracy to commit high treason. In fact, if the junta represents Greece, he is guilty, since he tried to forestall the coup by ridding the army of the putschists before they could act. The least he can expect now is long imprisonment.

The Johnson Administration must expect new difficulties in the Mediterranean. The junta asserts that Greece is in NATO more firmly than before and demands increased military aid from the United States. If this demand is met, or even if military assistance is maintained at the earlier level, Turkey will clamor for greater arms aid. The Turks suspect, not without reason, that U.S. weapons in the hands of the Greek nationalists may be used against them.

The Johnson Administration has urged moderation on the junta; in particular, it has asked that Andreas Papandreou be spared. But by all indications the new regime will receive recognition. A leftist revolution arouses the implacable hatred of Washington. A rightist take-over may be disapproved initially, but Washington always manages to live with it—quite happily, in the end.

Grudge Fight

Speaking to a group of White House Fellows recently, President Johnson said, "... the most noble outrage against injustice . . . will be only good intentions unless Americans . . . go into the field. . . ." On the very same day he was giving this advice, Mr. Johnson had turned down a request from the Senate Poverty Subcommittee to send emergency food rations to the Mississippi Delta, where hunger is a way of life and where between 40,000 and 60,000 people are expected to be jobless and completely without food by this summer.

The subcommittee had gone "into the field," as Johnson advised the Fellows to do; on a recent trip to Mississippi it had visited the shanties where people live on rice and soybeans and children's bellies are swollen with malnutrition. The subcommittee wrote up its findings, presented them to Johnson, and asked his help in translating them into practical results—just as he recommended.

Not only did Johnson turn down the request; he didn't even send a reply. Why would he respond so coldly when he knows thousands of desperate people are depending on him for relief? Because, simply, he is incapable of rising above personal politics. Look at the subcommittee that made the request: One man he hates (Robert Kennedy); one man he thoroughly dislikes (Edward Kennedy); one man has been a constant nettle to Johnson since the late 1950s (Joseph Clark); and all the others—Jennings Randolph, Gaylord Nelson, Winston Prouty, Jacob Javits and George Murphy—have often opposed him.

Even that old reactionary song-and-dance man, George Murphy, was moved by the suffering he saw in Mississippi; in fact, it was he who first suggested that the sub committee by-pass the Department of Agriculture and go straight to the President with their petition. Murphy could put aside partisan politics—Robert Kennedy could put aside personal politics—for mercy's sake. But President Johnson could not.

And for the same reason the White House is now opposing a bill sponsored by Javits, Clark, both Kennedys, Randolph, Morse, Nelson and Pell to add $137.5 million to the anti-poverty budget. Neither Johnson nor any of his aides will even talk about it with Clark, spokesman for the group. But Johnson made his position clear enough by undercutting their bill with one of his own—for only $75 million, introduced as soon as he heard the Clark bill was going to appear. The lesser figure (aimed only at cooling hot tempers during the summer, whereas the Clark-Kennedy-Javits measure is for a year-round program) will get the Administration's support.

Say what you will about Johnson's forgetting some of his Great Society promises, nobody can ever accuse him of forgetting a grudge.

The Change

Last fall, three soldiers were court-martialed at Fort Dix, N.J., for refusing to go to Vietnam. One received a three-year sentence, the others must serve five years.

A draftee now stationed at Fort Benning, Ga., is bringing suit against the Secretary of Defense to block his assignment to duty in Vietnam. He asserts that the war abridges his rights to due process under the Fifth Amendment and that it violates the UN Charter and various other pacts and proceedings to which the United States is a party, including the Nuremberg judgments.

Another soldier, having been inducted despite a record of militant opposition to the war, is performing his duties but continues to voice his dissent within the Army. He is threatened with court-martial proceedings for "disloyal statements," "subversion," etc.

After twelve years of exemplary service, and while he is up for promotion to major, a captain in the Air Force seeks to resign his commission and says he will go to jail rather than serve in Vietnam. He would have no moral reservations about engaging in combat in a war in which the United States was fighting in its own defense.

A lieutenant is arrested by military police while carrying a picket sign protesting the war.

A captain-doctor is charged with promoting "disloyalty and disaffection among troops." He refuses to instruct aidmen in skills which ostensibly are to be used to help South Vietnamese villagers. He maintains that medical art is becoming "the handmaiden of political objectives."

The heavyweight champion of the world claims a clergyman's exemption, but makes it clear that whatever the outcome in the courts he will refuse to serve. Tom Wicker points out (The New York Times, May 2) that this is outright civil disobedience, challenging the right of the majority to rule, and illustrates "the ultimate danger to a government that outrages a powerful and passionate minority."

Emerging as the leader of a passionate and, one hopes, powerful minority, Martin Luther King encourages young men to oppose the draft.

James Reston, reporting in The New York Times (April 26) on a visit to Yale University, finds that Strobe Talbott, chairman of the Yale Daily News, and other generally conservative undergraduates, are trying to get university leaders elsewhere in the country to organize "in order to support a policy of nonreligious immunity from service in particular wars."

Other cases could be cited, but where do even these few leave General Westmoreland in his contention that the war is "a single all-pervading confrontation" in which not only the fate of the "free world" hangs in the balance but "the reputation and the very honor of our country is at stake"? The dissenters agree that the honor of our country is at stake, but they feel it is Westmoreland, et al., who are ruining it.

Those who remember two World Wars and Korea can see that a significant change has taken place. Opposition to past wars was motivated by such factors as affection for the old country, religious or pacifist scruples, and reluctance to leave the safety and comfort of civilian life. Never before has there been widespread opposition to a particular war on the ground (whether or not it is so expressed) that it did not meet St. Augustine's definition of a "just" war. Never before have citizens persistently and openly challenged the official explanations of why we must fight. Stemming from the invention of nuclear weapons, a general disillusionment with war as a means of settling disputes has set in; it is now reinforced by abhorrence of a war in which the world's foremost military power is devastating a small, distant country.

Why should any decent person fight in such a war, or counsel others to do so? Look (May 2) quotes one of the West German leaders of the neo-Nazi NPD as saying: "What right have you Americans to preach your brand of salvation to us? You are the Nazis of today." There are several holes in this indictment, but it comes from an expert source and contains a shocking component of truth. Called on to support an immoral war, many Americans refuse to respond with the traditional patriotic tropisms. May their numbers increase!

Death of the Widget

The death of the World Journal Tribune after a few months of life was entirely predictable. The most vital partner in this three-paper merger, the morning Herald Tribune, had expired in last year's 140-day newspaper strike, and what was born in its place was a mélange of three different papers that never jelled. The news content reflected the wire-service coverage, fast rewrite, no-bureau-of-its-own-anywhere skimpiness of the World-Telegram; the editorial page mirrored the antediluvian notions of the Journal-American; and about all that was discernible of the Herald Tribune, which had been an excellent journalistic product, were the columnists—Joseph Alsop, Walter Lippmann, Jimmy Breslin, Red Smith. It was a clutter without a purpose.

In the post-mortems, the unions have taken a beating for intransigence. A lot of this criticism is deserved. Union leaders acted on the conviction that the owners would pay any losses, however staggering. After negotiating a 21 per cent salary hike at the Daily News, Bertram A. Powers, head of the Printers' union, announced truculently that the owners of the World Journal Tribune could pay or close up. Already incurring losses of $700,000 a month, they met this ultimatum by closing up.

The union attitude doubtless brought death more quickly, but the plain fact is that the paper wasn't making it. When news content begins to sound like a throwaway, when there is no depth or probing or purpose, there is no dedicated readership; and, without that kind of vital commitment to a paper, advertising shies away. Perhaps this should not have been too surprising, for the Widget, as newsmen called the hybrid, seemed to show the face of the World-Telegram. And the World-Telegram, under the late Roy Howard, had worked out a fascinating formula for slow death.

It went like this: The ideal circulation is somewhere around 400,000; just keep that and you'll get maximum advertising revenue for minimum production costs. Deliberately, then, you discourage excess circulation, you cut out delivery routes in Harlem and similar unsavory neighborhoods, you refuse to give suburban dealers all the papers they can sell, and you concentrate on developing a "quality" readership to lure those advertisements from Lord & Taylor's and Macy's. This is a business-formula newspaper, and it seems very logical on paper. The trouble with it is that it won't work, because a newspaper isn't a commodity like a pound of cheese.

The history of the World-Telegram operation tells the story. After the merger of the Telegram and the World, circulation zoomed over 600,000, was frittered away to less than 400,000—and in 1950, the Sun was bought. Again a circulation of more than 600,000 dried up until the danger point was reached and the transfusion of another merger was needed. Internally, these periods of decay and decline were traumatic. As the downhill slide became dangerous, the formula was unvarying: "tighten up" the news content, reducing the ratio of news to advertising; "tighten up" the news staff by reducing it in numbers and quality—and at the same time raise circulation prices. Virtually the same formula had been tried when the old World began to fail; it didn't work then, and hasn't worked since. All that happens is that you produce less and less of a newspaper, more and more of a throwaway, and advertisers flee.

The same telltale signs of panicked retrenchment had been perceptible in the Widget. Even before the abrupt announcement that the paper was folding, there had been firings of personnel, economy cutbacks, deadly tightening and scrimping all along the line. John Hay Whitney, who had gambled millions and made the Herald Tribune a joy to read (but unfortunately in the wrong field where the Times and the Daily News had sewed up the revenue), might have been able to turn the World Journal Tribune into a respected and profitable organ—a paper with a goal beyond maintaining "quality" circulation for department store ads. But Whitney's voice did not dominate in the new organization, and the wide-open opportunity in the New York afternoon field, abandoned now to the Post, was never seized.

In retrospect, it seems that the World Journal Tribune's best chance lay in roaring out of the gate, challenging the world. These are times of ferment. Even the police admit that 125,000 marchers turned out in New York's massive peace demonstration, and most other estimates put the figure around at least 300,000. Those who support silently are probably more numerous than those who commit themselves to march. Could the Widget have made itself the champion of the peace movement? Or could it have given expression to the problems and needs of the burgeoning Negro and Puerto Rican communities, now that so much of the old "quality" readership has gone off to the suburbs? To ask such questions is hardly hindsight. The hybrid, if it was to live down the name of Widget, had to establish its own individuality; it had to do something. It didn't. And it died with hardly a whimper.

FRED J. COOK

Bugging the Press

Critics of the New York Times women's page say it "gets too much space, and they particularly oppose the publication of lengthy stories by Charlotte Curtis, a 5-foot, fast-stepping blonde, describing the activities of wealthy wastrels from Palm Beach to New York, at a time when most of America is moving toward the goals of a more egalitarian society." ("The Kingdoms, The Powers, and the Glories of The New York Times" by Gay Talese, Esquire, November, 1966.)

"Mrs. Daniel Moran, the former Gregg Sherwood Dodge, decided the orange and white basketball court that passes for her loggia was too small for the two Vizla dogs she keeps in the house, so she had the room rebuilt last fall to accommodate them. 'I had the tile floor put in because the dogs like to lie on something cool,' she said." (A dispatch from Palm Beach by Charlotte Curtis, The New York Times, March 2, 1967.)

CONSTANTINE POULOS

TROUBLE IN EGYPT

VERN L. BULLOUGH

Mr. Bullough is a historian who, during a sabbatical leave from San Fernando Valley State College (California), has been studying this year on a Fulbright fellowship in Egypt.

The army colonels, including Gamal Abdel Nasser, who ousted King Farouk on July 26, 1952, had a rather naive understanding of the nature and effect of revolutions. They believed that the only thing preventing Egypt from becoming a thriving and successful country was the corruption of the Farouk regime, which in turn gave control of the country to foreign imperialists and permitted domestic exploitation. Today, some fifteen years after the revolution, they begin to realize that for all the very real progress, Egypt has still not advanced very far.

At first, the economic effects of the revolution were impressive. In its first decade the gross national product rose in real terms at the fairly consistent rate of 6 per cent a year, after almost fifty years of stagnation. Moreover, this growth spread to the lowest reaches of society. The fellahin is probably better off today than he has ever been, unemployment has dropped, social services have been expanded, housing for the urban poor erected, and the beggar has almost disappeared from the streets. Nevertheless, the ordinary Egyptian still lives at a very substandard level and economic growth has fallen to less than 3 per cent. It will probably drop still lower this year, making further improvement most difficult.

The greatest political achievement of the revolution was the nationalization of the Suez Canal at the end of 1956, an act which made President Nasser a hero to the Egyptians as well as to most people of the Near East. This was followed by a real breakthrough in Near Eastern politics with the union of Syria and Egypt into the United Arab Republic and the overthrow of the monarchy in Iraq. Since that time, however, the union with Syria has foundered, Egypt has become involved in a Vietnamese type of war in Yemen, Nasser has supported dissident groups in Jordan and Aden, and the Egyptian leader has become an object of fear to many other Arab leaders who believe that he intends to become the dominant figure in a united and revolutionized Arab world.

Internally, while Nasser is still revered as few rulers are or have been in modern times, his power base is still the army. Thus far the revolutionary junta has been unable to build a successful political party dedicated to Socialist reform. The revolution is planned, directed and administered from the top (the army) and there is a decided lack of dedicated party members of the type which have emerged in other revolutionary situations.

The difficulty that Nasser now faces is that all the easy tasks have been done; those remaining are the painful ones that can be carried out only at the cost of considerable antagonism within the country. In a sense, Egypt presents a case study in the difficulties underdeveloped countries experience when they try to overcome their past. Much of the early success of the revolution was at the expense of minorities (Greek, Armenian, Jewish, Italian, Belgian) who were in no position to protest because they were aliens, or at the expense of "imperialist" foreign groups (particularly the English and French). Whenever foreigners left, their places were taken by Egyptian nationals. And the Egyptian opponents of the revolution had so lost contact with their country that their only recourse was to flee.

In its early days, everything seemed to go right for the revolution. When Nasser suffered a setback, as he did in John Foster Dulles' nastily abrupt refusal to build the High Dam at Aswan, he was lucky enough to interest the Soviets in the project. When Israel attacked Egypt, the weakness of Nasser's military machine was obscured by French and English intervention, which allowed the Egyptian army to appear as heroic defenders against the old imperialists.

Various Western powers, either relieved by the departure of the corrupt Farouk or eager to establish their influence in Egypt, also gave aid in the first stages of the revolution. It is not widely recognized by Egyptians (or by outsiders) that much of the financial success in the early years came from the fact that Egypt managed to obtain more foreign aid per head than any other developing nation (except Formosa and South Korea). While American aid has been curtailed drastically in the last few years, the United States has given about $1.5 billion to the country since 1952. The decline in American aid was at first offset by an increase from Russia, which now has almost equaled the American contribution. Other Soviet bloc countries also contributed as did Western ones, particularly Germany and Italy. Even the Red Chinese chipped in.

This political miracle of aid is now coming to an end and the consequences are already felt. From increasing economic difficulties, Egypt has been forced to renegotiate for deferred payment on $100 million worth of debt to England, France and Italy. The International Monetary Fund, to which Egypt is also heavily in debt, has urged a devaluation of currency and a drastic cut-back in government spending. Since Nasser has resisted these recommendations, the fund is now making still another survey, in the hope of finding some solution to the present crisis. But drastic attempts to cut down the Egyptian deficit in the past year have already created havoc. Some government factories have slowed to 50 to 70 per cent of capacity from lack of money for imported components and parts; a much needed hospital has delayed opening for more than a year because it cannot buy equipment. On the civilian market, replacement parts are almost unobtainable.

To maintain its earlier growth rate Egypt would need $150 million a year in hard currency for investment—an amount which now seems impossible to raise except from outside sources. The great Egyptian dollar earners, the cotton crop and the Suez Canal, seem to be almost at maximum earning capacity. While many Western companies would undoubtedly be willing to undertake large investment programs, they would do so only if they received considerable cooperation from the government. Ford (and its subsidiary Philco), Coca-Cola and other companies that have in the past had fairly good relations with the Egyptians, found themselves banned because they made contacts with Israel. Fiat, which had an assembly plant in Egypt, closed down more than a year ago because of continued government interference. Even when foreign companies meet all the Egyptian terms for investment, there is no real guarantee that the government will follow through on its agreements.

Gamal Abdel Nasser

The greatest obstacle to further development, however, is the rapid expansion in population, now estimated at about 30 million people. Since the annual increase is close to 3 per cent (the theoretical maximum is 4), about 800,000 new citizens are added each year. That rapid increase is making the 6 million acres of arable land in Egypt the most densely populated in the world. Even the fabled richness of the Nile valley soil, which yields three crops a year, cannot support that many people. If medical techniques (still quite backward but better than most underdeveloped countries) continue to improve, Egypt's problems will only get worse.

Much of the present population problem is the fault of the revolutionary junta itself, which torpedoed earlier birth control efforts. Nasser and his fellow colonels at first quite simply believed that all of Egypt's difficulties were due to foreign imperialists and that their socialism (inadequate as it is) would bring an end to any presumed population problem. The 1960 census finally drove home to them that even with the land opened up by the High Dam they would be able in future to feed proportionately fewer of their population than when the dam was started. But the Egyptian Government has still not mounted an effective population control program.

There is also a danger that the revolution will soon lose the more or less passive support of the professional and intellectual groups. While members of this class suffered from the revolution, they were in part compensated by being sent abroad on special missions to other Arab, Islamic, or African countries, where they received high salaries and perquisites. After serving missions of one, two or three years, they were allowed to return with their accumulated savings, their cars and other items difficult to obtain. They gave loyalty to the regime so that they might go forth again. Since Egypt, compared to most other underdeveloped countries, had a large number of trained people, this export of talent made the revolution popular both at home and abroad.

Such excursions are now becoming less frequent, in part because the total number of professionals has been steadily growing, but also because Egypt's relations with many of the other Arab and Islamic governments have deteriorated. The mounting discontent among professional groups was one reason for the growth of the Muslim Brotherhood, an almost reactionary fundamentalist group. To counter this threat, Nasser had to emphasize the Islamic nature of his reform program, both to the detriment of the Copts (Egyptian Christians) and at the expense of some long overdue religious reforms (such as the Ramadan month of inactivity).

Education has often been seen as a cure-all for the problems of underdeveloped areas. The Egyptian revolution promised every Egyptian child the opportunity for an education. While this promise is still a long way from being realized, enough has been accomplished to cause tremendous unforeseen difficulties. What does an underdeveloped country do with all its educated people? This question has become especially acute at the college level, since all college graduates are guaranteed jobs. As it is next to impossible to flunk out students permanently, a flood of college graduates, many of them poorly qualified and without specific training, pours into an overcrowded job market. The solution that has been adopted is to give the graduates jobs in the government, and this has resulted in tremendous overstaffing. A visiting economist recently estimated that in one important government office some sixty-five of the 700 senior employees were capable of doing a first-rate job; the rest were deadwood. The government has lowered the retirement age for some jobs to 55, but still the number of job holders piles up at all levels of society, and new varieties of red tape are continually devised to occupy the surplus bureaucrats.

One obvious step to recover the momentum of the revolution would be to put less emphasis on the military and more on industrial and agricultural development. Egypt has the largest and best equipped army in the Arab world, some 200,000 to 400,000 men; it costs about one-third of the annual expenditures of the Egyptian Government, approximately $650 million a year. The justification for the army is the continued existence of Israel, although the Egyptians quite obviously use their army in Yemen and elsewhere. As arms expense mounts, there is real danger that in order to justify the large army, and at the same time obscure domestic difficulties, Nasser might well attack Israel. A first-class military clash with Israel would, according to some experts, ease Nasser off the domestic hook. Whether he won, or whether great-power opposition forced him to retreat, he would come through stronger than ever.

If the Egyptian army can be kept under control, the war in Yemen brought to an end, and some tight financing applied to internal problems, Egypt has a real chance of developing in the next ten years into a major neutralist presence on the world scene. In the long run, Egypt has at least two major potential sources of income, oil and tourism, which might save it, both of which could be implemented by the hydroelectric power from the Aswan Dam. Egyptian oil fields in the Red Sea are beginning to produce in quantity and might bring $50 million a year in revenues by the end of 1968, although much of this will be used to replace oil formerly imported into Egypt. More important are the possible oil deposits in the western desert, next to Libya, which might make Egypt a major oil-producing country. Egypt is also a tourist magnet, offering to the historically minded almost unparalleled opportunities for exploration and, for those bent on recreation, almost everything but winter sports. There are also the attractions of the mysterious Near East, and a population where almost anyone can speak at least pidgin English or French. If Egypt's relations with Jordan improve, there is real chance for an Athens, Cairo, Jerusalem tourist circuit to rival Paris and Rome.

However, the road ahead in the next ten years will be difficult. There is a chance that Nasserism will survive by becoming more totalitarian than it now is, withdrawn from the world, supported by an almost paranoid fear of the outside, and that the benefits of the revolution so far achieved will be more and more restricted to the new military ruling class. The other danger is that the country might fall prey to internal dissension; this could lead to chaos that would not easily be overcome. If in spite of these difficulties Egypt manages to keep developing there might be real hope for the rest of the underdeveloped world. If one underdeveloped country suffering from a colonial hangover can make it on the world scene, others might find the resolve and resources to do likewise. If the internal achievements of the Nasser revolution, incomplete as they are, can be extended, copied and adapted elsewhere, there may yet be a future for the masses of Africa and Asia. The world as a whole has a lot to gain if Nasser achieves his Arab third way through peaceful means.

BATTLE LINE OF WELFARE

THE HUNGRY CAN'T WAIT

CHARLES I. SCHOTTLAND

Mr. Schottland is dean of The Florence Heller Graduate School for Advanced Studies in Social Welfare, Brandeis University. He was United States Commissioner of Social Security, 1954 to 1959.

A great deal of optimism was being expressed a year ago with reference to the nation's poor. Some liberals and civil rights leaders were enthusiastic about those programs of the Office of Economic Opportunity (OEO) that aim to provide real opportunity for poor and disadvantaged groups to pull themselves up by the boot straps. Economists and social welfare workers were pleased by the success of their long efforts to call attention to the plight of the invisible poor in our midst. Large numbers of people felt that we were on the right track, even though existing programs may have had shortcomings and were generally inadequate to make a deep dent in the problem.

Recent events have dampened this initial enthusiasm. The combination of attacks by some members of Congress on the high cost of OEO programs, the criticism of liberals on the minuscule efforts and expenditures, the curtailment of Great Society programs because of the demands of Vietnam, the recent elections which brought severe critics of OEO and other Great Society programs into public office—these and related events cause increasing concern among those who thought that at least a beginning was being made toward abolition of poverty. Disenchantment with the prospects of a vigorous and effective anti-poverty program has served to stimulate discussion of a "guaranteed minimum income." More and more persons are becoming convinced that the United States has reached an economic development which makes it both feasible and relatively easy to do away with poverty entirely through some such sweeping legislation.

But during the past two years, while discussions of a guaranteed minimum income and anti-poverty programs occupied stage center, little attention was given to the "poorest of the poor." These are the more than 8 million persons on the public relief rolls of state and local welfare departments (not to mention the uncounted others who are eligible for public relief, but who, for one reason or another, do not appear on the rolls; see Cloward and Piven, "The Birth of a Movement": The Nation, May 8). They receive funds for food, clothing and shelter, but in most cases, the funds are not enough to support health and decency. The federal government provides the majority of the funds used for public assistance. Thus, on the one hand, the federal government attempts to assist persons out of their distress and up from poverty through various anti-poverty programs, while, on the other, it participates with the states in continuing to maintain 8 million public assistance recipients in conditions of distress and in poverty.

A number of sound and far-reaching proposals are occupying the intellectual and political arenas. The previously mentioned guaranteed minimum income, which would have been considered radical even three or four years ago, has been proposed by Sargent Shriver and by the National Commission on Technology, Automation and Economic Progress of the Department of Labor, which included representatives of big business. But while we discuss and debate macro-economic measures to solve the problem of poverty and to guarantee every American a decent standard of living, we tend to forget that millions of poor must be fed, clothed and housed now. There is an unfortunate tendency among some federal officials to depreciate "handout" programs and to emphasize training, community action and more "constructive" approaches. When Congress pays attention to the problem, it is frequently to deplore rising costs, "chiselers," illegitimacy and other problems which frustrate alleged Congressional desires to do something more "constructive."

Public assistance programs represent the recognition by the American people, the Congress, the state legislatures and the executive branches of federal, state and local governments that an affluent society such as the United States cannot permit people to suffer because they lack income through no fault of their own. Some are too old or too young or too disabled to work. Others suffer from handicaps which make it impossible for them to get even a sustaining share of our increasing standard of living and our continued rise in personal income. We recognize a responsibility for such as these. Nevertheless, we can hardly echo the statement made in an official British document that "No man, woman, or child in Britain need for any reason fall below a minimum standard of life." Many of the 8 million persons on relief in the United States do fall below any standard for decency which reasonable people would be willing to set.

To understand how this situation can exist in the United States today, it is necessary to understand how our public relief programs operate. The American colonies inherited the English Poor Laws which established the principle of governmental responsibility for the support of the poor. Associated with this basic principle were three established policies: (1) local responsibility; (2) responsibility of relatives, and (3) residence laws which limited eligibility to persons who were long-time members of the community. Under this Poor Law philosophy, it was the local community in the United States that established departments of charities, and it gave relief in kind (i.e., groceries, clothing, medical care). Generally, the aid was so meager that reports on local practices prior to 1936 reveal that cruel treatment and shameful hardships were the lot of those "on the county."

Adoption of the Social Security Act in 1935 created a change. The average citizen thinks of the Social Security Act as establishing unemployment insurance, old-age, survivors and disability insurance, and now Medicare. But the Act also established a grant-in-aid program whereby the federal government assigns funds to the states on a matching basis for relief of the needy. A matching formula, weighted at present in favor of low-income states, results in the federal government's paying from 40 to 80 per cent of the total cost. Under this arrangement states have established federal-state programs of Old Age Assistance for the needy over 65; Aid to the Blind; Aid to the Permanently and Totally Disabled; Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC); Medical assistance for medically indigent (MEDICAID).

In addition, states and/or local communities have established a program of "General Assistance" for needy persons who do not meet the eligibility requirements of the federal categories. Of the 8 million on relief, about 8 per cent receive General Assistance.

All of these programs are infinitely superior to those existing prior to the Social Security Act. Federal laws and regulations require that assistance be granted in cash; that recipients have the right to appeal a denial of assistance; that practices must be uniform throughout the state, and that states must provide services to assist in rehabilitation, uniting of families, and a variety of other services in order to qualify for federal reimbursement of 75 per cent of state and local administration costs.

But although the federal government established numerous excellent regulations for the federal-state programs, the most important aspect of the program—the amount of money to be paid to relief recipients—was left for state determination. As a result, states vary in their payments from liberal amounts, which are yet barely enough to support people decently, to payments which are too low to purchase the minimum necessities.

The average payment on Old Age Assistance in the United States is less than $75 per month, and the average payment per recipient in the AFDC program is approximately $35 per month. These amounts must take care of rent, food, clothing, utilities, transportation and all other needs of life. When one realizes that many of the recipients of public assistance have little or no other income, the seriousness of the problem can be appreciated.

Old Age Assistance payments reflect a more generous and liberal attitude than payments to recipients of AFDC. Nevertheless, average monthly Old Age Assistance payments in August, 1966, ranged from a high of $121.34 in New Hampshire to a low of $39.93 in Mississippi. Even the so-called more affluent states such as Delaware, Arizona, Idaho, Maine, Pennsylvania and Utah, fell below the national average of $74.02. The spread of payments to those receiving AFDC is even greater. The average monthly payment per recipient in the United States in August, 1966, was $35.38, with a high of $51 and a low of $7.90. Again, some of the affluent states fell substantially below the national average.

About 67 per cent of the 3 million children, receiving care under the AFDC program, live in families where the father is absent. More than 2 million of the children are under 13 years of age, and the median age is 8. These 3 million children are growing up in our rich country, supported by government programs, at a level which threatens their health and almost certainly deprives them of proper growth and development.

How can anyone justify a resident of, say, Massachusetts paying federal income taxes to be utilized for a grant-in-aid program of public assistance which results in undernourishment, bad housing and poor medical care for recipients of public assistance in other states? Inadequate programs frequently affect the residents of Massachusetts as directly as they do the residents of the state in which the low standards are applied. And even in Massachusetts, which has one of the most liberal public assistance programs, the amounts available to "reliefers" are barely enough to keep body and soul together, and fall below the accepted poverty line.

There is one simple answer to this problem. Both from a practical and a humanitarian point of view, the appropriate solution is compulsory federal standards. Levels of public assistance should be set by the federal government to guarantee recipients sufficient income to purchase the basic food, clothing and shelter vital for decent living and health. No state should be permitted to fall below the minimum standards.

Many persons, more interested in political structure than in people, will raise the specter of States' rights and claim that the state is empowered to keep many of its people at a starvation level if it so wishes. Still others will complain that that is an unfair and cruel way to put the issue and will declare that each state is obliged to establish public assistance programs consistent with its own financial resources. One vital fact is being ignored. The United States has the resources to provide a decent standard of living for all of its citizens. A mechanism to secure that standard for those who cannot achieve it for themselves in the market place has been developed. It is a combination of social insurance and public assistance. A federal standard that will be binding upon all states accepting federal funds is needed in the public assistance arena.

This analysis of the situation is neither radical, revolutionary nor impractical. Federal specifications exist for a variety of grants. States must adhere to standards when they use federal funds for highways. If states request assistance for hospitals under the Hill-Burton Act, they must meet specific qualifications. Public health agencies receiving funds for maternal and child health and crippled children programs must follow federal guidelines. These are only a few of the agencies and programs which insist upon minimum federal standards. Why shouldn't similar federal standards be established for public assistance? State legislatures no longer determine who shall vote; why should they determine who shall eat?

Theoretically, the standards already exist. Regulations of the Welfare Administration of the United States Department of Health, Education and Welfare spell out the goals of public assistance and list the items which should be included in individual and family budgets under the various public assistance titles of the Social Security Act. What is needed now is a specification of these items in terms of dollars. And a floor must be set below which no state may fall. It should be at least as high as the current demarcation line of $3,000 for a family of four.

Major new programs or fantastic expenditures of public funds are not being requested here. Federal standards for reasonable support of the needy will be relatively inexpensive, especially when compared with the tremendous expenditures now involved in social security, anti-poverty and a host of related programs.

In the past six years, I have talked with many persons on public assistance. I have interviewed them in the ghettos of Harlem in New York and of Roxbury in Boston. In these two states, public assistance standards are relatively high, although still too low. I have also talked to such persons in Texas, Maryland and West Virginia, states where the standards are much lower. It does not take a student of the problem to see what happens when persons do not have enough money to keep body and soul together.

We simply cannot help people out of their poverty, make them self-sufficient and self-respecting, as long as their stomachs are empty. There are states today that have excellent medical programs for public assistance recipients but such low cash grants that the inevitable result is a large incidence of malnutrition—which of course immediately qualifies the starving person for excellent medical care.

The imposition of a federal standard will not solve the problems overnight, but it will be a step in that direction. It will show that as a nation we do care how the 8 million fare on public assistance, that we do want to establish in America a minimum way of life below which no one shall fall.

THE SUPERSONIC TRANSPORT

BILLION-DOLLAR DILEMMA

KARL M. RUPPENTHAL

This is the first of a series of three articles on the supersonic transport. Succeeding articles will deal with several of the technical problems involved in the design, manufacture and operation of the aircraft, and with some broad social and economic problems. Mr. Ruppenthal has been a contributor to The Nation for several years. An active airline pilot for twenty-five years, and an attorney, he is director of the Transportation Management Program at Stanford University.

With a stroke of the pen in 1963, Juan Trippe declared war on the Boeing 707, the Douglas DC-8, and all other subsonic transports that now fill the air. Placing an order for six Concorde, the chairman of the board of Pan American World Airways relit the fuse on a bomb that had been quiescent since an Anglo-French combination, with the financial backing of their respective governments, announced that they would develop a plane to fly at Mach 2—or twice the speed of sound and appreciably more than twice the speed of presently operating commercial jets.

The first important reaction to Trippe's decision came from the President of the United States. Just one week after Pan American announced the placing of its order, John F. Kennedy authorized a major study of the supersonic transport (SST). And from this there followed a series of revolutionary events, the full effect of which will not be felt for years to come.

The SST will present all of the airlines with gigantic economic problems. In some cases the problems will be so severe that the airlines will forget their pride, together with their touted free-enterprise philosophy, and ask unabashedly for government subsidy. Other airlines will reluctantly merge or sell out; still others may simply go broke.

The revolution will force the Federal Aviation Agency to make new expenditures aggregating hundreds of millions of dollars, and the sheer volume of money required will increase the federal role in all phases of aviation. The government will be called upon to pay for most of the research and development required for the SST itself. It will also be required to develop and install new and complex navigation systems. It will be called upon to provide funds for new airports, new terminal facilities and for new safety devices. It may be asked to train pilots, to control traffic, to underwrite insurance, and to finance dozens of other ancillary projects. So great will be the demand for federal funds, and so great the government participation in all aspects of the supersonic project, that the aviation industry as a whole will need to develop some remarkable corporate agility if any aspect of private enterprise whatsoever is to be maintained.

The supersonic revolution will have an important impact on the United States in a host of other ways. It will add measurably to the balance of payments controversy; it will be a disquieting influence on living patterns; it will become the center of another controversy with Britain, France and many of the other nations of the world. It may be an important factor in determining whether there shall be continuing boom, widespread land speculation or large-scale unemployment in Los Angeles, Seattle and Hartford. Although the Federal Aviation Agency has indicated that Boeing will receive the prime contract for the air frame, and General Electric will build the engines, component parts will be made by subcontractors. Boeing's decision to subcontract certain systems and components will depend, in part, on its own ability to produce them. If the SST timetable indicates urgency, Boeing will be forced to subcontract large systems because of the shortage of labor and engineering talent in the Seattle area.

Should Johnson assign the program an urgent priority, he might well give Ronald Reagan the biggest boost he could possibly get. Boeing's subcontracting could add new jobs to an already swollen economy in Southern California. It could stimulate the real estate market, bringing higher prices, additional commissions and more sales. Reagan could claim credit for the increased level of business in the state, leaving post-boom problems for another administration to face.

The pending supersonic step in the evolution of aircraft is so large that physicists would term it a quantum jump. This leap through the sound barrier will shatter much of the aircraft industry, several of the airlines and the peace and quiet of much of the world.

Always before in the progress of aviation, measurable alternatives have been available to the airline industry. When the DC-3 was obsolescent, the manufacturers and the airline industry could make rational decisions concerning the planes that were proposed. A rather simple, basic issue was involved: would the airlines be justified in buying planes that were larger, faster and more productive? Was there a reasonable prospect that increased capital expenditures could be amortized through additional speed, additional lift and related economies? Could the greater capacity be absorbed? What new-plane problems could be anticipated, and what would be the probable cost of their solution? In short, the question was resolved by balancing the costs of designing, building and operating a projected new plane against the revenues that could reasonably be anticipated from improvements in comfort, economy and speed.

Thus the decision to graduate from the DC-3 to the DC-4 was relatively easy to make. While the later plane required a larger capital investment for each ship purchased, it offered considerably lower seat-mile costs. It was a more efficient plane. The same basic factors operated in the decision to drop the DC-4 in favor of the faster, more efficient DC-6 (and its competing plane, the Lockheed Constellation).

In the pre-jet days, the relationship between speed and initial cost was almost linear. Thus an airline could decide whether to increase its investment in aircraft, say, 10 per cent, in order to achieve a 5 per cent increase in speed. But when we enter the supersonic age, the old cost-speed equation will no longer apply. It will become entangled in a variety of complex physical laws and the airline industry will have much more difficult choices to make.

Basic to the problem is the fact that present jets now cruise at speeds slightly less than the speed of sound—usually in the range between Mach .80 and Mach .86. Because of the nature of the turbulence (and other phenomena) associated with flying at and near the speed of Mach 1, it is not practical to think in terms of small increases in speed. And since it is similarly impractical to think in terms of Mach 1.2 or Mach 1.5, the only real question is whether the next generation of jets should cruise at speeds on the order of Mach 2 or Mach 3—that is, at twice or three times the speed of sound.

In 1963 when it was first seriously proposed that the United States taxpayers might underwrite the cost of developing a supersonic transport, it was often stated that the development cost of the aircraft would approximate $1 billion. After some behind-the-scenes fencing, the SST project was taken from the Federal Aviation Agency and placed in the hands of the Defense Department. Subsequent meetings of the SST study committee were held in secret, and all that transpired is not a matter of public record. However, James P. Mitchell, vice president of the Chase Manhattan Bank, who had served on an earlier study committee, indicated in 1964 that the $1 billion research and development figure was about right. Another member of that committee was reported in The New York Times as saying that the development cost would be from $600 million to $1.2 billion.

In those days, spokesmen for the Kennedy administration suggested that the federal government might be willing to finance 75 per cent of the project, but that notion brought forth anguished cries from the aircraft manufacturers. They pointed out that if the industry were to invest all of its profits for a decade, it would still be unable to come up with that amount of cash. There was some public debate and a good bit of private maneuvering. Eventually the government proposed that the taxpayer finance 90 per cent of the preliminary costs (in practice, it would come to higher than this, since the aircraft industry, as long as it was making a profit in other areas, could deduct its 10 per cent share of the R&D costs from gross taxable income). The public was assured at the same time that the SST was certain to be a sound investment and that their tax money would be returned to them—with handsome interest to boot.

Evidently the financial community is not so sure. Although many investors eagerly seek situations in which a good bit of risk is coupled with quite high returns, no investment banker has yet suggested forming a consortium for the private financing of the supersonic plane. Indeed, one reputable investment banker has stated that without the underpinning of a government guarantee, such securities would have virtually no investment standing.

That judgment is supported by the fact that though development costs of earlier planes were minuscule compared with estimates for the SST, Lockheed was reported to have lost some $90 million on its executive jet, the Jet Star, in 1966 alone. It lost some $50 million on the Electra, although it is a very efficient craft and 188 of them were sold. And General Dynamics lost some $400 million on its 880s and 990s—the only commercial jets that company has yet produced.

Meanwhile the estimate for SST research and development costs has increased. The $1 billion figure most commonly quoted in 1963 (when the aircraft manufacturers indicated that they could not possibly finance 25 per cent of the costs) was soon doubled. In January, 1967, both The Wall Street Journal and the Transportation Association of America were talking of $4.5 billion. The magnitude of this figure can be appreciated when one considers that it is twice the New York Stock Exchange value of all the shares of Lockheed and Boeing combined. It is eighty times the highest net profit ever reported by any airline in a single year, and something like twenty times Boeing's total corporate debt.

While $2 billion or $3 billion or $4 billion may cover the research and development costs of the project, it will not provide the airlines with planes. And some financial analysts question whether even the $4 billion R&D figure will really be enough. Government-financed projects are notorious for exceeding their estimates, and projects that venture into new and relatively unknown areas are subject to wider errors of estimate than are projects in more traveled fields.

But suppose, to be very optimistic, that the research and development costs of the supersonic transport can be held to about $2 billion, as some of its proponents now believe. Under one system of accounting it might be presumed that such costs should be spread over the total time span in which this particular plane may be produced —say the next ten years. That would mean that each supersonic transport built in the United States over the next decade would be charged with a portion of the costs of research and development. If, for instance, only 100 such transports were built, each of them would be charged with $20 million in research costs, in addition to the cost of manufacturing each plane. If 1,000 planes could be sold, the R&D costs assigned to each plane would be but $2 million. This means that to set a realistic price on the planes, one must know not only the probable cost of manufacture and the total cost of research and development but also the number of planes likely to be sold.

There is considerable variation of opinion about the potential market. One aircraft executive estimated that some 900 SSTs could be sold by 1985, but other estimates are much more pessimistic. An important—and as yet undecided—factor is whether or not supersonic flights will be permitted over land. If they are restricted to over-water routes, the market for the plane will be sharply reduced. Another aircraft executive indicated on a C.B.S. broadcast that if the plane were restricted to over-water routes, the market would be reduced to some 585 craft. That would almost double the amount of research and development costs to be allocated to each plane and, of course, there is no guarantee that even this estimate of the market is correct.

It is worth noting that the aircraft industry has on occasion been too enthusiastic in its sales forecasts and too conservative in its cost estimates. Probably the most spectacular example of this wishful tendency was demonstrated by General Dynamics. According to an article in Fortune, the company produced its 880 jets in the face of its own studies indicating that the market was too small to return a profit. The result was a staggering loss, a change of management and near bankruptcy.

Even the majestic Douglas Aircraft Company, once undisputed world leader in the field of transport aircraft, has had its problems. Although Douglas had a respectable backlog of orders for its DC-8 and DC-9 jets, the company recently faced severe financial problems, and there were alarming indications that it might be unable to make good on its delivery commitments to the armed forces without a substantial infusion of government money. For a time it appeared that it might be necessary for the government, in effect, to co-sign Douglas' note at the bank. Only the rescue operations performed by McDonnell Aircraft made that government guarantee unnecessary.

But that crisis made an effective point: once the government has invested billions of taxpayers' money in a given project, it is not likely to pull out merely because preliminary cost estimates were too low. Someone in Congress will always raise the cry that since so much money already has been invested, additional funds must be spent.

It is true that SST advocates forecast that the taxpayers will recover the funds invested on the research and development of the supersonic transport. Some propose that these costs be charged directly against the planes, the tag to be set accordingly. Others feel that since the cost of manufacture will in itself be exceedingly high, it might not be prudent to increase the selling price of each aircraft by such a substantial amount. Too high a price would surely shrink the total market for the planes and thus make them even more difficult to sell. These people would prefer that the government recover its research and development expenditures through a monthly royalty charged against the operations of the planes.

But slice it as you will, there is no doubt that the taxpayers would bear the financial risks of the project. They will be called upon to pick up the tab if the market estimates are overly optimistic, if an airline is unable to make its royalty payments, or if the aircraft manufacturer falls upon evil days. That is the history of government guarantees in almost every field of endeavor.

While a monthly royalty device for recouping the taxpayers' investment has certain appeal (after all, much of the U.S. economy is based on the idea of buy now, pay later), it raises the problem of the value of money itself. If the taxpayers invest a dollar in a project today, it cannot be fairly said that they have made a sound investment if but a single dollar is returned to them a decade hence. If that same dollar were deposited in a reputable savings and loan association, it would double in a decade. And if it were prudently invested in the electronics industry, the chemical industry—or, indeed, in airline stocks—there is a high probability that its value would be a good bit more.

Their economic studies challenged by a number of economists (allegedly including some from the Bureau of the Budget), most SST proponents will no longer say precisely how the taxpayers will be repaid. Recent statements indicate that the repayment may not be in dollars channeled directly from the project into the treasury, but that much of the repayment may come indirectly because the project will stimulate employment, and increased employment will increase the flow of income tax dollars.

Of course this economic argument is not new. It was made by Lord Keynes a good many years ago when he pointed out that government spending could stimulate economic activity. The real question to be decided is which vehicles for government spending are most efficient in this respect, and there is reason to believe that other government-financed projects could be used at least equally well to stimulate economic activity and thus the flow of tax dollars.

The magnitude of the cost of the SST program comes into better perspective when one considers costs from the viewpoint of the carriers. Just twenty-five years ago an airline could buy a DC-3 for $125,000; today, a single spare engine for a subsonic jet costs at least twice that amount. With the advent of the jet age less than a decade ago, the airlines fell under severe financial pressure. So great were the problems surrounding the introduction of the jets that it was not at all certain that several of the major airlines could afford the price. Virtually every one of the major European carriers incurred substantial losses. In more than one instance the prospect of recovering the losses was so slim that they were simply written off by the government that was the principal (or sole) stockholder in the line.

In the United States the financial picture was so bleak that four major airlines—American, Eastern, Pan American and TWA—publicly announced merger plans. Almost every other U.S. airline made serious merger studies, although many of these activities were never revealed to the press. It was not until the general level of business activity rose to new heights that the U.S. airlines moved out of real danger. Had the business boom been delayed for another year or two, several airlines would have ceased to exist—at least in their present form.

The stakes will be much higher, and the ante far greater, when the airlines begin to play the supersonic game. At the present time it is estimated that a single supersonic plane may cost on the order of $45 million. This is just a little less than the entire after-tax profits that any airline has ever reported in its most profitable year. Of course airline revenues have been increasing at a rapid rate and are still rising. But even if the present growth rate continues, gigantic problems must be surmounted before an airline can equip itself with a fleet of supersonic transports. Any major U.S. airline will have to dedicate its entire net profits for at least a decade to the purchase of supersonic transports, unless profit margins can be improved, the tax burden reduced, or substantial funds made available from other sources. If total airline earnings are dedicated to SST purchases, the stockholders may become restive and complain that they have been starved of dividends in order to provide the public with an exceedingly fast ride.

While the financing problems for the major airlines will be severe when the supersonic transports begin to arrive, they will seem trivial by comparison with what the smaller U.S. carriers will face. Consider an aggressive, highly profitable trunk line like Continental. Its growth rate has been spectacular, its profits increasing at a prodigious rate. But in the most profitable year in all its history, its after-tax profits were on the order of $10 million—about one-fourth the probable cost of a single supersonic transport.

Most of these smaller carriers compete with at least one of the Big Four over important route segments. If the big carriers do indeed operate supersonic transports over the highly competitive routes, the middle-sized subsonic carriers may well be left standing at the post. If the proponents of the SST are correct in their assumption that the public will flock to the faster planes, those lines that do not have an extensive route structure, or the requisite financial resources to purchase supersonic equipment, will have severe competitive problems the like of which they have not yet experienced.

For survival they may attempt to merge with other troubled carriers. Failing in that attempt, they may be swallowed up by the lines that have routes suitable for supersonic operations. If they do not merge and are not swallowed up, their financial situation may become so precarious that they will begin to exist on government subsidy, or simply turn up their toes and go bankrupt.

The local service carriers, too, may well be caught up in the blast of the supersonic jet. Consider the affluent passenger who alights in Seattle from his two-hour cross-country flight from New York. Will he be content to spend a like amount of time getting from Seattle to his destination airport near Pocatello, Boise or Spokane? And how will the local service carriers respond?

While all of the effects upon the airlines themselves cannot be forecast completely at this time, it is safe to predict that because of the sheer magnitude of the dollars involved, the advent of the supersonic transport will inevitably result in a much smaller number of airlines in the United States, and much greater concentration in the industry.

As for the aircraft manufacturers, the forecast is even more bleak. If the supersonic transport should be com-mercially successful, it may well drive from the skies the slower, subsonic jets—and their manufacturers. The result would be even greater attrition in the ranks of the commercial plane producers, whose death rate has already been substantial. Now gone from the ranks of commercial aircraft builders are such once familiar names as Martin and Convair (General Dynamics). Douglas has had its problems, and it is not at all certain that relatively affluent Lockheed will attempt to build another commercial plane.

This tendency toward concentration would certainly be increased with the advent of a supersonic transport that is successful in an economic sense. It could even be that but one or two large aircraft complexes would remain: the prime contractors who design and manufacture the aircraft together with their respective (client) subcontractors. If a completely successful supersonic transport is actually built, there may be little demand for competing, subsonic planes.

The utility of the supersonic transport is indeed a two-edged sword: if the plane is suitable for a relatively small number of airline routes and can operate only from a limited number of airports, it may be an economic disaster for the manufacturers and for the taxpayers who put up most of the money. On the other hand, if the manufacturers are able to come up with a versatile craft, capable of operating quietly and efficiently over a large number of airline routes, and able to satisfy the demands of a large portion of the traveling and shipping public, then its effect may be to destroy much of the value of presently operating subsonic aircraft and to create another set of problems for the airlines and for their financial backers who hold substantial mortgages on the aircraft that are presently flying.

SDS: PROTEST IS NOT ENOUGH

RICHARD BLUMENTHAL

Mr. Blumenthal, who graduates from Harvard this spring, has been editorial chairman of The Harvard Crimson and a reporter for The Washington Post.

Members of Students for a Democratic Society marched last month in the Spring Mobilization, and cheered faithfully when Stokely Carmichael denounced the "cruel and senseless" war in Vietnam. But they demonstrated without the high expectations and hopes of past protests. SDS did not participate in organizing the march, refused initially to endorse it, and finally came to support it only ten days before it was scheduled to occur. Both the mood of the marchers and the attitude of their organization reflected a significant shift of strategy within SDS.

In building a movement for radical social change, SDS is turning from the tactics of protest and confrontation—marches, pickets and sit-ins—to those of organization and resistance. Although the students will continue to utilize dramatic, "one-shot" incidents of protest to attract publicity and membership, they are shifting, as national vice president, Carl Davidson, puts it, "to dig in for the long haul, to become full-time, radical, sustained, relevant." Marches, says a Chicago SDSer, "are just not enough. They won't stop this war. More important, they won't stop the military-industrial complex, the powerful institutions that decide the fate of people in this country. . . . We must do more than marching."

The shift in tactics is an attempt to extend the organization's appeal to new constituencies beyond the campus. While SDS has always aimed at inspiring a "broad-based" movement, it is now consciously appealing to adults, particularly among both the middle and working classes, and planning to increase such activities in the future. In organizing these groups, SDS is endeavoring to develop an "ideology"—a more systematic theory of social change for the American power structure.

The new approach signifies the beginning of a third stage in the development of the New Left organization. At the beginning, following its break with the parent League for Industrial Democracy, SDS stressed community organizing among people excluded from the system; mainly Negroes and poor whites. Members opened a Community Union Project in Newark, financed by the United Auto Workers, and built similar Economic Research and Action projects (ERAP) in other cities. Since 1965, however, SDS has concentrated almost entirely on students, and its main issues have been the war in Vietnam, the draft and "student power." During this second stage, it has endeavored, primarily by protest and confrontation, to organize new chapters on campuses throughout the country.

The organization has grown in the past two years from 1,200 national members in thirty chapters to more than 6,000 in 227 chapters. There are now, in addition to these national members, about 30,000 chapter members, who participate in the activities of local groups but do not pay national dues. The organization employs a national staff of ten in Chicago, with nine traveling organizers (soon to be increased to thirty-nine) in the field. But most of the new chapters were organized by local student radicals without help from the parent organization. "They write us and say they've got this chapter and ask to be recognized," says national chapter correspondent, John Veneziale. "Sometimes they wait for months before contacting us—there are probably a lot we still don't know about." Membership is now growing most rapidly in smaller institutions, state teachers' colleges and junior colleges, particularly in the Midwest.

With the tactics of direct action—picketing, campus recruitment by war-oriented corporations or sitting-in against university social rules—SDS has appealed to a vague sense of alienation among students, without defining a radical ideology. Unlike the old Left, which spent much energy on theory and analysis, SDS has been purposely anti-ideological, even anti-intellectual. Members have tried, as national secretary, Greg Calvert, puts it, to "build a movement out of people's guts." Rejecting the dogmatism of the old Socialist and Communist parties, they have stretched their ideological tent to include anyone feeling the frustration and anomie of "dehumanizing" modern society.

Their evolving ideology, such as it is, focuses on the inability of the individual to make meaningful decisions in society. Individuals, according to the SDS analysis, are deprived of power over their own lives by a corporate elite which manipulates human beings economically and politically. The few who own the means of production, in alliance with the military, control all aspects of society. Their crass materialistic values reduce human beings to "consumers of things." This depersonalization, combined with the separation of most people from power, produces a sense of apathy and resignation.

In place of this structure of decision making, SDS proposes "participatory democracy"—a decentralized system without real leaders in which every man would have an equal voice. It strongly rejects the contention of liberals that reform can be achieved through established parliamentary institutions. Numbers of supporters—or votes—do not count for political strength, since "representative" bodies only disguise manipulation by the industrial-military elite. Thus, the so-called "new middle"—a group of student leaders who recently wrote President Johnson expressing "responsible" doubts about the war—fails to recognize that the Vietnamese conflict is only one manifestation of a corrupt structure, and that it will be followed by other imperialist ventures unless the system is radically altered. SDS members spurn coalitions with such liberal groups, fearing that their radicalism will be diluted.

The reliance on action—confrontation and protest—rather than ideology has enabled SDS in the middle phase of its development to include a wide variety of personalities and interests. The organization can claim as members blue-collar militants of the Progressive Labor Party, as well as three-piece-suit liberals from ADA. There are anarchist hippies, humanists, Communists and an increasing number of former members of Young Americans for Freedom, a libertarian laissez-faire capitalist group. About 85 per cent of the membership, according to Davidson, serves merely as "shock troops." These are younger members, usually in the "long-hair Bobby Dylan syndrome," who turn out for demonstrations but do not go beyond gut reactions to a systematic critique of society. Davidson classifies the remaining 15 per cent in two groups: the "super-intellectuals" and the "organizers." The intellectuals, mainly graduate students, dominate the discussions. The organizers are full-time, professional radicals.

And yet, despite the apparent success of their past approach in augmenting this diverse membership, many SDSers now believe that the organization must develop a longer-range strategy. The tactics of confrontation have gained headlines but have not altered government policies. Most members regard anti-war activity with a mounting sense of frustration and impotence. They often begin speeches with the disclaimer: "Well, probably nothing we can do now will prevent escalation. . . ." And many fear that the radical commitments of the membership will wane unless it comes to view short-run setbacks in a longer-range "critical radical perspective." If the shock troops do not understand tactics in terms of a consistent and systematic radical analysis, they will eventually desert the movement.

The intellectuals worry that most members of SDS have yet to shed the bourgeois outlook and prejudices of their middle-class upbringing. "In fact, most students hold a kind of dogged career-oriented conception of their lives which would do their parents proud," observed Paul Potter, a past SDS president, and Hal Benenson, of the Harvard chapter, in a recent paper on the "critical radical perspective." Despite the radical rhetoric and slogans, "there is very little comprehension of what the words that are slung around mean either as descriptions of the society or as prescriptions for action." Most SDSers, they observed, still accept the notion that "getting a majority of people to vote for something creates a force for change"; that the United States will eliminate poverty without radically changing, and that the country cannot lose the war in Vietnam if it employs its superior military power. "In a very real way," they note, "rhetoric without content breeds the politics of despair and nihilism. The slogans we use acutely heighten our sense of distance and radical alienation . . . the failure of these slogans to specify any content also heightens our sense of desperateness and impotence."

The weakness of SDS ideology not only imperils the commitment of students, the intellectuals believe, but also prevents the organization from making a meaningful appeal to adults and thus filling the hole created by the departing parties of the Left. The collapse of the adult Left during the 1950s, they argue, has left radicals without a meaningful political organization. Neither the present Communist Party nor the Progressive Labor Party (Maoist) comprehends the real needs and problems of modern Americans. Communism is no longer radical: it aims to get power through the electoral process—in other words, working within the system—and supports liberal measures such as Social Security and Medicare. Progressive Labor, on the other hand, fails to fit radical ideology to the American experience: it misunderstands the mentality of the working class, relies on puritanical cadre-like organization, secrecy and dictatorial leadership. Neither the revisionists (CP) nor the Maoists (PL) accept truly democratic methods of decision making internally, and both groups have grubby, materialistic values. But in order to build a movement among adults who are repelled by the old Left and alienated from present society, SDS must develop an entirely new ideology. It must show these adults how their personal sense of alienation relates to the overall structure of decision making. "To reach these people," says Calvert, "we must involve them on the basic level of their own lives."

The need for ideology when shifting to noncampus activity was discussed at a meeting of the National Council of SDS in Cambridge during the first week of April. At the last national meeting in December, almost all the workshops preceding the official sessions had dealt with issues and problems of campus organization. In April, only one ("Curriculum Reform") concerned the university; the rest dealt with subjects like "Labor Strategy," "Middle-Class Community Organizing" and "Organizing Professions." Only eight delegates showed up for the curriculum workshop and most felt—as at least three stated explicitly—that the university would be "the last place to change." They believed that the educational system, as Paul Millman of Antioch said, "is as necessary to the power structure as any other part of society, and just as tightly controlled by the elite." Benenson and Potter warned against "separatism among students, and against student power activity" which "has had the effect of isolating the campus movement in some ways." The impulse to develop a new ideology was reflected in the decision to bring the Radical Education Project (REP) to Chicago and place it under the control of the national office. REP is the formal publishing and theoretical organ of SDS—one member calls it the radical equivalent of the RAND Corporation—and was set up in Ann Arbor as a semi-autonomous unit, for tax purposes, in 1966.

At the council workshops, Cambridge chapter members described projects in organizing unions among local hospital workers. Kim Moody of New York discussed his attempts to radicalize the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees by working within Local 1412. A representative of the American Friends Service Committee talked about radicalizing technicians in Cambridge corporations: "They feel they aren't allowed to work on the most significant kinds of problems. . . . You talk about Vietnam and start a kind of systems analysis of social objectives." Other delegates discussed attempts to organize middle-class neighborhoods in Boston against the war.

The new constituencies to which SDS now hopes to appeal are unlike those it worked with in its organizing activities during the first stage of the movement—they are primarily people involved in the system, rather than those frozen out of it. SDS must speak. Carl Davidson argues, primarily to the working class and "new working class," while continuing to recognize the problems of the underclass (the poor, disabled and chronically unemployed). The traditional working class, comprising skilled as well as unskilled blue-collar labor, has always been a source of political power for radical movements. But the number of people in this class is declining relative to the new working class—white-collar technicians, scientists, teachers and others who work at the bottom rungs of huge corporate bureaucracies. And these "new" workers, Davidson says, are the "most exploited" people in the entire system. Though well trained and imaginative, they have little or no control over the work they are assigned, and therefore no outlet for creative expression. They are dominated, along with the underclass and working class, by the three other groups: the middle class (petty bourgeois owners of small business), the subruling class (politicians, corporation and university presidents) and the ruling class (owners of the means of production).

Discussion at the national convention indicated that there are important disagreements within SDS on this new approach. The effort to develop an ideology and push off-campus is supported by the national staff and most of the older chapters in Boston, Berkeley, New York and Ann Arbor. But many newer members believe that SDS should remain primarily a student organization, engaged for the most part in the tactics of confrontation. In the areas where membership is growing most rapidly, students have had little or no previous experience with radical ideas or political organizing. Many of these chapters are located in rural areas, away from urban centers of the working and underclasses. "There has always been this split between those who see SDS as primarily a student organization and those who see it as the main party of the Left," says Lee Webb, a past national secretary, "and now it's coming more and more into the open."

The split, moreover, is only one of a series of problems that SDS intellectuals say the organization must solve when shifting tactics and developing an ideology. First, aside from differences resulting from age, SDS is likely to reveal genuine political differences among its members as it attempts to define more clearly a program for social change. Second, assuming SDS can develop a radical movement among adults, it must decide whether to absorb them into the present organization or split them off into a "Movement for a Democratic Society." In either case, students will risk domination by the older radicals. Third, there may be very serious limits to the application of participatory democracy to larger memberships. At the national council meeting, SDS members from the newer chapters complained that the participatory democracy of the session was "not even as democratic as most forms of representative democracy." The proceedings, complained Craig Livingston, of Rutgers Law School, were "dominated by an elite meeting in committee and bringing proposals before the body." The larger the number of participants, the more difficult consensus decision making becomes. Fourth, SDS lacks the money to support a substantial organizing drive. It now operates with a budget of $80,000 a year—one-tenth that of the National Student Association.

In addition to these internal problems, SDS will raise substantial conflicts of ideology in appealing simultaneously to the two exploited classes it seeks to organize. If past projects in labor union organizing are any guide, SDS will organize the working class around bread and butter issues—steady jobs, higher wages and better working conditions. It will urge laborers to join unions and gain power over their employers as a means to increases in material welfare and higher standards of consumption. The power it urges the new working class to achieve will depend on very different values. The enemy will be the same corporate elite and the exploitive bureaucratic structure, but decisions will relate much more to the quality of life and work, and power will be exercised in accordance with an ethic that consciously rejects the goals of higher consumption and materialistic satisfaction. Radical change, in this case, will not only replace the present owners of the means of production but will challenge the entire ethic which makes such ownership worth while. For SDSers reject the "crass materialism" of present society—the values, as Greg Calvert notes, that "transform people into consumers of things." They reject the statistical economic indices of the government—employment rates, gross national product, etc.—as true measures of the quality of life. The “main and transcending” concern of society, Tom Hayden has written, “must be the unfolding and refinement of the moral, aesthetic and logical capacities of men in a manner that creates genuine independence.” Whatever the meaning of that goal for the individual man, it surely will not be equivalent automatically to a house in the country and a two-car garage. Yet these higher standards of consumption appear to be the present goal of the new working class—and, even more strongly, of the working class.

How can SDS use these values to organize the working class and, at the same time, re-educate the middle class out of them? SDS organizers argue that after the working class reaches a decent standard of living and gains control over the means of production, laborers will see the futility of unlimited material aspiration and acquire a “revolutionary consciousness.” But such predictions cannot be proved, and the fact is that many of the “new” workers who have reached decent levels of consumption aspire vigorously to the middle-class style of life. There remains, then, the problem of how to alter the values of teachers and technicians who have been indoctrinated by the system. It is possible that alienation about assignments on the job, and discontent about the Vietnamese War may be translated into an understanding of the faults of the entire system. But it is questionable whether such “knowledge” can lead to a genuine commitment to radical change among individuals who are already career oriented, who have settled down with a wife, children and mortgage after long years of training, and who are at the beginning of the income trajectory. The least successful SDS projects so far, as SDS intellectuals are aware, have been those dealing with the middle class.

There are serious problems, furthermore, with the system of decision making which SDS would urge both classes to substitute for the present one. Participatory democracy, critics argue, is a vague and utopian notion that could never provide a workable system of government for society on a mass scale. In reply, SDSers allude to control by workers in cooperative factories, and to town meetings. But aside from the question of practicability, the notion has serious weaknesses even in theory. For it appears to depend on an underlying consensus in values and interests that runs directly against the pluralism and freedom which SDSers value so highly. The student radicals believe that meetings should produce a unanimity of viewpoint; yet they also prize a rebellious, strong-willed individualism and independence of mind. It is not surprising, then, that Carl Davidson says that "in most places the basis for participatory democracy just doesn't exist." "In many ways," observes a paper reprinted by SDS, "the procedural safeguards of a parliamentary system insure the rights of the dissenter and promote the idea of speaking to educate (rather than sway) much better than a 'sense of the meeting' system."

The issues of how to change values and accommodate different interests within society lead student radicals to the question of how they as individuals can be in, but not of, an authoritarian world—how they can function as citizens and job holders in a society of corporate elitism (thereby contributing to it economically) and yet remain radicals. Some deny the possibility: "I don't think that you can move out and take those jobs and adopt a bourgeois life style and still be part of the movement," says Greg Calvert. "So far as I'm concerned there is no radical movement among adults today." Others believe that it can be accomplished, and contend that the movement must produce radical professionals, not just professional radicals. SDS, they argue, must foster a commitment to radicalism among teachers, scientists and lawyers who will continue working for social change after they begin their careers, as well as among the full-time community organizers who devote their lives to the movement. In assessing the value of a particular tactic, they weigh heavily its psychological effect on the individuals who participate. Arguing, for example, in favor of massive civil disobedience if the United States invades North Vietnam, Paul Potter says: "It has been shown that the experience of going to jail changes people . . . changes their perceptions of themselves and their perception of the system."

Every member thus faces on a personal level the dilemma which the organization must face as a whole: how to be politically effective yet morally consistent—avoid manipulation and compromise, but still maintain effective communication with others. It is a dilemma that has always plagued radical movements, but it is particularly trying for one that takes spiritual goodness as a political imperative. The tension often turns SDSers away from the frustrating task of developing a long-range strategy, back to the only measure of tactics that appears genuine and spontaneous: the "gut reaction." "We don't want to put together some big blueprint for the future," says Carl Davidson. "Now wouldn't it be presumptuous for anyone, with all the hang-ups people have, to say what the future ought to be?" SDS intellectuals understand these problems, and are working desperately to find solutions. But at the moment, the organization remains truly leaderless, leaving each member to express his commitment as he sees fit. The latest button which SDSers wear to announce their resistance to the draft sums it up: "Not with my life you don't."

LETTERS (Continued from page 642)

underprivileged schools where they tutor the students on a student-to-student basis. Another example is the Student Volunteer Service. The volunteers journey, every two weeks, to the Chicago State Mental Hospital with their gifts and toys and good intentions in order to give of themselves some time and effort and, through games, songs and conversation, offer to the patients outlets for escape from their lonely worlds of unreality. Overpowered by his strong emotions, Mr. Oudes abandoned a possibly correct view and succumbed to obvious trick techniques.

Christina Bytautas

General Hester

Davidson, N. C.

DEAR SIR: Your honor roll of military "plain talkers" in your Apr. 17 editorial should have included Gen. Hugh B. Hester, U. S. Army (Ret.). General Hester has consistently and frequently written and spoken against our insane policy in Vietnam and before that against the cold war that sowed the seeds of which Vietnam is the harvest. For this great service to the welfare of his country, General Hester has received mostly criticism and calumny; journals like The Nation should miss no opportunity to give him the praise and recognition he has earned.

E. F. Patterson

misread violence

Larchmont, N.Y.

DEAR SIR: Elmer Bendiner's remark ["America Absurd," The Nation, Apr. 3] that New York Bowery thugs organized as ferocious gangs became a fifth column for the Confederacy is a simplistic misreading of Civil War history. The long-unemployed and impoverished immigrants—mainly Irish—were unwilling to surrender their newly found jobs and opportunity for a better life, in order to be drafted. The iniquitous Civil War draft, with paid substitutes, etc., favored the rich. There was also fear that the liberated slaves would come North and depress wages. To call these draft riots a "ghastly lynching spree" is as inadequate as summarizing Watts as a looting rampage. Much more was involved.

Moses Cammer

Alvin Johnson

New York City

DEAR SIR: A collection is being made of the articles and letters, both personal and official, of Dr. Alvin Johnson, President Emeritus of The New School for Social Research. Will anyone possessing such material kindly send it to Mrs. Agnes deLima, c/o The New School for Social Research, 66 West 12 Street, New York, N. Y. 10011.

Agnes deLima

BOOKS & THE ARTS

'The Absurdity of the Jewish Condition'

THE JEWS OF SILENCE: A Personal Report on Soviet Jewry. By Elie Wiesel. Holt, Rinehart & Winston. 143 pp. $4.95.

THE LIBERATION OF THE JEW. By Albert Memmi. The Orion Press. 303 pp. $4.95.

DAVID JORAVSKY

Mr. Joravsky teaches history at Northwestern University. He is the author of Soviet Marxism and Natural Science (Columbia University Press).

Elie Wiesel and Albert Memmi are both professional Jews, which is another way of saying that Jewishness is a very elusive quality. It can hardly be identified with Judaism, the Jewish religion. Wiesel breathes holy fire; Memmi douses it with observed fact. Here is Memmi:

We don't believe in all that any more? The modern Jew, even with his televised rabbis, does not seriously hope for a marvelous saviour who will lead him out of his wretchedness? No longer claims his election by God for an exceptional destiny? No longer claims a glorious mission, other than that of remaining faithful to a vague kind of morality? So be it; then let us dare to draw the proper conclusion: Judaism, as a doctrine, survives as a series of ambiguities.

Wiesel wants to believe the opposite, but he cannot:

I am still waiting to see tens of thousands of Jews singing and dancing in Times Square or the Place de l'Etoile as they danced here, in the heart of Moscow, on the night of Simchat Torah.

He concludes that only Soviet Jews hold to the true faith, because only they are isolated and oppressed:

Only they—because they have yet to give up the dream—only they still look for the coming of the Messiah, despite the unbearable pain that accompanies the birth of redemption. Only they—because they have suffered more than all the rest and are worthier than all the rest of the blessing of peace and salvation. Only they—because they have remained alone.

Wiesel is too agitated to be a reliable reporter, and the faith he attributes to Soviet Jews may seem rather Christian, but let us not get too involved. The obvious point is that Jews tend to lose their distinctive character in "privileged countries where the word Jew is not a mark of shame." They get to be like everyone else, only they go to church on Saturday. Even Wiesel is tempted by the dream of liberty, equality, fraternity. He wants to "force Moscow to accept Russian Jews as citizens with equal rights," that is, to end the isolation and persecution that sustain the old faith.

In any case, the historical fact is clear. The Enlightenment and the democratic revolutions have undermined the belief of Jews that they are chosen to hold a spiritual fortress against gentile assault until the true Messiah comes. The overwhelming majority of Jews leave the besieged life as soon as the gentiles offer a way out. They prefer peace in their own time, on almost any terms the gentiles offer. Memmi calls this "self-rejection." He doesn't bother with superficial things like beards, clothes or diet. He goes straight to such fundamentals as name, language, characteristic ideas and national allegiance. In all these essentials Jews come close to complete "self-rejection," but hold back at the very end, indulging in curiously ambiguous or whimsical acts of "self-acceptance"—like changing the name from Silverstein to Silvers, or arguing that Jewishness is an advantage because it is a burden. (Memmi quotes Freud giving that secularized relic of the belief that the Jews are God's elect.)

An ultimate contrariness—"negativity" is Memmi's term—seems to be the essence of Jewishness in our age of pallid religion and inflamed nationalisms. Ilya Ehrenburg, an irreligious Russian-speaking believer in Leninism, caused a minor sensation in the USSR by making a point of his Jewishness in his recent Memoirs. He is Jewish, he explains, in defiance of the anti-Semites. According to Memmi such efforts at "self-acceptance" are more honorable than efforts at total "self-rejection," but any reaction to the Jewish problem, defiance or flight, or the usual mixture of both, is a reaction to anti-Semitism. Whether we see the Jewish problem this way or that, or refuse to see it altogether, we are accomplices of the anti-Semites. They have made the world we all must live in, gentile, Jew and chameleon.

According to Memmi, Jewishness is not just a state of mind. It is also an objective condition, part of the facts of life. Like Sartre, he sees it as a peculiar case of the relationship between oppressors and oppressed. The oppressed cannot avoid some measure of shame and self-hatred, some desire to reject themselves and be like their oppressors:

A few years ago a well-known writer coined an ambiguous formula, which for that very reason had immense success: "We must assume ourselves," people repeated with self-delighted daring. "We must assume our condition." Can one really accept oneself as a Jew? Can one really accept oneself as a proletarian or as a Negro? Really, this was a simple matter of not knowing the meaning of misery!

Memmi exaggerates—that will be the instant reaction of most people in "the privileged countries," which goes to show that these countries have been good to the Jews in recent years. Of course, there is a tinge of anti-Semitism in that last statement, for it implies that Jews are alien guests who may be treated well or poorly by the native gentiles. Shall we therefore ignore the fact that many Jews feel that way?

Upper-class gentiles might almost be defined as people who have a special gift for feeling that they belong, and belong on top, wherever they happen to settle or conquer. Until the French Revolution Jews could almost be defined as people with a special gift for feeling homeless and insecure, nervously grateful to the powerful gentiles who treated them well. Since the French Revolution there have been many proud, rebellious Jews, who spurn the old role of royal wards and seek their liberation in alliance with the Left. Memmi applauds such people, and takes it for granted that Jews must take their stand with the Left. But he insists that the old-fashioned Jews have a point: In the last analysis gentiles cannot be trusted; they can take back the tolerant welcome granted by their forefathers.

That is the starting point of Zionism, and Memmi goes on to the logical conclusion, in his book though not in his life:

The Jew must be liberated from oppression, and Jewish culture must be liberated from religion. This double

EMBROIDERY AT BAYEUX

Men fought with axes, panting, nose to nose.

Women with pretty stitches pictured those.

The severed head lies beaming, "I'm a rose!"

JOHN FREDERICK NIMS

liberation can be found in the same course of action—the fight for Israel. . . . It is our only way out, our only real card, and our last historical chance.

It is too easy to ridicule Memmi—he does it himself in order to prove the absurdity of the Jewish condition. He tells us that he is a professor of philosophy at the Sorbonne, married to a blonde, Catholic Frenchwoman; he seems almost ashamed that the marriage has lasted. His heart is in Israel, but the rest of him stays in Paris, painting pictures of himself as the typical Jew, the utterly displaced person. (This is his fourth book on the subject.)

The oddest part is that the pictures are convincing. Memmi is an utterly displaced person. He was born and raised in Tunisia, where his forefathers had lived "since the Phoenicians." But Memmi could not feel at home. His native language was a Jewish version of Arabic, his people a despised minority within a majority that was itself despised by the French newcomers. He sympathized with the Arabs, struggling to regain their homeland from the French, but he adopted the language and culture of the French.

The Socialist and Communist Jews of Tunisia joined the Arab struggle for independence, only to find themselves, as the goal was reached, "eliminated quietly and radically, from every responsible post in their respective parties." And Memmi points to Soviet mistreatment of the Jews as evidence, similar to the Tunisian case, that "the revolution" cannot keep its promise of liberation and fraternity for Jew and gentile alike:

We are insistently asked not to accuse this [Soviet] government of intentional anti-Semitism; granted. But what follows is even worse: it has become, in spite of itself, objectively anti-Semitic, as if by some internal fatality.

Memmi offers little evidence to support this assertion, and some of what he does offer is seriously wrong. "I will never be able to rid myself of a terrible doubt: would the Red Army have stood immobile at the gates of the Warsaw ghetto if it had not contained Jews alone?" The fact is that Catholic Poles were passive while Nazi Germans killed Jews in the Warsaw ghetto. The Red Army reached the Vistula more than a year later, and sat there while, across the river, Nazi Germans killed Catholic Poles. The terrible doubt, if we get the facts straight, was Yeats's in 1919:

The night can sweat with terror before

We pieced our thoughts into philosophy,

And planned to bring the world under a rule,

Who are but weasels fighting in a hole.

Neither of the authors provides much evidence of Soviet anti-Semitism. On a hasty tour of Soviet synagogues, which is hardly the way to get a representative sample of Soviet Jewry, Wiesel was stricken with anger and despair. He is angry at the invisible "they" who oppress religious Jews; he is in despair over the comfortable Jews of the "privileged countries," who are indifferent, he believes, to the fate of their brethren keeping the true faith in a hostile Soviet world. He never makes clear just what he wants us to do beyond protesting, which everybody does already, or dancing in Times Square on Simchat Torah.

His tone is shrill, his testimony is slight, and some of it is wrong. For example, it is not true that Jews alone retain Stalinist fears of associating with foreigners, or timidly evade sensitive topics when they do find themselves talking with a stranger from the West. On one most serious matter Wiesel makes a most serious accusation without anything like adequate evidence. He grants that the analogy often drawn between Nazi and Soviet treatment of the Jews is "illogical, unfair, and unreal," but he contributes to that widespread mistake when he pictures the Ukraine as seething with the kind of murderous anti-Semitism that produced the famous massacre at Babi Yar. "Babi Yar is Kiev," he exclaims. "It is the entire Ukraine. And that is all one needs to see there."

Soviet mistreatment of the Jews is a fact, or rather a disorderly set of inconsistent facts, that reveal little truth to hasty observers. The most reliable, continuing study of the facts is provided by the periodical Jews in Eastern Europe (published by European Jewish Publications, Ltd., 31 Percy St., London, W. 1.). Their information, drawn mainly from the Soviet press, reveals that the mistreatment of Jews follows three patterns.

The Jewish religion is treated more harshly than any other except for those that are legally banned—Jehovah's Witnesses, the Khlysty (Flagellants is the literal translation, but Holy Rollers would be closer to the truth) and other sects.

Secular Yiddish culture, originally fostered by Stalin as Commissar of Nationalities and brutally extinguished by Stalin in his last years, has been denied equality with other minority cultures in the post-Stalin years.

In everyday life discrimination against Jews is widespread, a situation most dramatically evident in the "economic" trials publicized under Khrushchev.

The first and second patterns are efforts to force assimilation, which is self-contradictory, like forcing patriotism, but is not always self-defeating. The third pattern is an utterly inconsistent effort to mark the Jew and exclude him. The characteristic reaction of Soviet Jews—if one may generalize intuitively from fragments of information—is more anger than fear, more determination to win equal rights and dignity within the Soviet system than psychological rejection of it. I am here venturing onto very shaky ground, for one thing that the Soviet authorities will not allow is full, frank, public discussion of problems that they wish to consider completely solved. Thus the Jewish problem becomes part of the intellectuals' struggle for the right to discuss forbidden issues.

This is not one of the most sensitive issues, like the one-party system or the suppression of the Hungarian rising. It is a punishable crime to question those things. It was a bold but legitimate act of political defiance for Yevtushenko and the editors of Literary Gazette to publish his poem on Babi Yar. The audiences that beg him to recite the poem are not only expressing their solidarity with the Jews, and demanding that the government live up to its proclaimed ideals; they are also engaging, with enormous relish, in one of the few acts of political defiance that the regime will tolerate.

If they ever get to the point where the Jewish question can be extensively discussed with some measure of frankness—as, for example, economic problems are now being discussed—the result may well be more interesting than Memmi's effort to be Jewish at the same time that he is French and secular and Tunisian and a displaced existentialist.

There has been a slight hint of what might emerge in such a discussion: a few Polish writers have argued the Jewish question in terms of the rival merits of nationalism and "universal humanism." The defender of the Jews argued that it is good for a nation to shelter friendly universal people, who help one overcome narrow-mindedness. A Soviet discussion might turn up such a viewpoint, but it is more likely to become a general review of the Bolshevik dream of a multi-national state. That was probably a utopian dream to begin with—where is the great power that is not cemented by nationalist ideology?—and I am probably utopian to hope that Soviet bosses will ever allow meaningful discussion of their original dreams. But I do hope it.

Massacre of the Innocents

DEATH IN ROME. By Robert Katz. The Macmillan Co. 334 pp. $6.95.

RAPHAEL ROTHSTEIN

Mr. Rothstein is on the staff of the New York Times News Service, and has written for newspapers in Australia and Israel.

In 1963 a play by a young German writer shocked the world by accusing the late Pope Pius XII of remaining silent in the face of some of the worst crimes ever committed by man. Rolf Hochhuth's The Deputy specifically charged the Holy Father with refusing to protest the murder of millions of Jews in Nazi death camps.

Productions of The Deputy stirred controversy in Italy, Germany, France, England, the United States and Israel. Everywhere the play was produced in '63, '64 and '65 there were extreme and violent reactions. In Singen, West Germany, the mayor tried to prevent a performance by cutting off the theatre's electric power; in Rome a private performance was banned; in Paris there were mob riots on opening night; for weeks, New York police were stationed outside the theatre where The Deputy was playing to protect actors and audience from angry pickets; and in Tel Aviv, Habimah, the National Theatre of Israel, resisted pressure from the Foreign Ministry to cancel its plans for a Hebrew version of the Hochhuth work.

Hochhuth's play was followed by a flood of articles and books on the question of the late Pope's attitude toward the Nazis. Some, such as Saul Friedlander's Pius XII and the Third Reich, condemn the Vatican for failing to help the Jews during the Nazi holocaust. Others, such as Three Popes and the Jews, a work by Israeli diplomat Pinhas Lapide, defend Pius XII as the savior of over 800,000 Jewish lives.

Now Robert Katz, the 34-year-old American-Jewish author of Death in Rome, has joined the great polemic in a work describing the massacre of 335 Italians in the Ardeatine caves. In March, 1944, sixteen partisans belonging to the Patriotic Actions Groups, the Communist faction of the Italian Resistance National Liberation Committee, ambushed a column of 156 S.S. police on the Via Rasella in the center of Nazi-occupied Rome.

News of the attack reached Nazi military and diplomatic officials from Rome to Berlin within minutes. Enraged, Hitler immediately ordered that the whole area around the Via Rasella be blown up and that thirty to fifty Roman citizens be shot for every one of the thirty Germans killed. At the same time, Himmler, unaware of Hitler's order, demanded the deportation of the entire male population of Rome.

According to the author, Consul Eitel

Mollhausen, head of the Nazi diplomatic mission in Rome, and Col. Eugen Dollmann, the highest political representative of the S.S. in Rome, opposed the harsh military reprisals ordered by their superiors. They were convinced that the partisans had planned the attack to provoke revenge and thus intensify the hatred the Italians felt for the occupiers, as well as increase the popularity of the Resistance.

Katz describes how Dollmann drove to the Vatican a few hours after the partisan attack to seek the Pope's support for his plan to reverse the reprisal orders. He met with Pius' personal liaison between the Vatican and the Occupation forces, Father Pankratius Pfeiffer, the German Abbot General of the Order of the Salvatorians. Dollmann told Pfeiffer, known as Padre Pancrazio, that an extreme reprisal was being planned in response to the Via Rasella action. Pancrazio, according to Katz, agreed to ask the Pope to intervene and attempt to prevent or lessen the severity of the Nazis' planned revenge. The S.S. officer and Pancrazio were to contact each other on the following day, March 24, when they would have word from their respective superiors.

Katz relies heavily on interviews with Dollmann in Munich, where the former

His life was The Revolution

Victor Serge agitated for revolution and fought in upheavals across the face of Europe. He helped to found the ruling Soviet Comintern, but was expelled from Russia in 1936 for his unorthodox communism. He died eleven years later in Mexico City, stateless and destitute. His writing was his only legacy, and his largely autobiographical novel, now published in English for the first time, is both a literary and historical landmark. "I can't think of anyone else who has written about the revolutionary movement in this century with Serge's combination of moral insight and intellectual richness."—Dwight Macdonald.

VICTOR SERGE birth of our power

Translated from the French
by Richard Greeman;
introduction by Harvey Swados.
$5.95 at all booksellers

DOUBLEDAY

S.S. leader, now 66, lives in quiet retirement on a pension from the Bonn government. Dollmann gave Katz a copy of a manuscript of memoirs in which he recounts his visit with Pancrazio at the Vatican. Dollmann was convinced that if the Pope, working through channels he had used to communicate with the Occupation forces many times before, could win even a delay, the S.S. head and Mollhausen might be able to avert the impending tragedy.

While Dollmann was waiting for word from Pancrazio, Hitler's headquarters and the Nazis in Rome reached agreement on a compromise for the reprisal—ten Romans were to be shot for each dead German, and within twenty-four hours. During the night of March 23 and the next day, the Roman Gestapo rounded up men and boys from several jails, including seventy Jews who had already been arrested and were awaiting deportation. The victims ranged in age from 14 to 75 and represented every social class. Most were Catholic and the group included one priest.

Twenty-four hours after the Via Rasella attack, 335 Italians were taken by the Gestapo to abandoned caves in the Via Ardeatine on the Appian Way near the Christian catacombs. They were shot one by one. Nazi engineers placed charges of TNT around the caves and blew up the entrances, hoping to seal their contents forever. On that same afternoon the Vatican newspaper, L'Osservatore Romano, published a front-page statement appealing to all Romans to refrain from violence "... which would only provoke more severe reprisals giving rise to an infinite series of painful episodes. . . ."

"The man who drafted this statement," Katz charges, "must have been one of the few inside the Vatican who knew that the murders were taking place." He believes that Pius knew of the reprisals "reasonably" well in advance of the Ardeatine crime and had an established contact with the Nazis. "Pius," he explains, "working quietly through German channels, without having to break his well-known silence on other questions, could have won, at the minimum, a 24 hour stay of the mass executions. Failing that, he could have spoken out, not as Pope, but as the Bishop of Rome. There was no need to sacrifice or compromise his principle of silence. This was not a 'Jewish question.' This was a question of the extermination of his own Catholic children."

What were Pius' reasons for silence? Katz thinks that the Pontiff, fearing a popular insurrection and the establishment of a radical left-wing power in Rome, chose to do nothing lest the Vatican City State be destroyed in retaliation for his involvement with fascism. The Pope was opposed to the Roman Resistance and was already in the midst of negotiations to provide for the orderly transfer of power in Rome from the Germans to the Allies.

Katz was living in Rome in March, 1964, and working as a writer for the United Nations Food and Agricultural Organization when he observed the twentieth anniversary of the massacre which is known in Italy simply as Le Fosse Ardeatine. Fascinated by the conflicting accounts of the incidents in the Via Rasella and the Via Ardeatine, Katz began his study. For over two years, he consulted a mass of documents, memoirs and war-crimes trials records, contained in archives in several countries. In seeking to piece together a coherent account of the 1944 attack and reprisal he corresponded with Rolf Hochhuth, traveled twice to Munich to interview Dollmann, and even met with the partisans of the Via Rasella. In May, 1965, he went to the Vatican to seek information on the behavior of the Pope. As directed, he submitted his questions in written form, and despite a promise that they would be answered within forty-eight hours, he has never received a reply.

Inevitably there have been attacks on his book. Katz insists that he has documentary proof to substantiate his claims. An unidentified high-ranking Vatican official called his book a "vicious lie." Katz has responded by reiterating his charge that the Pope did nothing to save 335 Italians killed by the Germans. He said recently: "If that is a lie then what is the truth? Did he try to save them? If so, where is the evidence? And why has the Vatican kept it a secret for over 20 years?"

Reform or Revolution?

THE LIMITS OF AMERICAN CAPITALISM. By Robert L. Heilbroner. Harper & Row. 148 pp. $4.95.

JAMES O'CONNOR

Mr. O'Connor is a member of the Economics Department of San Jose State College.

Robert Heilbroner is best known as a writer with a certain knack for making economic science and economic history intelligible to the general public. The Worldly Philosophers and The Making of Economic Society, in particular, are widely used in introductory economics courses and have even found a place on the bookshelves of the good suburban burghers. It is doubtful whether Mr. Heilbroner's latest book will find such a ready market. The least of the reason is that The Limits of American Capitalism consists of two rather slight essays which at times seem to have been written at cross-purposes. More important, the book is bound to be somewhat mysterious to the average reader because the author cannot seem to make up his mind whether he is a reformer or revolutionary.

A large part of the first essay, "Capitalism in America," recalls the Heilbroner of yore, the lucid expositor of the research of other economists and historians. His purpose is to discover whether big business exercises more or less power today than in the past. His method is to describe the structure of contemporary capitalism—a task which he performs admirably—and to analyze the relation between big capital and other groups in the economy. The overwhelming impression which Heilbroner conveys is the gigantism of the dominant corporations. Less than one-twentieth of the economy's business firms conduct 75 per cent of the nation's business. In the industrial field, one-tenth of 1 per cent of all corporations account for one-third of total production. Of the top 500 industrial corporations, the biggest fifty do as much business as the remaining 450 firms.

The giant corporations press on relentlessly. Thanks to mergers and, more important, internal expansion, the largest 100 manufacturing corporations increased their share of total value added in manufacturing from 23 per cent in 1947 to 30 per cent in 1958. Meanwhile, fewer and fewer of the biggest companies drop by the wayside; of the fifty largest companies in 1909, only seventeen remained on the commanding heights of the economy in 1964. Owing to economic prosperity and the evolution of a live-and-let-live attitude on the part of the corporate oligarchy, however, the great majority of the largest enterprises in 1948 retain their dominant position today.

Who controls the great enterprises which preside over the economic destiny of the most affluent of the advanced capitalist countries? More than most students of the modern corporation, Heilbroner is aware of the theoretical and empirical weaknesses of the Berle-Means thesis of the separation of ownership from management: "Among the 150 super-corporations, there are perhaps as many as 1,500 or 2,000 operational top managers, but as few as 200 to 300 families own blocks of stock that ultimately control these corporations." The hallmark of the ideology of the corporate elite is "cautiousness" and a "blatant discrepancy between preachment and reality." Owing their career posts to wealth, influence, ability and long experience in administration, engineering or science, half socialized in college and half believing the democratic rhetoric, the corporate oligarchy preaches its "responsibilities" to labor, consumers and suppliers, as well as to stockholders, and practices one form or another of profit maximization. Nevertheless, Heilbroner is confident that the "big business directorate is trying to make its peace with the realities of the twentieth century."

When the author abandons description for analysis, he begins to lose control of his materials. He loses sight of the plain fact which he himself has helped to establish—namely, that the corporate elite is largely responsible for the "realities of the twentieth century." The form and substance of government regulation of capital or, more accurately, the self-regulation of the corporations, modes of labor relations and styles of collective bargaining, and many aspects of social legislation—all these and more reflect the needs of the corporations and monopoly capitalism, and in sum constitute the system of corporate liberalism which has been analyzed and exposed so brilliantly by William A. Williams, Gabriel Kolko, Martin Sklar, James Weinstein and others. This failure of perspective and vision—the failure to recognize that in no significant sense is the state independent of the needs and demands of the corporate oligarchy—largely invalidates the core of the first essay—Heilbroner's analysis of the power of big business in the United States political economy. His theory of power is a simplified version of the interest group theory developed in recent decades by political sociologists and political scientists of "liberal" persuasion. One quotation will at once convey the flavor of his style and reveal the assumptions which underlie his subsequent analysis: "Anyone who has read Robert Engler's Politics of Oil, or who has followed the course of efforts to write a stronger Pure Food and Drug Act, or to require admonitory labeling

TRACTORS

*The man was thrown clear,
Yet the experts say
To stay in the car is best.
To tap an undercurrent of Feeling, something I turn away
From, fearful, certain
It will end but not knowing
How it will end.
The dreams have a childish
Beauty. Fireplaces, planes,
Tractors to clear the roads.*

HARVEY SHAPIRO

of cigarettes, or who has probed into the operations of the FCC and the FPC, or notes the parade of business chieftains into the White House, knows that big business continues to exercise a very important influence on the formulation and administration of the nation's policies, including not least those policies that are supposed to regulate business itself."

Heilbroner is less concerned to demonstrate the power of big business, however, than to argue that business is no longer in political ascendancy. He locates a modicum of real power, and enormous potential power, in the new nonbusiness elites. The "semi-independent" military bureaucracy, the government administrators and the professional experts, according to the author, may hold the true reins of power. The fantastic expansion of the government's research budget "reflects not only the explosive growth of technical expertise . . . but its virtual pre-emption by non-business sectors." There is a national "consensus" in relation to the "problems" of defense, economic stability and growth, civil rights, urban renewal, education, unemployment and mass transport; and the day-to-day guidance of federal, as well as other government and many private, programs in these areas is largely in the hands of the new elite. Especially in the military sphere, the role of business, including even the largest corporations, is "essentially one of jockeying for favor rather than initiating policy."

But the truth of the matter is that the "semi-independent" military bureaucracy is harnessed to a foreign policy based squarely on the interests of a handful of giant corporations which make the great mass of foreign investments and appropriate the great mass of profits from foreign economic relations. The military bureaucracy indeed purchases the greater share of the economy's research and development, but Heilbroner neglects to add that nearly all R and D is performed in private industrial labs and increasingly is geared to private profit. To be sure, Heilbroner clearly states that "whatever sentiments that the new elites may hold, they are not anti-business," and that the corporations' "legitimacy is now virtually complete, its acceptance without exception," but he fails to understand that this means that government administrators and professional experts could not conceivably have any interests other than those of business and the capitalist system.

From this angle it is easy to see where Heilbroner goes wrong when he attempts to deepen his thesis. He points to protective labor legislation and the general acceptance of organized labor as indicative of the waning power of business; in fact, the dependence of organized labor on a government which is necessarily pro-business is a sign of a crippling weakness—as the present state of the unions eloquently testifies. He cites Fair Trade laws and the strengthening of anti-trust legislation as evidence of the new strength of small capital vis-à-vis big business; in point of fact, protective legislation is a form of holding action, a proof of weakness. What is more, small business is increasingly becoming partly or wholly dependent on big busi-

The secret that couldn't be kept!

A minute-by-minute, day-by-day, account of the "impossible" nuclear accident which dropped four U.S. hydrogen bombs over Spain, projected ■ hitherto unknown village into history, and left its radiation-exposed inhabitants as ignorant of their fate as the world was kept ignorant of the whole affair throughout months of official secrecy. Three of the bombs were recovered relatively soon. The search for and recovery of the fourth bomb is probably the most fantastic true story of our time.

"Mr. Szulc is the New York Times man in Madrid. He has had plenty of political experience and brings ■ wide historical perspective to bear on this weird episode."

—AVERY CORMAN, Book Week $6.50

The Bombs of Palomares
by Tad Szulc

THE VIKING PRESS

ness. Heilbroner further maintains that small business' historic anti-big-business attitude has "largely been dissipated." But what is the right-wing Republican movement, stripped of its rhetoric and slogans, other than a weak thrust by small capital and small-town business interests at the power of the giant corporations and the ethic of corporate liberalism? The struggle within the capitalist class takes many different forms and is conducted in many different ways. It is only when he examines the relationship between big business and the consumer that Heilbroner does not lose his footing. Although the public-b damned attitude has been replaced by a seeming deference to consumer articles on powell & black power

UAW rank & file revolt

Berkeley, migrant workers, SSEU

California CNP in the new issue of independent socialist single issue 25c / subscription $1.50 box 481, cooper station, 93 fourth ave.

new york, n. y. 10003

FOR WRITERS!

Enrich your style through Herbert Spencer's and Edgar Allan Poe's classic principles that have influenced many of the world's great authors. A help for writers eager to get published. Send $1.00 to

PAGEANT PRESS
101 5th Ave. N.Y. 3 Dept. 3

The Best Way To Get THE NATION

THE NATION 5-22-67
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

- ☐ One Year, $10
- ☐ Two Years, $18
- ☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Foreign and Canadian Postage
$1 a year extra)

NAME _____

ADDRESS _____

CITY _____

STATE _____ ZIP NO. _____

sovereignty. Heilbroner understands that the corporations shape consumer tastes and preferences in the interest of profits.

The second essay, called "The Limits of American Capitalism," gives the book its title and compounds the basic error committed in the first. There is no disagreeing with Heilbroner that the "limits" of capitalism are "those boundaries of change that would so alter the functional base of society, or the structure of privilege built on that base, as to displace [the] given social order by a new one." These boundaries constitute the system of production for profit, not production for use; private ownership of the means of production and communication (thus ruling out the use of communications as an agency of enlightenment rather than of sales and propaganda); and the concentration of wealth. Turning the problem around, what of capitalism's possibilities? In a nutshell, the author believes that the distribution of income can be corrected at the bottom, but not at the top; that the volume and, to a degree, the character, of production can be controlled, but that the basic commercial character of capitalism cannot be changed; that it is possible to make an accommodation with the noncapitalist world, but impossible to expect noncapitalist countries to adopt capitalism.

The agency of change, or historic subject, is the nonbusiness elite. The new elites will be in charge of abolishing poverty and unemployment and other remedial symptoms of monopoly capitalism. Sooner or later, they will reach the limits of capitalism and somehow overcome them; capitalism will first realize its possibilities of reform, and then it will be superseded by some other, unnamed, system. What are the dynamic social processes, the historic forces, which Heilbroner confidently charts? Much of his case rests on an analogy with the development of capitalism out of the womb of feudalism: "Just as the insertion of cash exchanges into the fine structure of feudalism ultimately made obsolete the functional mechanism of a manorial society, so the insinuation of science and technology into the interstices of business enterprise promises to outmode the fundamental working arrangements of capitalism."

Science and technology sustain and hurry along capitalism, but by that fact a more organized social form is required. But it is not just a matter of a need for more control and organization: from the ideological standpoint, Heilbroner anticipates the "conquest of the capitalist imagination by science and scientific technology." Increasingly, the new elites will divorce their goals from the society to which they now owe allegiance. At the moment, the elites moving into positions of power at the expense of business executives have no vision to offer society nor any goal other than capitalism. But Heilbroner is apparently convinced that they "may well some day develop an independent orientation, and formulate a program for American society that transcends the limits imposed by the present system." The aim of the new elites will be the primacy of scientific discovery as the central purpose of society.

Already there are certain manifestations of the promise of organized knowledge and scientific technology "to outmode the fundamental working arrangements of capitalism." Heilbroner cites the tendency toward administrative and bureaucratic, or non-market, control of the economy; man increasingly shapes, rather than is shaped by, his economic environment. He also refers to the more or less steady rise of per capita income which "gradually brings to an end the condition of material need as an effective stimulus for human behavior," together with the related phenomenon of increased leisure due to the advance of labor productivity. The new leisure signifies a need for more administration and planning, while the weakening of material or economic incentives suggests the urgency of developing new incentive systems.

Heilbroner has unquestionably gotten hold of certain possibilities inherent in United States capitalism, but a step-by-step critical review reveals major gaps and flaws in his analysis. First, the analogy with feudalism is satisfactory as far as it goes, but it fails to go far enough. There is no denying that the growth of markets, the rise in agricultural productivity and the accumulation of merchant capital, which eventually financed industrialization, undermined and subverted the feudal economy. But the capitalist social revolution did not by itself resolve the struggle for state power; a series of political upheavals and revolutions was required before the bourgeoisie was fully in control of the state. One looks in vain in The Limits of American Capitalism for the slightest hint of how the requisite future political changes will come about in the United States.

Second, the author is absolutely right to argue that the developing science and technology cry out for new organized social forms. But he is apparently blind to the fact that these social forms—state capitalism and corporate liberalism—are already well established. Far from undermining the present economic system in those countries with a large and powerful middle class, state capitalism has given the economic system a new lease on life. Man—that is, the corporate oligarchy and its hirelings—does indeed employ state power to control the economy.

The new elites control the economy in the name of private profit. The essence of capitalist rationality today is the use of science and technology for wasteful and destructive goals. Certain technologies are suppressed and others are perverted because technology itself has to be harnessed to private profit. This is necessarily true as long as investment and accumulation are private matters; capitalism cannot survive without constant expansion and accumulation, and accumulation without profits is a flat impossibility. This is the real limit of American capitalism.

In this context, it is readily understandable that the new elites who use scientific rationality for humanly irrational ends are simply not fit to formulate and develop a program which looks to satisfy human needs and wants. The fact that a man is a scientist or expert neither solves the problem of ends nor makes the man any more human or reasonable than a day laborer. This is particularly true in the United States where the scientific elites are largely bought and paid for by the corporate oligarchy in its role as businessman, foundation head or government official. Does Heilbroner really expect a discredited and corrupted elite to lead a revolution against itself?

Probably not, because he begs the question with the statement that there does not "seem to be much point in attempting to foresee by what precise stratagems the elites in the future may assert their claims." It is a weak defense of his position to refer to historical experience which "discourages us from attempting to prophesy the manner of demise of the social order to be superseded." And it is a strange position for an articulate observer-member of the new elite, a man who presumably will be the historic subject—especially one of the rare men who comprehend fully that the real problem is the struggle for the human use of science. "This is the struggle for the very distant future," the author writes in his final sentence, "which must be begun, nonetheless, today." Please, Mr. Heilbroner, whom do we fight, where and how, and on whose terms?

TELEVISION / John Horn

Controversy, which used to strike terror at the networks, is now a common television commodity. I cite examples from a recent week.

The Smothers Brothers struck a blow against the Vietnamese War when they appeared as guests on the Joey Bishop show. The comedians exhibited a Mother's Day card bearing the message, "Another Mother For Peace." They dead-panned the information that it was natural for mothers to want peace as they provided the card supplier's address.

Later in the week George Jessel, the perennial bridegroom, showed up on the Merv Griffin show with a new fiancée, and in the course of a personal, emotional defense of President Johnson and the Administration's Vietnamese policy, expressed the wish that Marines would beat up long-haired beatniks who protest that policy.

Before the week was out, F. Lee Bailey, the celebrated counselor at law, was retrying the case of Dr. Carl Copolino, who had been found guilty of murdering his wife, before Joey Bishop, Johnny Carson and their late-night television audiences. Having failed to persuade a Florida jury to what he considers proper evaluation of testimony on chemical findings in the corpse, Bailey was attempting to bring a nationwide jury around to his view—without the inconveniences or confusion of hearing the witnesses themselves or having the prosecution's case also presented.

The remarkable thing about these instances is that they all occurred on entertainment programs. Remarkable, but these days not at all unusual. Fun-and-game shows now provide the only television area where contention is to be found.

Nor is the entertainment invasion of the socio-political domain related to the careers of California's Sen. George Murphy and Gov. Ronald Reagan. Television entertainers, with the possible exception of David Susskind, have no political ambitions. But they do recognize a void when they see one. The void in this case is created by television's principle and practice in news and public affairs.

The definition of news is traditional, hard, what happened yesterday or today. Comment is confined to occasional mild utterances by Eric Sevareid or Howard K. Smith. Fred W. Friendly confessed, when he induced Walter Lippmann to appear on C.B.S., that it was sad commentary that television had to import opinion.

And public-affairs documentaries, with very rare exceptions, have become commercial and pallid, like most network television. In the past, an occasional documentary, notably some of Friendly's, stirred the public. But increasingly the sixty-minute reality shows—e.g., series like Saga of Western Man, Great Explorations, The World of Animals—are as non-contemporary, unchallenging and salable as their entertainment relatives, the situation comedies.

With news limited to headlines of the day and documentaries to marketable subjects, television has no real place for interpretation and analysis of the issues out of which controversy is made. Even if appetite for dissent and dispute could be shown to exist, television news bureaus do not control, and have little influence on, the operation of the networks, which have been organized to peddle national entertainment, which is profitable, rather than national problems, which are not.

However, while the news and public

Earl Browder
Hal Draper
Granville Hicks
A. J. Muste
Max Shachtman
Gerald L. K. Smith
Norman Thomas
Burton K. Wheeler

provide first-person, eye-witness accounts of major movements of the depression decade in

As We Saw the Thirties
Essays on Social and Political Movements of a Decade

edited by Rita James Simon
253 pages $6.50

UNIVERSITY OF ILLINOIS PRESS

Urbana, Illinois 61801

FREE! With every new subscription to

THE NATION

The FBI Nobody Knows

by Fred J. Cook. 414 pp. Pyramid Books.

A portion of this important book first appeared in The Nation (October 18, 1958), as a special feature and attracted nationwide attention and the highest praise. Now it has been rewritten and enlarged with much new material.

"... an effective and powerful document. . . ."

—Mark DeWolfe Howe, New York Review of Books

"Fred Cook must be credited with a courageous as well as an illuminating book. Let those who dispute his charges refute them if they can."

—Alan Barth, New York Herald Tribune

"A devastating case against the Federal Bureau of Investigation and its veteran director, J. Edgar Hoover."

—San Francisco Chronicle

"J. Edgar Hoover won't like this book . . . well-documented . . . likely to cause plenty of furor."

—Publishers' Weekly

THE FBI NOBODY KNOWS has the unique distinction of being the central point in the plot of Rex Stout's latest Nero Wolfe who-dun-it, THE DOORBELL RANG.

For your FREE copy of THE FBI NOBODY KNOWS fill out the subscription coupon below, and start receiving The Nation, this country's oldest (1865) weekly journal of dissenting opinion.

THE NATION

333 6th Avenue

New York, N. Y. 10014

Herewith is my order and payment for a NEW subscription to The Nation. Please send me FREE a copy of THE FBI NOBODY KNOWS.

☐ One Year, $10

☐ Two Years, $18

☐ 6 Months, $6

(Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 per year extra)

NAME

ADDRESS

CITY STATE ZIP No.

5-22-67

affairs departments are self-censored—because of lack of air time or incentives—relative freedom and flexibility do exist in entertainment, an area considered harmless. Thus, when a subject has been long suppressed in the consensus society, it becomes fair game for the mass-media sensation traffickers who, like peddlers of French postcards, exploit curiosity without satisfying it. In the interest of titillation they win reputations for "boldness" by violating taboos, prodding sacred cows, and mentioning the unmentionable.

The daring subjects for our middle-ground society are those touching extremes—Birchites or Black Muslims, hippies or homosexuals, Playboy bunnies or nuns, mod fashions or topless waitresses, alcoholics or drug addicts, hawks or doves. Such topics constitute the tired, semi-informed routine of most talk on our entertainment shows.

Perceptive opportunists with a sense of black humor—TV hosts Alan Burke, Joe Pyne, Susskind—have long mined the rich vein. A mixture of sensation, vitriol and laughs will always attract a large audience. The maestros of other entertainment talk shows—Bishop, Carson, Griffin—are not far behind the sensation leaders, although normally they're not as extreme in their pursuit of extremism.

The situation is absurd and typically American: matters too important to be discussed seriously are made fun of and exploited for profit. Correction may be possible, but it will not be easy. The industry is dogged by self-deception. George R. Graham, Jr., president of N.B.C. Enterprises, recently called American radio and television audiences the best informed in the world. A contradictory survey, conducted for C.B.S. by Opinion Research Corporation, indicated that the general public has a low understanding and knowledge of current events. No correlation was seen with another survey, by Roper Research Associates, which named television the public's major source of news.

Proper alternatives to Messrs. Smothers, Jessel and Bailey might be documentaries about private propaganda on public air waves, about pacifism, unpopular versus popular wars, the right to dissent, the use of force in suppressing dissent, the suitability of trial by public opinion. But shoot, they wouldn't be much fun, would they?

It is not evident that commercial television wants the American public well informed. Not only is there little profit in it but the tease-and-tickle market of the entertainers would be ruined.

Spring Records 2 / BENJAMIN BORETT

SIBELIUS: The Seven Symphonies. The Japanese Philharmonic; Akeo Watanabe, cond. Epic SC 6057/BSC 157.

Symphony No. 5 in E-Flat major, Op. 82. Symphony No. 7 in C major, Op. 105. Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra; Loren Maazel, cond. London CM 9488/CS 6488.

Perhaps not quite the seven deadliest symphonies ever composed, Sibelius' nevertheless consist mainly of the maximally gradual unfolding of ideas that begin unprepossessingly and grow to full proclamatory triviality. Those reputed to be more "original"—particularly the Fourth—are so primarily because the vocabulary in which their ideas are formulated is borrowed from a more "modern" literature; they are intrinsically no less obvious nor any less monodimensionally developed. Within these (admittedly severe) imaginative limitations the symphonies are, however, competently composed. What is odd is that they have attracted such serious attention in the form of extravagant praise and equally vehement damnation. This, I believe, must stem primarily from the ideological partis pris by the asserters (the reminiscent surface of the works seems to have been a rallying point for the belligerently nostalgic, and a convenient target for the mindlessly avant-garde); at any rate, nothing I can hear in the works themselves seems provocative of vehemence of any sort. Of the recordings, the Japan Philharmonic's performances are merely straightforward; the considerably greater finesse of Maazel and the Vienna Philharmonic gives the Fifth and Seventh at least an orchestral brilliance that seems virtually superimposed on Sibelius' rather flat-footed orchestration, but which makes the experience a little more interesting.

DVORAK: Symphonies Nos. 7, 8, 9. The Cleveland Orchestra; George Szell, cond. Epic SC 6055/BSC 155.

These works have long awaited recorded performances of an interpretive depth and executive refinement at the level of their compositional ingenuity and profundity. This is an important release, therefore, even if its accomplishment is primarily in the domain of executive finesse, which thus leaves the interpretive burden still on the perceptivity of the listener. But such perceptivity is at least made possible by the superiority of the playing, and the very absence of the usual simplistic excesses that overwhelm Dvorak's delicate sonorous and textural balances is an interpretive virtue in itself.

MILHAUD: Le Boeuf sur le toit. Satie: Parade. Auric: Overture. Françaix: Concertino. London Symphony Orchestra; Antal Dorati, cond. Mercury MG50435/SR90435.

The pop-music articulative surface through which the very complicated ideas of Stravinsky's Histoire du Soldat are perceived seems to have misled a number of French composers in the twenties to equate such an "anti-serious"—and hence functionally transparent—exterior with a genuinely anti-serious triviality of interior. Out of this enthusiasm they composed music that was in fact "pop" (and thus utterly antithetic to the compositional dead-seriousness of Stravinsky's work), consisting mainly of arrangements or simulations of strings of popular and folk tunes whose half-"classical" veneer left them rather less scintillating than the purer instances of the genre. The ingenuities among the works in the present album are restricted to the Milhaud Boeuf sur le toit; but they are rather thinner even here than in other Milhaud works of the period, especially La Création du monde and L'Homme et son désir, both of which manifest a compositional involvement with their popular elements far beyond anything in le Boeuf. The Satie is characteristic in the musical featurelessness that permits inexhaustible imputations of cleverness, and the other works are routine jeux du Conservatoire. Dorati's inflexible performances, too, miss whatever last chances remain to salvage a little joie.

BYRD: Mass in Three Parts. Mass in Four Parts. Argo ZRG 5362. Mass for five voices. Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis from The Great Service. Ave Verum Corpus. Argo ZRG 5226. All with the Choir of King's College Chapel, Cambridge; David Willcocks, cond.

Within the (from our a posteriori point of view) severe limitations of 16th-century music-structural resources—particularly the minimal number of functional dimensions and the homogeneous invariance of the presentational surface—the achievement by a few composers of a strong sense of individual event-contour, and of wide articulative variety within a multi-sectional work seems truly remarkable. Among composers of sacred vocal music, Dufay, Ockeghem, Isaac, Josquin, Lassus and Byrd are awesome for their capacities in this domain; and Byrd's special quality, notable in all the present works but especially in the five-voice mass and the motet Ave Verum Corpus, is the astonishing range of continuity—and articulation-images, all of which project sharply individual identities out of drastically simple and minimally embellished materials. The present works are full of ideas of this kind, and perhaps, for the listener unaccustomed to the earlier, minuscule distinction-range, the simplicity and compactness of Byrd's profiles and textures make them more immediately discernible, and might ultimately help to make the more elliptical differentia in—progressively—Josquin, Lassus, Isaac and Ockeghem become evident. The performance is transparent, well-tuned and coordinated, if perhaps a little too uniformly "sensitive" in the face of Byrd's frequently broad-stroked articulation.

ELECTRONIC MUSIC FROM THE UNIVERSITY OF ILLINOIS. Brün: Futility for speaker and tape. Gaburo:

OUR BOYS ARE DYING IN VAIN...

We don't want any more American soldiers sent to Vietnam to kill and be killed. We demand an end to the senseless slaughter of the Vietnamese people. Bring our boys home alive.

VETERANS, WOMEN, CLERGY, PEACE ACTIVISTS:

All are invited to join the first national vets'-sponsored peace action.

MEMORIAL DAY, MAY 30th WASHINGTON, D.C.

A solemn procession and memorial ceremony to American and Vietnamese victims of the war, led by Vietnam vets, mothers of GIs, clergy of the major faiths.

AD HOC VETERANS' COMM. FOR MEMORIAL DAY PEACE ACTION (Funds urgently needed)

For info & bus trans., write:

Ad Hoc Veterans' Committee
5 Beekman St., Rm. 1033, NYC 10038

- ☐ Encl. is $..... for bus seat(s).
(Round-trip: NYC-Wash., $7.50.
Chicago-Wash., $35)
☐ Here's my contrib. of $.....
to help defray expenses.

Name Address
City & State Zip Phone

Lemon Drops; For Harry; for tape alone; Hamm: Canto for soprano, speaker and chamber ensemble; Hiller: Machine Music, for piano, percussion and tape; Martirano: Underworld. Ensemble from the University of Illinois; Jack McKenzie and David Gilbert, conds. Heliodor HS 25047.

An important album for its representation of music composed at one of the most important American university centers of new-musical activity, far too rarely available otherwise either in recordings or performances locally. The representation is particularly valuable for the evidence it gives of the real diversity of approach and result among "advanced" American composers, and within the domain of the electronic medium; in particular, all these works manifest a fundamentally theatrical approach, compared with the contextualism that characterizes the work of the Eastern composers, even where gestural or theatrical surfaces appear, as in Carter, Wolpe or Wuorinen. Of the Illinois composers, Salvatore Martirano is perhaps best known in New York from his earlier days and frequent performances of his work here. From the beginning, his work manifested a particular interest in a supercharged heightening of verbal qualities superimposed on a basically traditional twelve-tone, specifically Bergian, foundation. The furthest previous extension of this was in his instrumental-choral O O O O That Shakespeherian Rag, performed in Town Hall several years ago and recorded on CRI. But Underworld carries the pure theatrical-verbal-gestural quality much further, to the point where it no longer articulates or is articulated by the pitch-durational-timbral-textural substructures, but explodes them into elements of theatrical unfolding. Lejaren Hiller has long been one of the important technological innovators in the development of electronic and computer resources, which he has used not only in the usual way as performance media but also for various kinds of mechanical simulations of compositional processes, through which most of his recent works have been generated. Kenneth Gaburo's music has always presented a rather strenuously gestural surface, with a particular predilection for internally immobile sonority blocks at instrumental and vocal extremes, a Varèsian quality that translates with particular felicity into the tape-studio medium. Herbert Brün's work is more directly Darmstadtian, and Charles Hamm's reflects the amalgamation of a remarkable diversity of compositional interests.

NEW MUSIC FROM BRITAIN: Peter Maxwell Davies: Leopardi Fragments. Alexander Goehr: Two Choruses. Richard Rodney Bennett: Calendar. Malcolm Williamson: Symphony for Voices. Melos Ensemble; John Carewe, cond. Angel (S) 36387.

INSTRUMENTAL MUSIC: Don Banks: Trio for horn, violin and piano. Richard Rodney Bennett: Trio for flute, clarinet and oboe. Phyllis Tate: Sonata for clarinet and cello. Iain Hamilton: Sonata Notturna for horn and piano. Members of the Melos Ensemble. Argo ZRG 5475.

The works of Davies, Goehr and Hamilton deserve serious attention; among European, and even British, composers they manifest a highly uncharacteristic insistence on the primary significance of a clear and cognitive pitch-durational-relational structure as the compositional center out of which surface qualities arise, rather than merely using these components in generalized configurations to produce images of gestural activity, as elsewhere. The result in their work is a depth of musical identity notably absent from the more obviously spectacular works of their Continental colleagues. Davies in particular reveals a striking originality in the invention and integration of sonorities and continuities within such contexts of coherent unfolding, while Goehr's work has the kind of polish and solidity one associates with much less pre-middle-generation composers; the present choruses are interesting for their ideas about choral sonority, particularly in the exploration of variant groupings of voices and of the range of accentual possibilities available in a purely vocal-ensemble context. Hamilton's sonata projects a sense of a sound and successional quality for each segment, involving interesting ideas about tempo changes in the course of a phraseological unit that suggests a relation to the work of Carter. Some of the interrelations and exchanges between horn and piano are also quite ingenious. The Melos Ensemble has long been the most accomplished extra-American chamber ensemble for contemporary music (the recording of the Schoenberg Op. 29 Suite has been particularly distinguished evidence of this) and—although in the absence of scores it is impossible to determine definitively—their playing here seems exemplary.

BEETHOVEN: Violin Concerto. Yehudi Menuhin, violin; The New Philharmonia Orchestra; Otto Klemperer, cond. Angel (S) 36369.

This performance unfolds with that almost beatless continuity that characterized Fürtwängler's conducting. It is, in fact, the most Fürtwängler-like performance by Klemperer I have heard, in which the semblance appears to arise out of an idea about creating a full-orchestral articulative analogue to the solo violin's super-legato, to counterpoise the super-demarcation of the opening drumbeats that become a succession of fourfold, one-note reiterations through the first movement. Menuhin, too, is evidently still possessed of unusual violinistic capacities, and is capable also of a genuine conceptual collaboration in the projection of this rather special idea of the Concerto; the total legato achieved in the unfolding of the slow movement is perhaps the most remarkable result of its realization.

Other recent releases of special interest:

WAGNER: Tristan und Isolde. Birgit Nilsson, Wolfgang Windgassen, Christa Ludwig, Martti Talvela, Eberhard Wächter. Bayreuth Festival Company; Karl Böhm, cond. DGG 139 221/25.

Die Walküre. Birgit Nilsson, Regina Crespin, Christa Ludwig, James King, Hans Hotter, Gottlob Frick; Vienna Philharmonic; Georg Solti, cond. London A 4509/OSA 1509.

WUORINEN: Piano Variations (see The Nation, May 4 1964). Martirano: Cocktail Music. Burge: Eclipse II. David Burge, piano. Advance FGR 3.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALGONQUIN 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

PERSONALS

LITERARY THEORY & CRITICISM IN THE GERMAN DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC: Lecture by Professor Gaylord Leroy, Temple University. American Society for the Study of the G.D.R., 777 United Nations Plaza, Hardin Room, May 25, 7:30 P.M.

PEACE STICKERS: Five different kinds. Defoliate LBJ Ranch, End the War, others. 1/2" x 2". 250/$1, 50/25c. Student Peace Union Box 141, Staten Island, N. Y. 10301.

USE LAWFUL DIRECT ACTION to repeal all abortion laws LEGALIZE ABORTION, POB 24163, Los Angeles, Calif. 90024.

Advertising Rates

CLASSIFIED

74c ■ line (6 words) Three-line minimum

CLASSIFIED DISPLAY

$7.42 per inch (minimum)

The NATION

333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014
242-8400

Crossword Puzzle No. 1202

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS:

- 1 One might get furious, if I'm to use up the difference. (9)
- 6 God's hand in the Recessional? (5)
- 9 Conducted around one who has debts decreased. (7)
- 10 Also in a rip-roaring time it has material significance. (7)
- 11, 12 and 13 International beauty contest winners in New York a few years ago? (3, 6, 4)
- 15 Said to be confused in the rackets with rejects. (8)
- 16 Might record your views in place of the council. (6)
- 18 They seem to be unhappy with what used to start at the turn of a hand. (6)
- 20 When one isn't occupied? (4, 4)
- 23 See 5 down
- 24 Rather gaudy, like amber at times? (6)
- 25 See 5 down
- 28 One thousand in 10 is changed to another thousand by the conductor. (7)
- 29 Character possibly favored by illumination at one time. (7)
- 30 Wilde's character in a vulgar sense—quite a bird, that is. (5)
- 31 Made straight for one end of the line, if it loses direction. (9)

DOWN:

- 1 A tiny version of such as Britain self-proclaimed to be tenanted. (5)
- 2 Dusts for some of those interned for duration around a communist uprising. (7)

- 3 One object of the tackle is to find reversions to type. (10)
- 4 Ranking officers might be. (8)
- 5, 23 and 25 across D'Artagnan had it good! (Points to a person's being with it!) (13)
- 6 Constellation load would be a hundred too much. (4)
- 7 Served at the June 1st puzzler's party? (You'll pardon the flourish!) (7)
- 8 Carey gets into trouble in the water, possibly on top of a big meal. (5, 4)
- 14 Grain types, as one might speak of late deserved merit. (10)
- 15 Behave like a rotter? (9)
- 17 Using iron this way may be important.
- 19 Weeper for Willie? (7)
- 21 Certainly not a good inch around the cube, identified with Wales. (3, 4)
- 22 Actor, musician, and athlete. (6)
- 26 Picketed, possibly, but showed some signs of being shocked by it. (5)
- 27 Did Jolson always seem to be down on one? (4)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1201

ACROSS: 1 Barber shops; 9, 10 and 11 Time out of mind; 12 Tiny Tim; 13 Passage; 15 Cerement; 16 Napery; 18 Access; 21 Cockpits; 24 Conquer; 26 Prorate; 29 Iliac; 30 Owed; 31 Endless belt. DOWN: 2 Acetylene; 3 Bromide; 4 Rite; 5 Hofmann; 6 Pumps; 7 Divide; 8 Onager; 14 and 27 Stickpins; 17 Paper doll; 19 Crowns; 20 Special; 22 Corncob; 23 Tatter; 25 and 28 Queen Anne.

MALVIN REYNOLDS PRODUCTIONS

At your bookshop:

- Little Boxes and Other Handmade Songs $2.45
- The Muse of Parker Street 2.45
- Tweedles and Foodles (children's songs) 1.75

At your record shop:

Malvina Reynolds Sings the Truth (Columbia 2614)

or write:

Schroder Music Co.
2027 Parker St., Berkeley, Calif. 94704

PUBLICATIONS

THE IDLER. Lively, offbeat, liberal monthly. $1 brings four different sample back issues. Idler, 413B 6th St., N. E., Washington, D. C. 20002.

"SELECTED POEMS" of George Flynn (Villiers of London $2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound."—James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at 544-82 St., Brooklyn 9, N.Y.

THE BLUE OF DECODING THE HUMANS by Bibi Beebi, 116 pp., price $3.00. Popular Non-Newtonian, etc., physics, astronomy, culturology, philosophy. The Inventist, P. O. Box 17039, Los Angeles, Calif. 90017.

EDUCATIONAL

FIVE DAY BOARDING SCHOOL. A unique program for people who have not even considered a boarding school. Grades five through eight. THE THOREAU SCHOOL. An intimate, cooperative community, combining study with the tasks and joys of farm living. School bus brings your children home to NYC week-ends. Small classes, individual instruction. Now enrolling for September. Write: Rodman, RD 1, Walkill, N.Y. 12589. Phone: 914-895-5523.

ART

ORIGINALS COST LESS THAN REPRODUCTIONS! Contemporary original signed etchings, lithographs, woodcuts, $3.50. Guarantee. Free brochure. GRAPHIC CIRCLE (NA), 68 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10011.

KHAJURAHO'S EROTIC SCULPTURES: Thousand Year Old Temple Friezes of Hindu Arts, Carnal Love, Masterpieces Chandra Architecture. Twelve Color Slides $10. TEMPLEVIEWERS, Box 25101, Cincinnati, Ohio 45225.

TRAVEL

The OTHER Israel—a three-week summer program for young people 21 to 35—a dialogue with young Israeli socialists—meet farmers, workers, Arabs, labor leaders, peace groups, parliament members—live and work in a kibbutz—tour the country, $625.00. For details write: Young Americans for Progressive Israel, 150 Fifth Avenue, Room 700, New York, N. Y. 10011.

SUMMER RENTAL

WESTBROOK VICINITY — LAKEFRONT Studio Apartment, private entrance, complete kitchen, sleep 2; swimming-boating-fishing on private lake; golf, tennis nearby. Season $500. Morgenstern, Deep River, Conn. 06417. Tel: 203 LA 6-2163 or Eves: NYC 324-9135.

Puzzle Fans

You are invited once again to meet our puzzle maker, Frank Lewis. The Nation will hold a buffet supper on the evening of Thursday, June 1, from 6 o'clock on, at the Harvard Club, 27 West 44 Street. All devotees of Mr. Lewis will be welcome guests. Please let us know as soon as possible if you intend to come. Write or call The Nation, 333 Sixth Avenue, N. Y. 10014. Telephone 242-8400.

Readers are invited to send for a free copy of Mr. Lewis' "ground rules." Address your request to Puzzle Department, The Nation, 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N. Y. 10014.

HOW WOULD YOU LIKE TO OWN THE "WORLD'S LARGEST BOOKSTORE?"

Sound like an impossible dream?

Perhaps. But, you'll find membership in the American Cultural Society is the closest thing yet to owning your own bookstore. Now, you can have your choice from the more than 166,000 books in print at guaranteed savings of 25% to 60%! If you love literature and fine art, you'll want to become a member of this unique new society,

No purchase obligation!

There is absolutely no obligation to buy at any time, and you will never be annoyed with "monthly selections". You buy only the books you really want to read, and each comes at a guaranteed savings of 25% to 60%. There are no minimum purchase requirements.

American Cultural Society was designed for people who know their own minds.

Here's how it operates:

$5 entitles you to lifetime membership in the American Cultural Society. You will receive the Society's periodic publication "Book Mark" which lists hundreds of titles including the most recent fiction and nonfiction best sellers. You will find a generous sampling of the world's finest literature at large reductions.

"Book Mark"—a periodic catalog of the world's finest literature!

The books you order from "Book Mark" will always be priced at 25% to 60% off the publisher's regular list price plus a small postage and handling charge. However,

SAVE 25-60%
for the rest of your life with no purchase obligation!

you are never limited to selections from "Book Mark." Any book, from the more than 166,000 in print, may be ordered at a 25% saving from regular list price. (Discounts are lower on technical manuals, reference books and texts. As a member, write our Reader Service Department for special price quotes.)

Lowest possible prices and satisfaction guaranteed!

Society prices are the lowest possible! The nationwide buying power of the Society commands vast discounts—discounts which are always passed on to you as a member.

Books purchased through the Society are always regular, full-size publishers editions. We guarantee complete satisfaction on every order or your money refunded.

To become a lifetime member of the American Cultural Society, fill out the membership application below, and mail with your check or money order for $5. "Book Mark" will be sent immediately.

AMERICAN CULTURAL SOCIETY
820 SHIPLEY STREET
WILMINGTON, DELAWARE 19801

Check these sample Society savings!

Title	List	Society
Ecstasy and Me	$5.95	$4.47
The Boys of Boise	5.95	4.47
The Boston Strangler	5.95	4.47
Madam Sarah	6.95	5.22
The Jury Returns	6.95	5.22
The Journal of Bentrix Potter	12.95	9.72
Ideal Marriage	7.95	5.96
Byzantium	10.00	7.50
ABZ of Love	10.00	6.95
Story of O	6.00	4.50
The Last Gentleman	5.95	4.17
La Vida	10.00	7.50
The Fixer	5.75	4.32
All In The Family	6.95	5.22
Naked Lunch	6.00	4.50
The Portrait in The Renaissance	12.50	9.38
Winston S. Churchill	10.00	7.50
The Mask of Apollo	5.95	4.47
American White Paper	5.95	4.47
Mastering the Art of French Cooking	10.00	6.69

Gift Membership available!

With each $5 regular membership, you may purchase one or more Gift Memberships at only $3 each. The same lifetime membership privileges apply—including regular editions of "Book Mark" and no purchase obligation.

(Please wait for membership materials before ordering books)

AMERICAN CULTURAL SOCIETY (126)
1005 Boston Post Rd., Rye, New York 10580
Enclosed is $5 (check or money order) for a regular lifetime membership in the American Cultural Society. Please send "Book Mark" immediately.

NAME _____

ADDRESS _____

CITY _____ STATE _____ ZIP _____

Enclosed also is $_____ for _____ gift memberships at $3 each.
(Please enclose additional sheet of paper with names and addresses of gift recipients.
Canadian and overseas memberships are payable in U.S. funds. Please wait for membership materials before ordering books.)

MAIL THIS APPLICATION TODAY!

PICASSO WALLACE FOWLIE

THE NATION

MAY 29, 1967 35 cents

BURLINGAME

MAY 29 1967

LIBRARY

Peace, Race and Power

THE NEW POLITICS GOES LOCAL

PAUL BOOTH

The Time-Life Caper

Brazil's Yankee Network

ERNEST BLUM

Louisville Happening

The Derby Runs Scared

LAWRENCE GRAUMAN, Jr.

Supersonic Transport II KARL M. RUPPENTHAL

KAY BOYLE on Dahlberg / JOEL LIEBER on Italo Svevo

SAMUELS on Alfred Chester / R. K. MORRIS on Anthony Powell

Our Puritan Roots LOREN BARTE

2-67 PLS-801
BURLINGAME PUB LIBRARY

NEWSPAPER

LETTERS

alienation's symbol

St. Louis, Mo.

DEAR SIR: Employing vague rumors and a relatively short interview, Robert Sherrill comes to the conclusion that Wallace is not a potent national figure and could not conceivably do well in the 1968 elections ["George Wallace: 'Running for God,'" The Nation, May 8].

Wallace is a representative symbol for alienated groups in our society. The frustrated remnants of the self-proclaimed superior classes in the South cling desperately to this last hope for their redemption. Unskilled white workers, fearing the Negroes and other minorities with whom they now must compete on identical levels, manifest their fears in support of someone (anyone!) who feeds their discontent with hope. Large industrialists and frustrated self-proclaimed aristocrats seek a man for the Presidency who would oppose the liberal trends and methods of dealing with a divergent population.

It is with these groups that Wallace aligns himself, and as seemingly unimportant as the gentleman from Alabama is to Mr. Sherrill, he is an ominously imposing figure. . . .

L. P. Matheis

'Poets on Poetry'

Peekskill, N.Y.

DEAR SIR: I will comment on only one aspect of your issue, "Poets on Poetry" [The Nation, Apr. 24]. Shouldn't it have been called "White Poets on White Poetry"? Not one black poet is mentioned in any way. I must add that The Nation is no exception to the general exclusion of black poets by white critics and anthologists.

Walter Lowenfels

New York City

DEAR SIR: I liked the poetry issue, especially Louis Simpson's piece which I think I'll have mimeographed and given to my advanced students. And I liked Robert Bly's piece.

Leonard Kriegel

Williamstown, Mass.

DEAR SIR: You deserve credit for doing an issue on poetry. . . . Paul Zweig's review of Lowell raised important questions about a major talent with a specificity that was at once persuasive and suggestive. . . . Other articles were good. . . like Louis Simpson's lively essay, about which, nevertheless, I have some gripes. First, Simpson's derision of New Criticism is as ill informed as it is gratuitous. The New Critics have attacked W. C. Williams in precisely the terms employed by Simpson. Second, as even Simpson seems to think, the "vatic poets" are mostly bad, and I don't for a moment see why we should look forward to hip Blake or unbuttoned Whitman. Third, though I share Simpson's admiration for Voznesensky, I don't see why he ends a prognosis for American poetry with the work of a mature talent in a wholly different tradition. . . . Your issue contained several good poems, most notably the Vallejo sonnet, which was a real discovery. . . .

Charles Thomas Samuels

New York City

DEAR SIR: My letter published in the May 8 Nation was cut in such a way that it seemed to confirm Louis Simpson's portrayal of me as a writer who has done nothing to protest the war in Vietnam and ridicules the attempts of others to do so, which is why I wrote the letter in the first place. The last paragraph of my original letter was as follows: "It should be evident from the foregoing that I was not 'sneering at the conscience of other poets' but

(Continued on page 692)

EDITORIALS

A Better Job for McNamara

"The Enemy—Exploring the Sources of Foreign Policy" is a thought-provoking article in the spring issue of Columbia University Forum. The author, Tom J. Farer, an assistant professor of law at Columbia and formerly special assistant to the general counsel of the Defense Department, inquires why we automatically fight revolutionary movements abroad.

Farer's presentation by-passes the vital need of the U.S. economy which the cold war filled after World War II—and still fills in such outbursts of shooting as in Vietnam. The concomitant arms race, supplemented later by space exploration, secured the economy against depression, and in the guise of resistance to Communist aggression enabled the corporate, political and military leaders to suppress (sufficiently for their purposes) the very freedoms which the cold war was supposed to defend. At the same time, the enormous productive capacity of the capitalist economy enabled it to make substantial contributions to the recovery of the nations that chose to side with us, and to keep the population at home content enough so that (except lately for a section of the Negro proletariat) they did not start on a dangerous comparison between what there was, and what might be.

Farer is preoccupied, however, not with the virtues of the cold war from the standpoint of its beneficiaries, large and small, but with its costs and perils. Why, he asks, have these moral disasters and diplomatic adversities failed so far to produce a single significant apostate from the Kennedy and Johnson Administrations, despite the presence of some intellectuals not vulnerable to charges of complaisance? Part of the answer, he suggests, may be "the lack in our government of a tradition of resignation on openly stated grounds of principle, a lack which is in large measure a function of the unusual indifference, bordering on contempt, of our Establishment to dissent premised on moral scruples."

This indifference, of course, is a necessary component of the cold war. But as long as it is not total, Farer's question is pertinent, the more so when we contrast the void in moral dissent among those who possess power with the intensity of dissent among some of those who lack power—for instance, a large section of the academic community—and further, when we compare this void with the tradition of principled dissent in British politics. There, a minister who has had his fill of moral degradation resigns. His letter of resignation is often revealing and politically influential. Having unbosomed himself, he resumes his seat in Parliament, stays in the doghouse for a while, and perhaps lives longer politically than the government whose immorality forced him to quit.

In American politics no one has dissented in this way for many years. Henry Wallace did (and look what it got him); Adlai Stevenson did not (and look what that got him). But that is history, for which our Establishment has, for the most part, the same contempt that it has for principle. Is there any present candidate who might inaugurate such a practice in American politics?

May 29, 1967

Only one name comes to mind: Robert S. McNamara. What an explosion he could set off! What an explosion he should set off! He is intelligent and patriotic. He has tamed the services, so far as anyone can in wartime. Now he differs from the Joint Chiefs of Staff on practically every issue, from the bombing of North Vietnam to the value of an anti-missile missile. His situation is becoming embarrassing, as in his attempt to reconcile his opposition of early April to bombing the MIG bases with his awkward justification, three weeks later, of the selfsame bombings.

By all indications, the Vietnamese War will drag on. Cured of his optimism of a few years ago, McNamara must see the futility of waiting for victory before quitting. If he finally gets out on some hypocritical pretext—health or family poverty—he will be missing the opportunity of a lifetime to serve his country, to which he owes much, rather than a President to whom he owes nothing.

Prologue

U Thant's warning that the initial phase of World War III is being fought in Vietnam has been brushed off by the Johnson Administration. Folly is thus piled on folly. Diplomatically, U Thant has the pulse of the world at his finger tips. He is probably better informed than President Johnson, he is certainly better able to gauge future Chinese reaction, and as a neutral he can afford to be objective.

No great war has burst on the world without warning. World War I was preceded by the Balkan War of 1912 and the clash of the Great Powers in the Algeiras incident. The Spanish Civil War (1936-39) was the prelude to World War II. The premonitory rumblings were unheeded, and they are being neglected once more.

The Vietnamese War drags on interminably, the omens of culminating disaster multiply. Every day's newspaper adds to the list:

¶ We announce that an Air Force F-105 Thunderchief may have inadvertently flown into Red China territory after being damaged in aerial combat.

¶ Soviet ships sideswipe U.S. destroyers in the confined waters of the Sea of Japan. This is a warning in the language of military powers, before worse collisions take place. It follows earlier warnings by the Soviets of a step-up in military activity on their part.

¶ The Soviets introduce portable 140 mm. rocket launchers—light, efficient and cheap. These weapons were first used in the North around February 27; about May 11 they were brought close to Saigon.

¶ British merchant seamen in Hong Kong say that while

IN THIS ISSUE

EDITORIALS

674

ARTICLES

678 The Time-Life Caper:
Brazil's Yankee Network

Ernest Blum

682 The New Politics Goes Local

Paul Booth

685 Supersonic Transport II:
Heat, Cold, Radiation & the Boom

Karl M. Ruppenthal

689 Louisville Happening:
The Derby Runs Scared

Lawrence Grauman, Jr.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

693 A Man in the Wilderness

Kay Boyle

694 The Compleat Picasso

Wallace Fowlie

695 Humanizing the Image

Joel Lieber

696 High Camp in the Underground

Charles T. Samuels

697 Dancing in Cadence

Robert K. Morris

699 Our Puritan Roots

Loren Baritz

700 The Trust (poem)

James Tate

701 Art

Max Kozloff

702 Paulo Climbing Down Through
A Tree (poem)

Ned O'Gorman

703 Crossword Puzzle

Frank W. Lewis

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Associate Publisher
GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Associate Editor
PHIL KERBY

Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIAS

Copy Editor
MARION HESS

Poetry Editor
MICHAEL GOLDMAN

Theatre
HAROLD CLURMAN

Washington
ROBERT G. SHERRILL

Art
MAX KOZLOFF

Paris
ALEXANDER WERTH

Music
BENJAMIN BORETZ

London
RAYMOND WILLIAMS

Science
CARL DREHER

Bonn
C. AMERY

Advertising Manager
MARY SIMON

Canberra
C. P. FITZGERALD

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July and August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1967 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel.: CH 2-8400. West Coast office: 1256 Westwood Boulevard, Los Angeles, Calif. 90024. Tel.: GR 4-2533. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give four weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE
NATION
Combined with FRONTIER

Volume 204
No. 22

their vessel was in Haiphong they saw ■ Red Chinese ship fire at U.S. aircraft on April 23.

¶ The military take over the "other war" in Vietnam. Civilian officials are reported to be appalled, but the reason given is that the South Vietnamese government troops could not hold "pacified" areas.

¶ The American correspondent Simon Malley, obtaining ■ Chinese visa as a UN correspondent for Jeune Afrique, reports on an interview with Chou En-lai. China would intervene, Chou says, if the North Vietnamese request "volunteers," or if U.S. land forces invade North Vietnam, or if the Soviets and the Americans cooperate in a "sell-out" of Hanoi. In short, the Chinese will not tolerate an American victory in Southeast Asia. Chou denies there was an interview—which may mean that he now feels the threat should have been harsher.

¶ Senators like John Sherman Cooper and Thruston B. Morton, who are not easily alarmed, urge de-escalation.

¶ As another warning to the West, the Chinese mount violent demonstrations against "British imperialism" in Hong Kong.

An ominous note running through all these events is that the American public, and even members of Congress, do not know what is going on until some overt incident occurs. The destroyer clash in the Sea of Japan is a striking example. How many Americans knew that our naval vessels, in cooperation with those of Japan, were engaged in maneuvers near Vladivostok and North Korea, and that our naval vessels occasionally sail into the Sea of Okhotsk to the north, which except for its mouth, is entirely within the Siberian land mass?

"Overshadowing all," says Senator Cooper, "is the dread possibility that the matching of power by power will lead relentlessly to a third world war. It is to prevent such a confrontation which would foreclose the chance for negotiations . . . that I ask our government, acting in the full confidence that arises from strength, to confine and restrain our bombing—if bomb it must—to infiltration routes near the Demilitarized Zone. . . ." Cooper concurs, in effect, with U Thant's warning. The next favorable occasion for some show of flexibility on the U.S. side is the Buddha's birthday celebration on May 23. As the Charleston (W. Va.) Gazette says, the world situation is screaming for a courageous peace act. There may not be another chance.

The Civilian Count

The status of the Congress is certainly in some eclipse in this era of the Great Texan, but even so a Senator is not someone to be brushed lightly aside. When one of them makes it plain that he intends to be possessed of a particular bit of information, he can usually find out what he wants to know.

It may, however, take some persistence and a good deal of staff terrier work, and Sen. Edward Kennedy is accordingly to be commended for having placed before the public some credibly derived figures on the war casualties occurring among civilian South Vietnamese. Senator Kennedy's total is 100,000 a year, and rising. He derives it by estimating that the 50,000 civilians which the United States Mission in Saigon expects to treat for war-related injuries in government hospitals this year cannot possibly be more than 50 per cent of the number wounded. According to the Senator's investigation, it takes on the average thirty-six hours for civilians to reach a medical center; obviously, many never attempt the journey and many die on the way. Many are dead on the spot.

The Administration does not care for the Kennedy figures and offers others of its own, hoping to involve everyone in a numbers game which will divert attention from the central fact that we are wounding and killing a great many civilians in Vietnam, and that each month we wound and kill more than suffered at our hands the month before. Plans are under way to build three hospitals in the war-torn country exclusively for civilian casualties. Plane and helicopter lifts are being advocated to bring the victims to these centers, and sundry blandishments are being employed to gather more doctors into the civilian program from the United States and from the non-Communist world at large.

These efforts are exemplary in themselves, and help to improve our image: kill we must in the interest of a better world for the Vietnamese, but we kill with reluctance, with compunction. Those we only partially kill we will patch together again—insofar as we can induce doctors to practice their craft under conditions of such inadequate supplies and facilities as to caricature the concept of healing.

Officialdom notes that there are always civilian casualties in wartime and agrees that a guerrilla war (which our enemy, lacking aircraft and heavy armament, insists upon fighting) produces peculiarly high death and injury ratios among the women, children and indigenous elderly. All we are trying to do is to kill Vietnamese who disagree with us, but accidents will happen. Much credit is due Senator Kennedy for giving us some notion of how these accidents are adding up on the tape of history.

The Doctors' Dilemma

A real crisis calls forth deep loyalties which are scarcely perceived, or are taken for granted, in less troubled times. The trial of Dr. Howard Brett Levy is a case in point. Dr. Levy, one may surmise, would rather be known as a physician than as a captain in the Army, but he is a captain, and as a captain he is being tried at Fort Jackson, S.C., for willful refusal to obey an order. The order sounds harmless enough: to teach dermatology—Levy's specialty—to Green Beret medical aidmen who were about to be shipped to Vietnam. Levy would surely not be averse to such teaching if it were entirely a matter of healing, but he takes his Hippocratic obligations seriously. The aidmen are also trained to fight, therefore he will not teach them medicine. As a physician, he feels that he owes an overriding loyalty to his profession, and that this takes precedence over his loyalty to his country in a conflict like that now raging in Vietnam.

At Levy's court-martial another captain, Ivan Mauer, was called as a government witness. He could not have given much comfort to the prosecution. Mauer had replaced Levy as chief of the dermatology clinic at the Fort Jackson hospital, and he said that he likewise would refuse to obey the order that had got Levy into trouble. The training of the Green Beret aidmen in dermatology is now in the hands of a civilian doctor who, presumably, is not plagued by the conflicts of the two captains.

In the San Francisco Bay Area, 121 medical students from Stanford and the University of California Medical Center have signed petitions declaring that they will refuse to serve with the armed forces in Vietnam, if and when they are drafted. This might be dismissed as a premature warning and an exhibition of youthful idealism that will be dissipated by mature wisdom, but the position of these young men is supported in varying degree by some 100 faculty members at the two institutions. This movement appears to be gaining momentum elsewhere in the country: an additional 133 signatures have been collected at twenty-three other medical schools, Harvard, Yale and Albert Einstein among them.

"Of course," says Arthur B. Zelman, one of the West Coast objectors, "I'd never refuse to care for a wounded soldier. What I object to is treating patients selectively in the military context. We all really want to save lives and the only way to do it is to refuse to go to Vietnam. In that way, perhaps the Administration will have some second thoughts about the war."

This Administration has ever had but one thought; nevertheless, a large-scale assertion of the right of doctors to refuse military service might cause it to ponder a little before the next escalation.

NASA and the Media

Until January 27, 1967, the National Aeronautics and Space Agency was the showpiece of the Johnson Administration, as it had been of the Kennedy administration. The public impression, fostered less by the agency itself than by the press, was that NASA, unlike any other engineering organization from the time of the Caesars to 'date, could do no wrong. With its contractors, it had performed miracles, bringing the United States in a few years from a position of inferiority in space to invincible leadership. It was widely believed—and for this notion NASA was as responsible as its admirers — that the American team would sweep on to a triumphant landing on the moon in 1969, perhaps even in 1968. And the astronauts would come back alive to enjoy the plaudits of friendly and neutral nations, and the discomfiture of our enemies.

Technological hubris is no more immune than any other kind from the tragic disclosure of fallibility. When the three astronauts perished on the pad in a fire that no one had foreseen, under operating conditions that gave them not the slightest chance of escape, the illusion built up over the years vanished in a few seconds. The fact that some remarkable engineering had gone into the Mercury and Gemini flights was forgotten. Also forgotten was the responsibility of those on the outside who had fed the myth when they should have been skeptical.

The way in which the heroic image was created and maintained tells a great deal about what is called, with appropriate genuflection, the American Way. In part it was the product of the idiot variety of patriotism, but in larger part it was a matter of money. NASA received its $5 billion every year with a minimum of Congressional inquiry, and became in effect an ever-flowing pork barrel for the aerospace industry. Who wanted to get tough with NASA when it was providing all those jobs and all that prosperity for the great corporations that it was supposed to keep at arm's length? According to Business Week (April 15), the United States can still probably get its first team of astronauts to the moon for $22.8 billion. A sum like that creates an enormous reservoir of good will. To a large extent the aerospace industry press, which was in the best position to know what was going on and to find fault when indicated, chose instead to cheer.

With such an example, it is not hard to understand the attitude of the broadcasters, who simply made an entertainment piece out of the moon project, on a par with soap operas and Westerns, but with more of a kick and at less expense. The astronauts were used to sell beer, razor blades and detergents, and Life bought their memoirs. When the three perished on the pad, the magazine paused only a few weeks before canceling the contract. The boys weren't entertaining any more.

With some outstanding exceptions, the newspapers also fell short. Had it not been for a few tough-minded journalists like William Hines of the Washington Star (who did a piece for The Nation: "NASA: The Image Misfires," April 24), we might know even less of the NASA story. It is even possible that without such gadflies the report of the board of inquiry would not have been as severe and thorough as it was.

In his first appearances after the investigation began, NASA Administrator James E. Webb gave an impression of candor, but later he took refuge in such early-NASA devices as parading astronauts before the camera, and he aroused outright distrust by his defense of the choice of North American Aviation as the prime Apollo contractor. At first he testified that North American was the first choice of the NASA source-evaluation board. Three weeks later he acknowledged that the Martin Company had been preferred by the technical people. There is nothing to indicate that Martin would have done better than North American, but Webb's conflicting stories do not inspire confidence. Nor do his antecedents—his earlier connections with the late Sen. Robert S. Kerr, for example—make him an ideal leader for the balance of the Apollo program.

Worse than anything Webb has done in the past is his commitment to land on the moon before 1970. He seems oblivious to the pleas of responsible scientists and journalists to abandon a fixed deadline and allow future experience to set the pace. Rep. William F. Ryan's suggestion that a high-level Presidential commission be established to review NASA's work, and the schedule to be followed, seems very much in order.

An Insufficiency of Frankness

The latest disclosures about how the CIA bankrolled the Congress for Cultural Freedom—which in turn bankrolled Encounter, the Anglo-American monthly—have precipitated a heavy and extensive fallout. Stephen Spender has resigned as a contributing editor of Encounter, on the ground that he had been kept in total darkness about the covert CIA connection. Frank Kermode, the co-editor, has also resigned. "I was always assured," he writes, "that there was no truth in the allegations about the CIA funds. On several occasions I gave false assurances about the facts on which I had been led astray." Irving Kristol, a former co-editor, deposes that he, too, was innocent of any knowledge about CIA largess during his stay with the magazine.

Melvin Lasky, the present editor, is, of course, in a somewhat different position. He was one of the three founders of the Congress for Cultural Freedom (Arthur Koestler and Michael Josselson were the others), with funds provided by David Dubinsky's International Ladies' Garment Workers Union (at least that was the immediate source of the initial funds). Mr. Lasky, faced with the flak the disclosures have given off, now concedes that he may have been "insufficiently frank" in briefing his colleagues about the relationship with the CIA.

Indeed, a lack of frankness colors every aspect of what The Observer has called "The Encounter Affair." Michael Josselson, who apparently will stay on as executive director of the Congress, admits that he was placed in a position of having to deceive "the people I most respected, admired and liked, and who gave me their trust wholeheartedly." Last year, when The Nation (May 16, 1966) commented on the fact—well known even then, although apparently not to the editors of Encounter—that the magazine for some years had been indirectly financed by the CIA, we were promptly taken to task by Stephen Spender, Melvin Lasky and Irving Kristol in a letter published in our issue of June 13, 1966, which strongly implied (though on close reading it did not actually charge) that our editorial was defamatory. The tone of the letter was belligerent and threatening.

At the same time, we also received, and published, a similar protestation of innocence and virtue from the Congress for Cultural Freedom, signed by Denis de Rougemont, as chairman of the Executive Committee, and formally attested—no doubt for added emphasis—by Nicholas Nabokov. But to date we have received no letters apologizing for the attempt to mislead us. This pervading insufficiency of frankness tends, as the Congress itself now concedes, "to poison the wells of intellectual discourse." Examining the acrimony which the Braden disclosures in The Saturday Evening Post precipitated, we strongly sympathize with Mr. Spender who points out that the revelations of past CIA support have created "a tangle in which one doesn't know what the past is." Perhaps it never happened. Perhaps Tom Braden, who set up the "front" program for the CIA, is mistaken in saying that he named one agent for the Congress and another to edit Encounter. Perhaps it was all a multimillion-dollar misunderstanding.

THE TIME-LIFE CAPER

BRAZIL'S YANKEE NETWORK

ERNEST BLUM

Mr. Blum is a New York financial writer now living and working in Latin America.

For almost two years, Time-Life, Inc., has been the chief target in Brazil of an increasingly vehement protest against the presence of U.S. money and influence in key sectors of the Brazilian press. The legal basis for the indignation rests on Brazil's constitution, which—in both the 1946 and 1967 versions—strictly forbids foreign ownership, even partial ownership, of the nation's communications media. Despite this clear prohibition, Time-Life has since 1962 pumped more than $6 million into Rio de Janeiro's leading television station, TV Globo, which is associated with Rio's leading newspaper, O Globo. Upon receiving this flood of Time-Life dollars, TV Globo suddenly embarked on an expansionary course, buying up TV and radio stations in the key industrial city of Sao Paulo and in the politically brittle Northeast.

With an eye to further growth, TV Globo has pending applications to set up a thirty-six-station TV and radio chain extending to all the major cities of Brazil and covering 95 per cent of the population. The expansionary program was termed by the head of a Presidential investigating commission "an imminent danger of the propagation throughout the entire country . . . of the domain of Time-Life."

The facts in this affair were uncovered by two investigating panels—one congressional, the other Presidential—formed after an insistent chorus of accusations had begun to arouse and shock public opinion. The investigating commissions, in the middle of last year, disclosed contracts by Time-Life of transparent hanky-panky (such terms have been plastered all over the Brazilian press) that provided an epidemic of embarrassed head shaking even among the American business colony here.

Forbidden to acquire ownership of Brazilian news media, Time-Life went into the "real estate" business and acquired on January 15, 1965, ownership of the premises of TV Globo. It became thus not an owner of TV Globo but the station's "landlord," renting the premises to the new "tenant." However, the distinction between Time-Life as landlord and Time-Life as owner becomes altogether academic in view of another provision of the contracts, which gives Time-Life no less than 45 per cent of the net profits of the station (this is called "rental"). Since another contract gives Time-Life 3 per cent of TV Globo's gross receipts, the "landlord" could conceivably make more from the station than the "tenant." (TV Globo is also obliged to pay 55 per cent of the upkeep.)

But these arrangements by no means exhaust the revelations that the Brazilian public has been treated to in the past months. Besides outlawing foreign ownership of the press, the constitution provides that management of news media "shall fall exclusively to Brazilians." But still another contract between Time-Life and TV Globo calls for placing a Time-Life executive in TV Globo, "with qualifications equivalent to those of a manager of a TV station." This contract—dating back to July 24, 1962, and called, somewhat euphemistically, an agreement of "technical assistance"—also provides for sending another Time-Life executive into the station to be "responsible for accounting and financing." (After the arrival of the Time-Life executives, TV Globo's Brazilian station manager resigned.)

The congressional committee investigating the deal unanimously condemned it as illegal, labeling Time-Life "the silent partner." The panel said: "The contracts violate the constitutional precepts because they mask the corporate link between Time-Life and TV Globo in a formal sense, but present the hidden components of an unmistakable corporate link."

The Brazilian federal agency responsible for licensing radio and TV stations, CONTEL, ruled that the contracts violate "the letter and spirit" of the constitution and gave TV Globo ninety days to "clean up" the situation. Contrary to CONTEL's regulations, TV Globo never submitted the agreements for CONTEL's approval. When CONTEL demanded to see them, after the publicity furor, the station's owner, Roberto Marinho, submitted copies that were so illegible from erasures that CONTEL promptly returned them. The agency was not to get clear copies until months later.

The 1965 "rental" agreement actually superseded an earlier agreement signed at the time of the 1962 "technical assistance" agreement (TV Globo was then in the planning stage). That agreement, called a "joint participation," expressly labeled Time-Life's then 30 per cent interest in the station a "foreign investment." Apparently the 1965 "landlord" contract was designed to circumvent possible allegations of a Time-Life proprietorship.

Marinho, the owner of the nationally distributed O Globo and an operator whose other "deals" have won him notoriety, received $1.5 million from Time-Life in 1962 under the "joint-participation," according to testimony before the investigating panels.

The head of the Bank of Brazil has disclosed that, starting in 1965 and up until May, 1966, a new influx of money exceeded $4.5 million. Of these funds, $980,000 is designated as Time-Life's payment for purchase of TV Globo's building; the remainder is promissory notes negotiated by Marinho (no date being set for repayment) and which he has called "loans."

When the money began to arrive in 1965, TV Globo acquired a chain of two TV and five radio stations located in the key states of Sao Paulo (one of the TV stations is the city of Sao Paulo's important TV Paulista) and Pernambuco, in the Northeast. Marinho admitted before the Presidential investigating panel: "I applied part of the sums sent by Time-Life on TV Paulista. . . ." As recently as last November Marinho acquired the second of Rio's four 50 kilowatt radio stations, thus adding Radio Mundial to Radio Globo.

Brazilians—and many Americans—are asking themselves what exactly Time-Life has in mind. Does it intend, in some delusion of grandeur, to "help" the State Department and the United States Information Agency in getting Uncle Sam's message across? In fact, that may be just what Time-Life has in mind.

Julio de Mesquita Filho, the publisher of O Estado de Sao Paulo, a conservative paper of a prestige comparable to that of The New York Times in the United States, has revealed that shortly before Time-Life con-summed the TV Globo deal in 1962, representatives of the American organization approached him with a similar offer. The reason for the proposed undertaking, it was explained, was the need to set up propaganda bulwarks against the immediate threat of Castroism in Latin America. The Brazilian publisher rejected the offer and explained to the Time-Life emissaries that Brazil did not require U.S. occupation of its communications media in order to combat communism.

However, Time-Life's infiltration of O Globo is not the only example of American influence in the Brazilian press; the initial scandal has now proliferated to the point of raising the issue of Brazil's right to—and imperative need for—a press independent of powerful foreign concerns having a vested interest in public opinion.

As in other developing countries, vast sectors of Brazil's economy are almost totally dominated by foreign corporations. While in many respects the presence of foreign firms is an asset to the economy, the interests of the foreign corporations and the national interests of Brazil do not always coincide. Furthermore, Brazil is unquestionably the key country of Latin America, and is emerging with international interests divergent from those of the United States.

In these circumstances, Brazilians are zealous to guard their communications channels from foreign control. As the congressional panel investigating the Time-Life affair put it: "National public opinion is not a manufactured product imported from abroad; we want to forge our own public opinion with our own forces." Yet in spite of these obvious considerations, one learns in Brazil how formidable are the attacks upon a nationally independent press.

Among the most notable of them has been the case of the "grupo Visao." This organization, founded by and corporately linked to Vision, Inc., with headquarters in New York, for fourteen years published the major weekly news magazine in Brazil—Visao (patterned after Time). This magazine, the only one of its kind in the country, was reporting on Brazilian affairs, editorializing on politics and economics, subtly taking sides on the whole spectrum of issues in Brazilian life, while linked to a New York corporation.

In 1965, "grupo Visao" launched a series of high-powered trade magazines—Dirigente Industrial (Industrial Manager), Dirigente Rural (Agricultural Manager), Dirigente Constructor (Construction Manager)—aimed at the full range of Brazil's top managerial class. They are subsidized by foreign corporations—with up to 60 per cent of the advertisements—and are distributed free to a controlled circulation list, an innovation which has competing trade magazines crying "foul play."

Late last year, apparently as a result of the Time-Life revelations, the corporate links between Vision, Inc., of New York, and Visao were ostensibly severed; the magazine moved its offices and started publishing separately from the Dirigente group. The latter, however, are still believed to be linked to New York.

Also in the magazine field, Editora Abril, one of Brazil's two top magazine chains, has been repeatedly accused of links with Time-Life. This mammoth publisher with nineteen different magazines, is headed by a former Time-Life employee, Victor Civita—an Italian-born ex-U.S. citizen, now a naturalized Brazilian. What appears suspect about Senhor Civita is not only his former Time-Life connections but the fact that in 1951, when he emigrated to Brazil, his brother, Cezar, emigrated to Argentina—to found a similar Editora Abril in Buenos Aires. There the firm's flag magazine, Panorama, carries the name Time-Life on its masthead.

In radio, informed Brazilians looked on with dismay last year as the important twenty-nine-station radio chain, "Rede Piratininga," based in Sao Paulo, was taken over by the Brazilian associate of the World Wide Missionary Educational Foundation of West Monroe, La. Purchase price: $1.5 million.

Stricter enforcement of the law would eliminate some of the more flagrant press abuses, but a more basic and knottier problem would remain—that posed by the foreign advertiser.

The dominance of foreign advertising in the Brazilian press can be appreciated merely by leafing through any major magazine: the big international corporations have all the 1-page and multi-page ads. Moreover, this advertising is placed by American advertising agencies: the two biggest agencies in Brazil are J. Walter Thompson and McCann-Erickson. Four American agencies in Brazil (there are eight) handle an estimated 37 per cent of all agency billings in the country. It would be naive to suppose that this formidable foreign advertising apparatus does not exercise an implicit, and sometimes explicit, editorial influence.

The Spanish-language edition of one major Brazilian magazine, O Cruzeiro, was prospering with a circulation of 420,000 when Life decided to put its own Spanish-language edition into the field. Upon the appearance of the Spanish Life, the American corporations doing business in Latin America—the advertising backstay of O Cruzeiro—dropped the Brazilian publication and swung behind Life.

O Cruzeiro is published by Diarios Associados, whose twenty-three newspapers, seventeen radio stations, and thirteen TV stations make it the biggest press chain in Latin America. The founder is the venerable journalist and magnate, Assis Chateaubriand, and managing director is Joao Calmon, a congressman who is an important force in the government's ARENA coalition (he also heads Brazil's national trade association of radio and TV stations, ABERT).

When these two gentlemen—having a score to settle with Time-Life—heard the 1965 deal with TV Globo denounced by then-Governor Carlos Lacerda, they hit the war path. (Carlos Lacerda had gotten wind of the deal inadvertently: the presence in TV Globo of a mysterious Cuban “agent” was denounced to his security police. When arrested, the “agent” turned out to be Alberto Hernandez Cata, a Cuban refugee and $20,000-a-year Time-Life executive who, under questioning, spilled the beans about the deal.)

Chateaubriand, in the middle of 1965, led off with what was to become an unrelenting campaign against Time-Life, TV Globo, O Globo, and their owner, Marinho. Then early in 1966, Joao Calmon, in his capacity as head of ABERT, spoke repeatedly over his radio and television chain, each time sensationally revealing some newly discovered facet of the deal. Calmon branded the inflow of Time-Life funds a “little sea” of dollars, an effective pun on Marinho's name, which means “little sea.” Backing the Calmon initiatives, the major newspapers, radio and TV stations of Sao Paulo—led by O Estado de Sao Paulo—issued a joint “Manifesto to the Nation,” calling on the congress, the President and federal officials to act.

The only note of support for TV Globo came from two members of the three-man Presidential investigating panel, who glossed over the deal, although recommending that in the future “standards be adopted to avoid such close ties between national and foreign entities.” But the two members took at face value Time-Life's pose as a Brazilian “real estate” operator, deciding that the agreement “adopted a modality which has been frequent in commercial renting.” The third member, and chairman of this panel, however, has submitted the most vehement denunciation of the deal to come from any official source, calling Time-Life “incontestably the principal figure in the business.”

The Brazilian congress, following up a unanimous denunciation of the deal by its own investigating committee, inserted into the new press law in February the same strictures on foreign ownership or control contained in the constitution. In pointed reference to the Time-Life affair, the congress outlawed “any type of contract of ‘technical assistance’ with foreign entities allowing these entities, under any pretext whatsoever, to have a direct or indirect participation in management of journalistic enterprises.”

When the President failed to veto these provisions, the game seemed over for Time-Life. This feeling was reinforced on February 16, after President Castello Branco denied TV Globo's appeal against CONTEL's eleven-point condemnation of the contracts. But for the previous twenty months, the President had shown a singular lack of urgency in the matter—a detachment explained no doubt by the fact that O Globo is the most ardent press champion of “the Revolution,” and such support is hard to come by these days.

As they say in Brazil, “You think three times before defying O Globo,” and the President's time to think thrice came on March 3, when he handed O Globo's appeal to his attorney general. The attorney general, in a burst of legal activity, digested the thousands of pages of testimony in the case within five days—a “time record.” commented O Estado de Sao Paulo—and on March 8 handed his opinion to the President: the deal was legal. Thereupon, on March 1, only twenty-four hours before leaving office, President Castello Branco ordered CONTEL to re-examine the matter.

The President left another bequest before departing. To the press law's (and the constitution's) strictures against foreign ownership of the press, the President decreed the following amendment: “Excluded from the provisions are scientific, technical, cultural and artistic publications.” Since anything, even comic books, could come under one of the four rubrics, the provisions banning foreigners in the press would pack as much punch as a wet tea biscuit. O Estado de Sao Paulo commented that the amendment seemed specifically aimed as a sop to Editora Abril, its nineteen publications being “scientific, technical, cultural and artistic.” The provision would also allow Vision, Inc., of New York, to continue with its Dirigente magazines.

With this challenge from the outgoing President, the controversy has flared again to the boiling point. The Diarios Associados has stepped up its campaign (O Cruzeiro recently carried an article on Roberto Marinho by Carlos Lacerda, somewhat indelicately entitled, “The Al Capone of the Press”), while in March the formidable O Estado published a series of four major editorials blasting the Castello Branco actions and outlining the areas of foreign infiltration in the press. The whole business is now in the lap of President Costa e Silva.

Whatever the new President's action, Time-Life might like to pull out anyway—what with all the unpleasantness—but there's that money held by Roberto Marinho. Should Costa e Silva say “no” to the deal, Senhor Marinho might very well shrug his shoulders, regretfully cut Time-Life out of the profits, and continue to dispose of a fortune in dollars.

THE NEW POLITICS GOES LOCAL

PAUL BOOTH

Mr. Booth, former national secretary of SDS, is on the board of the National Conference for New Politics, and edits its discussion bulletin, Inter/Change.

Chicago

Around the country, a bizarre phenomenon is appearing on the political scene; thousands of dissenters are involved in movements which seek to counter the decisions of war and peace, made on the highest level of government, by offering candidates for local political office. These new movements have already begun to surface in California and Illinois, and almost every Tuesday between now and November there will be a local election somewhere.

To a man like Robert Scheer, whose campaign for Congress in the district that includes Berkeley and Oakland was the outstanding achievement of the electoral peace movement in 1966, there is no anomaly in this local approach to national issues. "The cold war has penetrated every aspect of our common life," he says, and the answer to it must be built on the aspirations of the ordinary people whose needs have been ignored and whose lives have been warped as a direct result of cold-war priorities. This analysis led the Berkeley Community for New Politics (CNP)—the organizational successor to the Scheer campaign—to offer three candidates for City Council in the April 4 election, and to win more than a third of the vote for them.

Civil rights advocates have also turned to local politics. In Chicago, two independent Negro candidates defeated Negro Democrats for the City Council, and Dick Gregory's protest campaign for mayor netted 20,775 write-in votes that were counted and an estimated equal number that were thrown out. But 1966 was just the first round; in 1967 independent Negro candidates will try to break the hold of the Democratic Party all over the country.

The peace and civil rights forces are consciously in coalition throughout the states. Members of Berkeley CNP went to work in behalf of Elijah Turner's ghetto-based campaign for Oakland City Council in the election held April 18. One of the new Chicago independent aldermen, A. A. (Sammy) Rayner, Jr., served as chairman of the peace movement's March 25 protest meeting at which Martin Luther King called for joint action to end the war in Vietnam and poverty and racism at home.

Yet the movements work independently, each on its own political timetable. Unmistakably, both are growing factors on the American political scene, and professional politicians from coast to coast are taking careful measure of their potential power.

Campaigns like that of Scheer in Berkeley represent a development in the thinking of peace advocates beyond the old "peace politics." In recent years, especially in the even-numbered years, such people have used November elections as occasions for expressing protest or for offering alternative policies. Only a few groups saw those dates as early milestones on the road to eventual political power.

In 1962 and 1966, the large number of peace candidates attracted the attention of the press and aroused a good deal of anxiety among professional party politicians, but in neither year did the effort merit the hoopla, once the votes were counted. In New Haven last fall, where Prof. Robert Cook as a third-party candidate had challenged the incumbent Democratic Congressman, Robert Giaimo, Town Chairman Arthur Barbieri introduced Giaimo to his victory party as "the man who beat Cook." But Cook got barely 5 per cent of the vote and even so he made the strongest showing of all the third-line candidates. Out of the soul-searching that followed November, 1966, a new political strategy was born, aimed at permanent organization for the steady accumulation of power.

This changeover has not been easy. The peace movement is a middle-class movement of a particular sort; it draws its rank and file from the most cosmopolitan elements of the professional class. Its members have developed their politics in reaction to The New York Times, to Huntley-Brinkley, and to the liberal journals, but never to the conditions of their own working lives or their immediate environment. One local peace-politics newsletter can be distinguished from the next only by examining the mailing wrapper; the contents refer exclusively to national and international concerns, never analyzing the city's power structure, commenting on the local welfare department, or even identifying the local draft boards or recording the names and numbers of local young people drafted, wounded or killed in the war.

This approach to the electorate has been essentially educational, discussing issues—primarily Vietnam—that would not otherwise be raised. One hundred candidates in twenty-five states campaigned on such issues in 1966. When the ballots were counted, the insurgents' areas of strength stood out on the map like a topography of the American professional class. In Newton, Ann Arbor, Hyde Park, Bethesda and hundreds of other university towns and white-collar suburbs, the peace movement gained thousands of backers. But these were islands of strength, enough to give independent candidates 3 per cent of the vote, and Democratic primary insurgents 15 per cent of the vote. The exceptions were provided by the campaigns, like Scheer's, that succeeded in attracting mass support in ghetto areas. The 1966 total added up to 1 million votes cast against the war, the product of prodigious efforts by peace people, most of whom were taking their message from door to door for the first time.

Some workers read this as another chapter in the story of moral men hopelessly isolated in an immoral land. But that reading doesn't square with the returns from Dearborn, Mich., where 41 per cent of the voters supported a referendum for withdrawal from Vietnam—and without a local peace movement or any substantial educational campaign around the issue.

The only interpretation that does square with the facts is that the peace movement has thus far failed to tap the anti-war sentiment existing in that 95 per cent of America that makes its political choices according to the most immediate and obvious conditions of social life—family, race, class, the state of the economy and how city hall has been treating the neighborhood. Slowly but surely, the argument about how to seize the attention of those ordinary Americans has begun to supplant the endless debates over the slogan of withdrawal, the dress and demeanor of marchers, the exclusion of Communists. Not that these earlier concerns have been resolved; it is one of the frustrations of work to end the war that arguments about effectiveness can't be resolved by factual evidence. The results of peace actions are felt less at the polls than in the intangible realm of "public opinion," and show up in elusive phenomena like the credibility gap.

"I've been through those arguments enough times to know them by heart. Up here, we've stopped listening to these discussions long enough to start organizing our own neighborhood."

That claim comes from C. Clark Kissinger, formerly national secretary of Students for a Democratic Society and the principal organizer of the first March on Washington to End the War in Vietnam. Early in 1966, he was hired by the peace-politics group in Chicago (Committee for Independent Political Action: CIPA) to work in the 49th Ward, a serene white middle-class community on Lake Michigan. Kissinger took a job teaching mathematics at a Catholic college in the ward, and began drawing out of the neighborhood a corps of political workers, mostly young professionals like himself.

Last summer they blitzed the neighborhood, obtaining 6,000 signatures to put two independent candidates on the ballot for state legislature, only to have their names removed by the politically dominated Board of Election Commissioners, with no cause stated. Thereupon, four CIPA workers forced the movement into the attention of their neighbors and the whole city by staging a sit-in at the election office and landing on the front pages (and in jail for the afternoon).

Kissinger was nominated over two other CIPA members for alderman in an open convention early last winter. His campaign began to prove that in his phrase "the war is a local issue." "At the very moment when funds are needed the most, the national Democratic Administration has chosen to make War our number-one social priority." The money to fight poverty in Chicago "is paying for the American expeditionary forces in Vietnam and Thailand." But Kissinger campaigned on other issues as well, identifying himself and CIPA to residents of Rogers Park as "the civil rights candidates" and the "radical group," as well as opponents of the war.

CIPA brought a busload of Englewood Negroes about to be evicted from their homes by urban renewal (the plan would tear down sound housing to build parking lots) to lily-white Rogers Park to look for homes. Kissinger attacked Mayor Daley and his machine as a local version of Johnsonism. And he argued to voters that "the one thing the Daley machine is not reluctant to give to poor and middle-class people is the bulk of the tax load. The Daley machine's basic alliance with the business community means that corporate profits go untaxed in Illinois." Issue-oriented politics in the 49th Ward meant that no piece of literature, not even the campaign buttons, would say merely "Kissinger for Alderman"; the pins read: "When a Machine short-changes you kick it," and the posters summarized the CIPA platform.

Actually, three varieties of insurgency entered the aldermanic elections in an effort to undermine Daley's organization. Even stronger than efforts of the New Left like CIPA, and traditional reform movements in a few wards, were the independent Negro candidates.

They ran in five of the wards that make up U.S. Rep. William Dawson's 1st District on the South Side, and in eight other wards of the city. These have been among the most solidly Democratic neighborhoods in the nation. Their overwhelming votes for Kennedy swung Illinois into the Democratic column in 1960, delivering the bloc of electoral votes that historians regard as the crucial ones. But three Negro independents made a significant impression on Chicago politics with strong showings in three of Dawson's wards in the February 28 and April 4 aldermanic elections.

In Woodlawn's 6th Ward Samuel Rayner, who is commander of Veterans for Peace in Vietnam, was elected to the council with more than 60 per cent of the vote, unseating one of the "Silent Six" incumbent Negro machine aldermen. Fred Hubbard, a young community organizer running in Dawson's own 2nd Ward, was credited with 42 per cent in the official count, and brought in enough evidence of vote padding to persuade everyone but the Board of Election Commissioners that a fair count would have elected him. And William Cousins, a board member of the local ADA chapter, got into a run-off in the 8th Ward and won election on April 4.

These successes represent the independent temper of voters on Chicago's South Side much more accurately than did Dick Gregory's showing as a write-in candidate for mayor. Not only was the Gregory campaign a pure protest effort, with hard work beginning only in March (by contrast, Hubbard has been organizing in the 2nd Ward since the late fifties) but the election judges were careful to credit him with less than half the votes he really got. He was given 20,775 votes (1.9 per cent), but the board's statistics show 31,000 voters who didn't vote for mayor, of which 24,000 were in wards with no aldermanic run-off election. Presumably they walked into the voting booth, stared at it, and decided to walk out without voting.

A fundamental challenge to the hegemony of the Daley-Dawson machine is unfolding, and all the parties to it, from the peace movement through every wing of the civil rights movement, are committed to continue the organizing work that has brought them the first taste of power. Three particular qualities of Chicago give their work national importance. Within the national Democratic coalition, the Chicago machine is the firmest element. No other organization approaches the cohesion and power of the combine that Richard J. Daley controls from his position as chairman of the Central Committee of the Cook County Democratic Party. And Chicago is a model for the country, judged by political scientists to be (with New Haven) one of the urban governments most successful at coordinating local power structures. Lyndon Johnson could learn a great deal about how to run the great consensus from Edward Banfield's Political Influence, in which Mayor Daley emerges as the master of the art.

Second, there is more community organizing in Chicago than in any other city, and that provides a basis for exercising political power in ways much more democratic than are available elsewhere. The city has a strong organization of poor whites—the JOIN Community Union. Its tenant unions on the West Side pioneered in winning collective bargaining contracts between tenants and slumlords. It is the home base of Saul Alinsky's efforts. And the bulk of its grass-roots community organizations are joining to create a new training school to expand their efforts; they hope to see poor people's candidates for alderman in fifteen wards by 1971.

Third, Chicago is sociologically very similar to dozens of small Midwestern cities. Its basic style is that of its white working class, expressed through a strong Catholic Church and a strong Democratic machine. But this style is threatened by the unrest of the ghettoized Negro population, already more than a third of the city and inching toward a majority.

On the North Side, Kissinger was not the only insurgent candidate of the under-30 generation from which magazines like Time anticipate so much political trouble. Al Kaplan, organizer of the local social workers union, and Jerry Herman, a public schoolteacher, ran in the 43rd and 42nd Wards, at the other end of the Ninth Congressional District from CIPA. All three received a little better than 5 per cent of the vote. CIPA felt the election showed that one kind of hard work is more productive than another: in the handful of precincts where the work was "intensive," with house meetings and hourlong individual conversations, the vote ran to 15 per cent and 20 per cent, whereas in precincts where the same number of man-hours went in canvassing every voter with leaflets and other "extensive" work, the results were close to the 5 per cent average for the whole ward.

CIPA and veterans of the Kaplan and Herman campaigns have begun discussions of joint work that would build around the concerns of the young professionals who make up their constituencies. These are workers in the organized service professions—teachers, professors, social workers, clergymen, planners—as distinct from doctors, lawyers and other "free professionals." To these people, new politics seems to go hand in hand with militant white-collar unionism, a New Left critique of the society, and work to end the war in Vietnam.

Berkeley, Calif., the logical place for such a development to appear in its most advanced form, lived up to its reputation. Not only did the Community for New Politics offer three candidates for city council who received 10,000 votes each, to 16,000 for the incumbents, but Jerry Rubin, organizer of the Vietnam Day Committee and a frequently arrested peace activist, ran a campaign for mayor that aimed to unify the "hippies" and the Left, and registered 7,000 votes, more than 20 per cent of the total.

Although Rubin and the CNP slate failed to gain office, one ghetto insurgent supported by both the peace and civil rights movements did win a seat on the city council—further evidence that the strength of independent politics is deepest in Negro neighborhoods.

In the Midwest, this tendency is general, and holds promise of becoming the outstanding fact of urban political life in America by the end of the decade. In Pittsburgh and Cleveland, further tests of its strength will take place before the year is out. State Rep. Carl Stokes, who came within 2,000 votes of unseating Cleveland's Mayor Ralph Locker two years ago, will announce his decision to make another try in the September 4 election. Pittsburgh is seeing a coalition effort with three candidates for city council offered by the new Allegheny Alliance. And in Gary, where the Negro population is close to the 50 per cent figure, civil rights attorney and city councilman Richard Hatcher in early May won the Democratic primary election in a three-way fight with Mayor Martin Katz and a backlash candidate, Bernard Konrady. He now is busy resisting the threats of the Democratic machine to stay home in November unless he modifies his program.

Hatcher's campaign was typical in its heavy stress on Negro rights; but the key to its success was its ability to organize tremendous grass-roots support in the ghetto around this program. On election night, 5,000 Negroes celebrated in the main street of Gary, closing down traffic for half a mile. But this same number had also been in attendance at several election rallies, and hundreds of the celebrators had pounded the pavement and worked the polls, as they will do again in November.

In East St. Louis, Ill., a new group called the Young Voters Coordinating Committee on April 4 won 25 per cent of the vote for its slate against the all-white Democratic machine. Oakland, Calif., has a Negro campaign for city council, and in Mississippi, where the Freedom Democratic Party has been a pioneer in independent politics, the November elections for state legislature will bring out a formidable Negro drive throughout the delta.

While national attention has been focused on the defense of Adam Clayton Powell, it is this new upsurge at the local level that is gaining the attention of people in the barbershops and bars, in the churches and on the street corners of the ghettos. Whereas Powell achieved his Congressional chairmanship from the strength of his old-style Negro Democratic machine, and subsequently chose to move with the temper of the ghetto, the new insurgents begin in opposition to the Democratic Party, whether its candidates are white or Uncle Toms. Commitment to the Democratic Party has increasingly become the issue dividing the old leadership and the new forces, as can be seen in Gary, where C. Sumner Stone, Powell's chief assistant in Washington, campaigned for Katz, while the local civil rights movement backed Hatcher.

Much of the new leadership comes from the Negro middle class. Most candidates are lawyers like Hatcher and Cousins, public employees like Rep. John Conyers of Detroit, or ministers like John Porter in Chicago's 17th Ward. But this middle class has very little in common with the "Black Bourgeoisie" of sociology—the families that tried so hard to forget their race that whiteness and cleanliness became obsessions. This new middle class is highly conscious of race and racism, responsive to Stokely Carmichael's political analysis, and ready to break with its political heritage, which in Chicago they call "Plantation Politics." The tens of thousands of middle-class Negroes in the 6th, 8th and 21st Wards of Chicago, who voted independent in February, were people who felt that their gains had been wrested from the power structure (including Democratic city administrations) and must be secured by organized political action.

The federal programs of the Great Society have not been able to hold Negro voters to the Democratic Party. The superhighways are used mostly by white suburban commuters, and their construction invariably involves the dislocation of thousands of Negro families. The poverty wars are quickly domesticated into harmless social work or just plain political patronage. In fact, the ability of poverty workers and community groups to maintain a degree of integrity for the war on poverty seems to vary inversely with the strength of the local Democratic Party; in Chicago and the Deep South the programs are thoroughly domesticated, while the "war" retains some independence in Pittsburgh where the machine is in disarray.

The arena for new politics in 1968 will probably be in fights for the House of Representatives and state legislatures. Few activists can bring themselves to take seriously the idea of a national alternative to Johnson. Their own battles for the House in 1966 gave them a vivid sense of the difficulty of mounting any campaign; unless a national campaign is launched far in advance of November, 1968, there won't be new-politics workers in more than 2 per cent of the nation's precincts.

Some Negro leaders, principally Floyd McKissick of CORE, have begun to talk of a third party, but the elected Negro politicians see the creation of a Negro bloc to bargain within the Democratic Party as a more realistic goal for the next year. In California, state Sen. Mervyn Dymally of Watts has begun that work, and Representative Conyers is known to think along similar lines. To head this off, President Johnson is convening several hundred elected Negro officials for a June White House meeting. Obviously, the topic is civil rights enforcement, but Newsweek calls it a "subtle move" to outflank the plans of Dymally, Powell, Bond and others.

However, some elements within the National Conference for New Politics—the umbrella leadership council which services the local efforts—talk loosely about a candidate to challenge Johnson in the primaries, or in November or both. The names most bandied about are Dr. Benjamin Spock, Rev. Martin Luther King, Sen. Wayne Morse and Dick Gregory; Gregory has declared himself a "write-in candidate" for President with the slogan "Peace in '68," while King and Morse have tried to remove their names from consideration.

Most of the new-politics movements intend to use the 1968 elections to build their own strength and to project into campaign debate radical alternative programs on domestic issues, as well as on foreign policy. Even where Presidential politics is on the agenda, it will conform to this principle. Talk in California about a new-politics slate of Democratic convention delegates has included the idea of pledging them to a radical program instead of to a personality. In a few states a third party will appear on the ballot for the first time since the election laws were tightened following the Progressive Party effort in 1948, but even in these states heavy effort will be made on behalf of local candidates.

The long-range planning of those at the left wing of American politics is a sharp break from the ad hoc single-issue mentality of the past decade. Although some radicals have long urged this shift of perspective, it now fits snugly with two basic trends of American political life. A conservative restoration began with the 1966 elections; it had been made inevitable by the alliances of a Democratic President with all the forces to his right, to wage the war in Vietnam. It is a political mood that contrasts to the relative openness of the early sixties, and its implications were being read by men like Robert Kennedy as early as the spring of 1966, when he adjusted his timetable for taking power to 1972. Conservatives once more control the Congress and in all likelihood will retain control in 1968. This in itself is enough reason for the Left to build its strength for a long haul.

The second trend is the steady growth of the Left. The sheer volume of dissent to the great consensus increases every year—on the campus, in the ghetto, in unions, in the professions and at the polls. The most disturbing "scenario" haunting the imaginations of America's men of power is the possibility that radicals seeking to be relevant to present conditions might join with millions of ordinary Americans who are enough fed up with the shape of things to contemplate real social change. The local elections of 1967 are bringing that day of reckoning closer.

SUPERSONIC TRANSPORT II

Heat, Cold, Radiation & the Boom

KARL M. RUPPENTHAL

This is the second of Mr. Ruppenthal's three articles on the supersonic transport. The first (The Nation, May 22) dealt with some of the economic aspects of the SST. The third will consider some of the political and social ramifications of the project.

Before the proposed U.S. supersonic transport can get off the ground, some impressive technical problems must be solved. One of these concerns heat. When a plane travels through the air at three times the speed of sound, the heat generated on the skin of the craft will be on the order of 500° Fahrenheit—about the temperature that a French chef uses to broil a steak. Because aluminum loses much of its strength after prolonged exposure to such temperatures, neither aluminum nor any of its presently developed alloys can be used for the exterior surface of the SST. At present, the designers of the Mach 3 (three times the speed of sound) transport are working with titanium alloys and stainless steel. The disadvantage of steel is that it is heavy; titanium is much lighter, but it is relatively new on the industrial scene. It is also difficult to form and expensive to work. While it is entirely possible that new technologies for working this metal will be discovered, they are not yet at hand. Titanium offers promise to the aircraft designer and to the scientist, but to the banker it promises heavy costs. A great many research dollars will be spent in an effort to develop an air frame that will be sufficient to the task and still be light enough to carry a profitable payload.

The heat produced by flying through the air at high speeds produces other problems. How are the airlines to keep the passengers from being broiled alive as they speed about in their supersonic oven? While the task of air-conditioning the plane is not a momentous engineering feat, it requires the development of a system capable of dissipating large amounts of heat quickly and efficiently and without employing heavy or bulky machinery.

Paradoxically, flying at high altitudes where temperatures run as low as -100° centigrade, the plane's fuel (kerosene) may tend to freeze. The engineers are thus attracted to the idea of linking the two temperature problems together: heat created on the surface of the plane might be dissipated into the plane's fuel supply. To the man at the drafting table, this looks like a fairly straightforward solution to the problem, but to the pilot who is trained to think in terms of fire, the prospect is less inviting.

The spectrum of new engineering problems is challenging and wide. Windows and other openings on the SST must be able to withstand a wide range of temperatures and pressures. The problems associated with windows are so great that it is likely there will be no windows whatsoever in the cabin, and the pilot's windows may be functional only for take-off and landing. The plane may cruise entirely on instruments, dependent upon radio, radar and other electronic devices to achieve separation from other planes.

Since the Mach 3 jet will cruise at 60,000 to 80,000 feet (10 to 15 miles)—its pressurization systems must not fail. The cabins of today's jets are pressurized to the equivalent of about 5,000 feet when they are at cruising altitude (normally between 24,000 feet and 41,000 feet mean sea level). The fail-safe features of the 707 and the DC-8 provide an oxygen mask that drops automatically in front of each passenger in the event the cabin loses pressure. But this will not be good enough for the Mach 3 craft. Should the cabin rupture at 60,000 feet, the passengers' blood would boil, and the oxygen mask would be of no avail. Only a space suit, or a system which cannot possibly fail, will suffice. This means fail-safe pressurization systems, doors that will not leak, windows that cannot be blown out. All of these features can be developed, but each development may add to the weight of the craft, and they will certainly add to the cost.

High-altitude flight creates another problem which aviation has not yet fully faced—the hazard of radiation. At the cruising altitudes of the SST, the primary cosmic radiation consists mainly of protons (the nuclei of hydrogen atoms). The energy of these particles can be extremely high. Nuclear scientists have stated that the shell of the aircraft will not protect the occupants from radiation; as a matter of fact, it will act to increase the dosage rate.

Flying at the new cruising altitudes, the occupant of an SST will be exposed to a radiation dose equivalent to about 2 millirem per flying hour. Since 500 millirem per year is the maximum specified for nonradiation workers by the International Commission on Radiological Protection, a passenger (or crew member) would receive the maximum permissible dosage in 250 hours—just one-fourth the amount of flying time plane crews are now allowed annually by the Civil Air Regulations.

Further, particular solar events greatly increase the radiation dosage. Anyone passing through such an event might receive the maximum permissible annual radiation dosage in a single flight. Because of the genetic implications of radiation, some biologists have suggested that crew members for the SST be selected entirely from people beyond the normal childbearing age.

Thus, all hostesses on supersonic transports would be at least 45—a breed of flying grandmothers who would contrast sharply with the image of the chic young thing the airlines have cultivated so assiduously these many years. Far more serious from an economic standpoint would be the effect upon the working life of pilots. The cost of training well-qualified DC-6 captains to fly the Boeing 707 was on the order of $30,000 per man. If training costs for the SST are but twice that amount, an airline will think twice before making such an investment in a pilot who has very few productive years ahead of him. The FAA requires all airline pilots to retire at 60.

Furthermore, one competent test pilot has stated that in today's jets a pilot can wait as long as fifteen seconds before reacting to a situation without risking irreparable harm. If he is correct in his estimate that only five seconds of reaction time will be available to the SST pilot, trouble may be in store. For it is well known that as a man becomes older, his judgment may improve but his reaction time becomes longer. In short, it looks now as though neither young men nor old men will be suitable as pilots for the SST.

Turbulence also will be a problem. As the airlines took to flying at altitudes used by subsonic jets, they began to experience clear air turbulence. Several of today's jets have encountered turbulence that has breached the aircraft structure or thrown it completely out of control. The supersonic transport must be designed to withstand the most severe conditions that can be encountered, and about these conditions relatively little is now known.

What is known is that the impact increases with speed, and the standard practice for subsonic jets is to reduce speed as soon as the condition is recognized. The worst problem of clear air turbulence arises principally from the fact that at present there is no accurate way to forecast its existence. Unless major advances are made in weather analysis, it may be impossible for the supersonic airliner to know of clear air turbulence far enough in advance to take precautionary measures.

But these problems of radiation, heat transfer and metal fatigue pale by comparison with the one great problem of supersonic flight, for which nothing approaching an answer has yet been found. That is the sonic boom, and indeed the problems of the boom are so important and so far from solution that they may wreck the nice economic calculations that have been made by proponents of the SST, and the SST timetable as well.

Many people are under the misapprehension that the sonic boom is a momentary phenomenon. In a movie made a decade or more ago, some Hollywood star flew through the theoretical "sound barrier." As his plane approached the speed of sound, he encountered many weird phenomena, but once the speed of sound was exceeded, all was smooth. There was no vibration, no problems—and no boom. How the aircraft industry wishes that the Hollywood version of the sonic boom were reality! The fact is that the sonic boom, a shock wave, is a continuing phenomenon, and it is created when a plane flies at any speed higher than Mach 1.

If a supersonic transport were to cruise at the speed of Mach 3 at altitudes used by present-day jets, it would leave in its wake a trail of destruction fifty miles wide. Although the Air Force has taken great pains to minimize the damage caused by its supersonic jets, the number of damage claims filed against the federal government has been steadily increasing. Some 3,000 were filed in 1962 alone. The Air Force no longer publishes the number of claims filed or the amount of reparations demanded, but it is known that the dollars paid, together with the cost of processing claims, has already run into the millions.

Sonic boom damage caused by military planes has been responsible for a wide variety of claims. In 1962 a farmer in North Dakota was paid $1,048 because his animal had to be shot after a boom caused it to bolt into a barbed-wire fence. Another farmer in Hallock, Minn., was paid $50 because booms caused his chickens to panic and suffocate against a wall. In Cedar City, U., a store owner was paid $1,900 to replace plate glass windows and stock damaged by a boom. A farmer in Northern California sued the Air Force for $1.25 million for boom damage to livestock and irrigation pipes.

Even when the claims are farfetched, they must be investigated, at a cost of about $100 per claim. The Air Force recently investigated (and denied) a claim from an elderly recluse who sought $19 million in damages because he alleged that a boom had turned his house upside down. Also denied was a claim from a Cleveland motorist who said that sonic booms had ruined his automobile's power steering.

Because of the rising number of claims the Air Force has in recent years run a public relations campaign. Hundreds of civic leaders along B-58 test corridors near Strategic Air Command Headquarters in Omaha and the General Dynamics plant in Fort Worth have been assured that sonic booms aren't much louder than thunder. "The flights are the by-product of training maneuvers to save lives," said an Air Force spokesman. "Americans will have to learn to live with sonic booms. There's going to be more of them—a lot more."

This is a sobering background for the SST, particularly when one considers that most of the Air Force flights have been conducted with relatively small planes and over sparsely populated areas. The shock of the sonic boom varies with the size of the aircraft, and the damage created by the boom obviously varies with the value of the real estate that lies in its wake.

Uncertain about the effects of the sonic boom, the Federal Aviation Agency undertook experiments in Oklahoma City some time ago. After the residents had been carefully prepared, a series of runs was made. When there were claims of structural damage, the FAA made appropriate inspections. It also purchased structures in various parts of the city to record the vibrations and to note how much damage actually occurred.

At the outset, the residents of Oklahoma City were rather proud that their city had been selected for these important experiments. Many of them were eager to see them succeed. When the booms first began, most residents were mildly amused. But as they progressed, many of them became annoyed. At the conclusion of the tests, many Oklahomans breathed a sigh of relief that the ordeal was at last finished.

In their official pronouncements the FAA has stated that the tests indicate that 73 per cent of the Oklahomans indicated that they could live with the boom (at least, with a sonic boom such as they experienced during these particular tests). This means that some 27 per cent of the residents indicated that they would be unwilling to tolerate even that much sonic boom. That fact is significant for several reasons.

In the first place, the people were well conditioned. They knew when to expect the sonic booms, knew that they would occur only in daylight hours. They understood that the experiments were carefully monitored and controlled, and that they might well serve a useful scientific purpose. Add to that the fact that there are no historic shrines in Oklahoma City; no ancient castles that might be shattered by a sonic boom; no Revolutionary War structures; no great galleries; no sensitive seismographic instruments.

Consider also that much of the industry of Oklahoma City is based on and around aviation. The very large Air Force base, Tinker Field, together with the various installations of the Federal Aviation Agency, supply by far the largest payroll in the city. Within its metropolitan district are aviation schools, aircraft plants and other small industries with an aviation orientation. Much of the rest of the economy is based on petroleum, for which aviation is by far its largest single customer.

Important also is the fact that the residents of Oklahoma City knew that the sonic boom program was temporary. But despite all the factors, more than a quarter of the people affected found the boom intolerable. During the twenty-six weeks of carefully controlled sonic boom tests in Oklahoma City, the Federal Aviation Agency received 15,452 complaints from residents and 4,901 formal damage claims. However, a spokesman for that agency concluded that the fault was not with the sonic booms but with the public relations efforts of the agency. Said Maj. Gen. J. C. Maxwell, the FAA's director of the SST program: "We [shall] need to do a much better job in telling the SST story in the years ahead."

Speaking of the tests, B.O.K. Lundberg, the Swedish aviation expert, states that the number of people protesting the boom would be far larger than the number of people ever expected to enter a supersonic plane. He states that every flight across the United States would produce a "boom carpet" covering some 10 million people and terrifying millions more.

Although thousands of damage claims have been filed and millions of dollars paid for their satisfaction, no claims have as yet been filed for the most tragic effect of the sonic boom. It was not until last January 11 that the Interior Department revealed serious damage to the prehistoric cliff dwellings in Mesa Verde National Park. Some of the most scenic areas known to man have been defaced. A Navajo Indian, Guy Quazzie Teller, watched as the shock wave from a single military plane demolished a large portion of a magnificent overhanging cliff.

On October 4, 1966, Park Ranger Charles B. Supplee, "a qualified archaeologist," observed continuing damage by sonic boom between 12:27 and 12:31 P.M., and at 2:33 P.M. park rangers counted eighty-three sonic booms from August 11 through December 22, 1966. On October 12, 1966, after three short booms were reported, "approximately 10 to 15 tons of dirt and rock was found to have fallen from one of the formations near the bottom of the Navajo Loop Trail, in the park." Interior Secretary Stewart Udall said that the situation was disturbing because of the "intrusion of the sonic boom on the fragile masterpieces of nature."

According to The New York Times, Udall discussed the matter with the Air Force "which promised cooperation but suggested that the Federal Aviation Agency should be consulted. Air space is considered to be the province of the aviation agency."

George B. Hartzog, Jr., director of the National Park Service, reported that the number of sonic booms over the Canyon de Chelly (in Mesa Verde National Park) had increased sharply in 1966. "With extensive back country and side canyons, the total damage is impossible to assess; however, it is reasonable to assume that it is extensive in view of the on-site observation in Canyon del Muerto." There park service engineers estimated that about 80 tons of rock fell on the cliff dwellings.

Additional damage has been found in Bryce Canyon and Zion National Parks in southern Utah. There, amazing sandstone formations, the result of nature's forces conspiring together for millions of years, have been reduced to rubble in an instant by a single sonic boom. While the Interior Department presumably could ask monetary redress from the Defense Department, such a payment would be nothing more than an internal transfer of funds. Nothing can restore the damaged areas.

The severe wreckage already done in the U.S. by a handful of supersonic military planes increases the probability that such historic cities as Antwerp, Nuremberg and Vienna will never permit supersonic planes to approach within 100 miles. It goes without saying that the prohibition against overflight will be automatic for such jewels as Paris, Florence, Rome and Athens. The West German and Swiss Governments have already announced that they will forbid SST flights over their jurisdictions if their people find them annoying.

Even in the United States, where the historic shrines are much younger and less priceless, it seems improbable that even the flying public will be willing to risk boom damage to Mt. Vernon, Independence Hall or the White House. It seems more likely that the public will restrict the planes. That would mean that their utility would be severely reduced and the total cost per plane increased accordingly.

Some of the proponents of the SST seek to minimize the problem by saying that some inconvenience is the inevitable price of progress. They liken the process to the necessity for a prairie horse to become accustomed to the passing of an occasional railroad train. But obviously this is no realistic parallel. Given all that is presently known about the sonic boom, if regularly scheduled supersonic flights are permitted across the country, thousands of structures must be redesigned and rebuilt and their occupants fitted with sound suppressers, or a sonic boom right of way something like 100 miles wide must be cut from coast to coast.

Some people have suggested that since the force of the boom is a function of the size of the plane, a smaller version might be built for flights over land. Thus, they contend, the larger model (built by Boeing) could make the overwater hops while the smaller model (built by some other company) could fly over land. While this suggestion has the virtue of spreading the pie among several aircraft companies, it has the disadvantage of additional cost—perhaps $1 billion more. And much of the time that potentially would be saved flying a supersonic transport from Los Angeles to Vienna would be consumed in transferring from the little jet to the big jet at New York, again to the little jet in London or Paris. Furthermore, the size of the market for each type of aircraft would be so reduced that there would be virtually no chance that either could ever pay its way.

Speaking of the problems of the sonic boom, C.B.S.

reporter Bill Stout suggests that if the SST is restricted to overwater hops, the SST could easily become a multi-billion-dollar bust. And while over-ocean sonic boom problems have been dismissed as insignificant by the SST promoters, it is not at all clear that this view is shared by the ocean shipping industry, by pleasure boatmen or by the fishing interests. If the sonic boom swamps a few yachts, damages the masts in merchant vessels, and rudely awakens sleeping passengers on ocean-going liners, an entirely new set of legal problems may be created. Who is to say that the aviation industry has the right to interfere with ocean-going commerce? Might the sonic boom be construed by the shipping nations as interference with the traditional freedom of the seas?

As small segments of the public have become aware of the destructive potential of the sonic boom, public apprehension has increased. Unless they have a clear economic interest in the project themselves, many people will seriously question whether the increased speed can possibly be worth the cost. They are not impressed by the statements of SST promoters that the public simply will have to get used to the boom. Nor are they convinced that overland operations should be permitted even if the earth-bound humans in sparsely populated areas are somehow compensated for the noise.

All of this raises serious questions concerning the feasibility of the supersonic transport itself and important questions also in a somewhat different realm. Should decisions critically affecting the living qualities of the earth be made only by the promoters, the bureaucrats and the technologists? Or should such decisions be shared by the people who must inevitably bear the brunt of them and who inevitably underwrite the cost?

LOUISVILLE HAPPENING

THE DERBY RUNS SCARED

LAWRENCE GRAUMAN, Jr.

Mr. Grauman, a native of Kentucky, is a writer and critic now in residence at Antioch College.

Louisville

Louisville in spring is almost as beautiful as the Kentucky Tourist Bureau says it is. By mid-April Cherokee Park is already sweet with new grass and dense with the efflorescence of redbud, dogwood and thousands of old hardwoods. Further east, out along the Upper River Road and the Cincinnati Highway, the vast old estates have been subdivided into plots for $40,000 and $50,000 homes, but it has been done discreetly, and the season still spreads across the rolling land with a certain Southern grandeur. By early May gardeners are giving a second mowing to the steep sloping lawns along Mockingbird Valley Road, and the colonnades of the large old homes above have been freshly painted in preparation for Derby guests. Somebody recently designated Louisville an "All-American City" and everyone is proud of that. Special signs have been posted along the clean-swept streets in the downtown business district so that visitors will know Louisville takes its image seriously. This May, however, the traditional pre-Derby Pegasus Parade was canceled in a city too tense to risk the gathering of crowds in those streets.

Spring has also come to Louisville's West End, but there it is not so grand. Grass does not grow readily on the blocks that have been razed for urban renewal. Many of the large old homes have been hastily divided into small apartments and sleeping rooms, and few of the tenants have time to tend the tiny yards and gardens. The West End comprises the northwest corner of the city, bounded by the Ohio River as it turns from west to south, by the downtown district on the east and an industrial area on the south. In twenty-two of the West End's twenty-eight census tracts the median income is under $5,000 a year. Here live 60,000 of Jefferson County's 86,000 Negroes, and by the next census the area will be well over 50 per cent Negro. In their study Negroes in Cities (1965), Karl and Alma Taeuber give Louisville a residential segregation "index" of 89.2—among the highest in the nation. Although the West End is neither so bleak nor so black as a comparable part of, say, Jackson, Miss., a visitor does not need statistics to recognize a residential pattern common to most large Southern and Midwestern cities.

Ten years ago Louisville's Negroes were concentrated in the Walnut Street area along the eastern edge of the West End. But urban renewal has dispersed them westward, away from the business district, and today the closest thing to a hot center for community energy is at 38th and Broadway, where the recently formed West End Community Council (WECC) operates out of an old two-story building. The ground-floor store front, formerly a bakery, has been turned into a coffeehouse called The Happening, and when they are not in school or out marching, many of the local young Negroes hang around there. Some of them jive with one another along the sidewalk in front; others gather inside the barren store front and sing gospels in strenuous harmonies. They have a lot of energy.

The director of the WECC is a 25-year-old former law student named Hulbert James. He is one of the three organizers of the open housing demonstrations that have brought Louisville to a boil in recent weeks. The other two are Martin Luther King's brother, Rev. A. D. Williams King, who is head of the Kentucky Christian Leadership Conference, and Rev. Leo Lesser, president of the Louisville AME Ministerial Alliance. James is the youngest and is believed to be the "angriest" of the open housing leaders, but until recently he had other ideas for the WECC. He had helped organize discussions on the Community Action Commission's administration of the local poverty program, had organized opposition to rent increases at two large housing projects in the area, and had sponsored an integrated Arts and Talent Festival. He had hoped that the WECC would be able to bring white and Negro welfare recipients together to protest inadequate benefits. Now James admits that his chances for achieving an integrated coalition of the West End's poor have been damaged by his militancy on the open housing issue. Although his willingness to use most forms of direct action in the current conflict is shared in the main by King and Lesser, the three of them maintain an uneasy alliance with those ministers and professional men whom Louisville's aldermen are fond of calling "our responsible Negroes." Many of Louisville's newly arisen white liberals seem to have more sympathy for James's tactics than do the West End's older Negroes, and this is reflected in the high proportion of white adults and teen-aged Negroes to be seen among the nightly marchers. "Neither the oppressed nor the oppressors," says James, "see that there is a problem in Louisville."

There is a problem in Louisville, however, and the response to it provides a case study in civic collapse. Back in the days when it was earning its All-American honors, Louisville had a reputation as a very progressive city in matters of race relations. Although a few anti-segregation demonstrations were held in 1961, Louisville had a relatively easy time in getting a public accommodations ordinance, finally passed in 1963. This was followed by a fair employment law and a "freedom of residence" ordinance that had no enforcement provisions. Serious agitation for open housing began only a couple of years ago, while most of the citizenry was still congratulating itself on its enlightened view of social change. It may have been that some Negroes remembered the 1914 ordinance passed by the Board of Aldermen which forbade Negroes to buy property on a block having a "white majority"—an ordinance eventually overturned by the United States Supreme Court. And yet the strongest appeal for an open housing law came not from Negro organizations but from the mostly white City Human Relations Commission, appointed under the administration of former Republican Mayor, now Congressman, William O. Cowger, and now a joint city-county agency.

By the summer of 1966, both the Human Relations Commission and the Kentucky Human Rights Commission had decided that the 1965 housing ordinance based on voluntary compliance was an empty gesture; they urged Louisville and Jefferson County to pass a law with enforcement provisions. Republican Mayor Kenneth Schmied, Cowger's nondescript successor and a small businessman with real estate and consumer credit interests, said that more study was needed, and appointed another committee. In October, 1966, this advisory committee reported that housing discrimination was indeed widespread and recommended a strong ordinance.

By this time civil rights and church groups had formed the Open Housing Committee, of which Hulbert James, A.D. King and Leo Lesser are the leaders, and it agreed to support an ordinance, with jail terms and fines for offenders, that had been based on a model law prepared by the state Human Rights Commission. By November more than thirty civic and church groups had joined the appeal. Although local realtors muttered their predictable disapproval, there was no organized opposition to an enforceable ordinance. After a good deal of equivocation and outright evasion, Mayor Schmied agreed in December to have the ordinance introduced to the Board of Aldermen, but said he opposed it because of the jail provisions and the "broad powers" invested in the Human Relations Commission. Open housing advocates then indicated they would not hold out for jail sentences and also agreed to forestall demonstrations to give the aldermen time to act. Although a revised ordinance, including enough qualifications and exemptions to render it virtually innocuous, was presented by the Human Relations Commission in early February, the aldermen refused to give it a first reading until February 28, by which time the bread was clearly rising.

Meanwhile the aldermen tried a diversionary tactic of their own, and scheduled a series of six public hearings to tune in on public feeling, though no one knew at that point which of several alternatives were even worth talking about. The first hearing was held in the rigidly segregated South End and brought out all the Snopeses, who promptly created such a nasty situation that the remaining hearings were canceled. Then it was Mayor Schmied's turn to fake it again: he announced that there would be no action on an ordinance "as long as there are threats of demonstrations." This was to become the cherished red herring of the city administration. In mid-March, seven months after the first concerted call had been made for an ordinance, the Open Housing Committee started marching.

The aldermen finally voted on a much amended ordinance on April 11, turning it down 9 to 3, with the two Negro aldermen among the three. The majority issued a know-nothing report that blamed the entire conflict on local clergymen and "outside agitators" (SCLC had brought in ten or fifteen of its "technicians" to teach non-violent demonstration) and called attention to the opportunities for gracious living in the West End. The temperate chairman of the Human Relations Commission, the Rt. Rev. Alfred Horrigan, described the aldermanic statement as "frequently bordering on the frivolous," and the Courier-Journal, which had from the start pressed hard for an ordinance, called it "shallow, inconsistent and dissembling," and summed up the whole chronicle of ineptitude as a "tragic human failure."

As the tension built toward violence, almost everybody who was anybody was in Louisville, or on their way—except Mayor Schmied. Dick Gregory was there, and Martin Luther King was replaced by his assistant, Hosea Williams. Cassius Clay was on his way, as was the president of the American Bar Association and a couple of traveling salesmen for the American Nazi Party. Mayor Schmied was vacationing at the Master's Golf Tournament. When he finally returned, his first public act was an exculpation which attempted to dump the problem on the Human Relations Commission. Why didn't the commission stop criticizing public officials and start "exerting leadership" in housing problems, the Mayor wondered. In mid-April Hulbert James and A.D. King offered to leave town temporarily and take their technicians with them if the aldermen would promise to pass an open housing ordinance. Aldermanic president "Boots" Young said no, and then the demonstrators got down to business.

They started marching night after night into the darkest South End, provoking the anticipated responses from hordes of mostly teen-aged whites who turned out to throw rocks and cherry bombs, overturn police cars, and excrete cops, clergymen and Negroes indiscriminately. It was a classic SCLC tactic, and after a few weeks the knee-jerk racists were performing as though under laboratory conditions. Most of Louisville was surprised by the number of whites who joined the demonstrations—college teachers, ministers, housewives, even an insurance man—and even the "responsible Negroes" who found marching "undignified" began to express some solidarity with James, King and Lesser. The city quickly got a restraining order from a circuit judge forbidding night marches, and the police began arresting the demonstrators as soon as they got out of their trucks. After a couple of weeks Mayor Schmied reluctantly concluded that the "hecklers" might be causing as much trouble as the marchers. The police grew desperate and began booking marchers on any charge that came to mind. They arrested Rev. Charles B. Tachau, who is an Episcopal minister, a former judge of the Jefferson County Juvenile Court, and a grand-nephew of Supreme Court Justice Louis D. Brandeis, and charged him with "criminal syndicalism"—a pseudo-legal legacy from the thirties that an embarrassed prosecutor hastened to file out of sight.

By Derby week all Louisville was in anguish as it foresaw the consequences of this civic backsliding. James and King were running out of demonstrators and bail money, and they agreed to a day-to-day moratorium on marches while Congressman Cowger came back to join "hard bargaining" sessions proposed by the Human Relations Commission. When city officials refused to drop charges against the previous demonstrators, James renewed his threat to create "open hell" at the Derby. Although open housing leaders were recruiting college students around the Midwest, it seems unlikely that they could have amassed enough support actually to stop the Derby. However they scared Mayor Schmied and the aldermen, and on Derby Saturday Churchill Downs was swarming with state police and National Guardsmen.

The threats to unsettle the city's most cherished institution, with a consequent loss of several hundred thousand dollars of festive business, do not seem to have brought an open housing ordinance any closer to realization. Many residents have been saying all along that nothing will move the city administration until the end of May, if then. That is the time of the Republican primary, and Jefferson County Judge Marlow Cook is one of the candidates for governor. Cook was former Mayor Cowger's running mate and he pulled Schmied into office when he won his second term. The press has characterized him as a "liberal Republican," but it is doubtful that he and John Lindsay would have much to talk about. Many of the faculty at the University of Louisville still remember his contemptuous dismissal of them as "municipal employees" in a dispute over the football team a few years ago.

Louisville insiders believe that if Cook were willing to accept an open housing ordinance the aldermen would pass one tomorrow. But he is locked in what seems to be a losing battle for the Republican nomination with Louis Nunn, a Glasgow, Ky., lawyer who has great appeal for segregationists in the state's vestigial Bible Belt. In 1962, former Democratic Gov. Bert Combs entered an executive order forbidding discrimination in public accommodations. In 1963 Louis Nunn was the Republican nominee against present Gov. Edward Breathitt, and he campaigned on the promise that his first official act would be a repeal of Combs' anti-discrimination order. He ran surprisingly well downstate. So Marlow Cook is said to fear the consequences of permitting an open housing law in Louisville now. And well he might. Nunn has already begun to assure his listeners that he wouldn't dream of making a campaign issue of the fact that Cook is a Catholic.

Given this situation, it is conceivable that an open housing law could be put off until the general election in November. If Cook wins the primary, which he is not likely to do, one cannot imagine him adding the burden of an open housing ordinance to a campaign against either Happy Chandler, former Lt. Gov. Harry Lee Waterfield, or former State Highway Commissioner Henry Ward, all of whom either oppose open housing or evade it.

There are some in Louisville who think that this crisis need never have arisen, that an open housing law could have been passed despite the incompetence and neglect of the Mayor and aldermen. Had the "power structure" applied pressure three or four months ago, they argue, the bigots would never have come out of the woodwork, and the city would have quietly accepted open housing. But there isn't much of a power structure in Louisville any more. Just as the old estates have fallen to the land developers, the tight little interlocking directorate of patrician families that used to determine Louisville's fortunes has dissolved, most of its members either having died or withdrawn from active life. As the city has opened up to large industries like Ford and General Electric, its leadership has increasingly fallen to young professional-management types whose only familiarity with whiskey, tobacco and horses derives from their private experience. Many of them have not had time to consolidate their power, and others, realizing that they are transients in Louisville, care only for the temporary satisfactions of living in an All-American town. "White and Negro," a schoolteacher recently remarked, "this is an apathetic city."

Meanwhile down at 38th and Broadway Hulbert James's young friends strut restively along the sidewalks, popping their fingers and singing gospel-rock. They have a lot of energy.

LETTERS (Continued from page 674)

praising Frank O'Hara for giving a unique voice to his own conscience, far more effective than most of the protest 'poetry' being written today. All poetry is against war and in favor of life, or else it isn't poetry, and it stops being poetry when it is forced into the mold of a particular program. Poetry is poetry. Protest is protest. I believe in both forms of action, and I have, incidentally, signed and contributed money to the petition protesting the war circulated by the Committee of the Professions and published in the Times last June 5; was a sponsor of the anti-war fast and poetry read-in at St. Mark's Church last January; and participated in the April 15 Spring Mobilization march. I am reluctant to mention these things since I considered them as duties, as did so many others. But Mr. Simpson's unjust attack, which the context of his article leads me to suspect was motivated by considerations of poetry politics rather than international politics, leaves me no choice." John Ashbery

Stanford, Calif.

DEAR SIRs: The poetry issue is at best uneven and at its worst a disaster. The disaster comes with Simpson and the poems themselves: with the exception of the Akhmatova, the poems are lifeless. The Eberhart is bad enough to be an embarrassment—another of those poems published plainly for the sake of the name attached to it.

Mitchell Goodman

Fargo, N. Dak.

DEAR SIRs: Congratulations on the superlatively good name your office has acquired among the poets up here since the appearance of the poetry issue. Rodney Nelson

Cambridge, Mass.

DEAR SIRs: I was grateful to read the April 24 issue of The Nation because it articulated for me the several ways that poetry is taking at the moment. I was also very interested in your description of Angry Arts week in New York in an earlier issue. Sally Appleton Weber

BOOKS & THE ARTS

A Man in the Wilderness

EPITAPHS OF OUR TIMES: The Letters of Edward Dahlberg. George Braziller. 308 pp. $6.95.

THE EDWARD DAHLBERG READER. Edited and with an introduction by Paul Carroll. New Directions. 330 pp. $6.50.

KAY BOYLE

Miss Boyle is a member of the English faculty at San Francisco State College. She is the author of twenty-five books, the most recent being a collection of short stories, Nothing Ever Breaks Except the Heart (Doubleday).

In a letter written in 1958 from Mallorca, Spain, to William Carlos Williams in Rutherford, N. J., Edward Dahlberg cries out in despair: "As soon as you have architecture anywhere today you have foolish opinionated buildings, dogmatic functionalism, and all the depravity of the up-to-date, inhuman city. Nobody is educated enough any more to build a simple, unaffected home which is good, and has as much feeling, as an ancient proverb. When I look at a motorcycle or a taxi there are tears in my heart. For all the earth is ours, our habitation and sepulcher, and every country that falls under the infamy of money is a terrible wound to every other people."

Writing to Lewis Mumford from Berkeley, Calif., in 1953, Dahlberg reproaches Mumford for his worship of the machine, and cautions him that to see "beauty in machinery is a great perversity," unworthy of his nature. In New York in 1951, Dahlberg writes his friend, Sir Herbert Read, that he does not approve of his way of living. "Do you think it is good to go to the foes of art to heal the artist? I don't care what money you get for whom, what you are doing is at the bottom a sin." He warns Read that he lives too shrewdly, and that this is "the worst error of a poet." For man must thirst, and must remain in the company of those who are athirst, he writes; and even if solitude is "a great pain in the heart," still "a man must remain in the wilderness."

To read Dahlberg's two present collections is to enter that wilderness and to be all but overwhelmed by his passionate chronicling of the unrelenting affront to the spirit which makes alienation the greatest peril to contemporary, sensitive man. The loneliness and the separateness which result from this affront are apt to engender a climate favorable to art. Kafka wrote of the consequences of disesteem obliquely, his language German, his vehicle allegory, and startled the lost to a deeper recognition of how forsaken they were. Dahlberg, whose work may be compared to Kafka's in its intensity of discernment and foreboding, writes of that merciless assault on the spirit in cadenced, occasionally archaic and consistently splendid English. His language is classic, his metaphor frequently myth, but both language and myth belong to him alone.

Kafka was, in his time, not only Germany's most disturbing but most reliable prophet. As an artist, he foretold with the maddest courage all the horror that was to come. Dahlberg, whose more than a dozen remarkable books have established a unique reputation for him in Europe, as well as in America, deserves our recognition not only as stylist, as critic, as poet but also as eloquent and unflinching prophet. He declares against the outrage to every sensibility that faces us at this moment whichever way we turn upon our native soil, and he grieves for the disaster that lies, still undefined, beyond the perilous rim of contemporary American violence. What modern man calls progress, Dahlberg recognizes (with Yeats) as the dying of men's hearts. He sees the degradation of love and learning everywhere.

The ambiguous self in relation to history, to country, to sex, and to eternity, is furiously alive in all of Dahlberg's work, but it is in his letters that that self emerges in all its restless continuity. The letters are pages torn from the annals of his nights and days, his hopes and griefs, and transmuted into the actual substance of compassion, understanding and yearning for those who are for the moment beyond the reach of his hand. "Bill Williams, you know, had another small stroke; I tremble for him, and also weep for him," Dahlberg writes to Josephine Herbst in 1958. "He has done so many things of which I disapprove, but how little I want to go on rebuking him. Poor, poor Bill, he is much too close to Nature. I would kill Nature could I save him."

But despite the sincere passion of his declared love, there is all too often a wariness in his approach to those whom he addresses, a lurking overzealousness that leaves one with the feeling that every human relationship Dahlberg has had was, without exception, a heartbreak to him in the end. At the very moment that he declares himself, he appears to tremble at the prospect of another devastating experience, still another emotional catastrophe from which he will never quite recover. "What the two of you cannot know," he writes to the Allen Tates in 1965, "is that I fear going to other people's homes, and when I do, I leave as fast as I can, without seeming to be rude. It is not that I do not care deeply for my friends, or that I prefer to be with flimsy acquaintances rather than with the aristocratic intellects of our world. I dread unknowable disaster."

Lawrence Durrell once wrote a number of letters to Henry Miller on the subject of the artist's fear of accepting his own identity. He cited to Miller "Cezanne's fear that society would get the grappins on him. . . . Gauguin's insistence on what a hell of a fine billiards player he was . . . and D. H. Lawrence fervently knitting, knitting, and trying to forget Sons and Lovers"—and there was Miller himself eating like mad to establish a reputation for himself as a gourmet. "Here are numberless types," Durrell wrote, "of the same ambiguous desire on the part of the artist to renounce his destiny. To spit on it." This was not for the moment Dahlberg's desire or dilemma. He knew from the beginning who he was and that he was destined, both as man and writer, to be an exile in the land of his birth. "First in the wanton streets of Kansas City," he writes to William Carlos Williams in 1957, "then in an orphanage, and then a waif of letters in New York." His dilemma, rather, was how to be a writer, and he studied the works of others avidly, seeking to find that way.

From the time of the appearance of his first novel, Bottom Dogs, published in 1929, there could be no question but that he had found his own exceptional speech. The Job of American letters, one critic has called him; and others have termed his autobiography, Because I Was Flesh, a masterpiece, and "one of the few important American books published in our day." "The truth is," this outsized figure of American literature writes almost in panic to his friend Allen Tate (from Mallorca in 1962), "that I am a great coward before I dare venture one sentence. No man goes to the guillotine with greater apprehension than I sit down at my desk, no longer with a quill or a pen, but with a fell machine. . . ." For to Dahlberg, a book is "a battle of the soul and not a war of words."

Leon Edel recently took Joyce to task for calling out in his letters for help, love and money. Dahlberg's letters appeal for these same solaces. Is the artist to be reproached for articulating the constant cry of all living men; is he not rather to be cherished for having spoken it so eloquently? And is not the attempt to answer that despairing cry the reason for all teaching, all learning, all writing, from the Greeks to Abelard, from the Old Testament to Joyce?

The voices of Camus and Sartre, Faulkner and Hemingway, no longer reach the young in the far journey they are taking; and Salinger, who was once their spokesman, is now more silent than the tomb. This wayfaring generation, hair long on the shoulders and wounded faces stanchoned by beards, murmurs of Allen Ginsberg, Timothy Leary and Bob Dylan, uncertain as to whether these saviors (or even William Burroughs and John Rechy) are saying fearlessly and honestly enough the words that must somehow be said. Born in 1900, Dahlberg offers a philosophy of rebellion, but of dignity and discipline as well, to the young who have the insight to look his way. That philosophy, strong and undismayed, is stated in almost every page he writes. It is there in "The Tragedy of American Love" and in "Heart Speaketh to Heart," both of which are included in The Edward Dahlberg Reader. It is there in his uncompromising letters, and strikingly there in his essay, "Thoreau vs. Contemporary America," in which he extends his hand to the uneasy, saying:

We are fatalists only when we cease telling the truth, but, so long as we communicate the truth, we move ourselves, life, history, men. There is no other way. This is the simple epitome of the wisdom of non-resistance to evil. It is what Confucius, Thoreau, and Tolstoi taught. It is the incredible, the visionary way, and it announces treason and betrayal more boldly than firearms or airplanes.

The Compleat Picasso

PICASSO AND COMPANY. By Brassai. Translated from the French by Francis Price. Preface by Henry Miller. Photographs by the author. Doubleday & Co. 289 pp. $6.95.

WALLACE FOWLIE

Mr. Fowlie teaches French literature at Duke University. His most recent book is Jean Cocteau: The History of a Poet's Age (Indiana University Press).

This book, published in French under the title Conversations avec Picasso (Gallimard, 1964), in honor of the painter's 83rd birthday, is an important testimonial. It is in the form of a journal, kept by Brassai between September, 1943, at the time of the Occupation, to November, 1962. But there are many flash-backs to Picasso's early years in Paris, to the first decade of the century when the artist occupied the small studio in the Bateau-Lavoir on the rue Ravignan in Montmartre, where he passed through the blue, the rose and the cubist periods, and where he made his first friendships with French writers: Max Jacob, André Salmon, Apollinaire.

In recording these many conversations with Picasso, the photographer Brassai has produced a document on the spontaneity of the painter's speech and temperament which allowed him to explain some of the ways he followed in order to produce the art which no longer disconcerts the world, and which has been receiving during the past three or four months an exceptional recognition and re-evaluation, on the occasion of Picasso's 85th birthday. Picasso's ex-gees are legion, but he has taken very few people into confidence. Brassai is one of the exceptions. He met Picasso for the first time in 1932 when he went to the studio to photograph some of the sculptures. Since that time he has been a faithful friend and helper.

The notations Brassai made after each visit to the studio, or after each meal at the Catalan or the Brasserie Lipp, Picasso's favorite restaurants, or after meetings at the various cafés (the Flore and the Deux Magots, especially) have great value for our understanding of Picasso's character, of his habits, of his methods of work, of his aesthetic theories. These notes form, moreover, a colorful history of a long period in French painting and French poetry. Picasso himself was pleased with Brassai's book and has testified to its accuracy.

No other book on Picasso gives so full an account of the evolution of his work during thirty years, and of the large number of friends he counted among painters and poets. There are sketches of encounters with Henri Michaux, Paul Eluard, Matisse, André Malraux, Cocteau, Desnos, Jacques Prévert, Roland Petit, Jean Marais, Pierre Reverdy, Valentine Hugo. In each case, the sketch is sympathetically drawn. Brassai shows little inclination for maliciousness or gossip. He relates objectively, and what he records of conversations emphasizes the noble traits of those speaking, and those thoughts that have some significance for a firmer understanding of Picasso's activities and the world in which he lived and helped to create.

Several of the entries provide new or additional information concerning matters of history and biography: the rehearsals of Picasso's play, Desire Caught by the Tail, in which parts were taken by Michel and Louise Leiris, Simone de Beauvoir, Albert Camus, Valentine Hugo, Reverdy and Sartre; Picasso's relationship with Matisse, and especially the introduction of Matisse and his daughter to Picasso by the three Steins, Leo, Michael and Gertrude; Picasso's reticence about death and his unwillingness to speak of the death of his friends Matisse, Braque, Cocteau; the trying ways in which the painter's fame became a burden for him. In the inevitable rehearsal of events, episodes and traits of character that are now familiar, Brassai adds his own judicious observations which now have their place in the vast literature that already exists about Picasso.

At the age of 85, Picasso is still extraordinarily alive. During three-quarters of a century, he has been producing paintings and other forms of art. Brassai's Picasso and Company is one more book of a critical-historical effort to explain the man's genius, to describe the place he occupies today, and to prophesy the place he will occupy tomorrow. This new work proves once again how difficult it is to speak of Picasso in the past. He has gone through a capricious succession of styles and artistic periods. But his work seems to belong to an eternal present. The huge exhibitions held in Paris raise the same insoluble problems that the critics have been raising for fifty years, ever since the first writings about Picasso, those done by Apollinaire and Jean Cocteau.

The fundamental mystery is how Picasso has been able to embrace all of his century, all of its fashions and fancies, all of its problems and geniuses, and yet remain himself, giving himself to nothing and to no one, and yet borrowing from everyone and everything. Brassai's journal of conversations allows us to perceive more clearly the almost fanatical individualism of Picasso, his taste and need for solitude, his easy inclination to quarreling. The book also illustrates his need for friendship and for family affection. It confirms his inventiveness, his discoveries, the realization of his fantasies. Picasso's famous claim that he does not look for but finds (je ne cherche pas, je trouve) is everywhere apparent on these pages by his friend. He is still a man unafraid of contradictions, of retractions, of extravagances.

The breadth of his vision is staggering, and it is precisely this breadth that is constantly being studied in Picasso and Company: the kinds of vision that once explained the paintings of the blue, of the rose, of the cubist and the surrealist periods, of "Guernica's" inferno and the monsters of the 1940s. Even when his eyes are fixed upon the horrors of the world, Picasso does not hesitate to mingle elements of the burlesque and the droll. At every period of his life he has demonstrated the same robustness and the same shrewdness that are apparent in his 85th year.

Everything is present in what might be called the Picasso museum. Has he not realized the myth of the total painter? His work is not related to life or to death, to what is in the world or to what is beyond the world. It is quite simply related to painting, to the context of a picture. The picture does not serve a meditation or a philosophy or a series of objects. Painting for Picasso is a language. He never diminishes or degrades the themes of life and passion in his painting, but he dominates them. He is able to exteriorize the forces and images that most men repress.

Picasso's freedom as an artist is exemplary in our age. He has followed and exploited every whim, every instinct, and thereby made himself into a glorious legend. The stimulation which anthropologists and scientists can find in stones and flowers and birds, others can find in the world of Picasso's paintings.

At this moment in the history of art, when so many thousands of people have been looking at the paintings of Pablo Picasso, it is impossible to decide whether the spectators have caught up with him—he has always been in advance of his age—or whether he has, quite unintentionally, created in them the taste which will make possible the enjoyment of his work.

Brassai's book formulates the expression of one man's admiration for Picasso, his affection for Picasso's genius, for everything that Picasso's admirers find in him, for his ability to be always present, and to represent at all times the unexpected.

lish and borrowed his money), his marriage, his writings and his lifelong obsessions with cigarettes, dreams, disease and aging.

His marriage to Livia (whose father owned the ship-paint business) provided him with the certain basis of every wife his heroes ever had: dutiful, no-nonsense women toward whom each hero feels varying amounts of guilt and rancor. Of his wife Livia, Svevo wrote: "She fills her roles one after the other with perfect punctiliousness. I am sure that even as a baby she must have had a certain dignity." It was Livia whose name and long golden hair Joyce openly borrowed for the Anna Livia Plurabelle of Finnegans Wake, and Furbank sketches in the many traits of Svevo and his father that turn up in Leopold Bloom.

The relationship between Svevo and Joyce (who became single-handedly responsible for bringing Zeno to the attention of European critics) emerges as a curiously formal one. Each was virtually the only literary friend the other had in Trieste, although Joyce was twenty years younger than his pupil. They persisted in calling each other "Mr. Joyce" and "Mr. Schmitz." Svevo dubbed Joyce "a fine leech," while Joyce minimized the friendship, refused to write a preface to the English edition of As a Man Grows Older and, in retrospect, decided that Svevo was tight with his money.

Three-quarters of Furbank's book deals with Svevo's life, while the last quarter zeroes in on "The Writer." It may be that the author's enthusiasm for his subject went beyond solid objectivity in the critical praise he is able to heap on A Life, As a Man Grows Older and the last short stories. These works are simply not in the same class as Zeno, and Furbank's fantastically involuted theories of the value of A Life are ample demonstrations of this fact.

His long chapter on Zeno is much better, unraveling the intricacies that make this devilish novel a feast from start to finish. Zeno is a book as modern, impertinent and irreverent in tone as anything being published today. Permeating its every page is an ironic intelligence, a richness of incident and idea which Furbank explores admirably. The straight-faced, irritatingly rational, charmingly baffled Zeno, painfully aware of his own absurdities (from lust and cigarette smoking to hypochondria), was one of the first modern heroes to lock horns with his analyst. (We are told, in the biographical section, that Svevo's brother-in-law spent two years in Vienna being analyzed by Freud him-

Humanizing the Image

ITALO SVEVO: The Man and the Writer. By P. N. Furbank. University of California Press. 232 pp. $6.

SHORT SENTIMENTAL JOURNEY AND OTHER STORIES. By Italo Svevo. University of California Press. 319 pp. $6.

JOEL LIEBER

Mr. Lieber is a free-lance journalist whose first novel, How the Fishes Live, has just been published by McKay.

The unexpected publication of these two books seems to confirm that for Italo Svevo, in death as in life, his fate is sealed: obscurity followed by recognition, then obscurity again, then recognition. Knopf has helped Svevo out of the literary attic by keeping Confessions of Zeno in a Vintage paperback, and Richard Ellmann generally drops a morsel or two of information about Svevo with each new Joyce book. However, it took the British (whom Svevo so disliked) to republish his short stories and, in particular, P. N. Furbank (an English critic), to do the first book-length English biography of Italo Svevo, né Ettore Schmitz.

"There are ideas in Svevo's novels," Furbank observes, "which, like certain things in Kafka, once you have met them, keep scratching at your mind for ever." Now, thirty-nine years after Svevo's death, Furbank's curiosity has helped to place some of these ideas in perspective, and perhaps Svevo will no longer be called "the Italian Proust," "the Trieste Kafka" or any other such silly sobriquet that befalls a writer who comes onto the scene as a true original.

We learn the German-Italian-Jewish origins of Svevo's family, the tedium of his life as a Trieste businessman (manufacturer of a secret formula for painting ship keels), his ten-year friendship with Joyce (who tutored him in Eng-self, and came home pronounced "intrigued Svevo.") There are so many memorable scenes in Zeno—the grotesque sanatorium episode, the courtship of his wife, the Marx Brothers-like "business" deals—and in all of it Furbank manages to find shades of meaning that might escape the reader content just to revel in Zeno's many madnasses.

If there are gaps in Furbank's generally fine study, they are probably a factor of his research. Much of his material came from Svevo's wife and daughter. We are left without any adequate insight into why Svevo chose completely to repress his "Jewishness" in his writings. We do know that his wife badgered him to convert to Catholicism. (He converted, really, from Jewish apostate to baptized atheist.) Furbank does not discuss whether Svevo actually engaged in the endless affairs of his heroes, or whether this was just the recurrent fantasy of a man who could never bring himself to betray his wife. Not that it is necessary to know such intimate details of any author's life, but in this case, where the theme so preoccupied the writer, the lack of comment is conspicuous.

In the volume of short stories, the deft self-mocking tone that made Zeno so masterful slips into a pervasive fascination with approaching death. The three big stories ("The Hoax," "Nice Old Man and the Pretty Girl" and "Short Sentimental Journey"—all written in the mid-twenties after his success with Zeno) contain heroes who are pompous old men, endlessly lecturing and explaining how old men think and behave. The stiff technique of most of these stories is a throwback to his two earlier novels, and the zest and brilliance of Zeno is only occasionally glimpsed.

Svevo's awkward style is embarrassingly apparent in the short form. But his strength was always in substance, not technique, and some of his best aphorisms are in these stories: "Among dogs, who go by their noses, indifference towards life never exists. They are never simply indifferent to strangers, but always either friends or enemies." "I can never make up my mind whether by going to bed early and watching every mouthful I eat, I am really cheating life or death." "A successful writer, whose words flow too glibly and with too little effort on the paper [leaves] an empty husk which mistakes itself for the ripe fruit."

The short "Generous Wine" (written in 1914) is the best realized story in the collection, and the most interesting is the fablelike "Argo and his Master" in which a man learns a dog's language: the piece is brilliant in its insights into dog behavior, matching the best of James Thurber and Konrad Lorenz on the same subject.

Irony was at the source of the way Svevo viewed the world. It was utterly bizarre that, having become obsessed with the theme of old men and how they slowly die, Svevo should die in 1928 in a car accident. One of his fable-writing heroes in the hereafter might comment: "See, a watched pot never boils." As though Svevo planned the scene himself, a relative declined his death-bed request for a cigarette. "That really would have been my last cigarette," Svevo said, and died several hours later.

High Camp in the Underground

THE EXQUISITE CORPSE. By Alfred Chester. Simon & Schuster. 240 pp. $4.95.

CHARLES T. SAMUELS

Mr. Samuels teaches English at Williams College. He has written for The Kenyon Review, The Yale Review, Commonweal and other magazines.

Several years ago, Alfred Chester made a reputation as a book reviewer whose nastiness was refined by wit. In his New York Review piece on City of Night, for example, his affinity for Rechy's subject neither disguised itself nor spared his victim—nor, for that matter, Rechy's publisher. It was Chester who formulated Grove Press's policy statement: épater-la-post-office.

Chester wrote fiction himself, though most of his readers might understandably have been ignorant of this fact. His first novel (Jamie Is My Heart's Desire) was virtually ignored; and his short stories, unlike his criticism, had been published in too wide a variety of journals to have established a coherent following. In 1964, he made his first claim for prominence with a collection of stories, Behold Goliath. Now, after three years of obscurity, lightened by reports on love in exotic Tangier (found usually in Evergreen Review), Chester reappears, christened by his respectable publisher as "a major figure of the American literary underground," with a novel, The Exquisite Corpse.

Though the subject of Chester's stories is homosexuality, his sentimental preachiness makes the material seem almost banal. Without a trace of irony, he can write a hymn to homosexual cruising in which fellatio is "a conversion or a revelation," and castoff queens are made to indulge in true confessions which would be embarrassing from a more normal source. Normalcy itself is satirized with an earnestness only occasionally spiced by malice.

The Exquisite Corpse seems, at first, a tougher work. Through a series of separate but interspersed narratives, it constructs a crazy-house world of erotic anguish, a sort of queer Grand Hotel. In dizzying succession, we witness murder and ecstasy, high-comic satire of suburban motherhood (though these ladies tend children who don't exist), and pornographic descriptions of homosexual mechanics. Plotless, incisive, lyrical, repulsive, The Exquisite Corpse is a book for which the epithet "uneven" seems facetious.

In some bizarre subplots, Chester manages to find the right situation for his peculiar truth. To illustrate perversion's awful anonymity, Chester presents the married T. S. Ferguson who becomes John Doe and fulfills his illicit appetites with a partner designed to be debased. Installing Baby Poor-poor, his pathetic catamite, in a tawdry "love nest," John Doe will not even permit the utterance of his assumed name. "What shall I call you then?" asks Baby. "You don't have to call me anything. There are only two of us here."

In other parts of the novel, the action is so bizarre as to block any response except bemused curiosity. What, for example, are we to make of the adventures of Baby's mother, a near idiot who conceives her child by a Lesbian, loses it when some literal fairies give her a changeling, and eventually takes up with a jungle savage and an old man who bears the same name as her "son"?

Yet when Chester controls the grotesqueness, he can be both insightful and liberatingly comic, as in the series of letters written to Dr. Franzblau by a girl who "sort of knew the facts of life but not too clearly," since she is probably a boy. At his best, Chester combines wicked humor with pathos. When John Anthony, a Catholic convert and transvestite (relentless switcher), spots a vampire on the Salvation Army marquee which fronts his favorite bar,

She stuck out her tongue at him and wagged a finger, for nothing scared her anymore except the full moon when she dreaded turning into a werewolf. And even this not so much as formerly, because Veronica was frank with herself and, as unflattering as the thought was, she knew that the werewolf must just as much dread turning into her.

The oddly named characters in Chester's mélange appear to merge and assume one another's identities, an obvious clue to the title's allusion. (Cadavre Exquis is a famous Surrealist parlor game in which the players draw physical parts on pleats of a page in order to learn what arbitrary organism they may ultimately create.) If a reader were ignorant of the parlor game, however, he would almost certainly fail to perceive, as Chester clearly intended, that the novel's subject is one twisted avatar of suffering composed of all the characters. But what is compositionally valid in visual terms need not be applicable to fiction.

The vivid details are sometimes revealingly focused, but too often they seem only to reflect a sort of private blue movie being run off in the author's mind. It is psychologically descriptive of John Anthony's character when Chester shows him worshipping a homosexual Christ (with its "high tough buttocks and one tiny crab among the pubic hair"); but what is being characterized by Chester's erotic descriptions of neutral objects like trains and ice-cream scoops, his homosexual puns concealed in passages of seemingly innocent narration, his leering plot details (most of the characters either become or search for a man named Dickie)?

After all the fun and games, the shocking events coming at us without intelligible order, the book begins to seem more and more unmistakably soft. Characters start exhaling about "how hard it is to live." The most important subplot (in which a man considerably masks his ruined face only to go unrecognized by his homosexual lover) would pass, under other circumstances, for "straight" O. Henry.

Though The Exquisite Corpse is ultimately unsuccessful, it remains interesting for what it exemplifies. In its pages, two contemporary developments coincide: fascination with forbidden subjects and impatience with the traditional art of fiction. The book's subject is still strange, having been rendered comprehensible to most readers neither by Rechy's coy evasions nor Burroughs' mad dreams; neither by Selby's mindless pseudo-naturalism nor Genet's metaphysical arabesques. The private pain in Chester's pages is authentic, but the technical dislocations make its source more marginal and the pain becomes more remote.

In our literary situation, going underground is the road to chic success. But true exploration requires a discovery which is not mere inversion of the natural.

"time" at the center of his novel, though for him it becomes physical and absolute, not metaphysical and relative. Passing because it must, it is not mysterious, only at moments indefinable. Powell is concerned with time, not obsessed by it; for while he sees it as blasting the hopes of some, wasting the promise of others, he sees it, too, as the sole arbiter for shaping in the future the formless formulas of the past. Things, in short, may make no sense one minute, make all the sense the next.

This idea sounds through "The Music of Time" as a melancholy, sad, and recently even tragic note, but always pitched to the comic scale that keeps the sequence from growing tedious (Miss Lessing), oppressive (Sir Charles) or unwieldy (Durrell). Powell avoids embarrassing postures by treating comically—that is, in a way that accepts life and human nature for what they are without trying to change them—such joyless themes as decay, suicide and death; and without turning Jenkins into a Pollyanna endows him with an amiable curiosity, a good heart, a noble tolerance and infinite resources for recovery.

Nowhere does Jenkins wear these attributes more handsomely than in The Soldier's Art, the latest installment of "The Music of Time." To be sure, earlier doubts about his role as protagonist have been well founded. His problems of growing out of adolescence in A Question of Upbringing, of finding a niche in life in A Buyer's Market, of falling in and out of love in The Acceptance World were never his problems solely. And in At Lady Molly's and Casanova's Chinese Restaurant he hung fire to make room for dozens of new characters in the dance. But from The Kindly Ones on, Nick has found his footing firmer, though the ground has gone from shaky to shakier and, in the first volume of the war trilogy, The Valley of Bones, shakiest.

There, Powell shows how Jenkins' company commander, Captain Rowland Gwatkin, slave to a romantic idealism, is at first fascinated by the working of the war machine, and at last ground in its gears. On the tight little island war has not yet become hell, but it is already a dispiriting reality. The world of officers and gentlemen only outwardly glistens with the spit and polish of military noblesse oblige. Beneath the camaraderie and Kiplingesque romance are the scarred surfaces of a grubby, routine existence where success is difficult and failure severe. Jenkins, neither succeeding nor failing, emerges resolved

Dancing in Cadence

THE SOLDIER'S ART. By Anthony Powell. Little, Brown & Co. 252 pp. $4.95.

ROBERT K. MORRIS

Mr. Morris is assistant professor of English at the City College of the City University of New York. He has written a critical study of Anthony Powell to be published later this year by the University of Pittsburgh Press.

A happy Malthusian predictability accompanies the career of Anthony Powell. Since 1951 he has published eight volumes in the novel sequence, "A Dance to the Music of Time," and as the series swells arithmetically, his reputation seems to progress geometrically. Today, he is the most distinguished and respected of English novelists working with a form that has created pitfalls even for his expert contemporaries.

One thinks of Doris Lessing's "Children of Violence," C. P. Snow's "Strangers and Brothers," and Lawrence

Durrell's "Alexandria Quartet," important sequences by three writers who, despite their talent, have not always focused on the essential aim of the genre: to play changing sensibilities against the continuum of human history. How Powell, using at times the techniques of all three, has kept perspective and control, is worth a moment's pause.

Like Miss Lessing he has an eye for trivia, but where she conveys through her characters a sense of impotence, Powell conveys through his a sense of life; the trivial is made futile, but it is also made comic. Like Snow he employs a first-person narrator, Nicholas Jenkins, but whereas Jenkins increases in interest both as protagonist and chronicler, Lewis Eliot of "Strangers and Brothers," moving from obscurity to success yet lacking any real personality, has over the years changed from an easygoing bore into a crashing one. Finally, like Durrell, Powell places

'The habit grew on me...'

So writes a subscriber, explaining why he has been reading The Nation for the past thirty years.

In an age of hyperbole, The Nation makes few claims for itself. It will not make you rich or alluring to the opposite sex.

Some readers buy it because it carries the toughest crossword puzzle now being printed in America. More buy it because the editors have a greedy curiosity about what really happens behind the velvet curtains of public relations and the pious admonitions of government.

The truth is not often given away free—you have to dig for it. The Nation has been digging for 101 years and its readers never seem to tire of watching the editors work.

subscribe to

THE NATION

America's most habit-forming magazine

FREE with each NEW subscription

VIETNAM: The Logic of Withdrawal

by Howard Zinn

This is a studied rebuke by Howard Zinn (ex-bombardier, historian, civil rights activist) to America's continued military presence in what he calls "a theatre of the absurd." The price of that presence (primarily in lives, but also in national honor and in money needed to build America's own "Great Society" and help with the economic development of Southeast Asia) is calculated, weighed, and found indefensible.

To those who argue that our international reputation would suffer, that there is an analogy from Munich, or that we must contain communism or lose the game of dominoes—The Logic of Withdrawal as Zinn develops it is both forthright and persuasive.

The NATION
333 6th Avenue
New York, N.Y. 10014

Herewith my order and payment for a NEW subscription to The Nation. Please send my FREE copy of VIETNAM: THE LOGIC OF WITHDRAWAL.

☐ 1 Year, $10 ☐ 2 Years, $18 ☐ 6 Mos., $6
(Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 per year extra)

name

address

city state zip no.

5-29-67

and committed. There is certainly heroic stuff there. And any reservations remaining on his being the hero of the series should be dropped rapidly after reading this new volume covering the early years of the London blitz. It is both England and Nick's finest hour.

The Soldier's Art goes several steps beyond The Valley of Bones. Having accepted the "Rules and Discipline of War," Jenkins now takes up the trickier job of practicing its arts without precisely understanding them. What he sees is that they mean different things to different people, and that to find himself he must endure—even court—exposure to difficult and strained relationships.

The most difficult of these gets tangled in old ties. As Charles Stringham's superior and Kenneth Widmerpool's underling, Jenkins tries mediating between the two without connecting with either. Stringham's ironies have grown heavier, his outlook more fatalistic. For him, the soldier's art is studied resignation to fate. His confessed identification with Childe Roland—the title of the novel comes from the Browning poem—shows that he comes to stoicism via romanticism. Stringham is still the dupe of his imagination.

Widmerpool, on the other hand, is still master of the will. Like the politician or businessman's, the soldier's art consists of grabbing power, wheedling and manipulating while still hewing to lines of discipline. No one blames Widmerpool for that; it is basic to his egoism, and his egoism has often been the inspiration for great fun. But when he arranges a disadvantageous—perhaps fatal—transfer for Stringham, and leaves Jenkins stranded in an inferior post, fun gets a good stiff bash on the head.

Those familiar with the novelist's methods in "The Music of Time" may have gathered by now where Jenkins stands on all this. Without ever forcing any moral comparisons, Powell makes it plain that his protagonist comes the closest to scaling the escarpment raised by vanity and self-interest. Many of his shots may go wild, but Jenkins sustains his integrity. Alongside Widmerpool's blusterings and Stringham's passivity, his rectitude is quietly fashioned into heroic proportions. An awareness akin to sadness is the net result of the quest when Jenkins realizes that the soldier's art means remaining human in the face of the dehumanizing processes of war.

Pathos is, in fact, the fulcrum of the novel, balancing comedy on one side, tragedy on the other. Here tragedy (more particularly, death) is handled in Powell's customarily classical manner: the action happening off-stage and narrated with baldness and brevity. "That same week the plane was shot down in which Barnby was undertaking a reconnaissance flight with the aim of reporting on enemy camouflage." On some, this stark delivery may make more of an impact than it normally would if rendered in greater detail. Like E. M. Forster, Powell has the knack of killing off his characters suddenly, while still gaining for them an ironic compassion. To others, it might seem unfair that protagonists like Barnby, who have appeared throughout the series, and Lady Molly Jeavons, the eponymous heroine of an entire novel, should die without benefit of deathbed realism; or, failing that, that their deaths should be recounted with no greater ceremony than the suicide of Captain Biggs, a late-comer who has figured in less than 20 pages of The Soldier's Art.

But as a "comedian" Powell is interested in showing tragedy as underlying comedy, not vice versa. He has elected to forgo elaboration of the ironies and ambiguities that attend death and get on with those that attend life. Thus, he telescopes the tragic scenes, extends the comic ones which have always depended on richness of incident rather than verbal ingenuity, and, never gratuitously introduced, have a corresponding importance all their own.

Even the opening of the novel, which at first seems to hang rather limply on protracted double-entendres, is pressed into shape by the end. Jenkins, buying an army greatcoat from a shop selling both officers' outfits and theatrical costumes, is taken for an actor. The following exchange occurs:

"What's this one for?" [the assistant asked].

"Which one?"

"The overcoat—if I might make bold to enquire?"

"Just the war."

"Ah," he said attentively. "The War

... I'll bear the show in mind."

"Do, please."

"And the address?"

"I'll take it with me. . . ."

"Tried to make a neat job of it," he said, "though I expect the theatre's only round the corner from here."

"The theatre of war. . . .?"

"And I'll wish you a good run," he said, clasping together his old lean hands, as if in applause.

"Thanks."

"Good day, sir, and thank you."

The misunderstanding registered by the shop assistant later matches Jenkins' own confusion as he is compelled to act out various parts at headquarters and on leave in London. (There are similar comic scenes of misunderstanding with Liddament, the eccentric division general, Bithel, the lovably besotted officer in charge of the laundry unit, and Finn, a major attached to a special units language branch.) But the aptness of the dramatic metaphor—almost as much a favorite with Powell as the metaphor of the dance—is not reserved for setting character. It becomes structural in the novel as a whole when Jenkins' brother-in-law, Chips Lovell, is killed in a bombing raid while attending a theatrical performance. Powell thereby capitalizes on the earlier incident at the costumer's which, comic in itself, anticipates and underscores the sense of tragedy. Everyone, unfortunately, gets the chance for a role; everyone fits, somehow, into the "big show."

The Soldier's Art adds one more section to a complex structure that block by block, layer by layer, continues to grow into a great fictional history and to intensify and reaffirm the art of Anthony Powell.

Our Puritan Roots

A LOSS OF MASTERY. By Peter Gay. University of California Press. 164 pp. $4.50.

RELIGION AND THE AMERICAN MIND. By Alan Heimert. Harvard University Press. 668 pp. $12.50.

LOREN BARITZ

Mr. Baritz is the author of City on a Hill and the editor of the two-volume work, Sources of the American Mind (all John Wiley & Sons). He is a member of the History Department of the University of Rochester.

Whether, or to what extent, the categories and concepts of social analysis that were derived in and for Europe can be transposed to other cultures is a question that sooner or later is going to be answered. Whether, or to what extent, America is different from Europe is another such question. Perhaps it is a slur to say that Freud understood only middle-European Jewish boys, but perhaps it is not so ungracious to wonder whether he, or any other deeply cultivated Europeans could see America through the filter of what they believed to be right about their own time and place. One of the difficulties is that these European categories do at least seem to organize American data, and distinguished American historians have lived off and with them for a very long time. Where, in fact, would we be without Marx and Freud or, even more difficult to imagine, without the French Enlightenment?

This debate is now quietly proceeding over the role of religion in colonial America. It may seem an unlikely arena for such a question, but it is precisely the right place, question and moment of historical time for this debate; the nature and consequences of colonial religion must illuminate other, presumably more important, questions;

what, if any, was the class issue in the colonies? What was the American Revolution all about? What were the American sources of democracy and nationalism? And, not least, has America's cultural life been a pallid derivation from Europe? Those old Puritans continue to hold the keys to the kingdom, just as they knew all along. That is why more and more historians go knocking on their doors.

Peter Gay, a historian who has recently been writing on the French Enlightenment, turned to the American Puritans, as he said, as part of his own discovery of America. A Loss of Mastery is his analysis of the general Protestant need for a validating history, and of three Puritan historians: William Bradford, Cotton Mather and Jonathan Edwards. Gay's guiding conception was the distinction between what he calls critical and mythical thinking, and he concludes that all of the Puritan historians, as well as Puritanism itself, failed because history, and life, were made servants of piety. None of the historians knew contemporary European history, or life, which was then moving toward secularism and toward a reconception of the nature and goals of historical writing. Viewing history as art, Gay concludes that only Bradford succeeded, while Edwards may or may not have; Mather was a total failure: "the writing is prolix, arch, involuted, imprecise, repetitive, and hysterical." If Voltaire is the standard, Mather obviously cannot compete.

Jonathan Edwards' History of the Work of Redemption is judged by Gay to be thoroughly traditional, as it surely was, an Augustinian history of the invisible church, the wandering city of God. In a modern sense, that of Voltaire and Hume, Edwards wrote doctrine not history and his "history," says Gay, was "reactionary or fundamentalist," and the tragedy of Edwards is said to be that he was the last medieval American. That Edwards intended to write doctrine not history may not be beside the point.

According to Gay, the liberals in this Puritan country did not write history, and the histories of the conservatives were either bad or non-history presumably because they were conservative: orthodox, pious, Calvinistic. Ignoring some of the finer distinctions between Puritanism and Calvinism, Gay's conclusions illustrate, at least, the look of Puritanism when seen through an essentially European lens. What does it mean to talk about "liberals" and "conservatives" in this context? If one remembers the lessons he learned from Marx and Mill, among others, he may learn how not to see.

Alan Heimert's Religion and the American Mind is a conclusive argument, carefully and patiently done, which shows that religious reactionaries were political revolutionaries, and that liberal clergymen, defenders of sweet reason, were social and political conservatives. This complete reversal of what liberal, Whiggish historians would prefer simply demands that the entire period be reconceptualized along lines that Heimert traces. As a result of this book it is no longer possible to reason that revolutions are made by revolutionaries who embrace reason, attack religion, and otherwise behave as a philosophe in good standing.

The Calvinist clergy were almost all revolutionaries, because they would not separate morality from politics; because they insisted on trying to build a less imperfect world (instead of saying that this was the best possible) in the here and now; because they were committed to the equality and fraternity of all men under the transcendent King of Kings, and because England was in their way while God, they knew, was not. Edwards, Gay's reactionary, is for Heimert the intellectual father of the entire Calvinist clergy who helped to make a revolution. So far, therefore, from being the last medieval, he was indispensable to the success of a modern revolution. The very categories and labels simply retard understanding, and Heimert's argument would also have been clearer had he found a way to dispense with them.

Religion and the American Mind should not be summarized because its rich detail is necessary to support an unfriendly argument. But this much can be said without doing violence to Heimert's case: the Great Awakening,

THE TRUST

You start with yourself and are lucky if you ever get past that. It's a process of winnowing. Say, you have accomplished something—■ dragon, oleander or loin—

but how can you know the true salmon's touch when you cannot trust yourself alone

*like this with yourself.
You might call it creation, picturing a theater, the sun*

having driven the rattlesnakes to singing. Well, this is the beginning: what you do next will depend on nothing.

JAMES TATE

a widespread and intense religious revival in the 1740s, was an indigenous phenomenon that constituted America's intellectual independence from Europe. It split America into two hostile camps, one based on reason and the other on piety, or rationalism and evangelicalism, or liberalism and Calvinism. Heimert asserts that the difference was one of value and taste, not of class, but he later shows that the liberals consistently defended individual property, the rich and the genteel, while the Calvinists just as consistently spoke for the community and the poor. Liberalism was elitist while Calvinism everywhere challenged the established order. This means what is so hard to learn: the American democratic tradition was the child of evangelical religion, not of the Age of Reason.

Heimert's illustrative metaphor for this argument clinches the case. Edwards' major antagonist in the Great Awakening was Charles Chauncy. Chauncy advocated reasonableness in religion as in other things, and he accused Edwards of unleashing the dangerous passions of the great unwashed. As Heimert explains, Chauncy thought of heaven as a glorified Harvard graduate school with himself as dean. Liberalism, in short, provided a new concept of the Elect, the chosen of God, one made up of learning, gentility and manners, while the Calvinists appealed to everyone regardless of intellectual ability. Chauncy tried to explain that Edwards' position would result in a new peasants' rebellion, just as the first had been caused by "stupidities" encouraging resistance to "lawful authority."

The liberals counseled social resignation and the suppression of envy of the rich, and they were unfailingly committed to social order, to each man's accepting his station and praising God for His wisdom. During the revolution the liberals wanted to replace the English center of gravity, that which kept men and orders "in their place," with an American one that would perform the same function. But the so-called conservative evangelicals demanded an intimate, complete, affectionate union, a new creation of a band of brothers, as one put it.

Because the liberals always sought social institutions that would restrain the dangerous and stupid multitudes, they of course supported the Constitution, proliferation of law and a general tightening of America's social situation. With their eyes turned toward heaven, the Calvinists continued to demand reform but, in time, some were seduced by New England and these, although fewer than historians have thought, abandoned freedom for Federalism.

The colonial liberals were gentlemen, in an English sense, and the Calvinists were not. Later gentlemen, including some historians, have written gently of their kind, and consequently have drawn a picture of a revolution that could have happened only in England or France. Other Americans made their war not in the name of reason or even of class but because that was what they thought they had to do in order to protect their souls.

These explanations are uncongenial to the Enlightenment's children; Marx would seek the ox being gored, and Freud would seek the father whom the brothers had better murder. Their conclusions would actually help to construct hierarchies of significance but, in the end, the question remains: when tools of analysis are transposed from one culture to another, will they continue to function? Might their efficiency be reduced?

But, in order for those tools to work we have had to assume that America was a reflection of Europe. Of course it was, in many ways; in what ways was it not?

Heimert's Religion and the American Mind shows what Gay could not see, and shows that the cultural experience of 18th-century America was importantly different from that of either France or England. But more important, Heimert shows that the assumptions liberals have made about other liberals in history is likely to get the historical record, or part of it, exactly backwards.

"The first crime occurred at the Hotel du Nord—that high prism that dominates the estuary whose waters are the colors of the desert. To this tower (which most manifestly unites the hateful whiteness of a sanitarium, the numbered divisibility of a prison, and the general appearance of a bawdy house), on the third day of December came the delegate from Podolsk to the Third Talmudic Congress, Doctor Marcel Yarmolinsky. . . ." The words are by Jorge Luis Borges, opening a story called "Death and the Compass," but they could almost have come from the interior of a box by Joseph Cornell. In the vision of the blind Argentinian and of the man who lives on Utopia Boulevard, Queens, there is a comparable enchantment—a little pedantic, and very cosmological. One finds a fey horror and a genteel, almost Victorian stiltedness in Cornell that may precipitate easily into waters "the colors of the desert." The sense in which each of his creations is a microcosm of nostalgia, judged with lapidary precision, and embedded in a poetic recall that mingles music and the stars, film and mathematics, accords very well with a certain aspect of the modern imagination. For, underneath the positivism of the 19th century lies a substratum of disquiet, anticipating our own—there to be mined simultaneously for its campy charm and its darker hints of void. It is ironic to see the boxes of Cornell, in the best exposition they have yet enjoyed, housed in the buff and white Guggenheim, whose form resembles a rounded-off and inverted ziggurat, spiraling into a "Futuristic" vortex.

For, with unwitting relevance, the museum mimes one of Cornell's pervasive images: the coiled watch spring, cut off from its cogs and gears, existing in fruitless, ornamental tension. The convoluted spring is a pirouette divorced from the measuring of time it otherwise suggests. It partakes, as well, of Cornell's penchant for circularity—disks or spheres, rounding about themselves; the sun, balls, rings, arches, celestial bodies. The most fragile and evasive suggestion of it is soap bubbles; but these exist only by implication, white clay pipes, with bowls grasped by sculpted hands, being almost Cornell's signature. He manages to suggest by such iconography the idea of endlessness, infinity, which is all the more poignant since his chosen means are eggshell or hairline in their physical embodiment. It is almost as if the glance has to touch as lightly as it can upon these objects, for fear of crumbling or mauling them. The artist's intuition that the past and the future are in the same revolution, without start or end, is given as a kind of tracery in which the mechanism of nature hushes precariously into itself.

Like Paul Klee in wanting to invent as nature does, to create a miniature universe of his own, Cornell is yet much more directly involved with the stoppage of time, or more exactly, the mixing of tenses. In this sense, though it has a highly metaphoric content, the primary condition of his art is of a peculiar interior voyage. (The equation of many of his tableaux with hotels, temporary homes of the restless, is hardly a coincidence.) Each of the boxes is a self-contained journey, a time capsule or memory receptacle where the here and now cohabit with the distant and the exotic on the same level of suspended animation. It is precisely because the widest ranges into space suggest a temporal immensity as well that their compression has a hallucinatingly timeless quality.

In Cornell, the roots of German Romanticism have been overlaid with the tradition of French Symbolism, particularly that aspect of it which yearns for ineffable realms of experience, vicarious regions in which one can participate more substantially than in the undifferentiated chaos of immediate reality. Not for nothing does he bottle specimens of evanescent life, such as butterfly wings; nor is it accidental that the hourglass, like Mallarmé's "horloge de son ame," evoked in drifts of glittering sands, becomes a wavering imminence in his vision. The city, even history itself, exist only as scavenging ground for Cornell's compartmented fancies; and the present has no "feel," nor does it impart qualities of identifiable environment to an artist who retreats or escapes into surrogate environments.

It is surely not a contradiction that Cornell embodies all this in a theatrical mode which is a self-acknowledging form of his own artifice. These closed firmaments are little stages, with their own flats, sidelights and props. Much as with the old stereopticons, depth is incised by a series of images pasted on flattened planes, marked off, or separated from one another by an "illusion" whose very imperfection is charming. Not only is this a charade which strives to elicit some of the wonder of the first conquests of photography but it is also an ironic pleasure taken in revealing the conceits of the artist's own poetics. He is simultaneously the creator and the spectator of his own gamesmanship.

Nothing is more indicative on this score than a use of mirrors that Cornell not only pioneered but of which he remains still the most exquisite practitioner. Innumerable boxes are gridworks of transparent or reflecting screens. To look into them is to see not merely one's own features, staggered or fragmented, but back views of areas nominally averted from the gaze. But such glasses are obfuscations as much as they are extensions of space. Front and rear are reversible; the backdrop falls away, an oblique antechamber is partially revealed. Yet diagrams drawn on such surfaces seem suspended in "air"; supports are suddenly implausible, and reflections dissolve, as surely as transparency reveals, material things. The mirror or glass is an agent of Cornell's liking for replication at the same time that it is the most fragile of his elements. Additionally, it is so indeterminate in value, so specious and variable in the way it bounces back available light, that it deliberately intensifies the illusory quotient of his en-

The Nation SUBSCRIBERS' BOOK SERVICE

Offers the following at discount prices:

	Price
<input type="checkbox"/> THE ACCIDENTAL PRESIDENT by Robert Sherrill (Grossman, $5.00)	$4.00
<input type="checkbox"/> THE FREE WORLD COLOSSUS: A Critique of American Foreign Policy in the Cold War by David Horowitz (Hill and Wang, $6.95)	$5.55
<input type="checkbox"/> FRIENDSHIP AND FRATRICIDE: An Analysis of Whittaker Chambers and Alger Hiss by Dr. Meyer A. Zeligs (Viking, $8.95)	$7.15
<input type="checkbox"/> THE NAKED IMAGE: Observations on the Modern Theatre by Harold Clurman (Macmillan, $6.50)	$5.20
<input type="checkbox"/> DE GAULLE: A Political Biography by Alexander Werth (Simon and Schuster, $7.50)	$6.00
<input type="checkbox"/> THE PSYCHOLOGY OF POWER by Ronald Sampson (Pantheon, $4.95)	$3.96

Remittance accompanying orders should be made payable to THE NATION, 333 6th Ave., N.Y. 10014

☐ Payment enclosed ☐ Please bill me

Readers can avail themselves of our regular offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S. at the retail price post-free. When ordering, please give title, author and publisher, if possible.

terprise. Yet, to compose a lattice of vacancies is also, curiously, to introduce a certain voyeuristic coloring. The multiple innuendos, the scattering and faceting of images are all reminiscent of the coquettish thrills of a peep show. Still more, Cornell is forever partially imposing some porous veil mesh, darkly tinted glass, chiffon, feathers, twigs, screen doors—upon “backgrounds” which are in reality his protagonists. When, as in the “Crystal Palace,” 1949, mirrors reflect only the chance shadows that might animate a glittering prison, timbered in struts, the real meaning of his statement is illuminated: fantasy does not lead toward liberation, but rather provides its own lovely cage.

Whenever, at widely scattered intervals, Cornell had previously shown his work, it became for the most part, and with reason, an underground pet of criticism. The usual treatment at one time was to sing or chirp along with the boxes, in verbal mimicry of their winsome oddments. More recently, it has become harder to resist giving factual, but fascinating lists of Cornellian imagery—with the effect, perhaps, of some of the more titillating recipes in the gourmet cookbooks. Yet these approaches, while often yielding insights, tended to overweight the part against the whole, or vice versa, through

ART

ORIGINALS COST LESS THAN REPRODUCTIONS! Contemporary original signed etchings, lithographs, woodcuts, $3.50. Guarantee. Free brochure. GRAPHIC CIRCLE (NA), 68 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10011.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALQUIN 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

The Best Way To Get THE NATION

THE NATION 5-29-67
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

- ☐ One Year, $10
- ☐ Two Years, $18
- ☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Foreign and Canadian Postage
$1 a year extra)

NAME _____

ADDRESS _____

CITY _____

STATE _____ ZIP NO. _____

PAULO CLIMBING DOWN THROUGH A TREE

*He is off to wring the neck of the luncheon chicken and cut the throat of Sunday's rabbit. A knife between his teeth he steps down from the balcony onto the top branch glowing like vengeance in the leaves. The roadway steams. His shadow falls from the branches breaking up the skin of morning.
I reflect him in my heart, this child carrying weapons of supper. I carry weapons too between my teeth, the weapons of will and music.*

We increase in animality.

The harvest grows in the sun between the double gates of death and greenery.

NED O'GORMAN

their reluctance to use analysis. After all, the man is not an inexplicable mage, nor a mere customs official of the imagination; definite devices, even mechanics, put his materials into their special combinations.

It is obvious, for instance, that he relies heavily on the idea of the contained within the contained. Not only are goblets or bottles, dovecotes or portholes, receptacles for stored or concealed information but sometimes the frames of his compositions are included with the frames of the boxes. Even more frequently the outer frames are papered over with engravings or words in a kind of vacuum filling program (linked with the contents), in which it is impossible to tell whether they are more decorative or literary. Second, there is a surprising substitution of part for whole, still more direct than that which I have just mentioned. In “A Swan Lake for Tamara Toumanova,” 1946, for instance, an engraved or photographic cutout of a swan under blue glass is surrounded by real white feathers. Scale, too, is one of the most ingenious and important of Cornell's poetic sources. In “Pink Palace,” 1946, an engraving of an old building with minute foreground figures, is backed with hair-raising sprigs of twigs, grotesquely out of proportion with the scene. Maps are an even more extreme, though schematic, indication of his juggling of depicted and infinitely small scale references with real objects, not large in themselves, but Gargantuan in comparison with their surroundings. Finally, just to notice one more of several subtleties, there are frequent echo or rhyme effects in Cornell. I am not speaking of the repetitions of identical elements, like mute votives, in great pieces like “Multiple Cubes” or “Bebé,” but rather “A Parrot For Juan Gris,” 1953-54, in which the shadow profile of the flattened parrot occurs in white and black cut-outs against the newsprint behind it. What is volumetric becomes flat, what is solid becomes transparent. And yet, however different the incarnation, the morphology is the same.

It is just this kind of syntax, in the final analysis, that confirms Cornell as an extremely knowing artist. With extreme deftness, he has skirted through and around the methodology of di Chirico and Gris, Ernst and Mondrian, who are as present in his formal intelligence as the Renaissance masters are evident in the reproductions he includes. His compressions and elisions, always dovetailing with each other, are of such high level of inventiveness that his work cuts itself entirely free from those merely tasteful congeries of small antiquities to be found in the rue Jacob or on the Quai Voltaire. Yet Cornell is indifferent, in the end, to the structural imperatives of Cubism. And he is innocent of the aspirations to tap some collective unconscious that typifies Surrealism. Even Magritte's epistemological puzzles are foreign to Cornell's diffident narcissism, and his homespun refinement, centering usually upon the pretty underwear of culture. By his art, I am reminded of Lichtenberg's remark: “The petticoat had very wide red and blue stripes and looked as if it were made of theater curtain. I'd have paid a lot for a front-row-center seat, but the curtain was never raised.” Perhaps Cornell is too modest to raise the curtain, perhaps too sophisticated. At any rate, that very ambiguity constitutes the joy of this exhibition. For having selected it with great erudition, and installed it with remarkable care, Diane Waldman deserves loud applause.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1203

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS:

- 1 and 6 across Alcazar and Alhambra? (Not really real!) (7, 2, 5)
- 9 What Ethel Merman asked to be called.
- 10 Descriptive of a 28 that doesn't get to go with wings, and doesn't want to. (9)
- 11 Rather early, and about to inquire at the heart of the city. (9)
- 12 This summer could be deadly! (5)
- 15 An item in a rather dull series of letters.
- 18 15 passed around manufactured liquor, perhaps. (9)
- 19 Candy associated with Wales? (5)
- 20 Dwindle around the middle, by the sound of it. (5)
- 22 Making a favorable appearance, as the bride might be. (9)
- 25 Swap one of your handles, as they say? (It may not be susceptible of exclusive appropriation.) (5, 4)
- 26 An added remark appears to be one of two points in eccentric orbit. (5)
- 27 Falls back under the blow of winds? (5)
- 28 A boring job atop an old carriage, if you're looking for an insect. (9)

DOWN:

- 1 and 13 across The vacation spot's working equipment, or for the rest of the non-workers there? (10)
- 2 The team makes its appearance on the Midway, possibly. (9)
- 3 As a theorem, it helps. (5)
- 4 Just about the work of a tailor. (9)

- 5 If it's any longer, you can see the material there! (5)
- 6 This party needs capital, so italics could designate just a supporter. (9)
- 7 Adjudge to be due as a person under care? (5)
- 8 This can cause a riot, yet no disturbance is more likely to get publicity. (9)
- 13 Tried a wet solution, but not really deep.
- 14 The brave would hardly be, but neither would a cactus. (9)
- 16 England, Rome, Dalmatia — logical places to search for stars! (9)
- 17 and 21 Undercover romance that couldn't violate the Mann Act? (Secretaries might take a leading part in them.) (7, 2, 5)
- 22 Quietly set down in check. (5)
- 23 A number within the Shakespearean characterization would hardly be the well-developed type. (5)
- 24 Happy about the boat? Bubbles might manifest such a condition. (5)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1202

ACROSS: 1 Impetuous; 6 Awful; 9 Lowered; 10 Organdy; 11, 12 and 13 The World's Fair; 15 Disdains; 16 Camera; 18 Cranks; 20 Free time; 24 Flashy; 28 Ormandy; 29 Initial; 30 Ernie; 31 Rightened.
DOWN: 1 Islet; 2 Powders; 3 Throwbacks; 4 Ordering; 5, 23 and 25 Swordsmanship; 6 Argo; 7 Fanfare; 8 Layer cake; 14 Panegyrist; 15 Decompose; 17 Pressing; 19 Agnomen; 21 Ich dien; 22 Player; 26 Paled; 27 Knee.

EDUCATIONAL

FIVE DAY BOARDING SCHOOL. A unique program for people who have not even considered a boarding school. Grades five through eight. THE THOREAU SCHOOL. An intimate, cooperative community, combining study with the tasks and joys of farm living. School bus brings your children home to NYC week-ends. Small classes, individual instruction. Now enrolling for September. Write: Rodman, RD 1, Wallkill, N.Y. 12589. Phone: 914-895-5523.

BLAKE COLLEGE—Experimental, self-motivated, 'pataphysical students. 342 East 10, Eugene, Oregon 97401.

TRAVEL

The OTHER Israel—a three-week summer program for young people 21 to 35—a dialogue with young Israeli socialists—meet farmers, workers, Arabs, labor leaders, peace groups, parliament members—live and work in a kibbutz—tour the country, $625.00. For details write: Young Americans for Progressive Israel, 150 Fifth Avenue, Room 700, New York, N.Y. 10011.

SUMMER RENTAL

WESTBROOK VICINITY — LAKEFRONT Studio Apartment, private entrance, complete kitchen, sleep 2; swimming-boating-fishing on private lake; golf, tennis nearby. Season $500. Morgenstern, Deep River, Conn. 06417. Tel: 203 LA 6-2463 or Eves: NYC 324-9135.

VACATIONS

ENJOY SPRING at LAKE LOUANNE, West-brook, Conn. Over 200 acres on private lake. Excellent swimming, fishing-boating. Golf, summer theatres, Long Island Sound, excellent restaurants nearby. Rooms with private baths. Breakfast only. Tel.: 609-2465.

PUBLICATIONS

"SELECTED POEMS" of George Flynn (Villiers of London $2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound."—James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at 544—82 St., Brooklyn 9, N.Y.

THE IDLER. Lively, offbeat, liberal monthly. $1 brings four different sample back issues. Idler, 418B 6th St., N.E., Washington, D.C. 20002.

AMERICAN HAIKU magazine. Subscription —$3.00 yearly. Box 73, Platteville, Wisconsin 53418.

THE BLUFF OF DECODDING THE HUMANS by Bibi Beebi, 116 pp., price $3.00. Popular Non-Newtonian, etc., physics, astronomy, cultureology, philosophy. The Inventist, P.O. Box 17039, Los Angeles, Calif. 90017.

PERSONALS

CALCUTTA POET, qualified in theatre, Indian music, physics and math, wants summer job in New York City. MITRA, 729 Pennsylvania Avenue, San Diego, Calif. 92103.

USE LAWFUL DIRECT ACTION to repeal all abortion laws LEGALIZE ABORTION, POB 24163, Los Angeles, Calif. 90024.

Puzzle Fans

You are invited once again to meet our puzzle maker, Frank Lewis. The Nation will hold a buffet supper on the evening of Thursday, June 1, from 6 o'clock on, at the Harvard Club, 27 West 44 Street. All devotees of Mr. Lewis will be welcome guests. Please let us know as soon as possible if you intend to come. Write or call The Nation, 333 Sixth Avenue, N. Y. 10014. Telephone 242-8400.

WHAT ARE YOU DOING DURING VIETNAM SUMMER 1967?

"It is time now to meet the escalation of the War in Vietnam with an escalation of opposition to that War. I think the time has come for all people of good will to engage in a massive program of organization, of mobilization. This is the purpose of Vietnam Summer. And I'm happy to join as one of the sponsors of what I consider a most necessary program, a program that may well determine the destiny of our nation."

Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., at press conference announcing
VIETNAM SUMMER,
Cambridge, Mass., April 23, 1967

In 1964, the Mississippi Freedom Summer Project mobilized thousands of students, clergymen and concerned citizens in the struggle against racial injustice. The time has come for an even more massive effort to arouse the conscience of the nation—this time against the brutal and unjust war in Vietnam.

VIETNAM SUMMER is a call for 10,000 volunteers, including 2,000 full-time workers, to spend the summer in 500 communities organizing and educating against the War. During the next four weeks speakers and field organizers will visit campuses and cities around the country recruiting participants for VIETNAM SUMMER. All peace, civil rights and civic groups and all concerned citizens are invited to join in this nation-wide effort and to begin preparation in local communities for a VIETNAM SUMMER project.

VIETNAM SUMMER is a project to reach the millions of citizens in communities across the nation who oppose the war in Vietnam but whose voices have not yet been heard. The goal is to create a new, independent force in America which will undertake a broad range of concrete actions to end the war. In many communities, VIETNAM SUMMER will focus on establishing a powerful political base of anti-war sentiment capable of electing candidates in 1968 who call for an immediate peaceful settlement of the war. VIETNAM SUMMER will support and organize opposition to the war in ghetto areas of the nation and among young men who in ever greater numbers are questioning their duty to fight this war.

VIETNAM SUMMER is an unprecedented attempt to bring together the hundreds of thousands who marched against the war on April 15, who voted against the war in 1964 and again in 1966, and the millions of Americans who want peace.

Dr. King's call for VIETNAM SUMMER is supported by Dr. Benjamin Spock, Robert Scheer, Dr. John C. Bennett, Dr. Albert Szent-Gyorgi, Archbishop Paul J. Hallinan, Rabbi Abraham Heschel, Carl Oglesby, William Pepper, Carey McWilliams, and many others.

VIETNAM SUMMER urgently needs your support (a minimum budget of $350,000 is required). Let us hear from you right away.

Rev. Robert Holtzapple, Treasurer

Send to: VIETNAM SUMMER, 129 MT. AUBURN STREET,
CAMBRIDGE, MASS. 02138

- ☐ I want to work for VIETNAM SUMMER
- ☐ I want to organize a local VIETNAM SUMMER project in my community
- ☐ I enclose a contribution of $..... for VIETNAM SUMMER (please make checks payable to Vietnam Summer)
- ☐ I am interested in making a substantial contribution to VIETNAM SUMMER and would like to talk further to one of your representatives
- ☐ Please send further information

NAME

ADDRESS

CITY STATE ZIP

LITERARY BAY OF PIGS ALEXANDER WEIRTH

THE
NATION

JUNE 5, 1967 35 cents

BURLINGAME

JUN 6 1967

LIBRARY

EVIDENCE AT STOCKHOLM

The Judges Are Everywhere

GOSTA JULIN

Vietnam: This Is Guernica

CARL OGLESBY

NEW YORK'S FORGOTTEN DROUGHT

HOEL PERRIN

DOUBLE THE EFFORT

&

SQUARE THE ERROR

MALCOLM W. BROWNE on Roger Hillsman

Hugh MacDiarmid: Highland Red / SEAN CRONIN

-67 PLS-301
INGAME PUB LIBRARY
INGAME
FORMIA 5410
R NEWSPAP

LETTERS

caught out

New York City

DEAR SIRs: Since I took a part in the Encounter controversy in The Nation last year, let me say that I agree with your editorial summing up (May 29 issue), and would only wish to add the following.

None of the mea culpa's (or tua and sua culpa's) that we are hearing these days is ever offered spontaneously. Only when these people are caught out do we get either apology or correct information. This can only make the rest of us wonder in what areas we are being deceived right now. And to wonder that is to realize that we must do more than wonder. We must press for every kind of exposure of the truth whenever opportunity offers. And we must be very suspicious of those who have aroused our suspicion. Lyndon Johnson may have stopped the CIA infiltration of student organizations; but he would never have done so except for exposures which "his" people did everything they could to prevent. Melvin Lasky has admitted being "insufficiently frank" about certain things in his past. The important point is: what is he being "insufficiently frank" about now? And what will he be "insufficiently frank" about in the future? And isn't the phrase "insufficiently frank" an unpardonable euphemism, especially when used by the guilty party? Mr. Lasky described the whole episode as a storm in a teacup. In other words, it all means very little to him. Which, in turn, is of interest to those of us who would like to appraise Encounter correctly. If we may judge by its editor's present position, it is clearly bankrupt, politically and spiritually. Congress for Cultural what? Eric Bentley

and Senator Morse

Portland, Ore.

DEAR SIRs: Your editorial of May 15 entitled "War on the Third Front" was excellent and to the point. You wrote about "This slighting of the Senate . . ." and specifically mentioned "Fulbright, Church, Gruening, McGovern, McCarthy, Kennedy and other oppositionists." The omission of Sen. Wayne Morse must be considered an oversight on the part of your editorial writer.

This is a very unfortunate omission especially since Senators Gruening and Morse have not only led the anti-Vietnamese War debate in the Senate since 1963 but have been the only two who have consistently voted against the Administration on Vietnam, including appropriations. . . .
Charles M. Grossman, M.D.

The omission was unintended, and we apologize to Senator Morse, whose courage and wisdom we have had frequent occasion to praise in the past. The Editors

struggle for community

Stevens Point, Wis.

DEAR SIRs: There is a way, not often mentioned, that the two movements, peace and civil rights, are linked. Hitherto civil rights activists, black and white, have worked toward a rather limited goal—integration of the Negro into an essentially sick society. I am aware that there was often a barrier between whites and blacks in the movement, even though it was designed precisely to bring that wall down, and one reason for the continued existence of the barrier may have been the limited nature of the civil rights movement. But concerning militarism in our country we are all, black and white, brutalized and exploited, so that as we struggle together against the curse of militarism we may yet build that classless community which the civil rights movement has failed to create.

James Missey

EDITORIALS

The Third Front

United Nations

The Palestine war of 1948-49 was strictly a conflict between the Arabs and the new state of Israel. In the second round—the tripartite operation of 1956 in Suez and the Sinai—the Arab-Israeli conflict was compounded by a post-colonial adventure and cold-war rumblings. Colonialism is not a factor in the new Middle East crisis; but the cold war is—plus inter-Arab rivalry and Egyptian desire for hegemony in the area. This shows the extreme complexity of the situation which faced the United Nations in mid-May, when the organization was already immeasurably weakened, and its peace-keeping capacity was at its lowest ebb.

There were grounds to criticize U Thant for the way he handled the initial Egyptian request for withdrawal of the UN Emergency Force. By granting immediately the maximum demands of the U.A.R., instead of temporizing as was warranted by precedent and the need for consultations, the Secretary General put himself and the United Nations in an unfavorable position for bargaining with Cairo. Any illusion he may have entertained that the prompt endorsement of the U.A.R. request would satisfy President Nasser's need to reassert his leadership in the crusade against Israel was dissipated by the Egyptian blockade of the Gulf of Aqaba, which followed promptly.

U Thant could have gone immediately to Cairo to "clarify" the U.A.R.'s intentions. His peace mission a few days later was jeopardized by the speed of events precipitated by the initial Egyptian diplomatic success. It is possible, however, that the Secretary General's legalistic attitude concerning the withdrawal of the Blue Helmets from Egyptian soil was motivated by a desire to avoid antagonizing the Soviet Union, whose opposition to any infringement of national sovereignty by UN forces is well known. Having cut himself off completely from the United States on the Vietnamese issue, U Thant did not want to find himself in a similar position vis-à-vis the Soviet Union in the other potentially major conflict of the day. Barring complete irresponsibility in Cairo or Jerusalem, the most serious question behind the present Middle East crisis is the depth of the involvement of the Soviet Union. From an initial reserve, Moscow moved last week to the ominous stance of a possible co-belligerent on the Arab side.

There are signs that, while the two superpowers have achieved a sort of equilibrium in Asia and Europe, the Middle East is providing the Soviet Union with a "Third Front" to change the balance of power to its advantage. The Soviet-oriented Syrian Government, whose active hostility against Israel has undoubtedly precipitated the present crisis, has already greatly solidified Moscow's foothold in the area. Cairo, which has slipped away under conflicting nationalist pressures, could swing back to the Soviet orbit. How far the Soviet Union is ready to go is anyone's guess.

The U.A.R. set the stage for a trial by arms when it blockaded the Gulf of Aqaba and mined the Strait of Tiran. In spite of solemn pronouncements in favor of free navigation in international waters, the United States has not given an airtight promise to come to Israel's assistance if it chooses to run the blockade. The Vietnamese commitment has top priority in Washington. The hope is that the Soviet Union will not elect to press a show-down on the "Third Front." The same hope applies to Israel, which might be tempted to defy the Egyptian diktat in order to force a victory which past diplomatic exercises have rarely given it.

The meetings of the Security Council showed once again that no dove of peace can nest in the halls of the United Nations when the big powers do not agree among themselves. Even the innocuous and well-meaning resolution (submitted by Canada and Denmark) for a general "cooling off" went down in futility. The creation of the state of Israel was made possible because, at that time, both the United States and the Soviet Union favored it. The UN was able to intervene in the Suez crisis because both Washington and Moscow condemned the Suez-Sinai expedition. The present status quo can remain in the Middle East only if Washington and Moscow do not want it upset. The four-power conference proposed by France and accepted by Washington and London could provide both the breathing spell and the framework necessary for common efforts to restore the situation, if such is the general wish.

ANNE WEILL-TUCKERMAN

Retreat To Reason

Despite reassurances from Gen. Earle C. Wheeler, Jr., chairman of the Joint Chiefs—or rather because of them—there is considerable warrant for concern about the possibility of a ground invasion of North Vietnam. This is a development we have consistently regarded as altogether "thinkable" ("On Not Knowing When To Stop," editorial, The Nation, May 1), and recent events and portents seem to have made it more likely.

(1) We are now bombing within the city limits of Hanoi, and the number of possible targets for air strikes in the whole of Vietnam is shrinking. Business Week (May 20) points out that short of an invasion of North Vietnam, or a series of "all-out devastation" bomb raids, there is not much left to escalate. Of course we could de-escalate, the air strikes having been proved futile—or even pull back, as we have done temporarily from our invasion of the southern half of the demilitarized zone—but neither of these options is likely to appeal to the military, who increasingly run this show. In addition, either pull-back or de-escalation would infuriate the hawks,

IN THIS ISSUE

June 5, 1967

EDITORIALS

706

ARTICLES

710 Literary Bay of Pigs

Alexander Werth

Evidence at Stockholm:

712 The Judges Are Everywhere

Gosta Julin

714 Vietnam: This Is Guernica

Carl Oglesby

721 New York's Forgotten Drought

Noel Perrin

724 Huelga: New Goals for Labor

Eugene Nelson, Jr.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

726 Double the Effort & Square the Error

Malcolm W. Browne

728 MacDiarmid: Highland Red

Sean Cronin

728 Cattle Show
(from Collected Poems)

Hugh MacDiarmid

730 A Style of Anxiety

David J. Gordon

732 Art and the Book Reviewer

Leonard Kriegel

733 The Glory of Poor Living

Marysa N. Gerassi

733 Floats (poem)

Arthur Gregor

735 Crossword Puzzle

Frank W. Lewis

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Copy Editor
MARION HESS

Theatre
HAROLD CLURMAN

Art
MAX KOZLOFF

Music
BENJAMIN BORETZ

Science
CARL DREHER

Advertising Manager
MARY SIMON

Associate Publisher
GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Associate Editor
PHIL KERBY

Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIAS

Poetry Editor
MICHAEL GOLDMAN

Washington
ROBERT G. SHERRILL

Paris
ALEXANDER WERTH

London
RAYMOND WILLIAMS

Bonn
C. AMERY

Canberra
C. P. FITZGERALD

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July and August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1967 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel.: CH 2-8400. West Coast office: 1256 Westwood Boulevard, Los Angeles, Calif. 90024. Tel.: GR 4-2533. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give four weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information in Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE
NATION
Combined with FRONTIER

Volume 204
No. 23

who would turn their beaks and claws on President Johnson.

(2) The stories given out about the pro tem invasion of the demilitarized zone strongly suggest that they were designed for future justification of a ground invasion in depth. We have acted "defensively," merely to pre-empt positions and because the enemy's build-up was causing distress in the Marine bases of "Leatherneck Square." But at the UN, in Canada and in Europe, the reverse of this proposition is suggested, namely, that the North Vietnamese, fearing a future invasion, have moved into the zone in force to ward it off. The theory cannot be called implausible, nor would it be surprising if our foray was designed to provoke them further—and thus justify our future moves.

In any case the demilitarized zone, as one observer put it, has now lost its "virginity." A year ago it was forbidden even to talk about the possibility of ground action in this buffer area but now, the psychological basis having been prepared, it can be expected that the American public will not be greatly shocked at a recurrence on a larger scale.

The ones who will cry havoc are the peace forces and those Senators who have been warning against further escalation—but the President has shown a massive capacity for ignoring their counsel. Sen. Thruston B. Morton, a moderate Republican, continues to caution against the apparent Administration belief that we can achieve total victory in Vietnam without bringing Communist China into the war and perhaps precipitating "total world holocaust." But his warnings, and those of other anti-hawks, carry less weight at the White House and the Pentagon than the assurances of Secretary Rusk who, having been wrong about Chinese intentions in Korea, is now presumed to be right this time. He is supported by the "think-tank" boys, at the Hudson Institute for example, who assure us that the Chinese will not move as long as we do not get into the Red River Valley. How they know this remains their secret.

(3) The decision to place the "other war" under military direction is an indication that the effort to "win the hearts and minds of the people" is a bust. It means also that the strategy of "counterinsurgency" has been relegated to the dustbin.

(4) Perhaps most important, political time is running out for the President. The next three months will be critical in terms of laying down a political line for the 1968 elections. Mr. Johnson may be unable to face the prospect of being locked into a bloody war of attrition with no prospect of a settlement. The temptation will then be great to try just one more desperate move—and invade by land, sea and air, at the same time asking Congress to declare war, which would put a damper on partisan criticism and general debate.

But this crowning act of folly has not yet occurred. With a crisis in the Middle East, and faced with cumulative warnings about the danger of Chinese intervention, the President may even now decide to beat a retreat to reason, and abandon any thought of sending U.S. forces across the Ben Hai River.

Tuesday's Menu

The lunch at which Mr. Johnson tried to probe the minds and hearts of the disaffected intellectuals was a one-time affair, but The Washington Post has provided an insight into how high policy is made in Washington these days: the recurring Tuesday lunch, preceding which Messrs. Rusk, McNamara and Rostow meet, sip dietetic root beer or sherry, and prepare to wrestle with affairs of state. Soon they are joined by the President, who puts them at their ease with a brief interval of small talk and leads the way into the dining room. There, in the reporter's words, Mr. Johnson "dips into the minds of the men around him in smorgasbord fashion" and decides what to do next in Vietnam.

The first morsel is drawn from Mr. Rusk, whose great merit is impassivity. Less stoical is Mr. McNamara, who is said to be disquieted by the war. At the foot of the table sits Mr. Rostow, "father of the strategy of vigorously intensifying the war." Playing with destiny, he is both eager and nervous. Soon he will be immortalized in bronze as the giant who steered the President to victory—if he is not thrown headfirst down the Capitol steps.

The Nation has no desire to spoil the well-earned appetites of men so burdened by fate, but after all they are gambling with the lives of nearly 200 million Americans, not to speak of the rest of humanity. The Tuesday lunches have failed to produce policies that, just possibly, might work. "The group is ingrown," critics say. "Mr. Rusk and Mr. McNamara are tired men . . . there is an inadequate upflow of ideas and an inadequate downflow of results. . . ."

Perhaps a change of personnel would relieve these strangulations. For better or worse, all these movers and shakers may be retired in 1968, but in the meantime might not Mr. Rusk be given surcease from his tireless labors of seven years? He is no doubt skillful in negotiation. He knows how not to make waves. He has a nice touch with Southern Congressmen. He is as cool as an iceberg—and as difficult to move from a position. But how can the policies which have failed be changed as long as he is there? He has an enormous emotional and career investment in all that has happened. He is a symbol of what is wrong and sterile in American policy—and it is not in him (as it would not be in many men) to admit errors so mammoth.

What will Mr. Rusk do if, relieved of the cares of state, he can curl up at night with a good book instead of another load of bad news? Our suggestion for rewarding reading is the ill-fated GOP report, "The War in Vietnam," known as the White Paper. Five hundred copies were bootlegged about Washington, but it is not likely that one was allowed to reach Mr. Rusk. Fortunately, it has now been reprinted by the Public Affairs Press, 419 New Jersey Avenue S.E., Washington, D.C. 20003. Mr. Rusk could get a copy for $1 and, as a private citizen, he might be able to appreciate the worth of ideas he never had while in office.

The VOA Technique

Broadcast from Washington, April 18, ■ Voice of America account of the anti-war demonstrations of April 15 began in a fairly neutral tone. Although the broadcaster gives the estimated number of marchers in New York City as 100,000, considerably below the police count and about a third of Martin Luther King's claim, he concedes that the march reflected "strong, though minority, feelings about the Vietnamese conflict." Then he lists some of the organizations and individuals involved, and muses that "not for a long while have such heterogeneous groups put up so homogeneous—if temporary—a front. One could read this as a jelling of minority public opinion."

This descriptive section contains a reference to Dr. King's alleged "fracturing" of the civil rights movement and is suffused with a faint air of aversion but, after all, the writer is working for VOA, which is not in business to praise opposition to the cold war, or the Vietnamese War in particular. It is when he embarks on his job of news "analysis" that the writer sees to it that VOA gets its money's worth.

"Many older spectators of the march," he says, "must have recalled the days before World War II when pacifists, isolationists, Communists, pro-Nazi German-American organizations, and a good many idealists of various kinds joined in opposing American entry into the conflict in Europe. The parallel stops there, of course, because the United States was not actually at war in 1939 and 1940. . . ."

The parallel never starts, because those disparate elements never "joined" in their opposition. Between an organization like the Communist-led League Against War and Fascism and the pro-Nazi shirt outfits there was as much community of interest as between Winston Churchill and Adolf Hitler. Even after the signing of the German-Soviet nonaggression pact in 1939 there was never the slightest collaboration between Nazi and Communist groups in the United States, while individuals like Robert M. Hutchins and Charles A. Lindbergh, both of whom opposed American involvement, did so for entirely different reasons. The purported analogy is nothing but an attempt to smear the opposition to the Vietnamese War, in which the United States is playing a role much like that of the German and Italian Fascists in Spain in 1936-39. There is the analogy from which VOA wants the world to avert its eyes.

After saying that the United States was not actually at war in 1939 and 1940, the broadcaster continues: "Today the United States is in conflict in Vietnam. What shocked and angered many spectators of the New York rally was that, as ■ Washington Post correspondent put it, while Americans were dying in Vietnam other Americans were 'imploping peace and surrender to the enemy.' " Then he sets up the usual Administration wail that Ho Chi Minh will be hardened in his contumacy and will not show "a real interest in peace" because of the demonstrations.

So the U.S. is "in conflict" in Vietnam. VOA does not dare say "at war," because it knows, as everyone knows, that the Johnson Administration has by-passed the Congress in the whole wretched adventure, and that Mr. Johnson campaigned on a platform of nonescalation and, as soon as he was assured of another four years in office, became a hawk of hawks, while pretending still to be a moderate. One wonders where VOA expects to find an audience gullible enough to fall for propaganda at this level. Not in Asia, surely, where it will be welcomed only by the corrupt ruling classes of such countries as South Vietnam, Thailand, Korea and the Philippines. For all their tribalism and illiteracy, many Africans are likewise suspicious of the VOA. Within the Soviet orbit some potential defectors may be discouraged, since they can only conclude that the American Government tells even bigger lies than their own. As for the rest of Europe, The Wall Street Journal recently did a study which reached the conclusion that 80 per cent of European public opinion opposes the U.S. "conflict" in Vietnam, and that some such proportion runs through virtually all sections of the population, even those with reason to be prepossessed in America's favor. The VOA is pouring all those kilowatts into the air for no purpose except to provide work for some thousands of placemen.

Why Intellectuals Dislike LBJ

Among the recent sob stories coming out of the White House is the tale of the "Little Monks" and the President's lunch with a select group of intellectuals who work for him. The latter would fit into a musical comedy. Here were sixteen men, sitting around the President in the White House Fish Room, summoned to tell him what the devil was the matter with those other intellectuals, not in the Administration, who constantly gripe about the Vietnamese War and in manifold ways show their lack of love for LBJ. Did he really expect to find out what was wrong? He would have had ■ better chance of getting usable information if he had set up a suggestion box.

One courageous soul did suggest that the war might have something to do with the alienation of the intellectuals, but the consensus was that the highbrows were no more disgruntled than a "noisy minority" of the general population. No one was so ill-mannered as to refer to the almost continuous series of protests from university faculties—391 at Cornell, 321 at Columbia—at just about the time of the great fact-finding lunch.

The President himself seems to be rankled by a suspicion that his personality is at the bottom of his unpopularity among the intellectuals. We have said in these columns that it was not his Texas background or his lack of Eastern polish or his accent or his vocabulary or his haberdashery that puts us off. These are trivialities. It is his policies, his gross deception in the 1964 campaign and other political specifics that we criticize.

Yet, while we wish to keep the discussion at this level and not carp at Mr. Johnson for traits and habits he can't help, we will venture to call to his attention some unendearing mannerisms that he could avoid without trying to make himself over. The "Little Monks" story is a case in point. Mr. Johnson inflicted this anecdote on at least ten different audiences in as many months; it became a kind of Presidential vaudeville. What a commentary on Mr. Johnson's taste, his perception, his sensibility! The editors of the most banal pulp magazine would recoil from this "your daddy" goo, and the mental and emotional processes it reveals.

The story, which involves not a "little monk" but a 5 ft. 10 in. friar, is downright insulting to Catholic intellectuals in particular. They are expected to believe that when the President ordered the bombing of the Hanoi and Haiphong areas last summer—and feared that many U.S. planes would be lost, that many civilians might be killed, that a Soviet ship might be hit and World War III might be precipitated—none of these disasters occurred, and Mr. Johnson slept the sleep of the just because he went to a Catholic Church with his daughter Luci and prayed. Luci was not surprised, the story goes. "I knew my little monk (s) wouldn't fail me," she is supposed to have said. Luci is entitled to her beliefs and the President is entitled to a faith in the efficacy of prayer. But he cannot expect intellectuals to throw their hats in the air when he publicizes such debauchery of reason and religion.

LITERARY BAY OF PIGS

ALEXANDER WERTH

Paris

Ten years ago we in Europe knew very little about the CIA except that it had somehow, in cooperation with Mr. Loy Henderson, managed to bring about the overthrow of Prime Minister Mossadegh of Iran, much to the joy of the American and British oil companies. Today—or rather for the last four or five years—we can't get away from the CIA. One now expects to find out in the end that it is somehow mixed up in every dirty or shady thing that happens. There was Guatemala, and then the Bay of Pigs; then British Guiana; then, much nearer home, the kidnaping, in October, 1965, outside the "Drugstore" of St.-Germain-des-Prés, of Ben Barka, the progressive and "neutralist" Moroccan leader, who was thereupon apparently murdered in some horrible way in a villa outside Paris. François Mauriac openly accused the "American secret services" of having helped General Mohammed Oufkir, the Moroccan Minister of the Interior—against whom an arrest warrant was issued by the French Government—to dispose of Ben Barka. And, much more recently, there has been the military-Fascist Putsch in Greece. The French press has no doubt whatever that the CIA—which counts the Queen Mother Frederika among its friends in that country—helped to engineer a coup that may well (as Jean Daniel writes in a well-reasoned article in Le Nouvel Observateur) turn Greece into a "European Vietnam," with a Resistance movement developing in the north and, sooner or later, involving Albania, Yugoslavia and Bulgaria. It has also been openly reported that Svetlana Alliluyeva's trip to the United States was arranged by the CIA, even though the left-wing "Gaullist" writer, Emmanuel d'Astier de la Vigerie, had implored her to stay in France or Switzerland, and "not sell herself to the Americans," especially with the war raging in Vietnam. But no; having been escorted by the CIA to Italy and then Switzerland, she was talked into doing a "Kravchenko" in the United States—press conferences, bestseller, serial rights, a million dollars and all.

Yes, the European press has been full of the CIA. Le Monde has been writing at length of CIA money, coming ostensibly from the American labor unions, having split up the CGT, the French trade union federation in 1947-48, as a result of which the "Socialist" Force Ouvrière broke away from the "Communist-dominated" CGT and the French trade union movement was badly weakened.

No less interesting, and even more ominous, is the influence the CIA has been exercising on the "intellectual life of Europe," as reported in mid-May by the two principal English Sunday papers, the Sunday Times and The Observer. Neither paper is anti-American, but for them the CIA's "intellectual" activities in Europe and elsewhere are too much to swallow. More than a page in The Observer of May 14 was devoted to "The Encounter Affair: the Tortuous Path Leading up to the Row over Encounter and the CIA"; while the Sunday Times gave a whole page to "CIA Culture: The Story of a Literary Bay of Pigs." The Observer piece is illustrated by pictures of Melvin Lasky, who "was told about the CIA in strict confidence," Stephen Spender, "who soldiered on in ignorance," and Kermode (another editor of Encounter) who "was increasingly worried." In the Sunday Times there is a picture only of Melvin Lasky, Encounter's remaining editor, who says: "The magazine will go on." However, it carries pictures of the covers of four magazines that are—or were—financed by the CIA: Encounter (England), Preuves (France), Der Monat (Germany) and Quadrant (Australia). [See editorial, "An Insufficiency of Frankness," The Nation, May 29.]

I am not familiar with Quadrant, which seems to have specialized in boosting the Vietnamese War to Australians. But I know well the three main European CIA organs. For years they have been doing their best to keep the cold war going. All three were published under the patronage of a thing called the "Congress for Cultural Freedom," with headquarters in Paris, which was the real source of the CIA "contributions." For a long time Encounter was getting $30,000 a year. That there was something fishy about Encounter and the other Congress for Cultural Freedom publications was clear—or should have been clear—to any person of minimum intelligence. Soon after Encounter first appeared, the Times Literary Supplement accused it of a "negative liberalism" whose main purpose was to stir up hatred. How the thing works I know from my own experience: in The New York Times a critic, who proudly described himself as being closely associated with Encounter, openly advocated "sales resistance" to my book on de Gaulle because it sympathetically reported de Gaulle's hostility to the war in Vietnam; it is a small example but typical of the technique of damning books that are, I suppose, on the CIA index.

What is puzzling in all this is the lamblike innocence of the distinguished editors and contributors of the Cultural Freedom publications. The rumor of CIA subsidies had been current for years, but nobody on Encounter except "Mel" Lasky, we are now told, knew anything about it, not even Stephen Spender, one of the co-editors who "soldiered on in ignorance," until the truth about the CIA subsidies (as The Observer put it) "began to break in the U.S.A. a year ago." After that Spender resigned, apparently with a great show of indignation.

Or did many of the contributors to these papers strongly suspect that they were writing for CIA publications but felt that the end justified the means? In 1963, D. W. Brogan was enthusiastic about Encounter and about "its continual concern with reminding us of the realities behind the Iron Curtain. It has, since its foundation, been a journal de combat . . . and has been a protest against the trahison des clercs." The Sunday Times aptly recalls Conor Cruise O'Brien's retort that it did not serve the cause of genuine intellectual freedom in Europe to "promote for ten years a definite and consistent line," since this would seem "something of an intellectual security risk."

There is now a major stink in England over the CIA subsidies to Encounter, a magazine with a circulation of 42,000 copies, which has put Horizon and other intellectual and non-CIA-subsidized magazines out of business. Will Encounter and the other CIA magazines go on? Lasky doesn't seem worried, even though the Sunday Times talks of that "agonized debate" now reigning "around the question of what a free thinker should do when he finds out that his free thought has been subsidized by a ruthlessly aggressive intelligence agency as part of the international cold war."

The grandly styled Congress for Cultural Freedom has been busy these last two weeks in Paris. I am afraid I took a long time to discover when exactly it met, or where it held the meeting provoked by the genuine scandal over its present and past activities. My phone calls to its office were in vain; the exchange was instructed to tell anybody calling that the offices "would be closed until Tuesday." However, in the end I found what had been going on, but my attempts to reach Michael Josselson, the executive director of the Congress, were not successful; when I had myself announced as The Nation's correspondent, he preferred to say that he was not available.

The whole affair of this Paris meeting was grimly comic. Now that the CIA subsidies to the Congress were an open, and indeed screaming, secret, the members of the "general assembly" expressed "deep regret" that "CIA funds had been used to finance the activities of the Congress"—which had, in the words of the Sunday Times "channeled CIA money to Encounter and a host of other intellectual magazines." But the joke of it is that, although Mr. Josselson, a naturalized American who has lived in Geneva for the last six years, beat his chest, expressed "deep regret" for having accepted CIA money, said that he had found it a grievous burden to "conceal" from his colleagues on the Congress the source of the money, and even offered to resign his post, his colleagues who voted on this "resignation" asked Josselson—apparently unanimously—to continue in his post. And this he agreed to do.

Tribune, London (Ben Roth)

Josselson having accepted full and sole responsibility for all the Congress' grubby machinations, it was only fit that his innocently ignorant colleagues should have rewarded him by keeping him in his no doubt well-paid job. They were also apparently highly gratified to learn from Josselson that he would "never, never have permitted the CIA to use the Congress for propaganda and intelligence purposes." I wanted to ask Josselson what in fact the CIA money had been used for.

EVIDENCE AT STOCKHOLM

The Judges Are Everywhere

GOSTA JULIN

Mr. Julin is on the editorial staff of Dagens Nyheter (Stockholm), Sweden's largest morning newspaper.

Stockholm

What a strange tribunal: a jury, and no judge. It is true; we are only a jury. We have neither the power to condemn, nor the power to acquit, anyone. Therefore, no prosecution. We, the jury, at the end of the session will have to pronounce on the charges: are they well founded or not? But the judges are everywhere. They are the people of the world, and particularly the American people. It is for them that we are working.

With these words Jean-Paul Sartre inaugurated the Vietnam War Crimes Tribunal in Stockholm. For more than a week the tribunal worked its way through thick stacks of reports from investigatory commissions previously sent to Vietnam. Opinions were heard from experts on international law, witnesses were cross-examined, and napalm victims flown from Vietnam were on hand to drive home the sufferings of Vietnamese civilians.

On the eighth day of the session the tribunal was ready for the unanimous verdict: "Guilty. In view of international law, the U.S. Government and U.S. armed forces have committed aggression in Vietnam." The United States, the tribunal further said, has also bombed a great number of civilian targets in Vietnam, such as hospitals, schools and dams. Australia, South Korea and New Zealand were named as accomplices. As to Thailand, the tribunal did not find sufficient evidence to hand down a verdict either way. In addition, the tribunal found that the United States had infringed on the sovereignty of Cambodia and bombed villages in that country. The tribunal said that apart from the section on Cambodia this statement was unanimous, but it appears that the verdict was preceded by deep conflict of opinion among the seventeen jury members as to the aim, purpose and power of the tribunal.

Swedish Government circles were noticeably relieved when the proceedings came to an end without serious incidents. Prime Minister Tage Erlander and his government had made clear that they did not consider their country a suitable location for the proceedings. The official view was that the tribunal could contribute nothing toward a solution of the Vietnamese problem. Swedish free speech laws, however, prevented barring the tribunal. These laws prohibit only public slander of a foreign head of state, a restriction the tribunal did its utmost to observe.

What actually was accomplished at this first session? Is the Russell tribunal simply a Communist-inspired propaganda show? Or is it a manifestation of the fact that in all parts of the world large numbers of politically uncommitted people have been deeply shaken by the Vietnamese tragedy? These people say that if the American people were fully informed about the activities of U.S. soldiers in Vietnam, President Johnson and the Pentagon would immediately be forced to call off the war. The biased picture of the war presented to the American public through news media and official military reports is seen by many as a direct threat to the democratic idea.

What, then, are the facts of the Russell tribunal? They can be summarized in six separate points.

(1) It is correct that the tribunal contains outspoken Communists and leftist sympathizers, but this did not make the Stockholm session a Communist stage show. Many members are politically uncommitted but took part because they regard events in Vietnam as a tragedy for all mankind. This concern was expressed by Bertrand Russell, in a message to the tribunal:

It is our culture which is at stake. It is our barbarism which menaces it. It is not possible to organize society for plunder and mass murder without terrifying consequences. Our scientists and engineers, our chemists and researchers, our technology and economic system have been mobilized for murder. In Vietnam we have done what Hitler did in Europe. We shall suffer the degradation of Nazi Germany unless we act. The pity is not in the suffering of Vietnam. The pity is in the smug streets of Europe and the complacent cities of North America, so debased as to be indifferent even as our own fate is enacted in Vietnam.

(2) The sessions were characterized by unemotional and factual deliberation. The evidence comprised more than 2 million words. Certain details carried a propagandist taint, and there were some hate eruptions against the United States, but these were exceptions. Even Sweden's leading conservative newspaper noted that much of the evidence appeared so objective and so well documented that it would have stood up in a fully uncommitted court of law or investigatory commission.

(3) The tribunal did not set itself up as a court of law with a mission to pass judgment and condemn. "We have no armies and no gallows, we lack power," said Mr. Russell himself in a message to the tribunal from his home in Wales. "Our task is to investigate and inform the world of what is actually happening." This purpose, "to inform the world and particularly the United States," was a guiding principle of the proceedings.

But it should be noted that certain members of the tribunal saw their task differently: as that of judge. They were led by Bertrand Russell's secretary, the American leftist Ralph Schoenman. The more moderate group was led by the tribunal president, Vladimir Dedijer of Yugoslavia; the chairman of the executive committee, Jean-Paul Sartre; and Isaac Deutscher, historian and biographer of Stalin.

This endeavor not to appear as a court of law was also reflected in the composition of the tribunal. Only a third of the seventeen members were lawyers; the others were writers, historians, philosophers, committed pacifists. This gave the tribunal the character of an organization of laymen.

One might question the ability of some of these members to go through the voluminous evidence in a judicially factual manner. Some of them have made themselves known as men with strong emotions and much imagination. On the other hand, Sartre himself displayed one of the most strikingly objective minds of the group.

But many must have wondered what role could be played by such participants as Simone de Beauvoir, the Swedish writers Sara Lidman and Peter Weiss, and Amado Hernandez of the Philippines. There are those who believe that the outcome of the session would have had more impact if the tribunal had had a different composition: a group of eminent lawyers and opposite them a sort of jury, giving a clear distinction between judgment and accusation.

(4) Jus contra bellum. But the task of the tribunal, as defined by Sartre, could be cited as a justification for a more fluid composition: "The Russell tribunal will have no other concern as to the conclusions of its investigations than to bring about a general recognition of the need for an international institution whose essential role would be the resuscitation of the jus contra bellum which was stillborn at Nuremberg—the substitution of ethical and juridical rules for the law of the jungle."

(5) The legal material considered by the tribunal was extremely extensive. It consisted of reports and studies of the rulings of international law on the subject of war crimes: the Kellogg-Briand Pact, the Nuremberg Statutes, the UN Charter, etc. In this part of the proceedings the lawyers put forward their case against the United States with objectivity and restraint.

The highlight of their argument was the observation that the United States has never signed the 1954 Geneva Agreement on Vietnam but has deliberately torpedoed its enforcement. They noted that by ignoring the agreement on free elections for a unified Vietnam the United States has tried to perpetuate the provisional partition of the country that arose from the 1954 treaty. By backing up a puppet regime in Saigon the United States is refusing the principle of freedom of choice to the Vietnamese people, the lawyers said.

(6) Revelations. A large number of special reports were presented by doctors, arms experts and others who had been sent to Vietnam to investigate the plight of the civilian population. The question to be answered here was:

"Has there been bombardment of targets of a purely civilian character, such as hospitals, schools, sanatoria, dams, etc., and on what scale has this occurred?" Their reports were a frightening testimony to the sufferings of civilians during modern operations of war. But with one exception there was very little news in this material. Swedish and European opinion in general is already well aware of these facts. The only new revelation was the testimony of Jean-Pierre Vigier, French scientist and arms expert, who disclosed new facts on American fragmentation bombs, called the CBU bombs. During World War II Vigier was a member of the general staff of the Free French forces, and after the war he was a member of the general staff of the French army. He also thought he had discovered that the United States is using a new military strategy in Vietnam, a strategy that should explain much of the devastation and suffering of the civilian population. This is his argument:

In a strongly industrialized country an attacker who has mastery of the air can win by crushing the capital, military headquarters, armaments industries and economic centers. This breaks the power of resistance of the people. But this approach is impossible in a less developed country. There simply aren't enough military targets to bomb.

Franklin: Toronto Star

Thus, to win in Vietnam American bombers must be used against other social establishments. These are schools, hospitals, religious institutions, irrigation installations, etc. To quell guerrilla resistance the United States must also try to starve the civilian population by destroying dams, rice fields and cattle. This, said Vigier, is the only possible explanation for the mass bombing the United States is now pursuing against civilian targets. He said he was prepared to go to Washington to present these observations publicly.

The following day Vigier's report forced a reply from the Pentagon, but at least in the version presented in Stockholm, it was not a convincing rejection of his argument. On the basis of his report the tribunal found it justified to note that U.S. bombers in Vietnam are using weapons and tactics directly aimed at targets that in a conventional war would be considered civilian.

Much attention was given to reports on U.S. chemical warfare against rice fields and other food resources in Vietnam. Doctors gave evidence as to the suffering of children and women far behind the front lines. Hundreds of children were said to have been buried under the ruins of their schools. Others have been killed while herding cattle in the fields. The airmen launch rockets against the animals to deprive the villages of their means of support, many witnesses said.

On one of the last days of the session the charge that American troops are violating civilians was supported by a story in the Dagens Nyheter from its correspondent in Asia, Sven Oste. He reported from the Cambodian border that U.S. soldiers had gone berserk and killed women and children in a village.

Remaining from the week of deliberations is a depressing picture of the tragedy of war. The tribunal summed it up like this: "The conscience of mankind is profoundly disturbed by the war being waged in Vietnam. It is a war in which the world's wealthiest and most powerful state is opposed to a nation of poor peasants, who have been fighting for their independence for a quarter of a century."

Vietnam: This Is Guernica

CARL OGLESBY

Mr. Oglesby, past president of Students for a Democratic Society, was a member of the International War Crimes Tribunal. With Richard Shaull, he is the author of Containment and Change (Macmillan), a study of American foreign policy. When its proceedings are completed, he will publish a book on the tribunal.

Stockholm

Bertrand Russell organized the International War Crimes Tribunal to raise unfriendly questions about America's fight to save the southern half of Vietnam for the free world. People who are embarrassed or made furious by such questions invariably deal with the tribunal by changing the subject. Instead of talking about aggression and war crimes, they talk about the tribunal itself—its form, its members and its fairly conspicuous partisanship. To discredit the man, apparently, is to refute the argument.

It's never hard to lampoon a group to its political enemies; and the tribunal, rich in enemies, is also quite a soft target on its own. It comes from nowhere, with neither constituency, mandate nor customs, announces its intentions in an anti-American broadside or two, is ignominiously booted out of Paris by a politically sympathetic head of state, and arrives ruffled and internally disquieted in Stockholm to hear in public eight days of often polemical testimony which it in fact had collected by and for itself, and then produces on the ninth day (May 10, 4:50 A.M.) a judgment which everyone supposes could just as well have been drafted a year before. Its membership contains no really big-name jurists and only a few lawyers. It is a politically selective assortment of left-wing writers, intellectuals, politicians and ombudsmen without portfolio; and it seems so clearly less judicial than

And yet there was something missing in Stockholm. The tribunal forgot that there are more participants in this drama than the United States and North Vietnam. A refugee Hungarian who had fled to Sweden from Communist terror gave an efficient reminder of other aspects to the story. He suddenly burst into the session chamber, shouting in protest: "Out with the liars. Look how the Reds are treating the oppressed people in East Europe."

This eruption had an effect that was not lost even when the Cambodian delegate, Colonel Kouroudeth, danced on the platform and kissed the jury members in gratitude for their verdict against the United States.

The tribunal will now continue its work through an executive organization in Paris, and the next full session will be held this fall, probably in Rome. The American participants have said it might be possible to arrange some kind of follow-up in the United States. If this takes place it may repair the situation for the Swedish Government which could not see its way to ban the meeting, even though it was certain in advance to irritate President Johnson.

political that almost no one on the outside (which includes a lot of space) has been able to take it for anything but a stretched-out and fancified party rally.

C. L. Sulzberger went blind with exasperation about all this. He says (The New York Times, May 12) that besides Lord Russell, who at 94 is only a "decrepit symbol" and who wasn't there anyway, and Jean-Paul Sartre, who he admits is a "famous existentialist," the tribunal consists only of "mediocrities" and "nonentities." This sort of sneer can be taken on rather easily: Mehmet Ali Aybar is not unheard of in Turkey, people know about Ali Kasuri in Pakistan, and it is an odd set of mediocrities and nonentities that includes Vladimir Dedijer, Isaac Deutscher, Lelio Basso, Simone de Beauvoir, Sara Lidman and Peter Weiss.

But that's beside the point. The importance of the tribunal, the measure of its goodness or badness, lies in much different territory.

A long tradition of positive international (i.e., Western) law holds that there is such a thing as an act of aggression—a crime against peace. This is a fact. There are also such things as crimes of war, and these also, in a long series of conventions, protocols and treaties stretching back to the Hague Convention of 1907 and including the Paris Pact, the Nuremberg Charter and the Charter of the United Nations, have been most carefully described, defined, and registered by the national powers of the so-called and self-styled civilized Western world. Nobody is trying to pull any wool over anybody's eyes; these laws really do exist, have been officially adopted by official acts of the heads of state, are in fact the law of our land, and all the outrage in Washington and sarcastic obscurantism in The New York Times will not change that fact.

There is also a war in Vietnam. This war has a very concrete life in a very concrete set of events. It has an internal historical density about which it is possible to gather data of a more or less verifiable type.

That is to say, there are findings of law to be made about wars in general, and findings of fact to be made about the Vietnamese War in particular. These findings having been made with as much care as a body of serious and intelligent (who isn't partisan these days?) people can muster, it then becomes possible, appropriate and essential that the facts and the laws be exposed to each other through the very simple question, "Are these actions criminal according to international law?" This question can be answered yes, no, maybe or insufficient evidence. If crimes exist, it is possible, appropriate and essential to say so.

That is what the tribunal is all about. If it finds evidence of crimes, and if it is quite powerless to do anything about them, these conditions don't seem to be the fault of the tribunal. Criminality and victimization will or will not exist in Vietnam whether the tribunal says so or not; and on the matter of the tribunal's isolation from state power, Sartre's opening-address remark that this is in fact the tribunal's leading virtue seems to me quite enough to say on the subject.

The tribunal set itself the task of finding the law and the facts on five questions:

(1) Has the U.S. Government (and have the governments of Australia, New Zealand and South Korea) committed acts of aggression according to international law?

(2) Has there been bombardment of targets of a purely civilian character?

(3) Has the United States made use of or experimented with new and/or forbidden weapons?

(4) Have Vietnamese prisoners been subjected to inhuman treatment forbidden by the laws of war and in particular have they suffered torture or mutilation? Have there been unjustified reprisals against the civilian population?

(5) Have forced labor camps been created? Has there been deportation of the population or other acts tending to the extermination of the population and which can be characterized juridically as acts of genocide?

These five questions subsume four criminal acts: aggression (or crime against peace, jus ad bellum); war crimes "properly called" (jus in bellum; questions 2, 3, and 4); crimes against humanity (distinguished from war crimes by their greater scope and intensity), and genocide. The first session of the tribunal arrived at affirmative verdicts on the first two questions. The remaining three will be taken up in a final session to be held in the fall.

That the tribunal has reached these decisions does not surprise anybody. But that should not suggest that the decisions are empty or without portent for Americans. In particular, the peace movement, struggling in its own awkward fashion to decide exactly what it ought to say about the war, will have to come to grips with the political and ethical implications of these judgments.

Consider the first, that the United States Government is guilty of the crime of aggression. The tribunal does not affirm this in any loose moralistic sense. It bases its finding upon a crucial clarification of the political entitles which are involved in this war, and this clarification requires us to re-examine most coldly one of the staple arguments of the peace-movement "radicals."

From the 1961 White Paper to date, our government's position has been that the trouble in southern Vietnam is ordered and directed from Hanoi, whose creature organization, the National Liberation Front, is therefore illegitimate, criminal and deserving of the violently repressive treatment it receives at the hands of the American military. To this line of reasoning, the opposition movement—at least in its more "political" sectors—has usually responded: not so. We have been saying that what has been happening in the south in the late middle fifties and onward is indigenous—a gathering of a population increasingly outraged by Saigon's dictatorial terror and cornered into a choice between annihilation or defensive violence. The NLF, so this argument runs, is mainly a southern force, and not, as the government maintains, an invader from without.

Along the banks of this issue, the opposing debaters deploy their statistics about infiltration and their analyses of rebellion. The implicit symmetrical assumptions of this debate are (1) that the American position is established if the NLF is a "creature" of the Democratic Republic of Vietnam (DRV); and (2) that it is destroyed if the NLF, instead, is independent of the North and indigenous to the South. The government says "invasion," and the opposition says "civil war." The argument seems to be clear enough.

What may not be immediately apparent about the tribunal's verdict on U.S. aggression is that it rejects both positions. The line of reasoning the tribunal puts forward—in my estimation, simple and unanswerable—is as follows:

(1) Starting in the 1930s and continually gathering strength, a Vietnamese rebellion took shape against French colonialism. This rebellion was both nationalistic (aiming to break Vietnam's subservience to France) and social (programing the destruction of the exploitative landlord system).

(2) This revolution, waged across the breadth of Vietnam, achieved conclusive military victory over the French Union forces in 1954. The crucial diplomatic event at the Geneva Conference of that year was the formal surrender of French colonialism to the Vietnamese revolution. Geneva was very much like Yorktown in this respect.

(3) To provide for orderly transfer of power to the new nationalist regime, the country was temporarily partitioned at the 17th Parallel, the Vietminh forces withdrawing above it from the south and the French Union forces withdrawing below it from the north.

(4) An international diplomatic intervention originating in Washington but tolerated (at least) by Moscow and Peking required the Vietminh to submit to popular ratification in an election scheduled for July, 1956.

(5) The French withdrew ahead of schedule, forced to do so by the Americans and in any case weary of the position, and (via Bao Dai, who had no status) delivered their interim custodial obligations over to the Diemist cabal, which had no more legal authority to govern Vietnam than Montana, and which would have been incapable of even pretending to have such authority were it not for the direct and massive political and economic intervention of the United States. For its part, the United States had no claim whatsoever on 1 square inch of Vietnamese land and had no business even being there. In dealing with Diem, it dealt merely with its purchased man.

(6) Over the period roughly from 1955 through 1958, the U.S.-Diem regime made clear its intention to frustrate the Geneva Agreements bearing on the unity of Vietnam. Under U.S. prodding and protection, the Diemist puppetdom declared itself the government of something called the Republic of Vietnam. Legally speaking, this government and its "republic" came from nowhere. Its claims were based on an election which, besides being notoriously fraudulent, it had no right to hold in any case.

(7) Thus deprived of that victory which it supposed had been legally consolidated at Geneva, Vietnamese nationalism again began to mount a violent resistance to the new foreign rule. Hence, the second Indo-China war.

There is no civil war in Vietnam. There is, rather, a war of nationalist resistance against an invader—the United States—which appeared on the scene illegally under the flag of truce and which lost no opportunity to suborn Vietnamese against their country. It therefore perpetuates a fundamental misconception of the historical and legal situation in Vietnam to argue about the presence or absence of "infiltrated invaders from the north," as if we were dealing here with two separate and sovereign Vietnams. In point of unambiguous international law, there is only one Vietnam and it is not possible for one country to invade or aggress against itself.

In this case, it is legally pointless to argue about the relationship between the DRV and the NLF. If the evidence shows that the DRV did not create the NLF, then that is merely something for the DRV to be ashamed of. If it shows contrarily that it did, then the DRV was only doing what it had a very clear—very legal—right to do, namely, resist an aggressor against its national sovereignty. One and only one political force, Ho Chi Minh's, spoke for Vietnam at Geneva. And since no legal elections have taken place since to change the situation, one and only one government, Ho's again, has the right to speak for the Vietnamese, from the mountains in the north to the Camau Peninsula in the south. You and I and the U.S. Government may or may not approve. It remains the fact.

Legal realities do not, of course, uniformly coincide with political realities. There is evidence that the DRV, for reasons which need not detain us here, may have been prepared to concede at least temporarily the occupation and de facto severance of the south, and that the post-1954 resistance arose in the south independently. That it a matter, however, for the DRV and the NLF to settle between themselves at some later date when the invader has been repulsed. No outside nation or people, and certainly not the United States, has anything at all to contribute to that forthcoming private conversation.

Look now at the peace movement's suggestions. Almost everyone from U Thant on over thinks that our bombing of the north should be stopped so that we may enter at last into negotiations with the DRV. As unlikely as it may seem at the moment, something like this could very well occur within the next two years. And what exactly do we suppose is going to happen at this most elusive conference table? In Korea, we could negotiate for the ante-bellum status quo without losing face (our ambition to forcibly unify Korea not having been much publicized). But such a position can clearly not be held with Vietnam if the Vietnamese take the status quo at 1954 while we take it at c. 1958. What is the anti-war movement prepared to do or say when the voices start rising around this problematic conference table? Who are we? What do we want our country to be? And perhaps most painful and menacing: whose side are we on?

There are other basic complications. If the DRV is really separate from the south and the NLF, then what remains to be negotiated once our bombing has stopped? And if it is not separate, then why all the clamor about recognizing the NLF? More generally, what interest in Vietnam can the United States legitimately and morally lay claim to? And if, as I believe, there is no such natural American interest, then what is there to be negotiated in these negotiations except the precise conditions of American withdrawal?

I think it can be put in a nutshell. Both the DRV and the NLF affirm the unity of Vietnam. Both say that the NLF is the only legitimate voice of the people of the south. It follows that—at least in their own view of the matter—the DRV and the NLF are also one. As the SNCC people say: "Get to that."

To accuse the United States of aggression is to assert the legal unity of Vietnam (and vice versa, of course), and this does not merely add another curse to the vocabulary of dissent. It is a substantive charge which has substantive political consequences. Anyone who is persuaded that the charge has been proved will be logically obliged to abandon such intermediary and "moderate" positions as are implied by the slogans, "stop the bombing and negotiate" and "recognize the NLF." Sen. Robert Kennedy's idea that we should invite the NLF to take part in a coalition government in the south becomes in this case nearly as impudent as Johnson's refusal to do so, and perhaps a good deal less coherent. For the coalition which is being offered in this burst of generosity can be nothing other than a coalition with the Seventh Fleet, the White House and Vietnam's own sorry Vichy. It implicitly presupposes, moreover, the de facto partitioning of Vietnam. We should be able to forgive Vietnamese patriots for being unmoved by such generosity.

The verdict on war crimes has consequences for us, too: less specific politically but humanly more intense. Each of us will have to work them out for himself.

War crimes include, among other things, "wanton destruction of cities, towns or villages, or devastation not justified by military necessity" (Article 6, b, of the Nuremberg Charter). This definition, made in 1945, looks back to the fourth convention of The Hague of 1907 and the annexed ruling, of which Article 25 states that "belligerents do not have an unlimited right concerning the choice of means of doing harm to the enemy." America's legal commitment to abide by such law is embodied in various treaties, especially important ones being the Nuremberg and the UN Charters, and in a document published in 1956 by the Department of Defense, The Law of Land Warfare (FM 27-10), which stipulates this country's acceptance of the laws and customs of war.

The law is easy enough to find. But if you happen to be an American, more or less dependent for your news on the good gray Times, the facts are not so ready. My national press had not prepared me for Stockholm. The enormity of the picture that eyewitness after eyewitness uncovered there left me first incredulous and finally revolted. Example:

Some miles above the demarcation line in the province of Nghe An, coastal district of Quynh Luu, there is a spacious rocky plain bounded on three sides by mountains and on the fourth side by the South China Sea. The spot is both tillable and isolated, and for these reasons was selected in 1957 as the site of a major leprosarium. Construction was completed and the complex opened in 1960, since which time it has handled about 5,000 patients.

The Quynh Lap leprosarium was visited last April by the French medical doctor, M. F. Kahn, a member of the tribunal's fourth investigating commission. According to Dr. Kahn, "Quynh Lap was not so much a hospital as a small village," designed "to give the sick a social life as close as possible to a normal one, offering everyone a chance for rest and re-education and preparing them to re-enter society after their cure." Besides being entirely isolated geographically, the Quynh Lap colony is big (160 buildings) and internationally famous, at least among world medical and health organizations.

In May, 1965, it was overflown by several U.S. reconnaissance aircraft. On June 12, a Saturday, at 8 P.M., it was attacked with demolition bombs and rockets. Damage was light. One nurse was wounded. Since the nature of the complex was assumed to be well known (hospital roofs were also marked with red crosses), the officials decided that the attack had been an error and would not be repeated. They did not evacuate.

On the next day, at 1:45 P.M., a second strike was made against Quynh Lap. This one was violent. It killed 120 staff members and patients and wounded more than 100 others, nineteen of whom subsequently died of their injuries.

Officials immediately began evacuating the patients to a mountain grotto some 5 or 6 kilometers distant. The move was watched by more reconnaissance flights. Two days after the second attack, this grotto was attacked with rockets. Thirty-four were killed and thirty wounded. Survivors were forced to move still further into the mountains.

By June 22, the complex had been attacked thirteen times. Through the first quarter of this year, according to the Vietnamese, it had been hit a total of thirty-nine times. Except for a few buildings whose shells still stand, the colony has been flattened. It is unusable and desolate.

Tribunal member Lawrence Daly, a Scottish labor leader, asked Dr. Kahn what he thought the point of these attacks might have been. "I can find no reasonable explanation," said Kahn—a medical man, not a strategist. "First the buildings where the patients and the staff lived were attacked. Then the grotto was attacked, as if the purpose were to drive the lepers back into the population. Then, after many more attacks had destroyed almost all of the buildings, the attacks turned against the road, as if the purpose were to make it hard for people to come and see what had been done to Quynh Lap. I cannot explain this."

It might be just as hard to explain why not one provincial hospital in northern Vietnam and not very many of the smaller district hospitals remain unbombed. Or why Nghe An province alone has been raided (through the first quarter of '67) 6,817 times with 52,157 demolition bombs, 49,164 fragmentation bombs (see below), 40,050 rockets, 71 fire bombs, and 1,082 strafings with 20-mm. cannon, losing thereby 10,379 dwelling units, eight hospitals, one leprosarium, twenty-eight churches and pagodas, sixty-six schools, 743 fishing boats, and no one knows, apparently, exactly how many people.

The fragmentation bomb business has already become a minor controversy in the United States. Its use was the one tribunal accusation to which the Pentagon responded immediately.

The main and newest weapon in the frag-bomb category is the cluster bomb unit (CBU), a refinement over the first-generation lazy dog and the second-generation pineapple. The CBU is a three-stage weapon. What the aircraft drops is a large canister or mother bomb which falls to a certain altitude and is then opened by a timer or barometric switch, giving birth to anywhere from 200 to 800 bomblets (called guavas by the Vietnamese), each about the size of a baseball. The guava second stage is flanged to produce a spin in the plane of descent. The centrifugal force created by this spin apparently cocks the internal spring-loaded detonating hammers by throwing them outward against their springs. Upon impact (ground, roofs, trees), or if the planes of spin and trajectory deviate in flight (which makes for an air burst), the spin stops, the centrifugal force is removed, the hammers are snapped inward by the springs, and the guava explodes to release the third stage, about 260 steel pellets about twice the size of a BB, which are embedded in the surface of the spherical casting. Because the guavas scatter in the air, one CBU will cover an area about 300 yards wide and 1,000 long.

The pellets, which have an effective range of about 50 yards, are quite useless against the "concrete and steel" targets to which Mr. Johnson has assured us he restricts his bombing. Nor are they effective against people hidden below the forest canopy, where trees and heavy foliage afford good protection. They are effective only against people who happen to be in exposed, cleared areas, or who have no other protection than the frail straw thatch of which most Vietnamese village dwellings are made. CBU's are good for nothing but attacks against people. But for this specialized use, they seem to be very good indeed:

¶ Leaving only a small penetration wound, they follow erratic trajectories through the body, glancing off bones and organs; they can be traced precisely only with very modern X-ray equipment, and in many cases can be removed only with the most delicate surgical techniques—not likely to be available around every corner in Vietnam's provincial villages.

¶ They often do not kill their victims immediately. A CBU attack is likely therefore to saturate a village's medical facilities, or to require difficult transportation of victims to faraway medical centers. One witness before the tribunal, an exquisite 23-year-old teacher named Ngo Thi Nga, had been struck in the back of the neck by a pellet which was still lodged in her brain.

¶ The Vietnamese claim that a new strike tactic was developed after villagers had learned to shelter themselves in hard buildings and shallow ditches (the pellets penetrate earth only a few inches and concrete hardly at all). A sortie using demolition bombs having opened up concrete buildings, a second sortie using napalm would flush the people from their ditches. A third sortie, flown usually by Seventh Fleet aircraft, would follow quickly with the CBUs. The Vietnamese say that this more or less final solution has been applied only in the central provinces and that napalm has not yet been used farther north.

When the CBU story began to leak some time ago, the Pentagon's first impulse was to deny that there was any such device in the arsenal: impossible to design, too expensive to manufacture. When this lie became unstable, the new truth was confessed that there were indeed such things as CBUs, but that (1) they constituted no more than 5 to 10 per cent of the total "number" (conventional measurement is in tonnage) of bombs used in the north; and (2) they were used only against "convoys, aircraft on land, ammunition depots, radar installations and anti-aircraft batteries."

The first point is disputed by the Vietnamese, who claim that the proportion of CBUs is 40 to 50 per cent, and by the tribunal investigating commissions, whose members thought the proportion might have been still greater in the areas they visited. It is at least possible that nobody is really lying. If each canister counts as one bomb, the Pentagon's figure may be right; the DRV wins if each guava is counted. In any case, it appears that pellet bomb use has been stepped up markedly this year. Compare the DRV statistics for two provinces visited by tribunal investigators. Multiply, in the chart below, the figures for the first quarter of 1967 by eight and it becomes clear, for one thing, that the action is picking up in Thanh Hoa. But besides that, note the sharp increase in pellet bombing. If the DRV's figures are at all indicative of the reality, then we may have to decide that terror bombing is more and more the rule in Vietnam. Whether or not this is even a thinkable hypothesis is a matter which we shall come back to in a moment.

On the second point, the credibility gap being what it is, we can probably take the current Pentagon explanation of CBUs no more seriously than the earlier denial.

In one of the tribunal's better moments, David Dellinger had Jean-Pierre Vigier recalled to respond to the Pentagon's claim that CBUs were used only against "military targets." Vigier, once a member of the French General Staff and now a professor of physics in Paris, was in many ways the most effective witness the tribunal heard. His concern for method, his quick command of facts, his grasp of the politics of military strategy, and above all the simple lucidity of his intelligence reminded me of Bernard Fall, who had the same warm relish for accuracy and common sense. I copy here my notes of the exchange that followed Dellinger's reading of the Pentagon statement:

DELLINGER: Let's go down this list. The Pentagon says, first, that CBUs are used against convoys.

VIGIER: Because they scatter over an immense area and because the pellets have such little mass, I don't see how they would be at all useful for this. Better against either rail or road convoys would be rockets.

DELLINGER: What about aircraft on land [which, by the way, the Pentagon has only recently admitted that it attacks]?

VIGIER: Attacking military air bases is a conventional problem. It is taught everywhere that you must strike the fuel depots, the maintenance buildings and the airstrips. For these targets, you need high explosives.

DELLINGER: Ammunition supplies.

VIGIER: These are always buried or sandbagged and the pellets would be of no use.

DELLINGER: Radar installations.

VIGIER: Perhaps. But this would be a very exotic use.

DELLINGER: And anti-aircraft batteries.

VIGIER: No effectiveness at all. Anti-aircraft batteries are guarded by sandbags which the pellets cannot begin to penetrate. We saw many batteries that had been attacked by explosive bombs or rockets, but none that had been attacked by pellets.

If a final word is needed for this little dialogue, let it go to the U.S. Air Force. Its ROTC manual, Fundamentals of Aerospace Weapons Systems, explains that "fragmentation bombs," of which the CBU is merely the latest and most cunning type, "are designed specifically to be used against personnel." I shall come back to this manual in a moment.

A most unlovely picture emerged over the eight days of testimony. Along with all those famous roads and bridges—which in any case seem primarily to serve the civilian population—a violent attack appears to be aimed, with seeming malice aforethought, against hospitals, schools, churches, pagodas, dikes and the intricate irrigation systems of the countryside. Why? What is the point of attacking a leper hospital? And of doing it thirty-

ATTACKS	NGHE AN		THANH HOA
	'65-'66	1st qtr. '67	'65-'66	1st qtr. '67
Sorties	6,206	611	4,449	2,222
Demolition bombs	46,855	5,302	30,917	1,787
Pellet bombs	28,831	20,333	44,000	6,920
Rockets	34,728	5,322	9,300	2,142

Vietnam: The Final Solution

New Statesman (London)

nine times? What have we possibly got against public education for Vietnamese children that we should seek out and destroy their schools? Was the leprosarium really a supply dump? Was the cathedral really a barracks?

Dr. Kahn's bewildered answer, "I can find no reasonable explanation," will probably convince many that such things just do not happen. We seem to confront a motiveless malice, something we will not lightly impute to our fathers, sons and brothers. Since this is not comprehensible, it must not take place. Sad to say, however, a motive exists.

The Air Force ROTC manual, Fundamentals of Aerospace Weapons Systems, is a completely open and aboveboard text, available to anyone. Read it abstractedly and go to sleep at the third page. Read it, however, with Vietnam's people on your mind, and weep for your country—the land of Strangelove, Herman Kahn and huge computers in the War Room.

Each night, says our President, he agonizes over the maps, picking the targets personally for the next day's raids: this little concrete thing here, or that little steel thing there? We might have taken him more seriously.

For most of us, northern Vietnam has remained a more or less vague and undifferentiated geopolitical entity. If we do recognize special places within it, we are likely to go no further than to note that Hanoi is politically a crucial target or that there are dikes on the Red River which no sane man would bomb, or that Haiphong is a doubly dangerous target because of the Russian and British ships that are often at dock there.

The impression I bring from the hearings is that, at least for those who are attacking it, northern Vietnam is a highly complex social organism whose elements are acutely differentiated, and that the American attack—premeditated, precise and politically structured—is based on detailed economic, cultural, political and sociological

"maps" of the territory. Our Air Force does not simply bomb the north. Using conventional explosives, pellets, napalm, white phosphor, thermite, magnesium or rockets, depending on the mission, it bombs this or that sector of the city of Vinh because, this Thanh Hoa cathedral instead of that pagoda because, this central irrigation system instead of that northern canal because . . . because why?

The ROTC manual begins to give us a sense of the answer.

"The first order of the day," it affirms, "must be to know the enemy." Target analysis and selection proceed, therefore, in terms of what the manual calls the "components of national structure." There are four of these, each entwined with the others.

Military structure. "U.S. Air Force leaders have made it amply clear that this Nation's No. 1 target priority is the enemy's military force and war-making potential." On the surface, and except for the troubling ambiguity of the last phrase, this may sound as humane as the military spirit can be: if we must attack an enemy, leave his civilians alone. But we have not heard the explanation yet. "The logic behind the high priority assigned these targets rests on the fact that unless the military forces are destroyed they can retaliate. Other targets can wait their turn."

And what if we are dealing with a military force which cannot seriously retaliate? Clearly, we move on.

Economic structure. This category is described in rather commonplace terms—raw materials, basic processing, end-product industries, and services and utilities—until two long and especially forceful paragraphs make us remember in a new light what little we know of the bombing of northern Vietnam. They deal with transportation systems, and their argument is that the importance of transportation has dawned on our analysts only since World War II. It seems that German industry collapsed in 1945, not really because of Allied attacks on petroleum but because the attacks on the transportation network were finally paying off. In Japan, the importance of transportation had been sadly overlooked by our intelligence. "Later," says the manual, "we found that strangulation of that system would have destroyed Japan's economic structure. Lack of transportation would have reduced Japan to a series of isolated communities."

Differences between mature and immature economies notwithstanding, we apparently do not intend to miss our second chance. In the repeated bombing of a little wooden bridge connecting some tiny isolated hamlet with its market place, we may behold history's lessons being put to use.

Political structure. The manual deals here with the national "ruling body" which "makes decisions for the people" and "galvanizes a nation into action and causes it to function as a cohesive unit." We have come into interesting territory: "A government is most vulnerable in its relations with the people, for it must control their actions and it must have their support." If the locus or the medium of these relations can be broken—as, for example, in the destruction of the communications system—then the "nation would soon cease to function as a cohesive unit. . . . The resulting confusion would overlap into all other components of the national structure."

Psychosocial structure. The manual speaks for itself on this point only too clearly:

"For purposes of target study, the psychosocial structure of a nation or people is often reduced to terms of morale, because morale is something that can be sensed, observed and influenced. . . . Production required efficient organization and direction, cooperation among all the people, their willingness to consume less and produce more, to devote their energies to the production of war materials, at the expense of consumer goods, and at the same time to face personal hardships, tragedies, and the dangers of war. . . .

"Some of the conventional targets for morale attacks have been water supplies, food supplies, housing areas, transportation centers, and industrial sites. The objectives of these attacks in the past have been to dispel the people's belief in the invincibility of their forces, to create unrest, to reduce the output of the labor force, to cause strikes, sabotage, riots, fear, panic, hunger, and passive resistance to the government, and to create a general feeling that the war should be terminated. Although the question of how far the will to resist of a given group of people could be weakened or destroyed by aerial bombardment with conventional weapons was debatable, it was an irrefutable fact that a labor force preoccupied with civilian defense duties and the finding of food, shelter, and transportation could not operate at peak efficiency in the production of the materials of war. . . .

"If we were to search for the single type of target whose destruction would have the greatest adverse effect on the morale of a population today, we would have to conclude that the destruction of an enemy's major cities with high yield nuclear weapons would produce the most telling results, not only on morale, but on every other component of the nation's structure."

All this from a soldier's primer.

Try out a new definition of "military target." The same manual provides it. "A military target is any person, thing, idea, entity, or location selected for destruction, inactivation, or rendering nonusable [sic] with weapons which will reduce or destroy the will or ability of the enemy to resist."

A military target, that is, is whatever the military decides to attack.

And in a war against a whole people, the military must sooner or later decide to attack the whole people.

These pretty Vietnamese teachers and peasant girls, for example: in every picture of them we see, in rice paddy or schoolroom, don't they also have rifles on their backs? Don't they also shoot with these rifles at our aircraft? Aren't they all our military enemies? These children: unless we act now, will they not grow up sometime in the duration of this interminable war and be infiltrated into the south of their country? Is there any Vietnamese, in fact, who can prove to us that his life deserves, in the name of Western civilization, to be spared?

It comes to this: Whatever doubts Americans may anxiously cling to about the tribunal's data on the Air Force's purposive destruction of Vietnamese hospitals, churches, schools and people, it is nevertheless a fact that the accusation has to be granted an immediate claim of plausibility. Given the official strategic-bombing concepts this country uses, we are simply obliged to say, in advance of a single snapshot of a single ruin, that such attacks are possible, plausible and indeed that they are probable. We have no grounds for insisting that they could not happen, or that if they seem to happen, they must be accidental. On the contrary. We may henceforth be moved to raise our eyebrows when the hospitals are not bombed.

To explain our government's systematic obliteration of Vietnamese society, we need neither postulate a ruling band of Iagos nor assume that a certain leprosarium by the sea was really a submarine base. We need only to see the "psychosocial" reality of this war for what it is, and to understand that the structures of the externally "limited" war allow for no internal limits at all. By a process which in itself is cool, meticulous and no angrier than a computer can make it, a decision to breach the psychosocial forms in which the Vietnamese have their psychosocial being is most even-temperedly, most implacably reached.

The result, looked at from an old-fashioned angle—that of the Russell tribunal—is war crimes "properly called." This does not mean, however, that an old-fashioned history—that of Nazi Germany—is being re-enacted in the home of the brave. It means rather that when the previously parallel histories of the master and the slave crash inward upon each other, the old chivalry loses its power to shape and explain experience. In the face of a Rommel, after all, an Eisenhower might recognize himself. In the iron of the Panzer Corps, a Patton could see a proper and familiar world order. But what security for General Westmoreland is there in the face of Nguyen Huu Tho, the faceless? What do we expect General Walt to make of punji spikes and part-time teen-age terrorists? And what can a class society which defines happiness as privilege and equates it with profit make of a declassed society in which work is defined by the whole community's needs?

Across the historical gulf which has segregated master and slave, empires and colonies, there is no lawful way for Western coercive power to reach—not once that power has been called morally into question by the appearance of the rebel. For America even to dream of victory in Vietnam, it must destroy the revolutionary society. The enemy is the revolution, the breaking of the empire, and it is in the liberated people that the revolution has its being. To say that America commits war crimes in Vietnam is merely to elaborate legalistically the simpler fact that America is fighting in Vietnam. From the decision to fight that fight, the necessity of war crimes follows irresistibly. When the tribunal makes the accusation and implies thereby that the crimes ought to stop, what it really says is that the war ought to stop. If the revolution disappeared, there would be no more war crimes. If the counterrevolution disappeared, the same would be true. But when one world is occupied by both, it will be filled up with the violence of resistance, which the counterrevolution calls terror, and the violence of oppression, which the revolution calls crime.

After all, it is not Auschwitz which is being judged again by the Russell tribunal; it is Guernica, which is an entirely different matter. And even as we hurl the legalistic accusations of aggressor and criminal, which on the simplest level of fact seem so depressingly well founded, we ought to remember the source and the purpose of the laws we are invoking, and reflect that laws written by a culture for the purpose of guaranteeing its survival will never be used by that culture to guarantee its defeat.

Only the people who can surpass that culture can impose those laws.

New York's Forgotten Drought

NOEL PERRIN

Mr. Perrin, who is on the English faculty of Dartmouth College, has written on New York City's problems for the Herald Tribune, Harper's and The Yale Review.

You can still see an occasional grimy "Save Water" sign pasted to a wall, and a few restaurants still serve water with meals only if you ask for it. Otherwise, New York City's worst water shortage in this century has ended, leaving few traces behind. Already you can also see, as you pass a lunch counter in Grand Central Station, a hot-water tap running full stream, in case one of the countermen should happen to want to rinse a dish. Two hours later, it will still be roaring, having meanwhile conveyed 300 gallons down the drain. No inspector has come by to give the staff a lecture, much less a summons. The city is back to normal. Its crisis, officially over only last March 15, has receded to a bad dream.

The speed of this recovery is not really surprising; it has been repeated eight times previously in New York since 1900. The invariable pattern goes like this: every few years the city suddenly finds itself nearly out of water. Consternation results. The mayor personally opens a massive conservation program. New Yorkers are forbidden to wash their cars, fountains are turned off, mail is stamped "Save Water," Boy Scouts hand out leaflets. At the same time, the city mounts an eager investigation into the causes of the shortage. A group of outside experts is hired; they study the problem and recommend reforms. The city promises or half promises to make them. Then the rains come, the reservoirs fill up, the promises are postponed to "some day," and the cycle leading to the next shortage begins. That was the pattern in 1954, 1951, 1949, 1939, and so on. Is the city now, for the ninth time this century, lapsing into its customary water policy—described by Mayor Lindsay in 1965 as a combination of "short-sightedness, expediency and poor planning"—only to rouse itself when the tenth shortage begins?

So far the answer seems to be yes and no, just about equally divided. There are four promises that the city always makes during a shortage: three that the experts invariably recommend, one that they sometimes recommend. The first three—the ones that take a degree of political courage to fulfill—are to modernize distribution (which means to install meters), to reform the water administration (that is, to consolidate the two separate departments which the city maintains, for reasons that go back to Tammany Hall), and to charge fair rates. Water has been priced below cost by New York politicians since roughly 1840. That is, for 125 years the rates have been a standing invitation to waste. The fourth promise—the one that's politically easy—is to build more reservoirs upstate, or at least a few new aqueducts. At no time since 1900 has any promise but the fourth been kept. Until last year, that is. In 1966, Mayor Lindsay and his water commissioner, James Marcus, broke all tradition by honoring one of the hard promises, when they doubled the water rents.

By ordinary standards their action was not very daring. Almost every waterworks consultant in the country has at one time or another served on a panel that advised the city to raise its water charges to a realistic level. Furthermore, even the new doubled rate is pretty low. An individual New Yorker now pays about 2c a day for water instead of 1c; the average family in an apartment pays $20 a year instead of $10. (They're not conscious of the raise—it's included invisibly in the regular rent.) This rate is still lower than people in Westchester pay for water from the same reservoirs.

For a modest action, however, the rate rise is doing considerable good. For one thing, it enables the two water departments at last to be self-supporting, and thus the city has even less excuse than before not to keep the pipes and aqueducts in good repair. (One of the scandals of the recent shortage was that in the middle of it, Mayor Wagner quietly allowed the budget for leak-detection crews to drop from provision for eighty men to provision for fifty. The departments, he explained, were low on money as well as water.) It has also already induced something more than 1,000 New Yorkers to install meters voluntarily. These are mostly owners of one-family houses, who think that at the new rates they may be able to save money by paying for the water they actually use, instead of being assessed at a flat rate, with rights to unlimited waste. That still leaves about 534,000 meters to go, including nearly all that should be in apartment houses, but it's at least a start. Finally, New York industry, which already has meters (most of them sixty to eighty years old, and prone to so-called slippage, which means that a lot of water gets through free), is wasting perceptibly less water, now that what doesn't slip through costs a penny for 25 gallons instead of a penny for 50.

But the other two reforms that are always promised and never made remain in abeyance. The city still has both a Board and a Department of Water Supply, and it still lacks a general meter law. Two years ago it was clear to everybody that two water departments is one too many. It was also clear which one ought to be eliminated. The Board of Water Supply, as opposed to the Department, has been a political creature from the beginning. It was invented in 1903, chiefly to provide jobs for employees of the defunct Aqueduct Commission—itsself more a source of patronage than of good water management. Mayor Lindsay, when he was a candidate, called the board “obsolescent,” and blamed it in good part for the crisis. Paul O'Dwyer, also running for mayor, called it “a totally useless and expensive appendage.” He was in an especially good position to know, since it was during his brother's tenure as mayor that the board mounted some of its highest expenses.

Now that the ninth shortage of the century is over, the board has made a fine recovery. Like people, boards hate to die, and there were political doctors in City Hall who could and did save it. By January, 1967, it felt well enough to ask for a larger budget for next year, and at the same time to refuse a request from the City Planning Commission that it temporarily lend some of its engineers (it supports 400) to city departments that are short-handed.

The board is not completely useless. Its job is to build new reservoirs and aqueducts—it calls them water tubes—and it has built good ones. The city will continue to need new water tubes, as the population shifts, and someone will have to build them. But the city's greatest need is for good management of water—and since the board's only job is to build, it has a conspicuous lack of interest in reform. In fact, mismanagement and shortages are almost a necessity to the board, since only during a crisis is the city likely to give it really lavish orders for new construction. However, it takes political courage to kill a board, and so far the Lindsay administration hasn't even tried.

Two years ago it was also clear to everybody that New York stood in need of universal metering. Or, at least, it was clear to everybody except a couple of organizations of landlords and to Mayor Wagner. And even Mayor Wagner saw that there ought to be more meters than there were—for example, he realized there ought to be meters in city-owned buildings, and in July, 1965, he ordered a rush program of installation. (It is true that when he left office the next January, not one had been installed—that low budget in the Department of Water Supply again.)

As for the landlords, they feared that if they actually had to pay for the water their tenants used, they might get stuck with high bills. New York landlords have been worrying about this for nearly a century, during which time they have had visions of irresponsible—or dis-grunted—tenants leaving all the faucets turned on, the meter turning faster and faster, and the profits going down the drain. At no time have they done much research into what actually does happen when apartment houses are metered. If they had, they would know that in the 95 per cent of American cities that require meters, landlords get along fine. A Boston or a Los Angeles landlord simply prorates each bill among his tenants—high when they waste a lot, low when they don't. Or if he's alert, he may install one of the new meter systems that record consumption for each apartment.

In the summer of 1965, everybody except Wagner and the landlords was taking scared looks at the almost empty reservoirs or sweating at the office with the air conditioning turned off, and demanding universal metering. Mr. Lindsay's voice was among the loudest. Another of the especially influential proponents was the Delaware River Basin Commission, a regional agency controlled jointly by four states, including New York, and by the federal government. Since the city gets nearly half its water from the two branches of the Delaware River, and since the commission has the ultimate authority to decide who gets how much Delaware water, its demand made an impact.

Some would have called the demand an ultimatum. On July 28, 1965, the commission announced that its panel of experts felt that either the city should require meters, or else the commission should cut its quota. (At that point the city was getting an "emergency" ration of 490 million gallons a day from the Delaware—so much that the river was unable to maintain its flow, and salt water from Delaware Bay was gradually creeping up toward Philadelphia. At one time that summer the salt was within 9 miles of Philadelphia's intake pipes.)

A year later the commission's experts were still demanding meters, and the commission was still giving New York its generous ration. Why? Because the city for its part was saying eagerly that it could hardly wait to meter, but please give it a little time. It had only had since the 19th century.

There is a sense, of course, in which the city really did need a little time. The first plan for universal metering was drawn up in 1899, at which time the city was 30 per cent metered, having started from zero in 1875. (With careful mismanagement it has since slipped back to 24 per cent.) Every ten or fifteen years since then, a new program for metering has been drawn up, including one by an actual city water commissioner in the early thirties, and one prepared by the WPA just before World War II. But in the summer of 1965 all these were out of date, and no new studies had been made. The Department of Water Supply would have needed a few months to make them, even if it could have borrowed some of those 400 engineers from the Board of Water Supply.

The meter climax, and the closest New York has yet come to solving its problems, occurred last August. The water shortage was still acute, and the city still wanted its emergency ration. The Delaware Commission was planning to terminate it at the end of September. Water Commissioner Marcus went to see them, made a brilliant appeal—and got an extension to the end of the year. (The salt was still hovering 9 miles below Philadelphia.) What he said only he and the members of the commission know, but the day after he got back to New York he held a press conference. First he announced the extension, then he added that he expected the city to start metering by January 1, 1967. The commission insisted, he said. The details were still to be worked out, but legislation would be before the City Council within a month, and he expected it to pass. The next day Mayor Lindsay publicly backed Marcus. The "preliminary phases" of metering would start within a few weeks.

There was lots of rain last fall, and within a few weeks the reservoirs began to rise. By November they were only a little below normal, and extra quotas of Delaware water no longer mattered so much. The metering issue abruptly became more remote. In November, Commissioner Marcus still held that it was an "invaluable aid" to water management (it would be impossible to hold otherwise), but he didn't think any preliminary phases were going to occur soon. In fact, he wasn't sure that they would ever occur. The City Council would not approve, he feared, and he noted that David Ross, president of the Council, opposed meters. (Mr. Ross had also opposed them in August, for reasons generally conceded to have little to do with water engineering.)

In fact, Commissioner Marcus more or less waved metering good-bye. "We may have to depend on some other things," he said in a tone of mild regret. Citizen education (teach them to be careful, and who needs meters?) and the influence of the new rates are what he mainly has in mind. One other thing the city might depend on is suggested by the fact that during the same month Edward Maguire, president of that obsolescent, expensive, but thriving appendage, the Board of Water Supply, had asked the city for $51 million to start building another aqueduct up to the Delaware.

By this March, Mr. Marcus and the Mayor had ceased to talk about meters or dual water departments altogether, and were happily discussing the prospect of unlimited air conditioning and car washing this summer. The Mayor did add a caution: "Our water supply will never be good enough for waste." But he seemed innocent as a child about how one avoids it.

The city is like a half-reformed drunkard. It really has made some improvements; and assuming anything even near normal rainfall, another shortage is unlikely for at least a decade. Meanwhile, affordable or not, waste seems certain to continue. A backward city in an underdeveloped country can practice good water management. Lima, Peru, ordered 92,000 meters a couple of years ago. They had to be shipped in from here, since meters aren't made in South America. But New York, with the largest reservoirs and the most water engineers of any city in the world, not to mention the leading meter manufacturer in the world about ten minutes away on Long Island, is unable to charge its citizens for the water they waste. Maybe it will deserve the tenth shortage when it comes.

HUELGA: NEW GOALS FOR LABOR

EUGENE NELSON, Jr.

Mr. Nelson is an organizer for the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee, AFL-CIO, and the author of Huelga (Farm Workers Press, Delano, Calif.). Shortly after filing this article, he was jailed in Rio Grande City, Tex., in connection with an eleven-month strike there of farm workers. Mr. Nelson was charged with having threatened the lives of Texas Rangers.

If the word huelga has not yet appeared in an English-language dictionary, along with other Spanish words which have come into common usage in English, it surely will soon. As many Americans must know by now, "huelga" means "strike." As fewer know, it refers to a certain type of agricultural strike which is also a social movement, interpreted by different people in different ways, and capable at any time of shooting off in new directions which may significantly affect the lives of all Americans. The potentiality is there, despite the fact that at present only a tiny percentage of the American work force is involved, that these workers are among the most poorly educated of all, and that eventually their number must decline. Even on the surface, the strike and the movement in California, later in Texas, have been exciting and significant.

The huelga began in September of 1965 as just another agricultural strike, when about 1,000 Filipino-American members of the Agricultural Workers Organizing Committee of the AFL-CIO left their jobs in the vineyards of Delano, Calif., demanding to be paid the $1.40 an hour that was guaranteed to the last of the Mexican braceros who had been allowed to work in the United States. Delano was also the headquarters of the independent National Farm Workers Association, a unique union which was a combination of labor and social service organization, administering to all the major needs of its 2,000 Mexican-American members. The NFWA, headed by Cesar Chavez, joined the strike against thirty-six grape growers, presenting the uncommon spectacle of an alliance of two unions and two ethnic groups, plus a smattering of Anglos, Negroes and Puerto Ricans. [See "Monopoly in the Vineyards: The 'Grapes of Wrath' Strike" by James P. Degnan, The Nation, February 7, 1966.]

When the growers reacted with a violence suggestive of racial strife in the South, the strike gradually assumed, through the leadership of Chavez and his group, the proportions of a farm workers' social movement. There was a growing suggestion that it might expand to involve all Mexican-Americans and even join with the Negroes and other groups to become one massive movement of all minorities. Ministers, priests, civil rights workers, students, professors, politicians, labor leaders and liberals and radicals of all shadings flocked to Delano to fight the corporation farms and their cop cronies. Gigantic marches, demonstrations and mass arrests captured the imagination of people everywhere. A nation-wide boycott against the products of the Schenley Corporation, owner of the second largest vineyard in the area, finally brought the firm to the bargaining table in April of last year, in what was the first great breakthrough for America's farm workers. Now Schenley pays its hundreds of vineyard workers a minimum of $1.75 an hour, and several other large ranches are presently negotiating contracts. Significantly, the civil rights oriented Chavez union then became part of the AFL-CIO, in what was more of a compromise by the AFL-CIO with the huelga than vice versa.

In corrupt and poverty-stricken Starr County, Tex., where farm workers earn as little as 40c an hour, the movement also exploded last June when 700 melon pickers went out on strike. A subsequent farm workers' march to Austin united Mexican-American groups throughout the state in the demand for a state minimum wage of $1.25 an hour and union contracts for the striking workers. Gov. John Connally and Atty. Gen. Waggoner Carr refused to meet the marchers at the capitol on Labor Day, and many observers say the rebuff was responsible for Carr's defeat in the United States Senate race against Republican John Tower.

On May 15, the United Farm Workers signed their first recognition agreement with a Texas grower—Virgilio Guerra, who will be employing about sixty men in the cantaloupe harvest. Meanwhile the strike and boycott, launched with the same nation-wide machinery that forced Schenley to negotiate, is gaining momentum as the harvest peak nears.

There has been new organizing activity among farm workers in Oregon, Washington, Wisconsin, New Mexico, Arizona and Florida. About one-tenth of America's farm workers were included for the first time this year under the national minimum wage law, starting at $1 an hour. And it is predicted that this year or next farm workers will be included by Congress in the collective bargaining rights guaranteed other workers under the National Labor Relations Act, thus eliminating the grave injustice largely responsible for their depressed situation in the first place.

All these are the more obvious effects of the huelga. No one questions any longer the fact that what began as only a strike has now become a farm-worker movement, and to some extent both an economic and political movement of Mexican-Americans. What remains to be seen is the role the huelga is ultimately to play in two other large areas—the labor movement as a whole, and the civil rights movement as a whole; how it will affect the relationship between the two; and how they in turn, together or separately, will have a new effect on American society because of the huelga.

Although the Chavez group has to some extent been a factor in the joining up of Mexican-Americans and Negroes for political power, there has as yet been no really coherent alliance of the two. It is conceivable that, as in the case with the Filipinos who went on strike first, the Mexican-Americans, under Chavez, will come from behind to emerge as the leaders of a united movement of minorities. Acting either in league with other minorities or separately, they are certain to play an increasing role in contributing to more progressive civil rights legislation.

Of greater potential is the manner in which the huelga is influencing, and can continue to influence, all of labor. The labor movement was originally thought of as an anti-poverty movement, and it was one as far as it went. But once the more skilled workers had been organized and rescued from poverty, conservative leaders such as George Meany concentrated on consolidating gains rather than finishing the job, fulfilling labor's proper role, and organizing all the poverty-stricken workers of America. It is labor that should be leading the war on poverty, not the government—although if labor will not do the job, then the government must.

The huelga has made more and more labor leaders see this point, and labor at last is sluggishly beginning to move to fulfill its role. Perhaps the greatest contribution of the huelga has been its effect on the thinking of one man, Walter Reuther, a prime contributor to and observer of the movements in Delano and South Texas. But, as Reuther and other labor leaders increasingly realize, merely to organize the rest of America's workers is not enough. America is going through a profound change, the welfare state is expanding rapidly, and a guaranteed annual income for all citizens may soon be a reality. Many have debated whether it is feasible, but how many ask whether it is just? Or even whether justice is a factor. Justice seems increasingly lost in modern society's concern for efficiency and material abundance. Yet the sense of justice is amazingly strong among even the most degraded. Any honest social worker can tell you that, for most people, to receive handouts without working is demoralizing, and that there is a considerable amount of resentment to welfare handouts among the community at large. As yet, the problem is still a relatively small one. But what will the effect be when half the potential work force is living on welfare and the other half doing the work? A country half demoralized and half angry? A decaying of the moral fiber of the nation? A revolution?

Two alternatives to this potential state of affairs come to mind. One is government ownership of all industry, so that the work load can be equally divided among all the citizens by government decree. With the election of Ronald Reagan as Governor of America's most populous state, this seems unlikely to come to pass in the near future.

The other answer is for the unions, in the process of organizing all of America's workers, to get not only decent wages for them but to demand a shorter work week, longer paid vacations, a younger retirement age, and job retraining where necessary in all contracts. Thus all of America's workers will be able to share in both the productivity and the wealth of our nation. This is the way labor—whether or not the AFL-CIO remains united—can make America into a healthy society and save it from the creeping illness of an unjust welfare state that is overtaking it.

The greatest contribution of the huelga is the way it has influenced—and will surely continue to influence—the reviving American labor movement toward this course of action: a new wave of organizing of all workers of all races, with the emphasis on shorter hours and jobs for all. If it accomplishes this, the huelga will have helped the American labor movement to save America.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Double the Effort & Square the Error

TO MOVE A NATION. By Roger Hilsman. Doubleday & Co. 624 pp. $6.95.

MALCOLM W. BROWNE

Mr. Browne covered the Vietnamese War from 1961 through 1966 for the Associated Press and American Broadcasting Co. and as a free-lance correspondent. Among other awards, he received a Pulitzer Prize for International Reporting for his work in Vietnam. He is currently Edward R. Murrow Fellow at The Council on Foreign Relations and the author of The New Face of War (Bobbs-Merrill).

In his nastier moods H. L. Mencken used to argue that the majority is always wrong, and that American democracy always represents the lowest common denominator. But H. L. Mencken could always be dismissed as a crank and eccentric, who spent his spare time piling up scrap wood in the back yard of his Baltimore home.

Unlike Mencken, Roger Hilsman has stood close to the pinnacle of American power, in both the Kennedy and Johnson Administrations. He is therefore to be forgiven his Panglossian conclusion that American foreign policy somehow works out for the best in this best of all possible systems. However, Hilsman's arguments and observations in no way support the optimistic conclusions of his new book, To Move A Nation. If the reader overlooks these stated conclusions, Hilsman's thinking seems to run in channels similar to Mencken's.

As director of the State Department's Bureau of Intelligence and Research, and later as Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs, Hilsman was an important participant in the making of national policy. He was involved in decisions affecting Cuba, Laos, the Congo, Indonesia, China and Vietnam, among other countries. He was an important Kennedy teammate during the Cuban missile crisis, when the world came close to a nuclear holocaust, and Khrushchev smelled "burning in the air." Hilsman was up to his ears in the deadly political battles that raged within the Kennedy administration between State Department, CIA and Pentagon, as well as with various power blocs in and out of Congress. And the hectic, neurotic, almost consumptive flavor of those days is faithfully portrayed in To Move A Nation, especially in the section on Vietnam.

As a protégé of President Kennedy, Hilsman had personal influence that went far beyond his titles. An old Asia hand, he had been an OSS guerrilla leader behind Japanese lines in Burma during World War II, and had unusual sensitivity to the requirements of the new-style wars in Laos and Vietnam. Kennedy appreciated this, and listened to Hilsman. Kennedy even encouraged Hilsman to defy his immediate boss, Secretary Dean Rusk.

Inevitably, Hilsman made determined and powerful enemies. Besides the natural enemies of the State Department in the Pentagon, CIA and Congress, Hilsman also had his own colleagues to worry about, especially Rusk. And with the death of Kennedy, Hilsman's influence evaporated almost immediately. The New Frontier was dead, along with almost all the policies that went with it. Hilsman correctly recognized that he had no place in the Johnson regime, and resigned.

Hilsman makes all this come alive in dramatic detail. But the primary interest in the book is not historical; indeed, it contains a number of errors of fact, particularly with regard to Vietnam.

The real (and fascinating) question posed by the book is whether or not H. L. Mencken was essentially right—whether, for example, the American democratic system is capable of handling effective foreign policy. Hilsman's answer is yes, but it is a yes so clouded with qualifications as to be meaningless. And with respect to Vietnam, he flatly concedes that "the American form of government is ill-equipped for guerrilla war."

In commenting on the effectiveness of the State Department as a whole, Hilsman quotes Kennedy as having described it as "a bowl of jelly." In assessing the effects of American economic aid to Laos, Hilsman says: "To the shame of all Americans, the United States became the butt of jokes among both friend and foe."

Hilsman argues, with many illustrations, that "policy is politics"—that most major policy decisions are evolved slowly as a continuous process of achieving consensus. Hilsman also makes it clear that he doesn't like the system. He doesn't like the way policies he considers effective are watered down, distorted, and even defeated by democratic pressures.

By nature a believer in blue-ribbon policy making by experts, Hilsman liked the Special Forces as they originally were—an elite armed element of the CIA. Hilsman (and Kennedy) saw the Special Forces as a quasi-military political strike force, for which actual combat would be a secondary role. With Kennedy's death, the Special Forces lost their champion, and Johnson quickly turned them over to their archenemy, the Pentagon.

Hilsman sees American foreign policy at its best under the helm of a highly intelligent and decisive young President, who has weathered and learned from the Bay of Pigs blunder. He has unreserved praise for Kennedy's lonely and risky confrontation with Russia over the installation of missiles in Cuba, and describes him at his statesmanlike best in the engineering of the 1962 Geneva accords on Laos. He views Kennedy as the wise ruler, without whose sure hand children like Secretaries McNamara and Rusk, as well as the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the Congressional hotheads, would have ripped the ship of state asunder. Most of all, Hilsman sees Kennedy as a strong prince who refused to rely on raw military force as the basis of his foreign policy and wars.

In Kennedy, Hilsman saw the ideal practitioner of the new type of anti-Communist crusade, which seeks to beat the Communist war of national liberation, using the new tricks of the trade. This type of war is primarily and essentially political, and things like massive bombing and giant, divisional ground operations have no part in it, Hilsman and Kennedy felt.

Hilsman muses on what would and would not have happened in Vietnam had Kennedy lived, and leaves the reader with the impression that the United States would not now be in the mess it is. Hilsman relates that he once gave a briefing at Kennedy's instance for key administration leaders on guerrilla warfare. Among those present was Vice President Johnson, who showed so little interest in the subject that he spent most of the time going back and forth to a phone to keep tabs on a political development in Texas.

It is clear that Hilsman holds Johnson's circumscribed reliance on raw force in foreign policy in contempt. The former New Frontiersman offers some extremely interesting statistics in support of his obliquely phrased attack on Johnson. He cites Pentagon figures estimating that in the early part of the Vietnamese War the Vietcong required only 5 or 6 tons of supplies a day from the outside world to maintain their offensive, and that even by early 1966, the figure had risen to only 12 tons a day! Such a tiny requirement hardly supports the Johnson view that the Vietcong depends on massive infiltration of supplies from the Communist bloc.

Further, it is obvious that even under saturation bombing by American planes, enemy supply lines could easily sneak the small daily quota to the guerrillas in the South. The point, of course, is that the Vietcong has always supplied itself, with only minor supplements from the outer world.

The same is true of Vietcong manpower. Hilsman cites other Pentagon statistics that effectively refute both the Pentagon and Johnsonian contentions that the enemy in South Vietnam is a foreign Communist army. For instance, the figures show that in 1964, the Vietcong suffered 17,000 killed and 4,200 captured. Balanced against this, the Pentagon estimates 7,400 enemy Vietnamese troops were infiltrated into the South from North Vietnam. But—again, according to Pentagon statistics—total Vietcong strength in the South at the beginning of 1966 was 92,000, while at the end of the year it was 124,000.

To make these figures balance, the Vietcong must be assumed to have recruited in South Vietnam 45,800 new combatants during 1964! But the figures for 1965, the year massive bombing of North Vietnam began, are even more dramatic. In that year, according to Pentagon statistics, the enemy infiltrated 19,000 troops from North Vietnam. But to account for the sharp increase in enemy strength despite their growing casualties, the Vietcong must have recruited between 112,900 and 142,900 in South Vietnam alone in 1965!

It is hard to escape the conclusion from these figures that America has suffered and is continuing to suffer a staggering political defeat in Vietnam. Vastly greater numbers of Vietnamese each year are preferring the Vietcong side to ours, despite the mounting military and economic pressure we apply.

This is an impression abundantly confirmed by my own observations during a five-year tour as a reporter in Vietnam, by the way—an impression that to this day seems not to have affected most of Washington. There has never been a doubt in my mind that the war in Vietnam is political. Belatedly, even President Johnson appears to have recognized at least one political aspect of the war—that, as General Westmoreland recently put it, our Achilles' heel is our resolve. National resolve is an aspect of politics, and even in conventional war it plays a role on both sides of any line.

On one side among America's policy makers are those, like President Kennedy and Hilsman, who are inclined to fight the Communists with the "gray warfare" of politico-military tactics in Asia and the rest of the Third World. These are the men who believe that such wars must be fought on a limited and semi-secret plane, led and directed by an elite of experts.

On the other hand, there have been those like President Johnson, Dean Rusk and the Air Force generals who believe primarily in brute military force, in which God is presumed to be on the side of the big battalions. Both points of view have had their turns at bat.

America has not lacked for men of intelligence, experience and missionary zeal in fighting the shadow war in Vietnam over the decades. During World War II, the same OSS in which Roger Hilsman served, worked with Ho Chi Minh and his guerrilla forces, fighting the Japanese. Later, when Washington decided to back France against Ho and the Vietminh, Saigon and Hanoi again swarmed with American experts. American money and supplies played a gigantic role in that war, too. As Hilsman points out, America paid for around 70 per cent of French war costs in 1954, the final year of the Indo-China war.

Following the truce at Geneva, the long stream of American experts began arriving in Saigon, each to try his hand as an amateur nation builder.

There was Col. Edward Landsdale, the CIA man who had proved his mettle in the Philippines, and who now undertook to reshape the body politic in Vietnam.

There was Wolf Ladejinsky, who lived across the street from the palace as President Diem's personal adviser on everything from defensive villages to land reform.

There was a high-powered mission headed by Dr. Wesley Fishel from Michigan State University, which aimed at creating a new nation. Heavily supported by the CIA, an institute for training Vietnamese public officials was created, along with a shiny new police establishment. Among the innovations the American experts brought were telephone tapping and bugging equipment and other gadgets that were put to effective use in crushing political opposition to Diem.

There was a stream of American military advisers who managed to create, train and arm a new Vietnamese army. The new army undoubtedly would have fought well in Korea or World War II. Unfortunately, it was virtually worthless against the Vietcong—not because the Vietnamese made bad soldiers but because the American pattern of warfare had no place in Vietnam.

There were ex-CIA men like Rufus Phillips and other American civilians—Ev Bumgartner, John Vann and Dr. George Tanham, to name a few—who worked with the fire of revolutionaries to build a nation in Vietnam. There was Jerry Rose, a newsman who decided in 1965 to participate in the Vietnamese government as an adviser, and died a few months later in a flaming crash.

There was (and is) even a club of Vietnam buffs, known as The American Friends of Vietnam, which was a frequent participant in Vietnamese affairs of state.

America's political elite was for many years involved in the war in Vietnam. Despite the dedication and frequent heroism of this group, it failed in virtually everything it undertook. For one thing, no two American experts ever seemed to be in complete agreement on anything, and much of the fighting was between Americans. For another, America as a whole has never backed its experts.

But in a broader context, many of the ideas that seemed to work well on a small scale never worked out when expanded. The British adviser to Vietnam who exerted perhaps the strongest influence of all on President Kennedy, Robert K. G. Thompson, once told me: "You know, somehow whenever the Americans double the effort they manage to square the error."

President Johnson had always held the experts more or less in contempt, and made it plain that if they didn't quickly nail the necessary number of coonskins to the wall, he would invoke his own Draconian approaches. President Johnson is still at bat, but we're in the ninth inning now, and the home team is still badly behind.

One can't resist the image of a Vietnamese nha que (peasant) sitting in front of his hut, reading Hilsman's new book, a wry smile on his face. Is it possible that the old nha que is thinking, "a pox on all their houses"? I think that's exactly how Vietnam reacts to the torture of American policy politics.

When America is not politically bungling its relations with Asia, it seems to vent its spleen by bombing and destroying. Either way, Vietnam is the loser. Granting that Asian communism is a brutal force that hardly does much to make life happier for the average peasant, America has yet to demonstrate that it can do better.

Putting down Hilsman's book, one wonders whether some form of isolationism with respect to Asia would really be such a bad idea after all. Would Asia really be so much worse off without us around? Would we really be any worse off without Asia? Probably we shall never have the chance to find out. Asia and America seem doomed to play out their tragic drama to the end.

MacDiarmid: Highland Red

SEAN CRONIN

Mr. Cronin is a journalist who has lived in Ireland and the United States, and has written for publications in both countries.

Hugh MacDiarmid is a major poet of our time, but it is hard to grasp that fact because his politics and his personality and even his poetry keep getting in the way. All three are incomprehensible to most people without the aid of a glossary.

A face-to-face encounter such as the recital in May at the 92nd Street Young Men's and Young Women's Hebrew Association (under the auspices of the Poetry Center and the Lincoln Center Festival '67) ends such doubts. The voice of unconquered Scotland is strong and unequivocal still. It is a marvel to hear, thundering and burring with all the forcefulness, freshness and fire we have come to associate with the name and works of Hugh MacDiarmid. nom de guerre of Christopher Murray Grieve.

A living legend on his native heath—and to admirers everywhere—he is, for reasons of state, on a first visit to America at the ripe age of 75. There on the stage of the Poetry Center he stood in tartan kilt, ready and eager to do battle with his enemies. Short, square, wiry, his granitelike features seem milder than his pictures would lead one to believe. Uncompromising eyes fixed the audience of 300 or so. He quickly discovered he was among friends. They had come to cheer and hear.

Many stood when he emerged from the wings with M. L. Rosenthal of New York University shortly after 8.30 P.M.; and all stood two hours later when he walked off the stage alone. It was one measure of his way with people and words: warm, honest, direct. He says what he has to say and is silent. He says it well.

The audience seemed predominantly middle-aged and conventionally attired, but there was a strong sprinkling of youth. It was a knowing audience, subdued at first, quick to laughter, at ease with a cherished friend—a much neglected poet who though old and tired and a trifle deaf is at heart an angry young rebel still.

While Mr. Rosenthal traced MacDiarmid's development as a poet, the man who long, long ago wrote the masterpiece A Drunk Man Looks at the Thistle listened with interest as if hearing the tale of another. He has been ranked with Burns and credited with creating a literary revolution in Scotland. He has been a source of inspiration to a couple of generations of poets. He is in most anthologies, including Yeats's controversial Oxford Book of Modern Verse. He has published a dozen books and is one of the most original and provocative writers at work today. Yet it is nearly impossible to get at his works. A couple of weeks ago none of four Village bookshops I visited carried anything by him or on him. That matter is being partly rectified by Macmillan, which has issued a revised edition of his poems with an enlarged glossary and—as Mr. Rosenthal noted —minus the typographical errors that marred the first edition.

Strong and authoritative, with a prophet's passion, his words rolled across the footlights:

Auden, MacNeice, Day Lewis, I have read them all, Hoping against hope to hear the authentic call.

*A tragical disappointment. . . .
And know the explanation I must pass is this*

—You cannot light a match on a crumbling wall.

An inspired beginning and off the program. At the last minute MacDiarmid exercised the poet's prerogative and changed the selections. Not really though, for most of what had been promised came later anyway. The first section was devoted to English, the second to the livelier Scots verse. An intermission divided them.

You may say MacDiarmid is a satirist in the Swiftian sense, that his poems are replete with social comment and protest, that he writes charming lyrics. But to understand his range you must hear him speak the lines. That's an experience. He read "The Glass of Pure Water," "Reflections in a Slum," "At My Father's Grave," "In the Children's Hospital," "First Love," "Cattle Show"—all in straightforward English, which as everybody knows is a dialect of Scots.

Fellow Scottish poet Norman MacCaig introduced the second section, striking exactly the right note in his witty, lightly ironic, slightly skeptical remarks. He told how one day Christopher Murray Grieve discovered a Scots dictionary, devoured it, and emerged from the experience as Hugh MacDiarmid; how critics contend that the trouble with Hugh MacDiarmid—who lists his recrea-

CATTLE SHOW

*I shall go among red faces and virile voices,
See stylish sheep, with fine heads and well-wooled,
And great bulls mellow to the touch,
Brood mares of marvelous approach, and geldings
With sharp and flinty bones and silken hair.*

*And through th' enclosure draped in red and gold
I shall pass on to spheres more vivid yet
Where countesses' coque feathers gleam and glow
And, swathed in silks, the painted ladies are Whose laughter plays like summer lightning there.*

HUGH MACDIARMID

From Collected Poems of Hugh MacDiarmid. Revised Edition with Enlarged Glossary prepared by John C. Weston. The Macmillan Co. 498 pp. $7.95.

tion as "Anglophobia"—is that he missed the Battle of Flodden and has been trying to make up for it since; how he founded the Scottish Nationalist Party with four others on the firm foundation of hatred for England; how he became the gadfly of Scotland whose preaching and practice have affected everyone in the country—including those who can't abide him. As for his politics, that's quite a simple matter: he is simultaneously a Scottish nationalist and a Marxian internationalist.

The program gave text and glossary for the eleven Scots poems. The poet went over them in English first and the difficulties disappeared quickly. The words are sharp, vigorous, musical: raw speech of field and street with Burns's "spark o' nature's fire." What we heard ranged from the haunting delight of "Crowdieknowe":

*Oh to be at Crowdieknowe
When the last trumpet blows,
An' see the deid come loupin' owre
The auld grey wa's*

to the weary sadness of "Lourd on My Hert":

*Lourd (heavy) on my hert as winter lies
The state that Scotland's in the day.
Spring to the North has aye come slow
But noo dour winter's like to stay
For guid
And no' for guid!*

*Nae wonder if I think I see
A lichtner shadow than the neist (nearest)*

*I'm fain to cry: "The dawn, the dawn!
I see it brakin' in the East."
But ah
—It's juist mair snaw!*

That raises the question of "synthetic Scots," a matter MacDiarmid discussed at some length during the question and answer session. His vocabulary includes ancient and modern Scottish idiom. When he came on the scene the tongue had disintegrated into many dialects and was incapable of providing a medium for high poetry. In the 15th and 16th centuries Scotland was considered the fountainhead of song in Europe; faced by the competition of English, backed by English political power, the language began to fade. It is now encouraged in the schools and universities, but the majority of Scottish teachers are "hopelessly Anglicized," MacDiarmid says. Which leads him naturally to the point that political independence is necessary for the revival of a language and the creation of a national literature.

Yes, he wrote his poems straight out of the dictionary. But poetry, as Mallarmé said, is made with words, not

Charles M. Rehmus and Doris B. McLaughlin, Editors

LABOR AND AMERICAN POLITICS
A Book of Readings

Selected articles, papers, and speeches explore every important aspect of the American labor movement's involvement in politics from colonial times to the present.

hardbound $9.00 — paperbound $5.25

David Joel Steinberg

PHILIPPINE COLLABORATION IN WORLD WAR II

Dispassionately, but with a sensitive awareness of the moral issues involved, Steinberg relates the developments during this agonizing period of Philippine history.

$7.50

Guy E. Swanson

RELIGION AND REGIME
A Sociological Account of the Reformation

Professor Swanson attempts to explain why some societies became Protestant while others remained Catholic. A deeply interpretive study.

$7.50

Gerald G. Eggert

RAILROAD LABOR DISPUTES
The Beginnings of Federal Strike Policy

The federal government's methods of dealing with railroad labor problems in the last quarter of the nineteenth century and how federal strike policy evolved.

$6.95

Hershel Parker, Editor

THE RECOGNITION OF HERMAN MELVILLE

A collection of important American and British reviews and critical essays that have appeared since 1846. The basic documents, nowhere else anthologized, on Melville's reception and gradual acceptance.

$7.50

Werner Sombart

LUXURY AND CAPITALISM
Introduction by Philip Siegelman

Sombart demonstrates the importance of luxury in the development of capitalism and advances fascinating theories on women's role in the demand for luxury.

$6.50

THE UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN PRESS
ANN ARBOR

ideas; and words are found in a dictionary. Now he is concentrating on longer poems in Scots. He thinks short poems are too much like peering through a keyhole. (Heine adopted the same view after his early songs achieved an enormous popularity.) As MacDiarmid talks on about Scots it becomes clear how one great writer can affect a language, even raise it from the tomb. Like Burns in another age. To appreciate the verse that is "hamely in attire" you have to know something about the attire.

The question and answer period brought up the name of another Scots writer, James Leslie Mitchell, a prolific novelist of the early 1930s who used the nom de plume Lewis Grassie Gibbon and died at the age of 34. MacDiarmid considers his trilogy, "A Scots Quair," the best example of working-class literature anywhere. Journalist, historian, archaeologist, explorer, aviator—his body craved action and his mind teemed with ideas. Gibbon collaborated with MacDiarmid in 1934 in a book on Scotland

—the same year that he published three others: Grey Granite, which is Part 3 of the trilogy and deals with an industrial city in economic crisis; The Conquest of the Maya and the biography of an explorer. He died the following year.

"His influence on Scottish literature will continue," said MacDiarmid, "as long as Scotland lives."

A woman some seats behind me said rather sadly: "I never heard of him." It's a pity. But she's not alone.

The questions and MacDiarmid's answers skimmed lightly over Scotland's political future. The appeal of the Scottish Nationalist Party is growing, he said, especially among the young; "it is coming up like milk on the boil." The Labor Party has had its day in Scotland. He is no longer a member of the nationalist group which is "bourgeois controlled"; he doesn't want just a Scottish Parliament: he wants a Scottish Socialist Parliament. MacDiarmid sees it coming.

A Style of Anxiety

THE SENSE OF AN ENDING: Studies in the Theory of Fiction. By Frank Kermode. Oxford University Press. 187 pp. $5.75.

DAVID J. GORDON

Mr. Gordon teaches English at Hunter College. He is the author of D. H. Lawrence as a Literary Critic (Yale University Press).

Frank Kermode studies the theory not only of literary fiction but of fiction in general, "the ways we try to make sense of our lives . . . especially at a moment in history when it may be harder than ever to accept the precedents of sense-making—to believe that any earlier way of satisfying one's need to know the shape of life in relation to the perspective of time will suffice." His treatment of this intricate subject requires and repays slow reading. It is recondite, aloof, concise (rather difficult to imagine in its original lecture form), but also acute, very sophisticated, and surely valuable to anyone who gives thought to the theoretical issues of modern art, philosophy and perhaps even science.

Kermode interests us in the continuing human effort to reconcile two contrary needs: the need to believe and the need to doubt, to create and to de-create, to make and unmake models of our existence in time. (He assumes that temporal paradigms answer our most fundamental orientative need and have superseded spatial paradigms in modern thought, assumptions which I shall not attempt to evaluate except to say that he raises without quite answering E. H. Gombrich's objection that temporal and spatial models, in aesthetics, are not easily separated.) Thus he traces the persistence from the Bible to the modern novel both of "end-oriented" or "apocalyptic" fictions, which bind up meaningless temporal succession into significant duration, and of "clerkly scepticism," which spurs the creation of more sophisticated fictions by detecting the "mythic" or "escapist" elements in established ones.

It is his suggestion that Biblical apocalypse, picturing an imminent end, was in this manner superseded by tragedy, which rendered the end forever immanent by offering only a critical image of it (e.g., King Lear). Tragedies are "researches into death in an age too late for apocalypse, an age more aware that its fictions are themselves models of the human design on the world." He further suggests that tragedy was in turn demythologized and superseded by existential fiction, in which "the single unrationalized death becomes the sole point of reference," in which meaninglessness is so respected as to threaten the very possibility of humanizing fiction.

When, as today, fiction is so distrusted yet still so needed, it may "degenerate into myth," i.e., become unconscious, thus evading our skepticism but also orienting us falsely and dangerously to reality. Aware that modern literary fictions have dangerous relations among modern political myths, Kermode formulates the following distinctions:

Fictions can degenerate into myth whenever they are not consciously held to be fictive. In this sense [Nazi] anti-Semitism is a degenerate fiction, a myth; and Lear is a fiction. . . . Fictions are for finding things out, and they change as the needs of sense-making change. . . .

On Vaihinger's view, the fictional as if is distinguished also from hypothesis because it is not in question that at the end of the finding-out process it will be dropped. . . .

So my suggestion is that literary fictions belong to Vaihinger's category of the "consciously false."

The distinction between hypothesis and fiction may be a useful corrective to Northrop Frye's infectious mythomania which levels and absorbs both, but I find the distinction between myth and fiction more congenial than useful. Was Shakespeare or Milton's belief in the Great Chain of Being "consciously false"? Was even Yeats's belief in A Vision altogether so? In practice, myth and fiction are difficult to separate. Appreciating the heuristic value of radical literature, yet hating totalitarian politics, we crave a sharp distinction between art and propaganda, but I don't think it is to be had.

In his excellent chapter, "The Modern Apocalypse," an extension of the argument in his first book, Romantic Image, Kermode may demonstrate the difficulty more than the importance of this distinction by berating certain sophisticated early Modernists (Yeats, Eliot, Pound, Lewis, Lawrence) for regressing in their conception of history from fiction to myth, from conscious trying out to unconscious acceptance. They lapsed into the "myth of crisis," viewing the degenerate present as trembling more or less permanently on the verge of apocalypse. They forgot that "crisis is a way of thinking about one's moment, and is not inherent in the moment itself." Kermode is at his clerkly best in unmaking this myth of crisis:

I don't find it easy to see the uniqueness of our situation. It is commonplace to talk about our historical situation as uniquely terrible and in a way privileged, a cardinal point in time. But can it really be so? It seems doubtful that our crisis, our relation to the future and to the past, is one of the important differences between us and our predecessors. Many of them felt as we do. If the evidence looks good to us, so it did to them. Perhaps if we have a terrible privilege it is merely that we are alive and are going to die, all at once or one at a time. Other people have noticed this, and expressed their feelings about it in images different from ours, armies in the sky, for example, or a palpable Antichrist; and these have been discarded. But it would be childish to argue, in a discussion of how people behave under eschatological threat, that nuclear bombs are more real and make one experience more authentic crisis-feelings than armies in the sky.

I wish he had maintained this fine skepticism when he turned in his final chapters—with a sudden access of eloquence—to the radical later Modernists, who gave up the idea of degeneration for the idea of schism. Kermode is clerkly enough to be suspicious of a "total break with the past," of the schismatic aesthetics advocated or announced by such extremists as Robbe-Grillet, Harold Rosenberg and Marshall McLuhan. Thus he sides with Gombrich against Rosenberg in their lively debate on the New; and with Sartre against Robbe-Grillet for understanding that fictions, though "deeply distrusted," are "humanly necessary." But he seems to share with the writers he admires most, Sartre and Wallace Stevens, a belief that to be modern and creative is uniquely anguishing. With Sartre we know that "the very forms of art make us feel guilty." With Stevens "we know so desolately that is and as are one." With all our significant writers "we are muddled about what we can take on trust from the past."

Perhaps what is new is only the style of our anxiety. Today, as Kermode points out, we self-consciously use fiction to explore the problems of fiction. But does it follow that our "poverty" (Stevens) or "need" (Sartre) is keener? Or only that we talk about it differently? The Sense of an Ending contains much unemphasized evidence of the fact that this metaphysical nakedness was experienced long before Modernism: by Greek philosophers, church fathers and Renaissance poets. The author is beguiled by Sartre's Existential Man, seeming to regard this construct as the unadorned truth of the human situation rather than itself a myth—or at best a fiction.

Consider Sartre's man briefly. He has no relevant past. Insofar as he claims that his actions are psychologically determined, he is guilty of bad faith. He feels himself de trop in the world. His very existence is a sin. And this is called freedom, the realization of which induces dread or nausea.

Such freedom sounds exactly like the enslaving determinism Sartre detests, like the weight of some guilt-laden compulsion laid down by the past. Sartre seems unwilling to accept the partial freedom man really has because it entails accepting also the power of unconscious determination: he chooses total freedom, repressing his actual dependence. If this is so, every creative act, which inevitably requires taking from the past, would arouse "causeless" anxiety or revulsion.

In his closing paragraph Kermode says in effect that the burdensome freedom achieved by systematic doubt is our only alternative to Necessity and hence our only proof of the authenticity of the creative power in us. Well, creation may require initial de-creation, but it does not require the questioning of every assumption, if this were possible. It does not require such radical renunciations as the one expressed in the beautiful last stanza of Stevens' "Sunday Morning," where we are deprived not only of a god but also of a society and are left only deer, quail, berries and pigeons! Such radical renunciations suggest an effort to release the imagination from some obscure—but hardly causeless—guilt. The problem of the creative man may be not so much what as how he can take from the past.

THE WALTER READE ORGANIZATION PRESENTS A JACK Le VIEN PRODUCTION

*The story of King Edward VIII
who gave up an empire for the woman he loved.*

A KING'S STORY

MADE WITH THE PERSONAL
CO-OPERATION OF H. R. H.
THE DUKE OF WINDSOR AND
THE DUCHESS OF WINDSOR

...is a love story.

Narrated by ORSON WELLES • Music Composed and Conducted by IVOR SLANEY

Directed by HARRY BOOTH • Produced by JACK Le VIEN

Associate Producer ARTHUR S. FERRIMAN • IN COLOR • CONTINENTAL

NOW PLAYING

THE festival
57th St. at 5th Ave. L.T. 1-2323

Lou Shaw presents

MAC BIRD! by Barbara Garson

ALL ORIGINAL
LOS ANGELES PRODUCTION

OPENS JUNE 6

Previews Begin May 31

TICKETS ON SALE NOW

Mail Order — Box Office — All Agencies

Tues. Thru Fri. at 8:30 • Sat. at 7:30 & 10:30 • Sun. at 5:00 & 8:30
Tickets All Performances — $4.50 & $5.50 — Students $3.00

PLAYERS RING GALLERY THEATRE

8325 Santa Monica Blvd., Los Angeles • OL 4-0456

Art and the Book Reviewer

THINK BACK ON US: A Contemporary Chronicle of the 1930's. By Malcolm Cowley. Edited with an Introduction by Henry Dan Piper. Southern Illinois University Press. 400 pp. $10.

LEONARD KRIEDEL

Mr. Kriegel teaches English at the City College of New York, and is currently working on a novel and on a study of politics and literature in contemporary America.

The revival of interest in the 1930s continues, and those of us who were born during the depression can now see that for all its sins—and they are numerous—the decade was never that artistically barren landscape depicted for us by so many of the critical theologians who dominated a large segment of university English Departments in the 1950s. Beginning with Edmund Wilson's The Shores of Light in 1952, the political and literary fervor of the decade has been revived by a number of writers. Malcolm Cowley is the most recent to remind us of that peculiar excitement with Think Back on Us, a collection of essays and book reviews written during the thirties. Both as another perspective on the decade, and as a collection of essays by one of the foremost critics in this country, the book must be welcomed.

Think Back on Us is also a much needed tribute to a man who has served American culture very well, one who, along with Wilson and Kenneth Burke, helped not only to shape but also to record the American scene in the 1930s. They were all men of letters in the European sense of the term, and each was both singular and representative. Just as Randolph Bourne and Van Wyck Brooks made of the radical stance a critical position capable of challenging American life between 1909 and the end of the First World War, so Wilson, Burke and Cowley fought to prevent radicalism from being submerged beneath the peculiar provincialism which has always been the most serious threat to the nation's intellectual health. Their chief weapon was the book review. One wonders whether at any other time in our history it was so seriously conceived. In the epilogue to this book, Cowley speaks of his own weekly reviews as an "art form," a "blank-verse meditation," a "private journal."

Cowley succeeded Edmund Wilson as The New Republic's book review editor, a position he was to occupy from 1930 to 1941. If he did not possess Wilson's broad scholarship, he did have an extraordinarily sensitive mind—far more sensitive to the nuances of poetry, for instance, than Wilson's was—and large areas of intellectual and artistic interest which he wished to explore along with his readers. To read Think Back on Us—even those essays in which Cowley's judgments seem wrong, such as a 1936 review of Eliot's Collected Poems which terms Eliot a "minor poet"—is to be made depressingly aware that there is no reviewer today doing quite this kind of thing, none who consistently attempts to see both a work and its origins.

We are still, by and large, the victims of a rather narrow methodological criticism: we still separate aesthetic from social considerations, as if art were a pineapple to be macheted in half. But the relationship of the literary and social scenes was something Cowley could take for granted even before the 1930s; Exile's Return, still the best source book on what the 1920s were actually like for the expatriate generation, reflects his idealism as much as Think Back on Us does. If his spiritual parenthood passed from Emerson to Marx and back to Emerson again, his vision remained singular in its insistence that the function of art was more than decorative—an idea that both Marx and Emerson would have welcomed. Cowley believed that the artist had the right, if not the obligation, to demand changes in the human condition and to employ his art to that end. We are just beginning to get over our embarrassment about art that is didactic and to consider the idea that perhaps art must help transform that which is unlivable. What we must keep in mind is what Cowley instinctively knew—where the didactic is obtrusive, the work suffers.

Henry Dan Piper, who edited Think Back on Us, has tried to give us a representative sampling of Cowley's work during the 1930s. What we view is a mind in various stages of development. Cowley's Marxism, for instance, can be seen in a number of manifestations, from a review of Trotsky's My Life in which Cowley's incipient orthodoxy defeats his critical perception—his tone at the end of the review is almost triumphant as he dismisses Trotsky to "the dustbin of history"—to the detachment of his retrospective "Farewell to the 1930s." Since the comparison with Wilson is inevitable, it is interesting to stand this piece alongside Wilson's "Marxism at the End of the Thirties," which was included in The Shores of Light. In some ways, Cowley's Marxism ran deeper than Wilson's; at no time did he look at it with Wilson's patrician suspicion. By 1933, Wilson was already moving away from Marxist orthodoxy, at the very time when so many other American writers, including Cowley, were moving toward it. But if Wilson saw what was happening to Marxism before most other American writers did, Cowley was able to salvage more from his experience; he was never victimized by his beliefs, as Wilson was.

One cannot conceive of Cowley's writing a book like Europe Without Baedeker or the incredibly naive The Cold War and the Income Tax. Cowley's loss was not personal. Consequently, he is far less nostalgic. Unlike Wilson, he seems to have been able to take from the thirties whatever he could take and then moved on. He is still interested in what younger American writers

FOR WRITERS!

Enrich your style through Herbert Spencer's and Edgar Allan Poe's classic principles that have influenced many of the world's great authors. A help for writers eager to get published. Send $1.00 to

PAGEANT PRESS

101 5th Ave. N.Y. 3 Dept. N

The Best Way To Get THE NATION

THE NATION

6-5-67

333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

- ☐ One Year, $10
- ☐ Two Years, $18
- ☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Foreign and Canadian Postage
$1 a year extra)

NAME _____

ADDRESS _____

CITY _____

STATE _____ ZIP NO. _____

FLOATS

What is human in me—
dreams that repeat, incitement of figures riding in on waves—
sorrow in me
that what arises
must in like manner fade—face bent over my sleep easing the pain when I woke—what is meaningful to me must from time to time at least be my reality,
not unlike the soil
a plant needs to grow,
must be around me—
faces in whom is deeply inscribed
feeling for suffering, eyes that state
facts that can't be said.

No one can take bloom in hands, though it may seep through pores and make one shudder in the dark.
Walls I seek with flowers strung from top,
the height where hidden gardens start,
full life of the senses, of the heart, floats I can imagine but not see;— the invisible suggested by the visible to stir
what is human in me.

ARTHUR GREGOR

are doing, while Wilson—admittedly the one American deserving of the Nobel Prize—wonders aloud about his “pocket of the past.” Where Wilson has the edge over Cowley is in his vast learning. The opening essay in Think Back on Us is an attack on Babbitt, More and their fellow humanists. But to compare this to Wilson’s “Notes on Babbitt and More” is to see how superior Wilson’s ammunition is—few other critics could correct Babbitt’s Greek.

Most of Cowley’s literary judgments retain their power to persuade—more often than not, he is both correct and illuminating. Rarely did he permit himself the luxury of a judgment based on political indolence. Whether he is writing of Mann’s Joseph or Faulkner’s Pylon, he accedes only to the demands of his own broad human and literary sympathies. Although he didn’t separate the two functions, he was a better literary than social critic. The social reporting reprinted in this volume does not leave us with a sense of the depression’s bitterness, as Wilson’s The American Jitters did. Lacking Wilson’s eye and scholarship, Cowley’s advantage seems to have been a sensitivity which expanded during the years. It was this which enabled him to see what was worth while in Somerset Maugham without losing his perspective.

In his introduction, Henry Dan Piper speaks of how he came to put this book together out of his “need for a source book . . . in the intellectual, social, and literary history of the Thirties.” That he found such a book in the essays and reviews of a single man is sufficient testimony to Cowley’s stature as a critic. The only reservation I have about how Professor Piper did his job is that his division of the pieces into “The Social Record” and “The Literary Record” is artificial and serves to dissipate the very kind of energy that makes Cowley’s work so representative of the thirties. And just because Think Back on Us is both good and timely, I must object to its cost: $10 is an outrageous price for a collection of essays first published between 1931 and 1941. It might be advisable to remind the publishers that Malcolm Cowley wrote for people, not for college and university libraries.

The Glory of Poor Living

SHEPHERDS OF THE NIGHT. By Jorge Amado. Translated from the Portuguese by Harriet de Onis. Alfred A. Knopf. 365 pp. $5.95.

MARYSA N. GERASSI

Mrs. Gerassi teaches Latin American history at Newark State College.

In Shepherds of the Night, Jorge Amado brings to life the crapshooters, thieves and prostitutes of the streets of Bahia: Caporal Martim, the fair-haired boy of the brothels, a master at capoeira fighting, an artist at cards; Bullfinch, a “spieler” by profession, expert in talk of love, but perpetually deceived by his sweethearts, mistresses and fiancées; Carnation-in-his-Buttonhole, who cannot work because of his delicate health and who feeds his wife, seven children and his craving to gamble by stealing; Mother Tibéria, madam of the liveliest brothel in Bahia; Otília, the 16-year-old whore who plays with dolls after the customers leave; and old Jesuino Crazy

VACATION PLUS
If you can't go abroad,
let us bring the world to
you at
WORLD FELLOWSHIP
June 19-Sept. 5

Combine recreation and conferences
—Civil Rights, Affluence and Poverty,
Religion-Marxist dialog, Vietnam,
China, USSR, Africa, Middle East.
Reasonable rates. Relaxation and insight at our 300-acre forest-lake-mountain estate.

For full information address
WORLD FELLOWSHIP
Conway, New Hampshire 03818

The Nation SUBSCRIBERS' BOOK SERVICE

Offers the following at discount prices:

- | | Price |
|---|--------|
| <input type="checkbox"/> THE ACCIDENTAL PRESIDENT by Robert Sherrill (Grossman, $5.00) | $4.00 |
| <input type="checkbox"/> THE FREE WORLD COLOSSUS: A Critique of American Foreign Policy in the Cold War by David Horowitz (Hill and Wang, $6.95) | $5.55 |
| <input type="checkbox"/> FRIENDSHIP AND FRATRICIDE: An Analysis of Whittaker Chambers and Alger Hiss by Dr. Meyer A. Zeligs (Viking, $8.95) | $7.15 |
| <input type="checkbox"/> THE NAKED IMAGE: Observations on the Modern Theatre by Harold Clurman (Macmillan, $6.50) | $5.20 |
| <input type="checkbox"/> DE GAULLE: A Political Biography by Alexander Werth (Simon and Schuster, $7.50) | $6.00 |
| <input type="checkbox"/> THE PSYCHOLOGY OF POWER by Ronald Sampson (Pantheon, $4.95) | $3.96 |

Remittance accompanying orders should be made payable to THE NATION, 333 6th Ave., N.Y. 10014

☐ Payment enclosed ☐ Please bill me

Readers can avail themselves of our regular offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S. at the retail price post-free. When ordering, please give title, author and publisher, if possible.

Cock whose opinions on any matter are respected by all.

Amado weaves the lives of these people through three incidents: a wedding, a christening and a squatters' invasion, telling his stories in simple and spicy language, exactly as one of his characters would speak. We can almost see him in a tavern at dusk, wetting his dry lips with sips of rum, pouring out tales in a torrent of love for his characters. He makes no attempt to justify their values, their principles or their morality; he simply describes the way they live. Only in the third story, “The Invasion of Cat Wood or The Friends of the salutes

ONE MAN'S VIEW

Martin Luther King, Jr.

THE
NATION

"Through its journalistic integrity and its genuine liberalism, The Nation has carved for itself an imperishable niche in the annals of journalistic history in our nation. And I know those of us who are readers and subscribers of The Nation are deeply indebted to it for all that it has done to make the discussion of the vital issues of our day and our age reality. Certainly in these days of emotional tension, when the problems of the world are gigantic in extent and chaotic in detail, there is no greater need than for sober thinking, healthy debate, creative dissent and enlightened discussion."*

*Address, Los Angeles,
on February 25, 1967

FREE with each NEW subscription

The Politics of Escalation in Vietnam

by Franz Schurmann, Peter Dale Scott & Reginald Zelnik

"This book raises vital questions about our policy of escalation in relation to peace proposals."

Senator Vance Hartke, Indiana

"A most important and revealing history, and a clear demonstration of what is wrong with the strategy of escalation."

John Kenneth Galbraith

The NATION
333 6th Avenue
New York, N.Y. 10014

Herewith my order and payment for a NEW subscription to The Nation. Please send my FREE copy of THE POLITICS OF ESCALATION IN VIETNAM.

☐ 1 Year, $10 ☐ 2 Years, $18 ☐ 6 Mos., $6
(Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 per year extra)

NAME

address

city state zip no.

6-5-67

People," does Amado measure his Bahians against the government officials and politicians whose middle- and upper-class values he finds immoral.

The Shepherds of the Night are Bahia's poor, and Amado has given us a deeply moving and funny picture of life in the slums. Although he sees in them certain unique characteristics, his poor are very much like the poor of other cities and his "civilization of the Bahian people" is very close to Oscar Lewis' "culture of poverty." Bahians live in a closed world of violence and brutality, without medical facilities or education, where major events are those like the wedding of the free-wheeling Caporal Martim to Marialva, the whore from the backlands with the sweet, false smile and a mole on her shoulder. It is a world with its own laws, its own social standards and its own religion. Catholic saints are swallowed by powerful African gods who are also marvelously mobile: at the christening of Negro Massu's child, Ogun, the god of iron, manages to manifest himself at the proper moment at the Bahian church even though he has just been present "at long-drawn-out rites in Nigeria, and at an important celebration in Santiago de Cuba."

Amado's shepherds live mostly at night—the shadows protect them from the police. They talk, drink, satisfy their desire for mulattoes at Mother Tibéria's brothel and, possessed by their ancient gods, dance in voodoo celebrations. Those who do not sleep on the beach live in shacks or one-room flats. They hardly work—only the prostitutes hold regular jobs—and the men work whenever they need money for gambling, drinking or dancing at a candomblé. Though newcomers join them, Bahia's slum dwellers never leave their city except to escape the police—and they return as soon as it is safe.

For Caporal Martim, Bullfinch and their friends, life is the present, expressing itself in a passionate solidarity against the outside world made up of politicians, police, journalists and even sociologists, all using the poor in one way or another. Here the poor survive because they are "hard nuts to crack." They know there is no tomorrow, and no escape. As Jesuino Crazy Cock says: "A poor person does more than should be expected of him by just living, living in the face of such wretchedness, difficulties of every sort, dire poverty, sickness, the lack of help, living when there would seem to be reason only to die."

Amado's poor not only refuse to die; they also make an art of living.

THE NATION / June 5, 1967

Crossword Puzzle No. 1204

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS:

- 1 Money made, but not by a competitor of Pittsburgh Steel. (7, 6)
- 9 Act so peculiarly? Fit to be tied! (5)
- 10 The best artist or just the best in the class? (3-6)
- 11 Count to berate? (4, 3)
- 12 In the school of Sheridan? (7)
- 13 Losers might call it leaves. (5)
- 14 Splits in a way that could be either caused by stunting or accident. (4, 5)
- 16 An accomplice is a case to consider in a different light. (9)
- 18 Father of the Romans? (5)
- 19 Intelligence. (7)
- 21 Proving a degree by itself could at least provide food. (7)
- 22 A rough road with 13, possibly, used in time of trouble. (4, 5)
- 23 Tired out, but certainly not completely out. (3, 2)
- 24 They do along the track, but we haven't built any yet. (5, 8)

DOWN:

- 1 One of the great unwashed is heard to be given fifty cents by Forester. (4, 2 8)
- 2 Teaching bodies what we all hope to keep. (9)
- 3 Engaged in the writing game? (7)
- 4 and 20 The way some people make coffee tables right out in the open! (3-2-5)

5 An evident claim to being quiescent, but unmoved. (9)

- 6 Chosen people? (7)
- 7 Look to getting paired as the cattle did. (5)
- 8 March begins to improve with them, perhaps. (One is supposed to follow the order of their barks.) (5, 9)
- 14 If you have to change, change at Munster. (9)
- 15 A perplexing state of affairs! (9)
- 17 Can a stacked deck begin the game? (7)
- 18 Sounds like a masterpiece of decorative woodwork might serve in the late afternoon. (3, 4)
- 20 See 4 down
- 21 No credit to you if you so attend an official examination! (5)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1203

ACROSS: 1 and 6 Castles in Spain; 9 Madam; 10 Reluctant; 11 Saskatoon; 12 Adder; 15 Inanimate; 18 Distilled; 19 Taffy; 20 Waste; 22 Promising; 25 Trade name; 26 Apsis; 27 Reels; 28 Dragonfly. DOWN: 1 and 13 across Campstools; 2 Sideshows; 3 Lemma; 4 Sartorial; 5 Nylon; 6 Socialist; 7 Award; 8 Notoriety; 13 Tidewater; 14 Spineless; 16 Andromeda; 17 and 21 Affairs of state; 22 Plaid; 23 Imago; 24 Gassy.

PUBLICATIONS

THE IDLER. Lively, offbeat, liberal monthly. $1 brings four different sample back issues. Idler, 413B 6th St., N.E., Washington, D.C. 20002.

"SELECTED POEMS" of George Flynn (Villiers of London $2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound."—James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at 544-82 St., Brooklyn 9, N.Y.

THE BLUFF OF DEGODDING THE HUMANS by Bibi Beebi, 116 pp., price $3.00. Popular Non-Newtonian, etc., physics, astronomy, culturology, philosophy. The Inventist, P. O. Box 17039, Los Angeles, Calif. 90017.

WORLD DEMOCRACY by Bin Dir Woor, Self-Designated Symbolical World President. Unique. Entrancing. $2. Greenwich Book Publishers, 282 7th Avenue, N.Y.C. Bin Dir Woor, as the first Symbolical World President, calls on President Johnson to assemble a World Congress of the elected and other heads of all nations, to arbitrate the Viet Nam War, and all future wars.

MALVINA REYNOLDS PRODUCTIONS

At your bookshop:

Little Boxes and Other
Handmade Songs $2.45
The Muse of Parker Street 2.45
Tweedles and Foodies
(children's songs) 1.75

At your record shop:

Malvina Reynolds Sings the Truth
(Columbia 3614)

or write:

Schroder Music Co.
2027 Parker St., Berkeley, Calif. 94704

EDUCATIONAL

FIVE DAY BOARDING SCHOOL. A unique program for people who have not even considered a boarding school. Grades five through eight. THE THOREAU SCHOOL. An intimate, cooperative community, combining study with the tasks and joys of farm living. School bus brings your children home to NYC week-ends. Small classes, individual instruction. Now enrolling for September. Write: Rodman, RD 1, Wallkill, N.Y. 12589. Phone: 914-895-5523.

ART

ORIGINALS COST LESS THAN REPRODUCTIONS! Contemporary original signed etchings, lithographs, woodcuts, $3.50. Guarantee. Free brochure. GRAPHIC CIRCLE (NA), 68 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10011.

VACATION

ENJOY SPRING at LAKE LOUANNE, Westbrook, Conn. Over 200 acres on private lake. Excellent swimming, fishing-boating. Golf, summer theatres, Long Island Sound, excellent restaurants nearby. Rooms with private bath. Breakfast only. Tel.: 669-2465.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALGONQUIN 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

PERSONALS

SALASACAN WALL-HANGINGS—Tapestries, hand-woven by the Salasacan Indians of the Andes. Moderately priced (C.D. Project). Write: ANDEAN, Box 2918, Quito, Ecuador.

STUDENT at Music & Art High School needs summer employment. Willing and able. Box 601, c/o The Nation.

USE LAWFUL DIRECT ACTION to repeal all abortion laws LEGALIZE ABORTION, POB 24163, Los Angeles, Calif. 90024.

Advertising Rates

Classified: 74c a line (6 words) 3 line min.
Classified Display: $7.42 per inch (min.)
THE NATION, 333 Sixth Ave., N.Y. 10014
242-8400

Readers are invited to send for a free copy of Mr. Lewis' "ground rules." Address your request to Puzzle Department, The Nation, 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N. Y. 10014.

Individuals Against the Crime of Silence

A Declaration To Our Fellow Citizens Of The United States, To The Peoples Of The World, And To Future Generations:

1 We are appalled and angered by the conduct of our country in Vietnam.

2 In the name of liberty, we have unleashed the awesome arsenal of the greatest military power in the world upon a small agricultural nation, killing, burning and mutilating its people. In the name of peace, we are creating a desert. In the name of security, we are inviting world conflagration.

3 We, the signers of this declaration, believe this war to be immoral. We believe it to be illegal. We must oppose it.

4 At Nuremberg, after World War II, we tried, convicted and executed men for the crime of OBEYING their government, when that government demanded of them crimes against humanity. Millions more, who were not tried, were still guilty of THE CRIME OF SILENCE.

5 We have a commitment to the laws and principles we carefully forged in the AMERICAN CONSTITUTION, at the NUREMBERG TRIALS, and in the UNITED NATIONS CHARTER. And our own deep democratic traditions and our dedication to the ideal of human decency among men demand that we speak out.

We Therefore wish to declare our names to the office of the Secretary General of the United Nations, both as permanent witness to our opposition to the war in Vietnam and as a demonstration that the conscience of America is not dead.

On September 23, 1965, a Memorandum of Law was incorporated in the Congressional Record of the 89th Congress of the United States of America, in which eighty leading American attorneys, after careful analysis of our position and actions in the Vietnam War, came to the conclusion that we are violating the following accords: The Charter of the United Nations, The Geneva Accords of 1954, the United States Constitution.

To Protest--To Object--To Demand has long been an American tradition. The following are a few among the many who have signed this declaration to be on permanent record.

(FATHER) J. E. BAMBERGER, M.D., OCSO
DANIEL BERRIGAN, S.J.
REV. PHILLIP BERRIGAN, S.S.J.
RAY BRADBURY
ROBERT McAFEE BROWN
REV. WILLIAM H. DU BAY
W. H. FERRY
DR. JEROME D. FRANK
REV. STEPHEN H. FRITCHMAN
NAOMI L. GOLDSTEIN
DR. RALPH R. GREENSON
ABRAHAM J. HESCHEL

DR. STANLEY HOFFMAN
TERESSA B. HOFFMAN
CHARLES H. HUBBELL
SANDER L. JOHNSON, ESQ.
PROF. DONALD KALISH
EDWARD M. KEATING
PHIL KERBY
RING LARDNER, JR.
RABBI RICHARD N. LEVY
LOUIS LICHT, ESQ.
DR. ROBERT E. LITMAN
VICTOR LUDWIG

HERBERT D. MAGIDSON
SHIRLEY MAGIDSON
NORMAN MAILER
THOMAS MERTON
SIDNEY MEYER
EASON MONROE
PROF. HANS J. MORGENTHAU
HENRY E. NILES
DR. MARK F. ORFIRER
AVA HELEN PAULING
DR. LINUS PAULING
BISHOP JAMES A. PIKE

RICHARD M. POWELL
LORRY SHERMAN
PROF. ROBERT SIMMONS
DR. BENJAMIN SPOCK
FRED H. STEINMETZ, ESQ.
DR. NORMAN TABACHNICK
D. IAN THIERNANN
BRYNA IVENS UNTERMEYER
LOUIS UNTERMEYER
DR. MAURICE N. WALSH
HARVEY WHEELER
A. L. WIRIN, ESQ.

I wish to sign my name to the above Declaration to the United Nations and want to go on record with this Declaration of the Individuals Against the Crime of Silence.

signature _____

date _____

address _____

city _____

state _____

zone _____

Sign, complete and mail to P.O. Box 69960, Los Angeles, Calif. 90069. The office of the Individuals Against the Crime of Silence will then forward the information to the United Nations.

Should you also wish to support additional publications and communications, send $1 or more in cash or by check made payable to Individuals Against the Crime of Silence. This donation entitles you to the lapel emblem and the wallet-sized registration card. Money is needed to speed our progress.

The strength of our numbers will regularly and effectively be made known.

YOUR SIGNATURE DOES HAVE POWER — TEAR ON DOTTED LINE AND MAIL

THE HOUSE OF APARTHEID MARQ de VILLIERS

THE
NATION

JUNE 12, 1967 35 cents

BURLINGAME

JUN 12 1967

LIBRARY

Vietnam by Helicopter

THERE MUST HAVE BEEN EASIER WARS

DESMOND SMITH

Putting the Poor Out of Business

MARK LEVY

Abortion: Laws and Attitudes

PHIL KERBY

STEPHEN KOCH / GENET'S 'MIRACLE'

EUGENE D. GENOVESE / HISTORY AND THE NEGRO

MAIRE CRUISE O'BRIEN / EVASIONS OF PALOMARES

S-21-68R PL5-1449
BURLINGAME PUBLIC
LIBRARY

LETTERS

real war on poverty

New York City

DEAR SIR: Charles Schottland's article, "The Hungry Can't Wait" [The Nation, May 22], was badly needed and very timely. Professor Schottland's call for compulsory federal standards with respect to the levels of public assistance grants is far more meaningful for the poor, I believe, than Cloward's cries ["Birth of a Movement," The Nation, May 8] to break the system with more and more recipients. While I suppose the two approaches are not contradictory, it is my contention that the emphasis should be placed on increased public assistance grants; a renewed national campaign for mandatory federal standards should be initiated. This will be a genuine "war on poverty!"

Edward Perlmutter, Treasurer-Legislative Rep.
Social Service Employees Union

Pulitzer second guesses

Louisville, Ky.

DEAR SIR: I write as a member of the Advisory Board on the Pulitzer Prizes. I agree with your editorial of May 15 that Harrison Salisbury should have won this year's Pulitzer Prize for international reporting. As I have publicly stated, I spoke for and voted for his submission in the board meeting. . . . The editorial suggests that jurors should refuse to serve if their recommendations are subjected to "bureaucratic review." But a review of jury findings is the stated function of the Advisory Board, under the will of Joseph Pulitzer. He directed that "the selection of the persons who receive prizes or scholarships shall be under its (the board's) control so long as it continues in existence." If the function of the Advisory Board were simply to rubber-stamp the opinions of the majority of jurors in each category, what would be the point of its existence?

The Advisory Board is a continuing body, whose members serve for a maximum of twelve years. Jurors in the various categories are selected for one year only. I would not defend the wisdom of some majority votes in the Advisory Board, but I feel that critics of the Pulitzer Prizes should have a clear understanding of the procedures established by the founder.

Barry Bingham

the plan

St. Petersburg, Fla.

DEAR SIR: Sorry, but I cannot agree with your conclusion, "we have no policy," in your editorial "More Escalation—Why?" [May 8]. We do have a policy, that is, the Establishment has. It is a U.S. domination of the world. This is the meaning of the Truman Doctrine. And it was adopted almost immediately upon the death of Franklin D. Roosevelt.

I was told early in February, 1945, by a senior officer in the U.S. Air Force that the Japanese were seeking terms of surrender which would spare the Emperor's life; otherwise the terms of unconditional surrender were acceptable. This was confirmed a few days later by the U.S. admiral in command of our Pacific Submarine Fleet based on Fremantle, Australia.

The bombs dropped on Hiroshima and Nagasaki were not necessary. They were not the last bombs of World War II but the first bombs of World War III. This is all made quite clear in Gar Alperovitz's outstanding book: Atomic Diplomacy: Hiroshima and Potsdam, Simon & Schuster, 1965. . . . The present Washington Administration did not just stumble into war in Vietnam—it was deliberately planned.

Hugh B. Hester, Brig. Gen., U.S. Army (Ret.)

EDITORIALS

The Dual Crisis

The chances are that if the Johnson Administration had not got the United States so deeply involved in Southeast Asia the crisis in the Middle East would not have blown up to its present menacing proportions. The Arabs would have been more cautious; the Russians would have had more incentive to continue trying to relax tensions with the United States, and less to maneuver us into war on two fronts—an unpleasant prospect for even the foremost military power in the world, and the more so when the two battlegrounds are separated by some 85 degrees of longitude.

In diplomacy, the consequences of a single major blunder can be disastrous. We fought where there was no commitment forcing us to fight and where every consideration, both moral and material, should have dissuaded us from fighting. We are not necessarily committed to fight in the Middle East, but there we have both large material interests and an obligation to maintain the peace. But how are we to make good on that obligation when we are up to our ears in a wretched war on the other side of the world—one which, according to Gen. Lewis Walt, who was recalled recently, will involve us in ten or fifteen years of fighting and "pacification"? Modern times have not witnessed such a fantastic course of self-stultification on the part of a great power.

Had Mr. Johnson been honest, we would not be in our present unenviable position. In 1964, he told the electorate that we must be prudent in Asia and that the war in Vietnam should be fought by Asians, not by Americans. The votes had hardly been counted when he reversed himself. Perhaps events in the Middle East could not have been predicted, but with all the sources of information open to them it is a fair assumption that Mr. Johnson and Mr. Rusk might have considered the possibility that, sooner or later, an adventurer like Nasser would take advantage of our predicament. They must regret, now, that they did not seize one of the numerous opportunities of the past two years to extricate themselves from their self-built, self-baited trap in Vietnam.

The Russians may or may not have instigated the aggressive action by the Syrian wild men and Nasser, with which the other Arab states, willingly or otherwise, have gone along, but it is an excellent counter to our aggression in Vietnam. Diplomacy is a brutal business, and the Soviet variety is no more edifying than anyone else's. Reports in the Canadian press and elsewhere give further credence to the belief that the United States was planning to invade North Vietnam by land. We may still do so, but the Middle East situation makes such a venture look increasingly desperate. The Soviets are determined not to allow us to crush the North Vietnamese and the Vietcong. It looks as if they now have us in a position, whether managed by them or merely used for their ends (probably it was a combination of the two), to force us to back down either in Southeast Asia or in the Middle East. Face-saving ways may be found for doing this; if so, we shall be fortunate.

June 12, 1967

JUN
JAN 11

The one flicker of hope in the whole gloomy picture is that the Russians are no more omnipotent than we, and probably have no more desire than we to fight in the Middle East, much less to induce a nuclear confrontation. If we wish to restore some sort of stability in the Middle East, we must do business with the Russians. Joint Soviet-U.S. action is as imperative now as it was at the time of Suez eleven years ago. Working together, without amity but in pursuit of their different aims, America and Russia can settle matters East and West with only normal hazard and difficulty. Working against each other, they can easily lose control of the two situations which, whether we like it or not, are now interlinked.

For the moment the Soviets have the advantage, because we have been stupid, but the essence of retrieving one's blunders is to recognize them and to learn from events. Whether the President's trip to Canada had any connection with such a plan remains to be seen. As a member of the International Control Commission for Vietnam, and the originator or transmitter of several peace feelers, Canada could act as a broker between the participants in the present crisis. Perhaps this possibility attracts Mr. Johnson more now than it would have done a few weeks ago. If so, the dual crisis may provide a dual solution.

Sermon, Extempore

One of the troubles with TV news is its evanescence, which no amount of skill or dedication on the part of the broadcasting organization can cure. You see some scenes, you hear some words, and before you can make up your mind what they mean, they're gone. Often you can't quite remember what you heard or if you heard it correctly.

Such was our experience in listening to a C.B.S. broadcast on May 22, but in this instance the network courteously furnished us with a transcript of the part of Walter Cronkite's evening news program that had begun to haunt us. It featured an interview by John Hart, a C.B.S. newsman in South Vietnam, with two U.S. soldiers, SP/4 Melvin Schultz and Pfc. Clifford Rountree. They were two of eight Americans, out of thirty, who had survived an attack that overran their position. They played dead, and either the enemy were fooled or, possibly, they spared these Americans. Atrocities may be more common, but sometimes soldiers act as if they were human. At any rate, hear Pfc. Rountree:

There was one time I couldn't hold my breath any longer. I had to breathe a little bit, and they noticed this, so they pulled the back of my shirt up, put their hand on, on me right here and—to see if I was breath-

IN THIS ISSUE

EDITORIALS

738

ARTICLES

741 The House of Apartheid

Marq de Villiers

745 Vietnam by Helicopter:
There Must Have Been Easier Wars

Desmond Smith

750 Putting the Poor Out of Business

Mark Lévy

754 Abortion: Laws and Attitudes

Phil Kerby

756 Vietnam Summer:
Doorbells for Peace

Richard Blumenthal

757 The Amherst Community Referendum

Dorian J. Fliegel

BOOKS & THE ARTS

758 The Past Reconstructed Eugene D. Genovese

760 Generation at the Noonday (poem) John Knoepfle

761 A Romantic of the Wretched Life Stephen Koch

763 More Callous Than
We Know Maire Cruise O'Brien

764 A Usable Critic Charles T. Samuels

765 Art Max Kozloff

766 Looking Out at Night Over
Rooftops (poem) Paul Zweig

767 Crossword Puzzle Frank W. Lewis

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMSExecutive Editor
ROBERT HATCHCopy Editor
MARION HESSTheatre
HAROLD CLURMANArt
MAX KOZLOFFMusic
BENJAMIN BORETZScience
CARL DREHERAdvertising Manager
MARY SIMONAssociate Publisher
GIFFORD PHILLIPSAssociate Editor
PHIL KERBYLiterary Editor
HELEN YGLESIASPoetry Editor
MICHAEL GOLDMANWashington
ROBERT G. SHERRILLParis
ALEXANDER WERTHLondon
RAYMOND WILLIAMSBonn
C. AMERYCanberra
C. P. FITZGERALD

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July and August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1967 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel.: CH 2-8400. West Coast office: 1256 Westwood Boulevard, Los Angeles, Calif. 90024. Tel.: GR 4-2533. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give four weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE
NATION
Combined with FRONTIER

Volume 204

No. 24

ing—they held it there for the longest time. It seemed. Just before I couldn't hold it any longer, they took their hand away, and it wasn't too long after that before they left.

SP/4 SCHULTZ: I don't know why they didn't shoot us. We didn't have any blood on us or anything, the two of us. Just like God put his hand over both of us. . . .

HART: How do you feel about this war now?

ROUNTREE: Well, my one thought is that it isn't so much the, the laws or the agreements or anything that's going to come out of it, it's—it has to be a will inside, in the hearts of both sides. Ho Chi Minh and our side. We both want peace. I think this war is too costly. Both of us have a motive of living in peace, helping each other, as far as food, everything goes, and forget this war and everything, and as far as the whole world goes, if everybody's—we've got enough problems with disease and everything to keep us real busy for a long time, just helping each other, without shooting each other.

HART: You two don't speak with hate.

ROUNTREE: No, I can't say I hate anybody. I was doing my job and I guess they were doing theirs; that's what war is like. You'd be a fool to hate; you're only cheating yourself when you hate something.

After what they had been through, these two soldiers might have been excused for hating the enemy. They are not philosophers or psychologists, and it would be understandable if they hated the war protesters back home. Yet if there was need for a Memorial Day sermon, coming from those with the best right to deliver it, there it was on TV—on the air for a few seconds, and no doubt forgotten by Memorial Day.

The Colonels Endure

Immediately after the Greek coup it was being said that the colonels could not last. They represented no significant group in Greece, not even the conservatives and royalists, they lacked a dominant personality, they showed no gift for public relations, and they were not getting along among themselves. Their lease of power was deemed to be short, and speculation centered on how the rule of parliament would most readily be restored.

Now it is not so certain. The junta has held Greece for almost two months and time seems to be working in its favor. The countries of the West made their protests, and these were not heeded. The United States has threatened to withhold military aid, but the colonels have only to look at the history of Latin America over the past decade to quiet their alarm on that score. Washington always threatens to cut off arms when a military dictator seizes power, but then rumors proliferate of Communists in the hills and the flow of munitions begins again for the "Western-oriented" strong man.

The Greek colonels may not be very polished brigands but they are smart enough to keep their fists out of sight. No blood has run where it could be seen. It is true that the body of Jikiforos Mandelaras was washed up on the shore of Rhodes, but the corpse of this bold young lawyer does not speak. Reports assure us that the Acropolis still stands and that the squares of Athens look about as always—with perhaps a tank stationed here and there. In the taverns and coffee shops the men do not talk politics—and for Greeks such reticence is unusual—but that is about the only difference.

But that, of course, is the whole difference. The Greeks have lost their freedom, petty military men rule their lives, thousands of honest citizens are locked up in jail, promises to restore at least some vestiges of a constitution are obviously insincere, and the Parthenon stands not as a symbol but as a mockery.

The West doesn't like it, but the West is preoccupied elsewhere. Vietnam and the Gulf of Aqaba loom in our foreground; Greece threatens no one except the Greeks. The junta settles down like a great slug on the land.

But matters will not rest there. The Greeks will not tolerate the colonels indefinitely; they will indeed take to the hills and violence will ensue. Then Greece may become yet another massacre ground of the cold war. It is not necessary; we can apply such economic pressure on these upstarts that they will have to give way. This is no case for intervention; it is not even a case for parading gunboats in the Aegean. Our money, NATO money, made these colonels what they are today; without our money they will have to go back to barracks. A little firm attention is all that is required.

The Expeditors

Los Angeles

Better speak of a rope in the house of a man who has been hanged than mention the word "expediter" around City Hall today. Expeditors expedite, and in Los Angeles they have been expediting zoning changes so effectively that the city's master plan has been reduced to a bizarre model of frustration for professional planners.

It's not much different now than it has always been, except that the Los Angeles Times has been poking around the scattered ruins of the city's rapidly developing San Fernando Valley and has come to a late, but nevertheless true, realization that so many gasoline stations, hamburger drive-ins, and apartment house complexes couldn't have evolved by themselves. There had to be a creative force, some great design—and there is, the Times has been telling its 850,000 readers. That design was worked out by the City Council, the Planning Commission, the Board of Zoning Adjustment and the expeditors, who travel many paths, each according to his own vision, on the road to City Hall.

The expeditors have a mission: to frustrate the master plan, which is supposed to stop urban sprawl over the 450 square miles of the city of Los Angeles by bringing some sort of rational order to future development. The city agencies have a mission: to guard the master plan. But the guardians have been getting their roles confused, a human weakness explained by the close comradeship between real estate developers and members of official zoning boards. Four planning commissioners have business connections with developers. The mother of one commissioner got property re-zoned for a gasoline station. Land developers and expeditors have been appointed to agencies with jurisdiction over zoning. One planning commission member was known around City Hall before his appointment as "Mr. Standard Oil" for his success in acquiring sites for the company. Since his appointment several years ago, his old friends have obtained sixteen zone changes for service stations.

Among the complaints against Mayor Samuel W. Yorty, none can be found accusing him of hostility to business. Yorty believes that a landowner "has a constitutional right to develop his property as long as he doesn't hurt his neighbor." Yorty's appointees have been following that philosophy with an exuberance that would appall Adam Smith.

Big money rides on zoning changes. In the current trial of one developer on charges of grand theft and conspiracy to commit bribery, a witness said that land bought at $15,000 an acre was appraised at $37,000 an acre immediately after the City Council granted a zoning change. It is evident that fees paid to expeditors are not wasted.

Hope long deferred, and seldom fulfilled, is the occupational misfortune of the professionals of city planning, whose decisions are often upset by the arbitrary action of political appointees. Huber E. Smutz, Los Angeles zoning administrator, says: "The record shows that the Board [of Zoning Adjustment] has granted almost every appeal handled by certain well-known expeditors."

Former Mayor Fletcher Bowron, who routed the corrupt Shaw regime back in the late '30s, has come in from the cold to head a citizens committee of inquiry into the mess. Bowron is conservative, 80 years old, but still frisky, and a ruddy-cheeked, white-haired symbol of public rectitude. Occasionally, these old-fashioned types are useful. New Yorkers will remember Judge Seabury.

Commencement '67

The graduates of our great universities this June will miss the Godspeed of our leading statesmen. President Johnson, Mr. McNamara and Mr. Rusk will not don cap and gown and provide lifelong inspiration for fortunate student bodies. The blow, however, should not be too severe. All the graduates need do is go through the papers of a year ago and make a few notes. No one in the Johnson Administration, from the President down, has anything new to say.

A practical reason for the absence of these luminaries is that repetition of even old stuff has become dangerous for all concerned. "Leading Johnson Administration figures," Andrew J. Glass writes in The Washington Post, "and the Nation's more prominent universities intend to keep a wary distance between each other when the Class of '67 graduates. . . ." University spokesmen, understandably reluctant to have their names used, say that they have problems enough without the necessity of calling on the campus cops to protect the honored guests against catcalls, death masks, shouts of "Murderer!" and other manifestations of negative esteem. Of course, if Mr. Johnson wants one desperately enough he can get an invitation, and he may decide that not to speak at even one commencement would entail an intolerable loss of face. Mr. Rusk has been a little more popular, but his invitations have come from Southern schools, where, as a Southerner born and bred, he is not likely to be insulted. He has, in fact, spoken at a convocation at Hardin-Simmons University in Abilene, Tex., and he blessed the installation of a new president at Erskine College in Due West, S.C. His lecture at Cornell was an academic disaster and may have played ■ part in the current estrangement.

An exception to the tacit boycott is Vice President Humphrey, who is reported to have accumulated more than 100 invitations. None of the schools, however, is well known outside its neighborhood. Mr. Humphrey's sole scheduled appearance at a top-flight institution is at the U.S. Naval Academy. He will be safe there.

THE HOUSE OF APARTHEID

MARQ de VILLIERS

Mr. de Villiers is a South African journalist whose family has a distinguished journalistic tradition in the Union of South Africa.

Capetown

William Styron once wrote, in another context and of another color, of "a water-pale man at the bottom of a pool, soundlessly screaming." It could serve in South Africa too, for it is difficult—impossible—for the man who bears the brunt of apartheid (the black man) to make his voice heard.

And now our government is mouthing the words "separate freedoms" as its new euphemism, and has decided that the superego of apartheid needs a new image: separate but equal is the rallying cry.

There is little overt violence here. Since the massacre of Sharpeville there has been no Watts. All is quiet. And ordinary personal human relationships across the color line (where they are possible) are astonishingly tranquil.

But I recall a comment on civil rights I heard in New York: "They're selling us bargain-basement human rights at Fifth Avenue prices. Lines that have been selling for years elsewhere have just come on to the market here." In South Africa there is no market at all: that daemon apartheid has stripped the stores, prompted, it is claimed, by the ogre of communism.

The daily press, which largely ignores these things, still uses little items which show more clearly than most the way white skins feel about black. A few examples, culled from the papers of a recent week:

¶ The traffic cop who chained a colored street vendor to a lamppost for two hours because he was too busy directing rush-hour traffic to be able to take his prisoner to the station. The man was finally charged with vending without a permit.

¶ The well-known "liberal" who asked when he hired a new servant: "What do you think they eat?"

¶ The butchers in town who advertise, as special bargains, both dogs' meat and boys' meat—"boys" being African servants of whatever age.

Underneath, daily, hourly, despite the vast material improvement our government has given "them," murder hurts; murder in James Baldwin's sense, for men (and children too) must suffer insults, hurt, shame, degradation—and they dare not do anything but smile.

These things are not part of apartheid's theoretical scheme—they are even frowned on now as negating the government's determination to give, through propaganda, a "correct" impression of the country; yet they are the soil in which human relationships must germinate. They are the Id of the Ego called Separate Development—apartheid. And that is part of our special blindness: that we whites are already so divorced from contact with other colors who share our country that we can see only apartheid's superego, where it is philosophy and dialectic, and is called (and believed to be) separate freedoms. While the Africans who suffer from it feel only the Id, where apartheid is baasskap (domination) still. It is a society as schizophrenic as Verwoerd's assassin, Dimitrio Tsafendas: white South Africa feels itself as normal as a parliamentary messenger; black South Africa feels the snake that lived in the belly of the assassin to torment him.

The House of Apartheid has three foundations: the Group Areas Act, which spells out where people must live and work and make love; the Influx Control regulations, which enforce the purification of those areas declared white; and the Population Registration Act, which divides people into racial types, forbids contact, and allows for the settling of "doubtful" cases by "inspection and environmental investigation."

A "group area" is a place (which could be anything from a public toilet to a county) set apart for the exclusive use of any one race. To make it work, of course, people had to be rigidly classified into racial types. So far we have only four (white, Bantu, colored and Asiatic) but legislation has already been promised to divide the colored group into seven subsections.

The Race Classification Appeal Board was given the hideous duty of deciding contested cases. As its chairman, Magistrate A.E. Burger, said at the start of a typical case:

If, according to the Act, the board finds that the persons concerned are obviously white in appearance, then all it will still have to do will be to further satisfy itself that they are not generally accepted as colored persons.

The board will call upon the two parties to come up to the table and will then satisfy itself as to the appearance of the parties. Then the board will adjourn to consider the matter, and it will then reassemble to announce its findings.

If the board, however, finds that they are not obviously white in appearance, then, provided they are not obviously nonwhite persons, the board will have to investigate the matter in order to satisfy itself that they are persons who are generally accepted as white.

This further examination involves the meticulous probing of their lives, their associations, the shadings of their children, the boy friends of their daughters, the opinions of their friends, as if they had committed some ghastly and secret crime.

Because appearance and associations are the criteria; and because a change in classification means a revolution in a way of life, heartbreaking scenes have become commonplace.

An example was little Sandra Laing, 11-year-old daughter of a white couple in the Transvaal. The interior minister, acting after complaints, classified her as colored. So the bewildered child was fetched from the classroom by a policeman and the head teacher, and escorted home. And this simply because a race-crazed government is determined to purify the (white) nation and, in the words of Capetown's deputy mayor, "because I do not want this country to go black." The fact that three-quarters of it is already black seems not to have registered.

But white people do not appear to feel the savagery simmering below the farce. Listen to the cross-examination of the employer of a man applying for reclassification as white:

Q. Have you any separate toilet facilities at your management?

A. Yes, separate for Europeans (whites) and non-Europeans.

Q. Now which of these are being used by Mr. X?

A. He uses the European one.

Q. Did you see him there or did he tell you?

A. No I have seen him there.

Q. You actually saw him?

A. I have seen him going in and coming out.

Q. Didn't any of the other white people employed at your firm as far as you know pass any remarks as to his appearance?

A. Not a thing.

Q. They are quite prepared to allow this man to enter the same toilet?

A. Yes.

Or, from the same case, the cross-examination of a white woman friend of the petitioner and his family:

Q. Did [your children] play with Mrs. X's daughter?

A. Yes.

Q. I am talking of the time when she was still at school. Did she play with them?

A. She did play with them.

Q. You are classified as white, didn't your children ever tell you that Mr. and Mrs. X's daughter was attending a colored school?

A. They are too young to know anything like that.

Q. Your children never made any enquiries about that?

A. My eldest daughter is only five years old.

Once you have identified your colored people, the thing to do is move them out of the white cities into new and barren barracks-like townships, near enough so that their labor can still be useful. This happened, for instance, to Christine and Seyster Janey, who would today be living out their lives in contented obscurity were it not for two things: first, an Act of God, the color of their skins and, second, an Act of Parliament, group areas.

Mrs. Janey's family had lived in a small cottage nestling under Table Mountain in the Capetown suburb of Newlands for more than 150 years. Her mother was born in it and so was she. She continued to live in it after her marriage to Seyster more than forty-seven years ago. Four years ago she was 70, he 69. He worked as an elevator operator, earning $20 a week. They had many friends, felt safe and happy in a large circle of relatives. The prospect of old age held no fears.

Says Mrs. Janey, sadly: "We had a lovely garden too, gentleman, full of flowers and shrubs in the front and back: japonicas, hydrangeas, vines, loquats, guavas, peaches, roses, all planted by ourselves."

But suddenly, four years ago, the Janey's were moved to Bonteheuwel, a new town, a colored town, a group area, a barren spawning of the mother city, 10 miles out of town. And now that those four years have gone they are just waiting, waiting to die. Their health has been broken by the move and by the terror of the skollies (thugs) that hold the overcrowded township in a bully's grip. They no longer go out of doors; nothing will ever grow in the sand that drifts around their house. Their happy life is finished before its time; because, they were told, they were colored.

Bonteheuwel holds 45,000 people where seven years ago it held none. Multiply Mrs. Janey by 45,000 heartbreaks and you have Bonteheuwel. Multiply Bonteheuwel by Lavis, Langa, Guguletu, Nyanga, and you have a further measure. Multiply these "townships" of Capetown by those of other cities, other provinces, and there you have one measure of the Group Areas Act, one of the instruments of Separate Freedoms.

For the Africans it is even worse; not for them dusty ghettos permitted to the colored on the fringes of the cities, not any more. They must go back "home."

Part of the principle of Influx Control (it is a euphemism for the refusal to allow black Africans into the so-called white cities) is a procedure called "endorsing out," which means forcibly shipping back to the reserves many who are already in those cities. Occasionally more revealing official terminology is used, like the expression by Mr. Blaar Coetzee, deputy minister of Bantu development and administration, who talked of the government's determination to effect the gesuiwering (purification) of the white areas.

This purification has never worked before, probably because the government has never really thought through to a final solution. Black ghettos near white cities keep growing. Industry, after all, needs labor.

But in December, 1966, Mr. Coetzee warned industrialists that they would, starting now, have to reduce their African labor force by 5 per cent a year. And in a letter blocking the establishment of a new industrial township in Capetown, Mr. Coetzee's department said:

The application is opposed by this department because it would cause the influx of a large number of Bantu into the western Cape should the industrialists insist on Bantu labor and allege that colored labor is not available. Such a position would tend to create a state of affairs in conflict with official policy.

It is impossible for a nonofficial observer to find out how many Africans are being "endorsed out." Only in the case of a friend, or an employee of a friend (when the name is known), is it possible to trace. Many people don't bother. There are plenty of servants.

Then there are the people who are banished rather than just sent, to their "homelands"; their names appear on the public record. There are hundreds of them, banned under that South African catchall, the Suppression of Communism Act, for suspected subversive activities and confined to a magisterial district in the segregated reserves.

One unfortunate from Capetown, a garage mechanic in the city for twenty-two years, was banished, after serving his prison sentence, to a rural area in the Transkei, some 30 miles from the nearest garage. He has no job and no money—not even those who would like to help him know how he keeps himself and his family alive. Newspapers are forbidden to publicize his case: banned people are unpeople and so unquotable. He must report to the nearest police station—30 miles away—once a month. Having no money for the bus, he walks.

It is also possible, though difficult, to trace the people who appear in the many Bantu criminal courts around the country. They are the ones who have committed the criminal offenses of being without jobs, or homes, or proper papers, or who have failed to register themselves with the authorities. They are fined or jailed before being sent "home."

A diary of one morning session at Bantu Criminal Court in the Capetown suburb of Observatory gives some idea of how the system actually works: (Note: those found guilty in this court have not only to pay their fines or go to jail but are almost invariably ejected from the cities.)

10.00 A.M.: The witnesses and some of the accused, who have been munching oranges on the lawns outside, file into the court. The prosecutor and interpreter stroll in shortly. Then a couple of policemen, hitting each other with rulers. At 10.15 the court is still.

10.30 A.M.: The magistrate, a dumpy man with sharp blue eyes, enters. The court shuffles to its feet, subsides.

10.42 A.M.: The eleventh case is called. In the first ten there were no witnesses, no testimony. One minute and a few seconds each. The eleventh case is a woman from the Transkei reserve, who was picked up by the police. She had her pass ("reference book"), but had failed to register with the authorities within the required seventy-two hours. Africans must register. Influx control. We'll never get them out of the cities otherwise. Why did she come to Capetown? "To seek my man," she says. The magistrate sighs. Five rand (about $7) or fifteen days. Next case please.

10.45 A.M.: It goes on. The magistrate concedes where he can, but the law is specific: no pass, an offense; no registration, an offense; no job, an offense; no home, an offense. Mabel Maselane is called. Her case is more difficult since she wants her mother to appear as a witness. She had a defense lawyer (the only accused who did) but fell out with him over his fees. He withdrew.

Mabel lived with her husband in Capetown from May, 1956, to February, 1960. Between that date and September, 1966, there is no record of her—a thing for concern, this. Now she says her husband is living with another woman and wants to get her back to the Transkei. That, she explains, is why she's in court; she is not allowed to live in Capetown alone. There are a few confused moments: the court cannot understand why her husband, who lives in an area controlled by the Cape Province, is allowed to work in the Capetown municipal area. Surely this is wrong? An official explains that this is a temporary "gentleman's agreement" between the two bodies which will soon be put right.

Mabel's case is adjourned when she insists she wants her mother to testify. "All right, but you'd better have a medical certificate if she's not here," says the prosecutor.

11.05 A.M.: More of the same follows; all deal with illegal entry into white cities, or failing to register within seventy-two hours. Ten rand or thirty days is the standard sentence; a well-paid African gets about 30 rand a month.

11.30 A.M.: Thirty-two cases in the first hour. The prosecutor is beginning to mumble the charges; it doesn't matter since the interpreter knows the wording by rote. The interpreter, a large man with handsome teeth, has a fluent and resonant voice. No trouble hearing him. A young man is called, his hands shaking in nervousness.

He admits he has never had a pass, though he was born in the city and can thus stay. "Ten rand or thirty days," says the magistrate. "It's even easier to have document if you live here. Next case."

11.53 A.M.: A man from the ghetto called Lang (where Capetown Africans must live) briefly disturbs the even flow. In recognition of the break in pattern the crowd shuffles and shifts on the hard wooden benches. A baby squalls and the woman who was suckling it gets up hastily and leaves court. The man is accused of hospitality he put a friend up for the night without permission. He pleads guilty and is fined 4 rand or fifteen days. His case took exactly twenty-seven seconds.

11.53.27 A.M.: The pattern resumes and the court swings back into rhythm: one man chose to pay his fine at the bench, and solemnly tipped coins from a large wallet in front of the clerk. He was still busy when the next case finished and the third accused walked toward the dock. The first and third walked out together.

11.55 A.M.: A man from the town of Mossel Bay said he came to Capetown with his baas (master). "But he didn't tell me I needed a book," he said. "But the law has to tell you, not your baas," said the prosecutor with some asperity. This, after all, was the forty-ninth case of the morning.

11.57 A.M.: Still the same charges, still people being sent back "home." Only minor offenses are dealt with in this court. "Seldom anything exciting happens here," a large gravel-voiced policeman has explained before the court opened. "Only things on a low level of importance."

12.02 P.M.: One and a half hours and fifty-two cases have passed. More than forty of them sent from the city to the city that was their home. A man is called who clutched his right ear. His baas brought him to Capetown to doctor, dropped him and went off with his pass, he explains. "Aaaagh, don't come here making up stories," exclaims the prosecutor. "Ten rand or thirty days," says the magistrate.

12.36 P.M.: The pile of green and pink dockets in the "in" basket is growing smaller now. One man produces a sheaf of papers which he says represents his authority for working in Capetown. The prosecutor ignores them. "The reference book is the authority and it says nothing about allowing you to work here," he says. He pushes the papers aside without looking at them. "Ten rand or thirty days," says the magistrate. The man picks up his useless papers and empty pass and leaves the court.

12.44 P.M.: A lad appears in the dock. This is the last case. He too was arrested without papers; but he explains he was born in 1952 (Africans under 16 are not obliged to carry passes). At the prosecutor's urging, the interpreter examines the boy's teeth, pushing his chin up for a good look. He shakes his head at the prosecutor, who shrugs at the magistrate. The boy is led away without charge. No doubt he must try to explain to his parents where he has been and why he was in jail overnight.

12.46 P.M.: Eighty-four cases have gone and the court adjourns for lunch. It's raining outside and on the playing field opposite the court a man is scurrying for cover. The wind is getting up too. Not a good day. But not a bad day's work; the city is just a little purer now.

There Must Have Been Easier Wars

DESMOND SMITH

Mr. Smith, a frequent contributor to The Nation, has recently returned from a stay of two and a half months in Vietnam. It was his second trip there, on assignment from an American television network.

We took off from Tan Son Nhut, Saigon's airport, at midday, in a burning haze. We flew a whistle-stop course, landing at Pleiku, Qui Nhon and finally at An Khe, headquarters of the First Air Cavalry Division. The flight takes most of the afternoon, though the actual distance is only a few hundred miles. The plane, a C-130, as bare inside as a skeleton, carries cargo as well as passengers. A young sergeant, wearing a purple scarf, sat across from us, jammed between two South Vietnamese soldiers who were loaded down with PX supplies. The sergeant was carrying a primitive wooden crossbow. I asked him whether the weapon was a VC souvenir.

"Not exactly."

"How's that again?"

"Well I guess they might have used them at one time. But these days they use Chicom grenades and Russian rockets, and they sell the crossbows in Pleiku."

After Qui Nhon the countryside becomes more hilly. We are in the Central Highlands; rivers shining like silver spread into the greenest of valleys. The airstrip at An Khe, as we looked down, was bulldozed out of the top of a hill. Banking steeply, the C-130 sideslipped onto the metal runway, jouncing to a bone-rattling stop without shutting down power. Out of a blinding cloud of red dust came Major Jones, the First Cav's PIO (public information officer). "Welcome to the war!" he yelled.

As we drive along a service road littered with the carcasses of wrecked helicopters, Adam Raphael of C.B.S. nudges my elbow and points to a set of Burma Shave style signs along the curve of the dirt road:

Charlie used to be here and mean til he met the First Airmobile Team

The First Cav love their war. Basically it is Indians and Cavalry spread over an AO (area of operations) of some 3,000 square kilometers (called "clicks" by the briefing officer). The big survey map is covered with clear plastic and brilliantly marked in colored crayons. The map has been Americanized. "The Crotch" represents a group of hills at the northern point of the First Cav's AO; "The Santa Fe Trail" represents a line along the First Cav's southernmost boundary. In between on the battle map are such names as the Oregon Trail, the Fish-Hook, and a whole rash of red-crayoned LZs (landing zones)—Two Bits, English, Pony, Pistol, Hump, Grief, Turkey, Santana, Soupy. And then there is the Bong-Son plain where we are at present located. According to the briefing, elements of a North Vietnamese regiment are all around us. In addition, this is the stamping ground of the Second VC Regiment, a main-force outfit so hard to locate that it has been nicknamed the "Ghost Regiment" by the First Cav. The logistics needed to keep the First Cav operational are simply staggering. Every few minutes Caribous and C-130s land with supplies from Cam Ranh Bay and Saigon. Yet even this air armada isn't enough; a 100-truck convoy from Qui Nhon daily rides up Route 19 under heavy guard.

Things must have been easier in other wars. I leave a briefing in Vietnam wondering aloud: "Are we surrounding the enemy or is the enemy surrounding us?"

From a briefing on how the First Cav "softened up" the Bong-Son plain preparatory to moving in:

"Three hundred and sixty-five air strikes."

"Yes."

"More than thirty ARCLIGHTS—that's code for B-52 strikes."

"Yes."

"And that was the start. Then we lobbed in better than a million shells."

"Yes."

"In between the air strikes we dumped more than a million psywar leaflets on the plain."

"Yes."

"Well, do you correspondents have any questions?"

"Well, only one. According to your handout, all you have captured so far in OPERATION PERSHING is thirty hand grenades, four rounds of large caliber ammunition, 3 tons of rice and 3 tons of salt."

"Sir?"

"It appears that you've leveled virtually every village and hamlet, killed or driven more than 50,000 peasants off the land with your firepower. My question is, how do you intend to go about winning the hearts and minds of these people?"

"I'm afraid you'll have to take that up with the S.S. sir, but jeeze, it's a real good question."

Imagine miles upon miles of emerald-green rice fields splattered with bomb craters; all the untended rice shoots growing up to the edges of craters. That was my first glimpse of the Bong-Son plain. From where we were standing, on LZ Santana, hills from 300 to 800 feet high surrounded us on every side. As far as the eye could see forward columns of blue smoke rose in the air. A deeply warm and human chaplain, Father Theodore Dowd, who hailed from Worcester, Mass., had invited us to spend a week traveling with him from company to company on the Bong-Son plain. So early next morning we had piled all our camera gear into the big Huey helicopter. While we made ourselves as comfortable as possible on the canvas seats—I noticed nobody fastened seat belts—the pilots tuned up their radios for a communications check. On either side of the open doors, the gunners fed belts of copper-sheathed bullets into their guns. There are two ways the copters fly over the Bong-Son plain, very high or very low. We flew low, skimming above the palm groves, dipping down to charge like an elephant across the watery-green rice paddies, and soaring up just yards short of the tree line. The pilot was having trouble locating Captain Bernstein's beleaguered company—it had been hit badly the night before. Now as we skimmed over a burned-out village the pilot asked Bernstein to mark his position with smoke. Almost at once we saw the purple smoke billowing across the white sand in a hollow at the edge of the village. When we landed, the down draft from the rotors spewed up a 90-mile-an-hour sandstorm that completely enveloped the crouching GIs. Most of them had been without sleep for two nights and their faces were drawn and tired. The squad of soldiers seemed delighted to have a visit from the chaplain. In part, probably, this was because it meant that for the next hour they would get a break from the war; but the fact that Father Dowd was an outsider who obviously cared about them also had something to do with his welcome. Soon they had gathered into a semicircle, heads down in a prayer for the souls of those recently departed. Whatever one thought about this war, it was impossible not to feel an enormous sadness and sympathy for these young soldiers. It was almost inevitable that some of them were moving their lips in prayer for the last time.

During Mass patrols were out, and my thoughts were interrupted by Captain Bernstein who had given orders that a bunch of women walking along the tree line were to be brought in. "At the double," he yelled, adding as he walked over to the radio man on the slope, "We're not going to take any more casualties than we have to."

Now the women were brought over to where Bernstein was sitting.

"Search their baskets!"

The GIs opened up the baskets. In one of them was a tiny child who immediately began bawling his head off.

"Get Sergeant Han!"

Han, the Vietnamese irregular who traveled with the company, came running. For the next couple of hours the Captain interrogated each of the women. How many guerrillas does she have in her village? How long has she been a member of the Liberation Front? Every person that lives in this valley has worked willingly, or under compulsion, for the VC; what does she do for the VC? Where was her husband? All their husbands, the women said, had gone to live on Route 1, away from the bombing and the Americans. None of them were members of the Liberation Front. Now Bernstein was sure the women were lying, that they were certain to be wives of local VC. He told the Sergeant to separate the women from one another and, holding the I.D. card of the first woman, he radioed her name to base. "X-Ray, Uniform, Alpha, November . . . break . . . Hotel, Alpha, November, Hotel, break . . . 37 years old . . . village Tan Qhon."

After a ten-minute wait, the answer came back: the woman's husband was positively identified as a member of the Second VC Regiment. "A hard-hat," said Bernstein, laconically. Hard-hat is GI slang for hard-core regular guerrillas. I asked what would happen to her.

"I'm going to call in a chopper, and send her back to LZ English," Bernstein said. "She's VC, and she's got information. We'll get it out of her somehow."

Now the woman, and her little bundle of child, were separated from the main group by Sergeant Han and led to the edge of the clearing. In an hour or so she would be taken away. Meanwhile she would sit in the punishing sun with a tag on her—"VCS": VC suspect.

"Don't film," said the young lieutenant, with a smile. When we joined this particular company it was searching out a shattered hamlet near the village of Tan-An. It was almost time for a copter to arrive with hot food. A few GIs were cutting down coconuts and sipping the milk. The rest of the company was patrolling the hamlet perimeter. So we sat and watched the activity. The company had bivouacked in a coconut grove at the edge of the hamlet. The sandy ground was strewn with discarded C-ration packs, many of them unopened. Near the radio man sat the company commander, a captain. He was of medium build, with a lined face that reminded you of Humphrey Bogart in Casablanca; his dark eyes were set deep in their sockets and he had two days of stubble on his chin.

The lieutenant had been referring to the scene before us: A trooper was spraying insect repellent on a human ear. There was no blood. It was quite small and brown and hairless.

"No sir," I said, "we won't film that."

But I was curious to know more about this ear fetish. I had often heard that though it was forbidden, the practice of clipping ears was widespread. A PIO back at An Khe had told us that the going rate for a VC ear among souvenir hunters was $30. But that was just talk; this was the real thing. So I walked out of the coconut grove and across the paddy dike. There I saw my first atrocity. His head slumped against the bank, a look of agony frozen beneath the shock of black hair. Both ears had been severed at the root so all that remained were two bloody circles about the size of 50c pieces. Someone had thrown a Pepsi-Cola can on the bank of the paddy and the red, white and blue container had come to rest on the boy's shoulder. He didn't look to have been more than 15. An impulse made me throw the can away. I remember thinking that this was the first time I'd ever seen the face of the enemy, and it was just a kid. Winning hearts and minds? I almost threw up at the thought.

The main characteristics of unit life on the Bong-Son plain are death and dust. In the course of a typical day a company will be visited a dozen times by helicopters; you see them bringing the mail, ammunition, hot food, replacements; you see them taking away WIAs (wounded in action) and the awful black body bags with the KIAs (killed in action). But nothing really prepares the visitor for the dust. It is thick and red and choking. As the copter lands or takes off, great billowing clouds of the stuff leave you gasping for breath. Each soldier, the majority are in their teens, will spend an average of 100 days in the field.

On a tree at LZ Steel Helmet fluttered a flimsy piece of paper:

AMERICAN OFFICERS, NCO, SOLDIERS

Number US 501883508 my name is Luis Antonio Ortiz private E 3, Co D. Battalion 229, 1st Canbry [sic] Division. I was captured by Liberation Army December 27, 1966, in Nhan Tinh camps. I was good treated, I eat good food, drink mil [sic] I smoke cigarettes, I sleep good. Liberation Army explains for me lenient and humanitarian policy of National Front for Liberation. December 31, 1966.

Luis Antonio Ortiz

In the village of Tan-An I found this:

WHAT'S IN IT FOR YOU G.I.?

MacNamara says Americans will have to accept casualties. And that means you, G.I.

You won't find him sweating in the jungle or going home in a coffin.

There aren't yet any bombs planted in the Pentagon.

Like there will be for you in your barracks, your base, or the local bar.

SO WHAT'S IN IT FOR YOU?

Combat pay and a Purple Heart if you're one of the lucky ones.

AND WHAT ABOUT THE OTHERS?

The Marines who don't come out of the jungle.

The pilots who don't make it back from their missions.

The guys who get hit in the Saigon, Danang, Chulai airports, etc.

Their combat pay doesn't do them much good.

When they go home in a box.

Better think it over, soldier.

There's not much in it for you.

Who is better at this game is a matter of opinion, but my own view is that the Liberation Front's psychological warfare is not nearly as good as its internal propaganda. Mind you, one wonders also about the American psywar effort. More than 45 million leaflets, I was told, were dropped over South Vietnam last year. They are made from a special paper that has a slow rate of descent. One aspect of psywar is the "Chieu Hoi" or Open Arms program which promises amnesty to every defector. The cost of these drops has so far averaged $1,000 for every Chieu Hoi. Yet compared with the calculated cost of $370,000 to kill a VC, this might be considered a bargain in the absurd mathematics of this bizarre conflict. A typical American leaflet shows a picture of a smiling peasant with the message:

WHY IS PHAN NHO SO HAPPY?

On the reverse side is the answer:

BECAUSE GREAT NEW PROGRESS IS COMING TO VIETNAM

Interestingly enough, there is no reference to South Vietnam in this message. The leaflet continues on a decided Madison Avenue note: "You too can share the exciting progress that is taking place in rural Vietnam and that has brought happiness and security to Phan Nho and his neighbors. Return now to the side of the GVN and join in the great work of transforming Vietnam."

I picked up that leaflet in the still-smoldering ruins of Hy-Van, where not a house or even a tree was standing.

The copter makes its way along the emerald-green plain, soaring quickly to hills splattered with bomb craters. We have to get out of the valley before dusk. "H&I" fire—harassment and interdiction in military jargon—is about to begin. The idea is to make it tough on Charlie during the long night ahead. Presently we come to LZ Two Bits. The copter skims low over the palm trees and lands. This is a forward base camp, big enough to take nearly 100 helicopters, and all around it, high and steep, rise the green hills. From a mess tent with open flaps we look out across this lovely valley. A smoky haze of evening fills up the valley and the sun, blood orange, seems to set the hills on fire; then, suddenly, it is dusk. There is ham steak, beans, caramel custard pudding for dinner. Against the purple hills flash the tracers of the camp's twin-eighties . . . boom, flash . . . we can see the bullets hit the hills with orange spurts.

"Mail going out," says a First Cav captain, walking back to his tent with an armful of free cigars and toothpaste from the Red Cross cartons next to the coffee urn. Don North, an A.B.C. correspondent, listens with me to some GIs talking together. "Hell," says a 19-year-old, talking about the war, "what burns me up is this craze for body counts. Like the last operation we were on. The Captain says, 'I'm calling for volunteers to go out and count bodies; I want two men.' No one stepped forward. He must have asked three or four times. Then he told us he would go by himself. About that time a guy called Walker volunteers. Then Walker's buddy, Jackson—a kid with thirty-six days to go—steps out of line. They get up there, then the PAVN [People's Army of Vietnam] open up with everything they've got. We ended up the day with two more KIAs. I noticed that the Captain cried during the memorial service. You see these captains are bucking for major, and man, they've got to get those body counts. The thing is, Charlie won't ever give up those bodies."

Most GIs I spoke to had, and have, a very high regard for the Vietcong, especially the local guerrillas. "I've seen eight air strikes and nape called in on a village and, would you believe, old Charlie had the goddamnedest nerve to attack us that night!"

Says another soldier: "Down in the Delta, I've seen Charlie make 60 mm. mortars out of the axles of an old car. The VC have guts. I don't care about the PAVN, but you've got to take your hat off to Charlie."

"We sure lend them a big hand sometimes," a fourth GI says. "I mean I recall one nutty guy we had in our company. He was always playing the John Wayne scene. So this day we got pinned down in a rice paddy. We just had to get into the village before dark. We called the gunships in. Then we finally made the tree line. Well, as soon as we get into the village this nut races up to the 'hooch' that was giving us all the trouble. He takes a grenade, pulls the pin, and throws it through the window. Then he flattens himself against the wall! That was it—he hung it up right there, completely signed out. The wall blew out and you could have put what was left of him in a steel helmet. It wasn't funny, yet it sure looked funny. I mean how crazy can you get? That's the thing about Nam, we all play the game."

The enemy lives in a land few Americans have ever heard of called Nam-Bo—South Vietnam. From General Westmoreland down to Pfc. Jones, the Americans call him Victor Charlie, shorthand for Vietnamese Communist. Yet the term would puzzle most of them. When captured, they generally declare themselves to be members of the Dan Quan Du Kich, literally Guerrilla Popular Army. By far the greatest number of them are to be found at the hamlet level, where they operate in small bands, seldom more than twelve, usually in threes and sixes. Not surprisingly, the local population does not consider them to be soldiers. In the hamlet's eyes the typical du kich is a civilian and an insider. In the "sweep-and-destroy" operations currently being conducted by the First Cav around the Bong-Son plain, it is the Dan Quan Du Kich who form the persistent enemy. Booby traps, punji sticks, sniping, local reconnoitering, night attacks, are their main duties. There are two more plateaus in the Liberation Army: the Regionals (Dai doi doc lap) and Main Force (Quan Doi Chu Luc) or "hard-hats," so-called because of their fiberboard helmets. No member of the Liberation Army wears uniform or any distinguishing mark of rank.

One thing remarkable about the Liberation Army's logistics is that every unit is self-contained. By contrast with the U.S. Army's prodigious "tail" of support services, the motto of the Main Force units is Tu Luc Canh Sinh—"We Support Ourselves." When a guerrilla unit needs supplies, they don't requisition them; they plan an attack on an enemy camp. ARVN units are especially vulnerable to this kind of attack. When the guerrillas need food they usually work for it. In fact most units have a double responsibility—for military action and for food production. What interested me about the Liberation Army was an American official's comment that "the typical Main Force unit or regional unit spends less than two days a month in combat. The rest of the month is spent in training, food production and agit-prop work." It is this "other war"—theirs, not ours, that holds the real clue to what is happening in Vietnam. For in moving into Vietnam, the United States Army is taking on both a social revolution and a social structure that are remote from the world described in training camp.

A typical Vietnamese village represents a collective work group and a self-sufficient economic unit. It is composed of the following: a village protection society; a village guild made up of carpenters, blacksmiths and other craftsmen; the elderly women's Buddhist association; the mutual-aid society, chiefly organized as a burial society. Yet all these associations are only the superstructure. The bedrock is the household. The nature of a Vietnamese village is such that normally a stranger cannot go anywhere—in the rice fields, to the mud and thatch homes, Buddhist shrine, or even the local cockfight—without noticing that almost everything seems to be done on the family scale. A youthful Vietnamese told me: "In our country it is the nha—the household—not the individual that is counted in the census." The basic point is that after several lifetimes of subjugation by France, the Vietnamese are not about to give up their hamlet-level independence to another foreign invader.

To a certain extent the Americans in Saigon have always been divided on this issue. Roughly speaking, the civilians who managed the pacification program were pro-peasant, convinced, in the awful jargon of pacification, that "winning hearts and minds" was more important than destroying them. The military on the other hand remember—endlessly, I'm afraid—Mao's analogy of the guerrilla living among the people as a fish in water. They have ferociously gone about removing, first the water, then the people. The atmosphere in military circles in Saigon was joyful last month: with the reassignment of Deputy Ambassador Porter, the civilian-run pacification program was dead. Officers about to take over the program gave broad hints about the new "get-tough" line. "They don't love us, but their attitude is improving." With similar emphasis a tough prison officer in Alcatraz might so describe his charges.

So the war goes on. Like a buzzard, the olive-green helicopter banked and wheeled over the burned-out village. Abruptly, the black-gloved pilot swung the copter into position for its approach. The rice field now wasn't more than 50 feet below our skids, and the down-draft from the rotors was flattening out the tall rice shoots. Hurriedly we jumped out, the pilot waiting no longer than it took for us to get from under the whirling blades, then thrashed upward and raced away. As we walked through the tree line the destruction was such that it left us breathless and appalled. It was as though we were seeing an old war newsreel—Poland, 1939—only in color.

The village was a dust heap. The sienna-colored huts had been flattened by repeated air strikes. Trails of fresh blood splashed a crazy path among the broken coconut palms.

A top sergeant is busy emptying his back pack to make room for a mother-of-pearl Buddhist altar looted from the ruins. A baby carriage is lying in a heap of spent mortar cases. The earthworks of one of the village bunkers are littered with C-ration cans, spent ammunition, discarded copies of Stars and Stripes ("HO REJECTS JOHNSON PEACE OVERTURE"). A bulldozer heaves aside the one remaining wall of someone's home. On it is scrawled in English, "G.I. PLEASE DON'T BURN MY HOME!" "VC propaganda," mutters a GI. Another First Cav trooper is giving out black playing cards. On one side is a death's-head skull with paratrooper wings. Beneath this is the legend "Death From Above." The idea I am told is psywar at the company level. When Charlie returns to find his family dead, he is expected to get the message. The cards are stuck in dead mouths.

"What's the bulldozer doing here?" I asked.

"The captain is looking for rice and weapons—they've got to be buried somewhere!"

"What about the villagers?"

"Screw the villagers. Everyone here was VC."

That evening we are back at LZ English. In the brigade command post, Colonel Smith, commander of the First Cav's First Brigade, is listening to a run-down on the day's fighting. The unprepared outsider gets a chilling feeling that time and space are out of joint. It is utterly professional, utterly clinical. Under a bright light, a taut, trim officer wearing captain's bars is briskly outlining what we know about the enemy's movements in the past twenty-four hours. Hunched forward on wooden benches, the captains, majors and colonels listen intently. No clocks, no windows are visible anywhere in the dimness of the tent to remind one of the other world. Only gradually does the realization seep in that, on this quiet day, in spite of 400 helicopter sorties, an estimated 200 artillery rounds, an untold number of patrols, and a B-52 strike, the enemy had completely vanished. This, then, is the frustrating environment the U.S. Army has moved into. "Guerrilla warfare is primary, and war of movement secondary," General Giap wrote in People's War, People's Army. Yet the war of movement is crucial to the First Cav. The "instant battle" is the helicopter cavalry's forte, but in this quicksilver war, the enemy refuses to fight save on his own terms.

As I leave the briefing I cannot stop thinking about that burned-out village. I go back and ask the intelligence officer about it. Here is the run-down. We took 24 KIAs. Their losses were unknown. After the fire fight the VC vanished, dragging their dead with them under cover of night. We evacuated all the women and children that were found in the bunkers. They are now in a refugee camp. Finally we bulldozed the village flat.

A few weeks later I happened to pick up a column by Joseph Alsop headed, "The Battle For Binh Dinh." In the course of describing the action on the Bong-Son plain, the columnist describes the frightful carnage with a parallel to a fox hunt, "in which the hounds are grimly skillful and wonderfully swift," chasing a sneaky fox who keeps going to earth. An outsider who listens to a briefing in the brigade command post would remark that the analogy was apposite. But somehow, Mr. Alsop managed to keep the horrifying realities of the burning homes, frightened peasants and crying children out of his article. It is a scandalous war that on one level is a kind of game to the men whose business is war.

I left Vietnam with a dozen notebooks crammed with impressions: Vietnam is the only place in the world where every horizon is a battlefield. In Vietnam, extraordinary Americans spend months rigging up a rural electrification scheme in a village, only to watch in horror as an A-4 Skyraider with Vietnamese air-force markings swoops down and drops 2,000 pounds of bombs on it. Saigon officials complain bitterly if an American MP tries to question a Vietnamese civilian. No visitor to the Bong-Son plain is likely to forget the streams of weeping refugees, but the Saigon government pays no attention to that problem. Vietnam this year will get more foreign aid from the United States than all of Latin America combined—it will also receive more bomb tonnage than was rained on Nazi Germany during World War II. In Vietnam it is entirely possible to watch the Dean Martin Show on Armed Forces TV in your foxhole. Also the "log" ships (logistics) disgorge complete luncheons—from roast turkey with giblet sauce to ice cream—for the fighting GIs. Vietnam is tragic, yes, but it also has its wildly absurd side.

The Americans are now the dominant element in the population of South Vietnam. They are both the masters and the rulers. They have denied effective political power to the National Liberation Front, and are fully aware of it. They are also the only source of energy for a "free" South Vietnam, which is to say, a South Vietnam without Communist participation. President Johnson proposes, General Westmoreland disposes. Thus, the Commander in Chief of American forces in Vietnam moves about the blazing countryside with the weight of a Legatus Augusti, in some ways the most extraordinary, certainly the most bizarre character of the war. Spare, pious, modest, nonsmoking—who, more fittingly, could have been chosen to represent America's new Imperial Destiny? The French, obsessed as they were with keeping title to colonial assets, were always trying to demonstrate in General LeClerc that valor could prevail over a ragged army of peasants. The Americans, obsessed with the Communist menace, seek in General Westmoreland to persuade a skeptical America that might is right, even when the Vietnamese people so clearly refuse to recognize it.

As I checked out of the Hotel Caravelle nearly three months later, I glanced over at the television set and there on the screen was Henry Cabot Lodge, then Ambassador, nervously fingering his white suit, and saying something to the effect that as he looked forward into 1967 he would predict "sensational" military gains in the coming year. Pressed by the TV interviewer, he thought that war would eventually "fade out," once the allied pacification effort had made sufficient progress to convince Hanoi that "the jig is up." It was a wistful little performance and the few wealthy Vietnamese who congregate in the Caravelle's lounge clucked approvingly. With all the appearance of a proconsul vested with enormous authority, Henry Cabot Lodge had come to exercise none. Any individual commander, in practice, had more influence over Vietnamese affairs. In his day, Lodge provided a useful symbol; the Boston Brahmin with the touch of "cool"; that starched white suit, brown and white palm beach shoes; afternoons spent at Saigon's exclusive Cercle Sportif; those privileged "backgrounders" where the Ambassador addressed visiting VIPs on the situation in South Vietnam. Henry Cabot Lodge was an entirely appropriate choice for ambassador, managing with finesse to convey the peaceful intentions and solemn purpose of a disinterested Administration; while at the same time the White House escalated the war. It seemed to me appropriate that this solemn, humorless Bostonian, whose politics were so manifestly out of tune with 20th-century America, should have been chosen as the ranking apologist for the New Globalism of the Johnson Administration in revolutionary Vietnam.

From Tu Do Street came the sound of the Hondas and Lambrettas. Through the thermoplate windows, crisscrossed with masking tape, I could see flares lighting up the night sky across the Saigon River. The desk clerk shuffled around to the cashier's cage, counting the piasters with a deft touch. He looked at me inquiringly through the thick lenses of his glasses and said: "You will be returning, Mr. Smith?"

"I imagine so, M'sieur Qui; I imagine so."

Putting the Poor Out Of Business

MARK LEVY

Mr. Levy, a free-lance writer on social and political topics, is with N.B.C. News in New York.

Since August, 1964, the Office of Economic Opportunity has been joined in an unlikely partnership with the Small Business Administration to fight poverty by lending money to poor people who want to go into business. The Economic Opportunity loans were authorized by Congress in Title IV of the legislation creating the OEO. Loans of up to $25,000 at annual interest as low as 5.5 per cent for a maximum of fifteen years could be made "to assist the establishment, preservation, and strengthening of small business concerns and improve the managerial skills employed in such enterprises." The OEO was to establish Small Business Development Centers in thirty-eight poverty "target areas" from Harlem to Pawnee, Okla.

These centers, with administrative funds channeled through the OEO's local community-action agencies, were to screen applicants for the loans and provide a major portion of the required business training and counseling. The centers themselves had no money to lend. The funds, as much as $100 million, were to be provided over an indefinite period from the Small Business Administration treasury. After choosing likely candidates, the centers were to forward loan requests to the SBA, which was given the power to approve or reject them.

From the start, OEO officials assumed that Congress would want the loans to go to persons in the lowest economie groups—a reasonable assumption since the program was an anti-poverty measure. OEO touted the loans as "a bold new effort to offer opportunity in business to talented and energetic low-income people. . . ." But OEO's initial enthusiasm outstripped its Congressional mandate, for Title IV said that loans could be made only when "there is a reasonable assurance of repayment," a provision that inevitably led to criteria more suited to a credit bureau than to a poverty program. Further, the House report on the bill clearly indicated that the loans were to be made to very small or marginal businesses, with emphasis not on persons seeking a start but on enterprises already established.

But a more serious flaw in the program was a lack of funds to give adequate training to the people approved for loans, only a fourth of whom had completed high school, and many of whom lacked rudimentary business skills. In the first eighteen months of the program an estimated $270,000, or only about $108 per person, was spent for training and counseling. A management study for OEO—made, unfortunately, a year and a half after the program got under way—estimated that an adequate training and counseling program would cost at least $500 per person.

Training in most cases was restricted to fifteen or twenty hours of instruction—mostly lectures—at local colleges or universities. The courses included bookkeeping, merchandising and record management, but the work was rarely tailored to the special needs of individual recipients. Some personal counseling was provided by center staffs or by Service Corps of Retired Executives (SCORE), but such meetings were infrequent and short. A survey conducted for OEO showed that most of the trainees were completely dissatisfied.

The first clashes between the two agencies came at the opening ceremonies of the Small Business Development Centers. Local SBA officials had been told by their superiors in Washington to screen applicants and award loans before the centers opened, so that successful applicants would be on hand for the first-day publicity. This order clearly usurped the functions of the OEO, and in about half the centers OEO personnel complained bitterly about the SBA's preselection activities.

Following these initial frictions, a mistrust developed between workers at the centers and the SBA officials. Viewed from the centers, the SBA appeared to be too conventional, too business-oriented; while in the minds of SBA administrators the centers were concerned too much with social work and not enough with good business principles. The regional SBA offices regularly took up to eight months to process applications forwarded after initial screening by the centers, and then turned down 40 per cent.

In the first few months of the program the SBA agreed to base loans on subjective judgments of character and management ability rather than on traditional credit ratings. But its increasingly exacting criteria soon made clear that it wanted to grant loans to small businessmen in the lower-middle-income brackets rather than to poverty cases. In November, 1965, after much tugging by the SBA, an income standard was adopted. The maximum income that was set, for example, for a family of four was $4,630, or $1,500 above the OEO's definition of poverty for the same size family.

But even this inflated poverty definition did not satisfy the SBA for long. Regional loan officers said that the income ceilings were still so low that they were being forced to make too many high-risk loans. In March, 1966, the income standard, again for a family of four, was raised to $5,630 (or $2,500 above the OEO poverty line). As Sargent Shriver noted during a Congressional post-mortem on the program last March 15, "The loan program was continuing to draw even farther away from OEO's real 'constituents' in poverty."

A second concession gained by the SBA altered a policy under which loans had been made to businessmen with incomes well above the poverty range who promised to hire the chronically underemployed. Both the OEO and the SBA originally saw this as a direct means of creating jobs for the poor. But in practice few jobs opened up; businessmen often promised to hire the poor in order to obtain the loan, then failed to do so. The deputy director of the New York SBA office, Raymond Curran, recently told me: "These loans were difficult to police. But we didn't think it was right to put people out of work by canceling the loan when we did find cheating." Curran may have been prepared to allow incompletely honored loans to stand for the sake of whatever jobs were created, but SBA officials in Washington were not. They suggested that the hire-the-poor standard be discontinued. In November, 1965, over the protests of Negro business associations and many Small Business Development Centers, this direct means of creating jobs was dropped.

From late 1964 until October, 1966, when Congress rescinded the OEO commitment to the loan program, more than 2,700 loans totaling $27.6 million were made, mostly to businesses in slum communities. Although the loans were not designed specifically to aid Negroes, the program had a definite urban and hence Negro orientation. Half the loans went to Negroes and Puerto Ricans. Ninety per cent of the recipients were already employed. The default rate was 3.4 per cent, a third higher than the normal SBA rate of 2.4 per cent and far above the average commercial bank default rate of 0.2 per cent. Still, under the circumstances it was considered surprisingly low.

Despite this apparent success with a limited number of cautiously selected individuals, OEO became increasingly disenchanted with the Economic Loan Program experiment during 1966. Not only was the SBA rejecting two out of five loans recommended by OEO and keeping up pressure for a business rather than social approach to the project but few additional jobs for the poor were being created, and the OEO field workers were having trouble finding reasonably sound risks even within the revised income criteria.

These difficulties were reinforced by a 111-page study prepared for the OEO by Kirschner Associates of Albuquerque, N.M., which told the anti-poverty agency what the SBA had been saying all along: "Evidence strongly indicates that the smallest businesses are those with the greatest difficulty of surviving. Evidence also indicates that the 'long-term underemployed' are generally those who can make the least contribution to the success of an endeavor. . . ." Its conclusion, hardly comforting to the OEO, was: "The program must focus on the highest levels of the rather low economic strata that can qualify; that is, it must concentrate on the businessman requiring capital and not on the less qualified person in poverty aspiring to enter business." Even to have a chance to compete, the poor would need much more thorough training than they were getting under the program as it was then set up, the study showed.

These considerations came to the fore at a time when the OEO was on the defensive generally. There were signs that many in Congress wanted to dismember the sprawling anti-poverty agency and parcel out its major projects to other departments of the government. The loan program had a relatively low priority among the activities the OEO was preparing to fight for. As one of its officials put it: "We had other fish to fry."

That summer, Robert Perrin, OEO's assistant director for Interagency Relations, paved the way for withdrawal from the loan project when he told the House Select Committee on Small Business: "We at OEO sometimes question whether this program properly is part of the arsenal of weapons over which we have primary and statutory jurisdiction. . . . Perhaps it could be better handled as an SBA operation." Perrin's suggestion was immediately challenged by Berkely Burrell, president of the National Business League, an association of middle-class Negro businessmen. Burrell told the House committee that Negro leaders opposed any shift of the loan program exclusively to the SBA, which "has no historical record of being responsive to the community for which I speak." But no objections were raised by spokesmen for the very poor, Negro or white.

Elsewhere on Capitol Hill, however, OEO's discouragement was noted by Congressional friends of the SBA. In particular, Perrin's suggestion interested Rep. John Dingell, Jr., a Democrat from a middle-class district with a large Polish population in Detroit and its suburbs. Dingell believed that the OEO's efforts were misguided, and he even had a "scandal" in Detroit to prove it.

In March, 1966, a reporter for the Detroit News had discovered that one of the first loans for $25,000 in Detroit had gone to a woman who owned a Lincoln Continental and whose combined family income was in excess of $11,000. The loan, for a combination ice cream parlor-shoeshine shop-export-import emporium, was made before the guidelines were set; local anti-poverty officials admitted that they pushed the application through in order to have a loan to announce at the opening of the Detroit center. After the News story appeared, Dingell ordered a committee investigation. At that time he said: "I am a friend of the program. This is not an attempt to stifle the whole program." But he added with just the right touch of righteous indignation that he wanted to be sure the loans were being made "with proper attention to the care of the public treasury." In fact, under the guidelines issued shortly after the Detroit loan was made, it would have been proper. The recipient had promised to hire ten to seventeen unemployed workers for a new store, thus meeting the hire-the-poor standard.

The stage was now set to end OEO's excursion into small-business activities. In the last days of the 89th Congress the House opened debate on OEO's budget for fiscal 1967. The bill submitted by the Administration called for no change in the joint management of the Economic Opportunity Loan Program. Rather belatedly, it requested that $5 million in community-action funds be earmarked for business training and counseling of loan applicants by the Small Business Development Centers in fiscal 1967.

Representative Dingell, with the full knowledge and technical advice of the SBA, but with neither the consent nor opposition of the OEO, introduced an amendment to the basic anti-poverty bill giving complete authority over loans to the SBA and cutting out the badly needed training funds. No one rose to challenge Dingell's amendment, and it was approved by a voice vote. The OEO made only a few halfhearted attempts in the Senate to save its share of the project. A handful of center workers wrote to their home state Senators. But according to Senate anti-poverty subcommittee staff members, the OEO appeared glad to be rid of the loan program.

At the insistence of Sen. Jacob Javits (R., N. Y.), however, the $5-million business-training authorization was restored to the bill by a conference committee. Thus, at a time when the centers were deprived of any authority over the loan program, including even the function of preliminary screening, they finally gained funds sufficient to train 10,000 successful applicants. Under the law the centers will be closed at the end of June, although OEO officials estimate that less than half of the $5-million allocation will be spent by then.

Since October, when the SBA assumed total control, the character and results of the loan program have been drastically altered, virtually abandoning its anti-poverty basis. Although loans are now available in SBA offices in all fifty states, less than half of them are being made to persons considered to be poor under the last joint OEO-SBA guidelines (which, as noted, were far above the OEO poverty line). The number and amount of loans to middle-income people has doubled, there are proportionately fewer Negro recipients, and fewer new businesses are being started. Rural and small-town businessmen, the traditional clientele of the SBA, make up a larger share of the successful applicants.

Under the SBA, Economic Opportunity Loans come in two sizes: up to $15,000 for individuals whose income is, in the guideline's loose wording, "below that which is required to meet the needs of themselves and those of their immediate families who are dependent on them," and up to $25,000 for businessmen whose incomes exceed the inflated poverty standards.

According to Bernard Boutin, SBA Administrator and a former deputy director of the OEO, the primary emphasis of the first category is on sound loans to existing, if not thriving, businesses. Boutin told local SBA officials: "While new businesses qualify . . . we do not intend to provide start-up financing for a small grocery, beauty parlor, carry-out food shop, or other business of the type traditionally operated by members of disadvantaged groups unless there is a clear indication that such a business will fill an economic void in the community."

The effect of Boutin's rule of thumb is to help freeze the pattern of discrimination and absentee business ownership in low-income communities—a condition prevailing particularly in urban Negro slums. For instance, it is estimated that in central Harlem at least 85 per cent of the more than 2,000 small businesses are owned by white merchants who live outside the community. The Negro share of central Harlem's $50 million worth of business has not increased very much in thirty years, Negro businessmen say. New York's large commercial banks generally look with disfavor on business financing in Harlem, and none works with the SBA in financing Economic Opportunity Loans even though they are fully guaranteed by the federal government. As a vice president of a large New York bank told me: "We're in business to make money, not to run a charity. You don't expect us to get into the never-never land of social responsibility?"

The program as the OEO wanted it run might have been able to attack this community problem to a limited degree. Instead, the SBA has stiffened its profit-oriented attitude. And as the director of the Economic Opportunity Loan Program, Philbin has said: "We want responsible individuals who will consider their debts to the government to be morally binding. We check credit ratings to see whether they stand a reasonable chance of repaying the loan." According to Philbin, a poor credit rating does not necessarily disqualify an applicant, because local credit interviewers are instructed to look for the "underlying causes of the financial trouble." To the SBA's way of thinking, mitigating circumstances include personal illness or physical handicap.

The second type of loan, for $25,000, is made to persons "who have sound business plans, management ability, and a strong desire to start their own businesses." These loans are designed for people in what the SBA calls the "financial no man's land"—those too poor for regular SBA loans and too well off for the first category of Economic Opportunity Loans. SBA officials hope to finance businesses not traditionally associated with the low-income groups. "We are looking for the young Negro engineer who is currently with GE but who has an idea how to make a better transistor and needs capital to set up a small plant," they say. Nevertheless, most of the more than 250 second-category loans made so far—totaling more than $3.5 million—have gone to the kind of traditional business enterprises that Boutin hopes to avoid. Apparently the SBA considers it proper for wealthier clients to own the ghettos' hot dog stands, though the agency proscribes the same endeavors for the poor.

After the Small Business Development Centers close in June, the SBA no longer will be able to rely on the OEO to make the initial contacts with loan applicants. Thus, reaching promising candidates could become the SBA's biggest problem in the months ahead. Philbin told me that his agency would like to make more loans to the very poor but that the supply of "qualified" applicants, particularly Negroes, was limited. He said he thought that civil rights organizations such as the Urban League should bring candidates to the attention of the local loan officers.

The SBA is, nevertheless, doing some field work and claims some impressive results in what it calls "outreach" efforts. Manhattan-based SBA men now regularly ride a circuit into the smaller cities as far north as Albany. In Illinois, the regional director claims that businessmen in dozens of communities help him spot candidates.

While circuit riding may help overcome the physical distances between the SBA and the potential applicants, it may have a limited effect on social distances. As one official in SBA's Washington headquarters told me: "These opportunity loans take many of our people into an entirely new world." With few exceptions the SBA representatives are white. Administrator Boutin has issued orders requiring that at least one member of the regional office teams be from "a minority group," but it will take time for the offices to put the order into effect. And top SBA officials concede that many local officers are not proceeding enthusiastically with the program.

In October, Congress set up the SBA's loan program through June, 1971. It seems clear that under SBA's control it will have its share of successes, but it is no longer in any sense an anti-poverty measure. The basic question of whether impoverished, chronically unemployed persons, given adequate training, can succeed in small business remains unanswered. But the question of whether a business-oriented agency—and nation—is willing to take the necessary risks to find out seems to have been answered rather effectively by the unhappy career of the Economic Opportunity Loan Program.

ABORTION: LAWS AND ATTITUDES

PHIL KERRY

Los Angeles

A typical newspaper report on Colorado's new abortion law read: "Last week Colorado enacted the most permissive abortion law in the nation's history—a law so liberal that a cry went up from its opponents that the state would become an 'abortion mill' for the rest of the country."

In fact, the Colorado legislation, passed April 25, is liberal only in comparison with the archaic laws of forty-five other states, which permit abortion solely to save the life of the mother. Four others—Alabama, Maryland, New Mexico and Oregon, and the District of Columbia—sanction abortions to preserve the mother's health.

The Colorado law, contrary to the impression created by the press, represents a cautious approach to a major medical problem: an estimated 1 million criminal abortions in the United States each year, with an estimated 5,000 maternal deaths. Colorado now permits abortions to save the mother's life, to preserve her mental or physical health, and to interrupt a pregnancy when the child is likely to be born with grave physical deformity or mental retardation. A three-doctor board in an accredited hospital must agree unanimously before a therapeutic abortion is approved.

If all the other states were to follow Colorado's lead, public health authorities predict a mere 3 to 5 per cent increase in the present 10,000 legal abortions a year. Rep. Richard D. Lamm, sponsor of the Colorado reform, said reports that the state is flooded with calls from women seeking abortions are propaganda. "We have had a few inquiries, which is natural, but all our hospitals have taken a conservative and restrictive interpretation of the law. I wouldn't be at all surprised this year if we had fewer legal abortions than last year, which, in a state of over 2 million, was forty."

The Colorado law and similar legislation proposed this year in about half the other states make no provision for the married woman who simply does not want to have a child, and at least 80 per cent of illegal abortions in the United States are performed on married women. Advocates of reform understand the problem, but believe it impossible to gain support now for any measure more liberal than the Colorado law.

Bills almost identical to the Colorado measure are stalled in the California legislature. Gov. Ronald Reagan has said he would sign a liberalized bill if it prohibited abortions to prevent the birth of a defective child. Reagan stated: "I cannot justify the taking of an unborn life simply on the supposition that the baby may be born less than a perfect human being." State Sen. A. C. Beilenson, sponsor of reform legislation in the Senate, replied that Reagan is against any modification of the present law and charged that the Governor's staff is working covertly against his bill.

With contraception more widely practiced now and more effective than ever before, why press for a more flexible attitude toward abortion? The answer lies in the statistics. Garrett Hardin, professor of biology at the University of California, Santa Barbara, points out that about 3 million of the 25 million married women of child-bearing age in the United States want a child in any one year. This means that 22 million are exposed to undesired pregnancy. The pill fails for one woman in every 100 during a year; other methods are less effective, and the combined failure of contraceptive devices produces between 2 and 3 million undesired pregnancies each year among married women. In addition, the U.S. Department of Health, Education and Welfare estimates that about 250,000 unmarried women become pregnant annually in the United States.

Thirty years ago Denmark and Sweden enacted therapeutic abortion laws, but a high criminal abortion rate persisted until they were amended to include "extended medical" reasons, which take into account the overall welfare of the mother and her family. Great Britain is considering a change in its law to permit abortions when "the pregnant woman's capacity as a mother will be severely overstrained."

Arguing from the experience of Sweden and Denmark, Ruth Roemer, associate researcher in public health law at the UCLA School of Public Health, says the Colorado law represents only a limited advance and will not materially reduce the toll in maternal deaths and disability from criminal abortion. Mrs. Roemer estimates that criminal abortions cause one-fifth of the maternal deaths in the United States.

Since they liberalized their abortion laws a decade ago, Eastern European countries have experienced a sharp increase in legal abortions and a simultaneous drop in maternal mortality. The rise in legal abortions corresponds closely to the provisions of the law in each country. Czechoslovakia, for example, which permits abortion on broadly interpreted social as well as medical indications, has a ratio of twenty-nine abortions to 100 live births. But Hungary, which allows abortion on request, unless interruption of pregnancy is medically unwise, reports 140 abortions to 100 live births.

Abortion is a health problem on a world scale. Reports presented at the eighth conference of the International Planned Parenthood Federation last April in Santiago, Chile, said that 15 million to 20 million women undergo induced abortions each year. It is evident that the laws and mores in various countries do not control the incidence of illegal operations. Dr. Frank Novak of the Ljubljana Faculty of Medicine in Yugoslavia told the conference that European countries whose laws limit access to legal abortions and contraceptives were reporting "more abortions, regardless of legality." The treatment of women after illegal abortions is one of the major burdens on hospitals and public health services in South America. Dr. Rolando Armijo of Chile said that in Santiago alone, a city of 2.5 million people, 50,000 abortions occurred last year.

The effects of strict laws against abortion fall most heavily on the poor. The California Committee on Therapeutic Abortion reports that an average of ten women daily are admitted to the Los Angeles County General Hospital, suffering from infections, hemorrhages and other results of self-inflicted abortions or back-alley operations performed by unqualified practitioners. In the county as a whole, it is estimated that there may be as many as 20,000 cases of this kind a year. A statement signed by twenty sociologists and clinical psychologists of the University of California commented: "The wealthy may go abroad and secure a legal abortion, but the poor must break the law" at the risks of "disastrous effects on physical and mental health."

And the wealthy, in some instances, do not have to go abroad. Dr. Robert E. Hall, associate clinical professor of obstetrics and gynecology, Columbia University, states that "infected abortion cases abound on hospital charity wards, not in our private pavilions. To a degree, the medical profession is responsible for this through its inequitable distribution of therapeutic abortions among ward and private patients." (Emphasis added.) A 1960-62 survey of New York City hospitals revealed the ratio of therapeutic abortions to live births as follows: in proprietary hospitals, 1 to 250; in the private wards of voluntary hospitals, 1 to 400; in the ward services of the same voluntary hospitals, 1 to 1,400, and in the municipal hospitals, 1 to 10,000.

Such discriminatory practice extends to ethnic origin. The ratio of therapeutic abortions to live births among white women in New York City is 1 to 380, but among nonwhites, it is 1 to 1,000; and among Puerto Ricans, 1 to 10,000. Half of the puerperal deaths among New York's Negroes and Puerto Ricans are due to criminal abortions, as opposed to only a quarter of those deaths among white women. Dr. Hall's comments underscore what has long been known: abortions are performed in American hospitals for reasons other than to protect the life of the mother. The law is broken to accommodate the well to do.

Dr. Hall, in common with the large majority of American physicians, wants the law liberalized. Dr. Carl Goldmark, an obstetrician, gynecologist and member of the Board of Directors of the Association for the Study of Abortion in New York, asserts: "There should be no abortion laws at all. No law tells me if I can amputate a leg or perform a Caesarean, and no law should govern whether I can perform an abortion." Dr. Goldmark's position is not widely shared by the medical profession, which advocates change to permit therapeutic abortion, but shies away from approving, as it is phrased, "abortion on demand." Dr. Keith P. Russell, clinical professor of obstetrics and gynecology at the University of Southern California, and a strong advocate of modifying present abortion laws, said: "I believe that perhaps only 20 per cent of physicians favor abortions on social or economic grounds. The majority view it, as I do, as a medical problem."

If Dr. Goldmark represents one extreme side of the controversy, the Roman Catholic Church represents the other. Catholic doctrine forbids abortion for any reason. The dour Archbishop of Los Angeles, James Francis Cardinal McIntyre, who is leading the fight in California against reform, wrote to the Los Angeles Times: "A most fundamental and primary principle in the economy of existence is the 'right to life.' This right is inherent in the process of creation. Once conception is effected, immediately follows the 'right' of the embryo, which will mature into a human being. Any interference with that process constitutes the taking of life. . . ." Writing to Sen. A. C. Beilenson, a woman expressed the same view more harshly: "Abortion is the deliberate, cold-blooded murder of an innocent child."

It was a Catholic physician, Dr. James V. McNulty of Los Angeles, a former member of the California State Board of Medical Examiners, who caused charges of unprofessional conduct to be brought by the board against nine San Francisco doctors. The nine performed therapeutic abortions in San Francisco hospitals during an epidemic of German measles in 1965; all the abortions were undertaken only after approval by hospital staff committees. Medical research indicates an 8 per cent to 50 per cent possibility that the child of a mother infected with German measles during pregnancy will be deformed. The percentage depends on the month of pregnancy in which the disease is contracted.

Dr. McNulty said: "I was interested from a legal standpoint; these doctors were saying they were above the law. Even though I'm a Catholic—they always point that out—the law is the law." Dr. McNulty is not opposed to the Beilenson bill "on principle" and believes the Catholic view "should not be imposed on the majority."

The action against the doctors is the first use of California's 1872 abortion law against physicians who openly terminated pregnancies in a hospital. Swift reaction followed. Dr. Edmund W. Overstreet, vice chairman of obstetrics at the University of California, denounced the charges: "We do not believe that violation of an archaic statute is unprofessional conduct." William K. Coblenz, San Francisco lawyer and a regent of the University of California, heads a distinguished defense committee. California physicians pressing for reform are supported by the Executive Board of the Federation of Women's Clubs, the State Bar Convention, the California Council of Churches, the Northern California Board of Rabbis, the California Division of the American Association of University Women and several social work organizations.

While Catholic religious leaders resist any change, lay Catholic opinion is sharply divided. Modern Medicine announced in April that its survey of 40,000 doctors in every state showed that 49.1 of the responding Catholic physicians approved of liberalizing the law. (Among non-Catholic doctors, 93.3 per cent favored modification.) A recent survey by the California Poll, conducted by Field Research, reported that 67 per cent of California Catholics support liberalization, and 10 per cent favored unrestricted abortions. (Public health workers say that Catholics make up a high percentage of the attendance at family planning clinics. The Church still officially proscribes artificial birth control, but the majority of the committee established by the Vatican to advise Pope Paul VI on birth control recommended lifting the ban.)

Division of Catholic opinion on the subject has a long history. Until the late 16th century, the Church allowed interruption of pregnancy. Abortions were prohibited for a short period and again permitted for nearly three centuries until 1869. High abortion rates persist in countries with predominantly Catholic populations.

Left out of the present agitation for reform, even by most physicians, are the rights of the married woman pregnant with an unwanted child. Professor Hardin observes that "contraception is a method of birth control invented largely by men, but the consequences of its failure are paid by women."

Therapeutic abortion boards established in hospitals are often called upon, in the words of Dr. Hall, "to render moral judgments. Through the detachment typical of committees in general, this judgment is apt to be more academic than humane." Dorothy Stolz, executive director of the California Committee on Therapeutic Abortion, says there is an "underground of resentment among married women who find it dreadful, under such circumstances, to be brought before a panel of men for judgment." Dorothy Kenyon, a former municipal court judge in New York, agrees: "For a state to force a woman to bear a child against her will is outrageous."

Psychological stress is sometimes suffered by women after an abortion, but this is not typically true nor does it have to be true. Professor Hardin believes that a physician who "tries to argue his patient out of a desperately wanted abortion by predicting psychological consequences is not so much predicting as creating grief." Studies have shown that remorse following an abortion is not intrinsic, but results from the beliefs of the woman or the taboos of her culture.

Pressure for reform of abortion laws has arisen in recent years principally from the medical profession, which limits its concern to the medical aspects of pregnancy; but a demand for far-reaching liberalization is inevitable because of one of the great revolutions of the 20th century: the increasingly effective separation of copulation from reproduction and the separation—at least in the minds of many—of "sin" from sex. The new mores are reflected in the results of a poll taken by the Stanford Chapter of the California Committee to Legalize Abortion. It revealed that 72 per cent of the responding students favored general legalized abortions, and 93 per cent said abortion should be as available to the unmarried as to the married woman.

Whatever the consequences, the "sex revolution" has taken place, and no signs of a counterrevolution are at hand. Until abortion laws are extended beyond therapeutic necessity, and as long as science cannot achieve complete control over human reproduction, and unless the poor are educated to make use of present methods of contraception, the mutilations and infections of criminal abortion will continue to wreck the lives of millions.

VIETNAM SUMMER

DOORBELLS FOR PEACE

RICHARD BLUMENTHAL

Mr. Blumenthal, who graduates from Harvard this spring, has been editorial chairman of The Harvard Crimson and a reporter for The Washington Post.

Cambridge

Beginning in June—more than a year before the 1968 elections—students will be out ringing doorbells in middle-class neighborhoods, urging housewives and their husbands to meet with neighbors and discuss methods of opposing the war. Their grass-roots organizing will be part of Vietnam Summer, a national program with headquarters in Cambridge, that hopes ultimately to enlist 10,000 volunteers in some 500 communities across the country. These workers will include clergy, professionals and faculty, as well as students, and will range in political belief from moderate Republicans to New Left radicals. But they will all share at least one common aim: to organize an active and effective constituency against the war between now and 1968.

The organizers of Vietnam Summer assume that most Americans are worried and concerned about the war but remain silent because they feel isolated and powerless. Beginning with the "teach-out" technique of house-to-house canvassing, workers hope to counter that isolation through local meetings and study sessions. Following this first phase of "education," the neighborhood groups will undertake political action: referendum campaigns, anti-war resolutions in city councils, leaflet distribution in public places, ads in local papers and letters to the editor, resolutions against the war by local Democratic and Republican committees, community speak-outs and panel discussions before local organizations. One favorite activity will be a petition campaign directed at local Congressmen, requesting them to return home for open hearings on the war. Eventually, the local projects may run peace candidates in local elections.

The decision as to tactics—and, even more important, as to general strategy—will be left almost entirely to the local groups. Contrary to the rumors that the national program will attempt to "take over" the anti-war movement, Vietnam Summer's steering committee will not dictate any line to the projects or organizations it supports. It will not mass-produce leaflets (though it may distribute examples of literature which have proved effective in other communities). It will not appoint national staff to "control" the local projects. It will not even provide all the funds needed to initiate organizing activities (most communities will have to match Vietnam Summer "seed money" with locally raised funds).

Vietnam Summer aims, in fact, only to transmit the first spark of political action to communities. Says Gar Alperovitz, a member of the steering committee and a fellow in Harvard's Kennedy Institute of Politics: "This is not going to be any top-down organization—it will be an open-ended process. We want the projects to fit local needs. . . ." It would even be wrong, Alperovitz insists, to speak of Vietnam Summer as an "organization," since it will have no specific ideological posture, no bureaucracy, not even a governing board of directors.

It would be equally wrong, other organizers contend, to think that Vietnam Summer will be "taken over" by any group, radical or moderate. The informal steering committee which will make funding decisions includes Andy Rudin of the American Friends Service Committee and Dr. Irwin Rosenberg of the Harvard Medical School, as well as executive director Lee Webb, a former national secretary of SDS, and Carl Oglesby, a past president. The coalition will cooperate through ad hoc agreements with peace groups ranging from SANE (considered in the "right wing" of the peace movement) to SDS and other New Left organizations. The organizers of Vietnam Summer have not sought support for any third party Presidential candidate; nor have they permitted any Establishment politician such as Robert Kennedy to play a role in the organization (though they have maintained and publicized Martin Luther King's firm and continuing endorsement). As a result of the influence of the New Leftists, particularly Webb, the program is looking more and more beyond middle-class organizing and the 1968 elections to projects in poor and working-class communities and draft-resistance programs among students.

Organizers of Vietnam Summer acknowledge the danger that the ideas of some radical groups may antagonize middle-class people, but they contend that ideology is usually abandoned when workers reach the field. "These strong ideological attitudes," argues John Maher, a radical steering committee member, "tend to melt away when you get out to doorsteps and begin talking to people. . . . You have to be prepared to deal with people who may never share your ideological perspective." Vietnam Summer will force radicals, Alperovitz says, to "engage American society where it is now, not where they dream it may be." To prepare workers for the difficulties of community organizing, the program will provide one-week training courses at national institutes.

This is not to say, however, that ideology will be banned or discouraged: many of the workers will urge their neighbors to establish organizations capable of exerting pressure for peace even after the Vietnamese War ends, and will attempt to engage these organizations in a thoroughgoing critique of American society. Ideology may be suspended on the doorstep, but it is apt to reappear when workers get their neighbors out of their houses and into study groups and political action.

The program will thus provide a test, as Alperovitz puts it, "of whether people with different ideologies can work in the same program for the same immediate objective." Organizers of the program are encouraged by their success in a Cambridge pilot project, where 100 workers have been canvassing six local precincts and where 50 per cent of residents approached have signed a petition calling on their Congressmen to hold open hearings [see also box below]. But they will need more volunteers and funds to make the program effective on a national scale. They now have commitments from only about 2,000 volunteers, out of the planned 10,000, and only $120,000 of the minimum $350,000 they hope to use.

The Amherst Community Referendum

How much effect have protests against the war in Vietnam had in local communities? To find out, students from Amherst College organized a door-to-door referendum in the town of Amherst, Mass., in which citizens were asked to vote on the following statement:

We are concerned with the human and material costs of the War in Vietnam. We urge our government to cease bombing North Vietnam immediately and to recognize the National Liberation Front in negotiations for the establishment of a coalition government in South Vietnam. These proceedings and the withdrawal of foreign troops should be under international supervision.

The results showed 38 per cent of those who answered in agreement, 46 per cent in opposition, and 16 per cent undecided.

Amherst, which serves as home to the college and the University of Massachusetts, is a liberal and active community. It was the only town in the state to give a near plurality to Thomas B. Adams, a peace candidate in the 1966 Democratic Senatorial primary, and in the election gave a strong majority to Republican Edward Brooke, then running as a "dove." Faculty members, students and community groups have been prominent in their dissent. Each Sunday about 300 people have stood silently for one hour on the town common in opposition to the killing in Vietnam.

But even in such a community more than a third of the voters approached in the referendum refused to answer, and the bulk of these were clearly opposed to the statement.

As important as the results, however, was the actual meeting with voters and discussion of the war. Canvassers were astonished by the extent to which views were based on emotions, prejudices and misinformation. Many of those polled had deep reservations about the war, but thought it improper to say so publicly. Many said they were powerless and had to believe in the authority of the government. Others were simply afraid to talk.

The Amherst Community Referendum suggests the scope of what is to be done. Those faculty and students who dissent from the war cannot possibly compete with the government's dominance of the mass media. They must come out of their privileged academic circles and attempt to speak directly to the local public.

DORIAN J. FLIEGEL

BOOKS & THE ARTS

The Past Reconstructed

FROM PLANTATION TO GHETTO: An Interpretive History of American Negroes. By August Meier and Elliott M. Rudwick. Hill and Wang. 280 pp. $5.75.

NEGRO THOUGHT IN AMERICA, 1880-1915: Racial Ideologies in the Age of Booker T. Washington. By August Meier. University of Michigan Press. 336 pp. $7.50. Paper $2.25.

EUGENE D. GENOVESE

Mr. Genovese is the author of The Political Economy of Slavery (Pantheon). He will shortly take up his duties as professor of history at Sir George Williams University. He is a member of the editorial boards of Studies on the Left and The Journal of Social History.

Before World War II and immediately after, an irrepressible band of Negro historians, occasionally joined by a white historian, usually a radical, strove to restore to the Negro a sense of his past and to bring to all Americans a sense of the Negro's contribution to our national life. Until a few years ago works on Negro history were shunned by publishers as unmarketable; today, publishers complain that they cannot get enough books to publish, and scholarly journals vie with one another for manuscripts. This victory has been bought at a price. In order to offset stereotyped notions of Negro passivity, historians have tended to dramatize the heroic moments; in order to force attention to the Negro's place in our national history, they have slid into some sweeping exaggerations. Most of the older scholars tried to keep on guard against a romantic view, but there has been a growing danger of an oscillation from a reactionary and ignorant view of the Negro, or no view at all, to a romantic and one-dimensional view. Thus the ideologically conservative portrait of every slave a Sambo has given way to the ideologically liberal portrait of every slave a potential Nat Turner.

August Meier has been in many ways emotionally and intellectually tied to the older, heroic school of Negro history; but strong doses of skepticism and a noticeable aversion to dogmatism temper his passionate commitment to racial justice and equality and, together with his impressive learning, place him in the front rank of his field. From Plantation to Ghetto is more than another history of the Negro in America. Meier and Rudwick have written seven essays designed to present basic data within the framework of frank interpretation and even speculation.

Of especially high quality among the ante-bellum subjects treated is the account of the essential contribution of the Negro to the abolitionist movement, and of the discrimination encountered there. Apart from the commanding and irresistible Frederick Douglass, no Negro played a leading role in abolitionist circles, and few innovations came from black abolitionists. The authors properly interpret these circumstances as a reflection of discrimination and point to the absurdity of some exasperated Negroes' having had to organize segregated abolitionist societies. Yet, we may also observe that the objective outcome left the Negro leaders ill prepared to develop an independent program and movement during Reconstruction. The record of black suffering and heroism during the war and Reconstruction is presented here, but so is the record of political ineptness and of the failure of independent leadership.

The comparison of the 1860s and 1960s lays bare the long history of boycotts, sit-ins and other militant actions against segregation, and demonstrates how every important Negro gain, then and now, has had to be fought for tenaciously. The account of labor struggles, especially in the Knights of Labor and the Industrial Workers of the World, avoids both exaggerations of Negro-white unity and superficial anti-labor polemics. The treatment of the migration from the South explores the movement of social institutions as well as persons; the examination of religious cults as an alternative to explosive nationalism is suggestive, and the discussion of the matrifocal family is well balanced and free of the claptrap usually manifest in such discussions. The authors do a particularly good job with the "New Negro" movement and its ethnic dualism.

The frankly interpretive aspect of the book invites quarreling. As stimulating as it is, From Plantation to Ghetto has some strange features and dubious judgments. For example, it contains an illuminating analysis of the continuity of response from ante-bellum to post-bellum times, but devotes 59 pages to the small number of ante-bellum free Negroes and only 43 pages to the great mass of slaves, with little attention paid to their daily life. The Negro in the United States was largely formed within the system of plantation slavery, as the title of the book suggests, and the subject cannot be by-passed without doing it violence.

The discussion of slave society suffers from the authors' neo-abolitionist bias—a bias that regrettably dominates the liberal and radical Left today. Thus, they talk nonsense about slave breeding, relying on arguments that U. B. Phillips demolished fifty years ago. That a woman's "anticipated fecundity" helped determine her market value is merely to say that she was property—i. e., a slave. We know that much. The point is that the sexes on farms and plantations were numerically in balance, that "rattling good breeders" did not command suspiciously high premiums, that only in rare instances did forced mating for breeding purposes occur, and most important, that planters generally did everything possible to encourage their slaves to live in stable family units. Elsewhere in the Americas, where slave breeding was attempted, the result was usually a failure. The high birth rate in the United States demonstrates not deliberate breeding but the relative comfort and stability of slave life. In the older areas of the South the natural increase could not be absorbed into production and partially had to be sold off. In this sense "slave raising" was objectively a part of the system and essential to its economic viability. Undeniably, family units were too often broken up in these sales. From this point to the assertion of deliberate slave breeding, or the implication that most de facto slave families were broken up, is a long, illogical and empirically false step.

The authors exaggerate absenteeism and thereby miss the main point of the Southern slave system—that it was dominated by a class of resident planters whose daily lives inevitably, and despite their best efforts, became bound up with the lives of their Negroes. Accordingly, the bonds of sentiment, as well as of economic interest, are underestimated, and with them the slaves's level of material comfort. They end with an undistinguished account of the factors responsible for the low incidence of slave insurrection in the United States.

When the authors move beyond Reconstruction they get progressively stronger. Accordingly, the best parts of their ante-bellum chapters are those which lead in a straight line to later problems. The dominant notion of Booker T. Washington—that thrift, sobriety and economic achievement would gain for the Negro recognition and respect from the white community—beguiled many Negro leaders long before Washington was born. The assumption proved false. Evidence of Negro sobriety, thrift and economic achievement in an essentially racist society more often than not simply enraged a large part of the white community. During the Atlanta riot of 1906—to take only one of many examples—it was precisely these “uppity, aloof, smart-assed niggers” who bore the brunt of white violence.

Negro thought from ante-bellum days to the present has ranged along a continuum of ideologies from assimilation to separatism, with a bewildering number of combinations and variations between the extremes. The authors are at their best in leading the reader through what at first glance appears to be a hopeless maze. For a single illustration consider the following passage in From Plantation to Ghetto:

The gap between ideal and practice in American society meant that Negroes not only wanted to be a part of that society, but that they also found it desirable to develop their own group life within it. Thus, ironically, the establishment of the separate Negro church and fraternal organizations was both a form of protest against racism and yet an accommodation to it.

The chapter on the civil rights movement, although uneven, is often excellent and will repay close reading. Its deficiencies stem in part from the earlier errors concerning slavery's effect on the Negro and in part from a Left-liberal or social-democratic (if there is much of a difference any more) bias. The nationalist tendency is in general badly slighted, although occasionally treated with refreshing skill. The authors search the various protest groups to discover their social composition and conclude that personality rather than social class separates them from one another. No doubt they have a point, but the main question concerns the class implications of their programs, not the social origins of their leaders and members. They do explore, with considerable insight, the general radicalization of the civil rights movement since 1963.

Many other specific arguments could be joined. The rosy account of the March on Washington ought to be read along with the caustic account in the Autobiography of Malcolm X. The implication that Robert F. Williams lost his post in the NAACP because he advocated offensive violence is unworthy of the authors. The statement that SNCC militants scorned Johnson's maneuvers at the 1964 Democratic convention because “they reject on ideological grounds the compromises inherent in the American political system” is an inexcusably silly way to deal with the ideological complexities of a rapidly changing, radical, opposition movement.

The most unsatisfactory part of their treatment of the recent period concerns the cold war. The authors tell us that domestic racism was reinforced during 1890 to 1914 by the ideological exigencies of imperialism—a view that has been respectable and indeed standard fare since the publication of C. Vann Woodward's The Strange Career of Jim Crow—but they shy away from the relationship between racism and foreign policy in recent decades. Their observation that Communist espousal of the Negro cause has embarrassed the United States Government into policy shifts is well taken, but they display no small uneasiness about pursuing the matter.

They do explain in a footnote that the escalation of the war in Vietnam occurred too late to permit them to assess the new situation, but one detects that a combination of partisanship for the Negro cause, unhappiness about American imperialism, and stanch anti-communism has created a world in which they are less than comfortable. It is to their credit, in view of their anti-communism, that they have made a genuine effort to do justice to the contribution of American Communists in the fight for Negro liberation and have refrained from having jolly good fun with the more imbecilic gyrations of the party line. Yet the result of their uneasiness about cold-war issues leads naturally to a weak and disappointing end to an admirable if sometimes irritating book. No one today can predict the outcome of the present struggle, but surely such learned and sophisticated students as these ought to do better than to end with the question: Where will it all lead?

If Meier's Negro Thought in America (first published in 1963 and now appearing in paperback) is the more significant of the two books—one destined to reshape much of our thinking—it is also the easier to deal with. Not that it is a simple book, for its beauty lies in the clarity with which so many complexities and subtle nuances

Jean Genet

His new novel is a searing vision of man in the 20th century—revealed from the perverse, barbaric and saintly depths of criminal society...and a man's soul

This novel, like Our Lady of the Flowers, was written in a prison cell.

The place is Fontevault, a French prison notorious for its hardened criminals—a convict society ruled by a homosexual hierarchy of big shots and pimps.

“Genet has been accorded international standing as a writer. He would have deserved it for this book alone... Homosexual love forms the leitmotif; platonic and physical, always poetic: there is a moving and delicate description of a homosexual marriage... Genet succeeds to an amazing degree in creating poetry from the profoundest degradation.”—The London Sunday Times

MIRACLE OF THE ROSE

Translated by Bernard Frechtman
$7.50

Photo: Jerry Bauer

Now at your bookstore, or order directly from the publisher. (Please enclose payment with order.)
GROVE PRESS, 315 Hudson Street, New York, N. Y. 10013

GENERATION AT THE NOONDAY

*We have the power now.
We administer, our progenitors are dead. We talk angrily, thinking of the young.*

This is the time when enemies are known to us and when our friends call us up on the phone and they say we need you now.

My friends have evil eyes.

My reaction to them is normal, and they are normal.

The deepest terror has no shadow.

JOHN KNOEPFLE

are explored. Rather, its exhaustive scholarship and astute analysis provide an overwhelming case for its main contentions and provoke fewer quarrels.

Meier focuses on the articulate Negroes and accepts some distortion, for, as he observes, these would tend to be the prominent and socially privileged. To compensate somewhat, he searches institutional as well as intellectual developments in order to get some clues to the state of mind of the masses. Perhaps his most important contribution is the demonstration of a persistent quality in Negro life between integrationism and separatism and especially his probing examination of the specific forms and consequences of this duality. Meier points out that the integrationist tendency has generally prevailed during periods of upsurge, optimism and white dependence on Negro support—as, for example, during the War for Southern Independence and immediately thereafter—whereas the separatist (Black Nationalist, Black Power) tendency has generally prevailed during periods of defeat and disillusionment and the flight of white allies.

This integrationist-separatist antagonism has rarely expressed itself in pure form: usually both elements, although in different proportions, have intruded themselves into movements and even individuals. Cutting across this antagonism has been the division between the leaders and the led. The generalization laid down by Meier for Reconstruction will, with proper application, serve for other occasions: "While the masses were primarily interested in landownership, the elite leaders, who had achieved some sort of economic security, were first and foremost interested in political and civil rights." Throughout the history of the Negro in America the emphasis on economic advance has been closely related to separatism and has been a working-class as well as a petty-bourgeois demand. Philosophies of racial exclusiveness and institutional separatism have formed part of a broader complex of ideas that has included racial pride and solidarity. In the age of Booker T. Washington, as well as before and since, Negroes have had to fight for integration, while creating separate organizations. "They appeared to be creating a segregated movement in itself, to be fostering the very thing they were attacking." Much of Meier's book is devoted to a searching examination of this paradoxical duality.

The clarity with which Meier presents this duality renders strange his assessment of Booker T. Washington. He insists on cluttering up an incisive discussion with dark suggestions that Washington's preponderance somehow does not indicate that he reflected the "aspirations" of the black masses and that he was "power" motivated. "Aspirations" is a loaded word. The point, as Meier's account shows, is that Washington spoke for and to the possibilities for the Southern black masses in a period of retreat and defeat. As for "power," Meier's embarrassed discussion provides enough reason to forget it. Washington was human and convinced of his own superior wisdom; the fact remains that he did the best he could for his embattled people. Perhaps the best part of Meier's discussion is his demonstration of the use to which Washington's philosophy was put: in the South it spelled accommodation; in the North a doctrine of self-help and go-it-alone for a people without substantial allies who nonetheless had the wherewithal to assume a defiant stance.

One of Meier's most significant findings concerns the decline in Washington's power, which roughly coincided with the formation of the NAACP. By the time he died, most of his power had disappeared. As his political position with the Republican Party slipped and his control of patronage dwindled, his enemies finally saw their chance. The subsequent changes opened the way for a more militant movement, but proved less extensive than appears on the surface. Northern Negro acceptance of Washington's leadership had never meant acquiescence in his accommodationist philosophy, which had been designed for a difficult Southern setting. Southern Negro acceptance of Washington's leadership had meant such acquiescence because no alternative had presented itself or was to present itself for a long time after his death. The integrationists spoke for a new Negro middle class that aspired to assimilation but was itself rising on an expanding Negro market and had the most to gain from an espousal of racial pride and solidarity. The Northern Negro politicians especially had to walk a tightrope, and part of DuBois' stature rests on his having grasped, so much better and earlier than most, that Negroes somehow had to integrate and separate at the same time.

Meier's account of the years 1880 to 1915 could in most respects be extended into our own day. New problems have arisen to complicate the old, but all or at least most of the old remain, for they have arisen from the paradox of the Negro in America, within which he is nothing if not an American, and still has never been permitted to become fully an American either. Meier's praise of the pragmatic streak in Negro thought is therefore hard to take: "There is something pragmatic

THE WALTER READE ORGANIZATION PRESENTS A JACK Le VIEN PRODUCTION

*The story of King Edward VIII
who gave up an empire for
the woman he loved.*

A KING'S STORY

MADE WITH THE PERSONAL
CO-OPERATION OF H. R. H.
THE DUKE OF WINDSOR AND
THE DUCHESS OF WINDSOR

...is a love story.

Narrated by ORSON WELLES • Music Composed and Conducted by IVOR SLANEY
Directed by HARRY BOOTH • Produced by JACK Le VIEN

Associate Producer ARTHUR S. FERRIMAN • IN COLOR • CONTINENTAL

NOW PLAYING

THE festival

57th St. at 5th Ave. LT 1-2323

about the ideologies of American Negroes. They will take the path that seems most likely to eliminate or at least minimize the discrimination involved in the American race system." Reflecting on how far back the Negro remains, we may question the wisdom of this pragmatism. Short-run tactical approaches have their place but their only real virtue lies in their supposed ability to deliver victory. The failure of black America to develop a long-range ideology and strategy of liberation has cost it dearly and, if the present signs of reaction are not deceptive, may soon take another heavy toll. Meier underestimates the savage emasculation wrought by slavery, paternalism and persistent violence. It will take much more than shrewd tactics, limited gains and heroic moments to bring the black masses that elan, self-discipline and political cohesion without which their liberation is unlikely.

It would be unfair to Meier's remarkable effort to press this argument further, but I do wish he had pondered more carefully the words he quotes from the Southern Negro political and religious leader, Bishop Henry M. Turner: "A man who loves a country that hates him is a human dog and not a man." This sentence ought to be taken neither as an understandable but reckless outburst nor as a moral judgment on a too often apathetic people, for it contains in embryo an understanding of the terrible effect wrought by centuries of slavery and a glimpse of the harsh work needed to exorcize it.

A Romantic of the Wretched Life

MIRACLE OF THE ROSE. By Jean Genet. Translated from the French by Bernard Frechtman. Grove Press. 344 pp. $7.50.

STEPHEN KOCH

Mr. Koch teaches at the State University of New York at Stony Brook.

Twice during Jean Genet's Miracle of the Rose (near the beginning and near the end) the writing gets off the ground and really sails. The flights are spectacular enough, but not in the fashion of the blasting skyrockets to which book reviewers customarily compare such feats. The trajectory is more like the path of a great blue heron moving downstream, its vast wings scarcely moving in the still air as the bird scans the landscape, turning its head from left to right. Everything seems to fall silent as the unearthly vision floats by.

Both of these moments are among the more beautiful and absorbing in modern French literature, and by themselves make this new translation by the late Bernard Frechtman worth the price of possession. But the book offers much more: I mention them only because they are the two moments of sublimity in a complex, self-undermining narrative the ultimate object of which is precisely that—sublimity. As such, they sound a little silly out of context. The first occurs (in a characteristically degraded situation) as Genet and his fellow convicts stand in a corridor of Fontevrault, the French penitentiary which is the novel's setting, and see a murderer named Harcamone being led by guards to the death cell, there to await the guillotine. The prisoners' eyes turn toward this (to them) gloriously heroic figure "as sunflowers turn to the sun." Suddenly the manacles on the martyr's wrists begin to be transformed into links of white roses. The guards see nothing, and Harcamone keeps walking. The iron door of the cell slams shut.

Following this vision, Harcamone (who is the book's patron saint, invisibly leading it to its conclusion) disappears from the scene, only to reappear in the final pages, though not in the flesh. He invades Genet's dreams in the form of a huge colossus on which crawl judges, jurors and executioners (emissaries from the middle class, against which Genet measures the strength of his private world of demons and martyrs) as termites might creep across the Colossus of Rhodes. These homunculi slowly descend into Harcamone's body (through the mouth) and discover it transformed into a dolorous wonderland—"more decked with black than a capital whose king has just been assassinated."

I am not sure a simple critical description can make either of these passages sound very promising: Genet's motifs often sound merely grandiose without the concentration of imaginative energy that buoys them up and gives them their substance. But the final passage in particular is tremendously powerful, even for Genet: the judge's descent into Harcamone's flesh is a descent into a spiritual mystery, and every phase of the surreal fantasy is given both a tough, concrete presence and a peculiarly mute, admonitory "significance," like the indecipherable totems of some lost civili-

BLACK POWER!

Whether you think of it as a threat or a promise, it's here to stay. Nathan Wright, Jr., a onetime CORE field secretary with a doctorate from Harvard, now looks beyond the fear and violence of today's headlines to outline the real meaning of this challenge to all Americans.

BLACK POWER and Urban Unrest by Nathan Wright, Jr.

$4.95; paperback, $1.95

from
HAWTHORN
Books

70 Fifth Avenue, New York 10011

The Nation SUBSCRIBERS' BOOK SERVICE

Offers the following at discount prices:

- | | Price |
|---|--------|
| <input type="checkbox"/> HELL'S ANGELS: A Strange and Terrible Saga by Hunter Thompson (Random House, $4.95) | $3.95 |
| <input type="checkbox"/> THE ACCIDENTAL PRESIDENT by Robert Sherrill (Grossman, $5.00) | $4.00 |
| <input type="checkbox"/> THE FREE WORLD COLOSSUS: A Critique of American Foreign Policy in the Cold War by David Horowitz (Hill and Wang, $6.95) | $5.55 |
| <input type="checkbox"/> FRIENDSHIP AND FRATRICIDE: An Analysis of Whittaker Chambers and Alger Hiss by Dr. Meyer A. Zeligs (Viking, $8.95) | $7.15 |
| <input type="checkbox"/> DE GAULLE: A Political Biography by Alexander Werth (Simon and Schuster, $7.50) | $6.00 |
| <input type="checkbox"/> THE PSYCHOLOGY OF POWER by Ronald Sampson (Pantheon, $4.95) | $3.96 |

Remittance accompanying orders should be made payable to THE NATION, 333 6th Ave., N.Y. 10014

☐ Payment enclosed ☐ Please bill me

Readers can avail themselves of our regular offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S. at the retail price post-free. When ordering, please give title, author and publisher, if possible.

zation, staring out of ruins at the startled explorer.

Miracle of the Rose therefore begins and ends with transcendent visions of the condemned murderer, Harcamone. Sandwiched between them (though it's a piece of bread between two slices of meat) is Genet's account of more mundane events: his complicated, distracted amours in the bull pen, dove-tailed with his memories of his first prison—the prison orphanage at Mettray, where he spent his boyhood and adolescence in a hierarchical world of little-boy big shots, “chickens” (their loyal, passive boy loves) and “jerks.”

Mettray—a former convent, with encircling walls of stone—was Genet's mother. Fontevrault penitentiary was the arena of his perverse movement into manhood. Mettray was Genet's idyll, his pastoral; at Fontevrault that idyll was ripped to shreds. Genet's whole effort in this book is to reassemble a shattered and fragmented paradise. This is the immemorial motive that lies at the center of his art, making him the romantic he is—the only first-rate romantic genius of postwar world literature.

Romantic nostalgia can take the standard form of a flight from the present, in which fantasy wafts the mind back to some real or imagined moment of perfection. But it can also wear its struggle with the world on its sleeve and supply the energy for a creative act bound to the present, in which the artist attempts to achieve some kind of spiritual state that overcomes a wounding reality. The individual does not evade the moment, but struggles with it openly—and the struggle is an angry one, directed not only against an unacceptable world but also against time itself. Such a person sees himself as alone. The more evasive nostalgia tends to dissolve the ego; the mind creates in fantasy a perfectly harmonious landscape into which the self blends without a hitch and disappears into the general bliss. In contrast, Genet's nostalgia erects a demonic ego, fighting a present he never stops facing, and overcoming it on his own.

The nature of this demonic, romantic egoism, its infinitely complex dialectic, and its ethical and aesthetic ramifications have been encyclopedically explored by Sartre in Saint Genet (it is an encyclopedia without an index), and I refer anyone interested in the philosophic dimension of Genet's romanticism to that maniacally analytic work. I don't see how anything more can possibly be said on the subject. Some feel that Sartre's dialectics fail to grasp the real genius of Genet: the sensuous glory of the spectacle. I don't agree with this argument—Genet is a philosophic novelist, and his work is inseparable from the serpentine subtlety of his intellect. But it is true that Saint Genet is more important to an understanding of Sartre's intellectual position than it is to a reading of Genet, and there is no need to resort to it to grasp what is. I would argue, a philosophic spectacle rendered in strictly poetic terms.

Still, this spectacle creates a strange kind of poetry in 1967. Genet seems to be an increasingly isolated figure in current literature (but then these books, written in the forties, are not current); isolated particularly in France where the classical austerity of the new novel has moved in the opposite direction from his hyperbole, and even in America, where such would-be poets of the ego as Norman Mailer have run into a dead end—failing to get in touch with the poetic resources that keep Genet's prose aloft—and thus have been forced to use every journalistic ploy (including bashes, gratis, for theatregoers on Christopher Street) to keep the glorious ego out in front and running.

I think the explanation of his artistic isolation lies in the facts of Genet's life. Like Mailer, Genet is inordinately aware of his audience, but as a real (rather than self-appointed) outcast he sees his audience as a mass of aliens, as those who have cast him out, as them. His first three books (including this one) were written in a prison cell, under a blanket at night, and hidden in the toilet (where else?) during the day. Genet's whole life has been determined by a real—and very clearly defined—sense of transgression. And for Genet's variety of romanticism, transgression is really a formal property which gives the art its substance and seriousness.

Genet's wretched early life gave him a resounding sense of alienation to which few romantics can aspire, and this unique relation to his audience contains in its interesting impasse a set of artistic possibilities which most authors, lost little children of their own class, have to hoke up as entertainment. But the point is not what society will or will not accept but rather how the artist embodies his own relation to the rest of the world. Ultimately the whole question resolves into a poetic issue: the form the artist gives his isolation—which is why Baudelaire even today retains his singular isolation (damned for sins long forgotten) while Mailer, no matter how jazzy the crime, remains one of us.

The central portion of Miracle of the Rose moves in a single, uninterrupted block, although one richly strewn with the wherewithal for Sartrean dialectics. This part of the book is much more talky than is either Our Lady of the Flowers or Funeral Rites (a novel whose structural technique is considerably more inventive than either). Genet's prose is always rather episodic. Typically, he is excited by some real event (meeting a handsome convict on the stairs, seeing a fist fight in the prison yard) and proceeds to expound on it, using his unique mixture of fantasy and intellectual reflection. The other two novels find devices to make this stop-and-start narration more clear-cut and lucid than it is in Miracle of the Rose, which sometimes allows its energy to be wasted in talk rather than in keeping things moving at the relentless clip they require.

Some readers (not myself, however) may find this talkiness sufficient compensation for the aesthetic lapse. This is the book in which Genet most extensively discusses his ideas as ideas: here the sociology of his prison life is most fully presented. (Both ideas and information, by the way, are of considerable interest and are expounded with great intelligence.) Needless to add that these expositions are not for “our” bene-

I WANT TO HELP BUILD A HUMAN BRIDGE TO RUSSIA WITH CITIZEN EXCHANGE CORPS This Summer

Send me FREE reprints of N.Y. Times editorials telling how CITIZEN EXCHANGE CORPS (CEC), a non-political, non-profit organization acts to implement Presidents Eisenhower, Kennedy and Johnson's policy of "Building Bridges" to Russia. Tell me how I can participate this summer in a 3 week CEC program of people-to-people contact and seminars that is open to Americans of all ages and occupations. AND HOW THIS PROGRAM CAN BE A MAJOR STEP TOWARD PREVENTING NUCLEAR WAR.

3 WEEK EXCHANGE VISITS LEAVE NEW YORK CITY
July 14 — Aug. 5 — Aug. 26 or Meet CEC in Moscow

Name
Address
City
State Zip

Mail to:
CITIZEN
EXCHANGE CORPS.
550 Fifth Ave. (Dept. N-1)
New York City 10036

fit—Genet neither amuses nor instructs his audience (at least not consciously). He seems more concerned with clarifying his life and intellectual position for his own benefit, and getting it down on paper. But to my mind, these maneuvers (evidently a necessary step toward his own maturity) make parts of the central portion of the book somewhat clumsy, in contrast to Funeral Rites.

These are minor failings in view of the book's whole achievement. The transgression succeeds on a profound level that has nothing to do with sexual mores or one's opinion as to whether Jean Genet is or is not a nasty man. In a period in which most art is moving in other directions, Miracle of the Rose is a monument to a peculiarly virile kind of energy: an act of transgression and completeness that puts before "us" the determination to create itself autonomously, to stand on its own terms. It begins in rebellion and ends as a work of self-contained beauty which no longer needs "us" to give it meaning. There it stands, unfolding the private splendor of its romance, showing all the tough, curling thorns that will scratch the hand that touches it.

lived too long with, and too close to, the unthinkable.

The people of the village behaved with courage and humanity in the early hours of the crisis, succoring the survivors of the crash—surprisingly there were some survivors—and making determined efforts to rescue the hopelessly smashed and burning bodies of the victims. The parish priest, with his cassock actually on fire, tried to administer the last rites of his Church. Warily, the reader feels at this point: "We have only their own word for it." The chain of events is in itself so ugly that evidences of normal decency and compassion induce skepticism. Perhaps the U.S. authorities reacted similarly, for there has been no official recognition on their part of any sense of obligation toward the villagers. Perhaps spontaneous gratitude for spontaneous generosity got lost in the dreariness of the haggling over compensation claims.

This book does not make enlivening reading, but it is salutary. Even if we can no longer react to it with any intensity, it is necessary for us to realize what the world we live in is really like. Sometimes, as here, it is intellectually, as distinct from emotionally, more feasible to do this in microcosm.

More Callous Than We Know

THE BOMBS OF PALOMARES. By Tad Szulc. The Viking Press. 288 pp. $6.50.

MAIRE CRUISE O'BRIEN

Mrs. O'Brien is a former Irish diplomat who spent two years as Secretary of Embassy in Madrid.

This is a lucid, conscientious and humane account of how on January 17, 1966, a B-52 bomber of the Strategic Air Command carrying four hydrogen bombs collided, while refueling, with an aerial tanker over southeastern Spain, and of how both aircraft exploded in midair, filling the sky with flame. Providentially the bombs jettisoned in time, and although two of them were involved in minor explosions the electro-mechanical safety devices against accidental detonation proved effective. Had they not. . . . ?

It is a grim commentary on our society that, for one reader at least, this admirable piece of reporting gives off an undeniable aura of anticlimax and déjà-vu. We know about "overkill"; we know we live under the constant menace of just such an accident as this was; we know that the danger we are in is not confined to the sphere of accident. One of the four bombs fell in the sea and took months of organized search to recover; we remember the interlude as comic—it is the classic refuge of impotence.

We are told that as a result of the rupture of the casings around the missiles' warheads in the two minor explosions, some of the inhabitants of the village of Palomares may in twelve to thirty years' time develop cancers due to plutonium poisoning. We know that for the best part of a year their lives were disrupted, their livelihood gravely prejudiced, and that they will have to live with the repercussions of this visitation in terms of social and economic disadvantage for a long time to come. Against the background of the headlines we read daily it seems a relatively benign tragedy; we have become more callous than we know. A good deal of very serious criticism has been leveled by the author and other professional journalists at the inept handling by the United States of the release of information. Their points are well taken, but, already the entire occurrence seems peripheral and remote—like the village of Palomares itself or the death of President Kennedy.

In part, this lackluster impression is a function of the book's virtues. Mr. Szulc knows and loves Spain and conveys its authentic claustrophobic atmosphere with rare success. The result is an orchestration of boredoms: the desperate boredom of poverty, the frustration and hardship of Lorca's Andalusia—the boredom of the Top Brass, Dr. Strangelove's people—of the provisional and the arbitrary which is the hallmark of General Franco's police state—the glossy boredom of the diplomatic corps. They are all here and their dehumanized and deadening interactions are faithfully recorded. When a little boy of 9 called Tony (the author's son?) takes an unscheduled part in the ghastly ambassadorial "swim-in," which declared the Mediterranean free from radioactive contamination, one feels like cheering: "Here at last is somebody real!"

Mr. Szulc is scrupulously fair to the American health and decontamination teams who, at the cost of much labor, checked the radiation hazards in the area, did away with them, and restored the physical environment to normal. Yet they do not emerge as likable people. Their devotion to duty was unquestionable, their approach to human problems detached and perfunctory. How could it be otherwise? They had

VACATION PLUS
If you can't go abroad,
let us bring the world to
you at

WORLD FELLOWSHIP

June 19-Sept. 5

Combine recreation and conferences
—Civil Rights, Affluence and Poverty,
Religion-Marxist dialog, Vietnam,
China, USSR, Africa, Middle East.
Reasonable rates. Relaxation and insight at our 300-acre forest-lake-mountain estate.

For full information address
WORLD FELLOWSHIP
Conway, New Hampshire 03818

MAO TSE-TUNG'S

- Selected Works in 4 vols., ea. $2.75
- Poems $3.00
- Selected Military Writings $2.75
- Quotations, the original handbook of the Chinese Red Guards; also Lin Piao's People's War, both $1.00
- Subscriptions to Peking Review $4.00

Send payment with orders to:

CHINA BOOKS & PERIODICALS

Licensed Importers & Distributors
2929 24 St., San Francisco 94110

Free catalog on request

A Usable Critic

WILLIAM TROY: Selected Essays. Edited and with an introduction by Stanley Edgar Hyman. Rutgers University Press. 314 pp. $9.

CHARLES T. SAMUELS

Mr. Samuels teaches English at Williams College. He has written for The Kenyon Review, The Yale Review, Commonweal and other magazines.

While introducing William Troy, a critic who flourished in the thirties and forties, Stanley Edgar Hyman complains that ours is an Age of Epigones; but critics are less responsible for the decline than Hyman seems to think. "R. W. B. Lewis [may be] less than Matthiessen, Norman Podhoretz [may be] less than Lionel Trilling," but Saul Bellow is also less than William Faulkner; Robert Lowell less than T. S. Eliot.

When Troy was writing for several magazines including The Nation (to which he contributed regularly on movies as well as books), Proust had just been translated, the novels of Malraux were coming out, and Finnegans Wake was not yet complete. Little wonder that criticism today seems puny by contrast.

Coming from that age of great literature and seminal criticism, a figure like Troy, who wrote about seventy critical pieces and no book, is easily forgotten. Lacking the theoretical brilliance of a critic like Kenneth Burke, or even the exemplary methods of Trilling or Empson, Troy was too eclectic for easy labeling, and thus for packaging in histories of criticism. His attempts at theory, like the essay on tragedy here reprinted, were both loose and unoriginal; his most suggestive theoretical statements were likely to have been tossed off in the heat of battle, in more practical pieces. Nor was he great by virtue of extent of interest or influence: protean like Edmund Wilson, or messianic like Leavis. Yet Troy is eminently worth reviving, just as he was dangerous to forget. Because of their very distinctiveness, the methods and gifts of more famous critics have hardened into tools or commandments (Epigones are not only lesser, they are likely to be more doctrinaire). With his lucid sensibility and freedom from restrictive categories, Troy may prove a more fruitful model than those great critics who begin to seem larger than writers and have thus become distractions from literature itself.

Though Troy was not a theoretician, his criticism was informed by an intelligence so balanced that where many the-oreticians took up positions in logical traps, Troy easily avoids them. At the very moment when scholars and critics were either treating literature like polemics or investigating ideas as if belles-lettres was a sub-category of history or philosophy (only rather effete and somewhat unreliable), Troy acknowledged both the centrality of literary ideas and their distinction from ideas in other forms:

... metaphysics is concerned with devising a picture of the world by means of the rational intellect, literature with recreating this world in the fullness and immediacy with which it appears to an individual personality. . . . The most we can say about the ideas or philosophy of an artist is that they resemble some intellectual formulations with which we are acquainted.

With this alert, refined conception, Troy can in "The Lawrence Myth" precisely delineate the ideas buried in Lawrence's work, then use them to expose the romantic death worship which subverts Lawrence's more apparent notions and, finally, the very world he wants to create:

To discard reason is to throw over the only thing that can give life definition. Lawrence's program is, in the last analysis, a program for a mystery god—but hardly for a man. And Dionysius in every age can terminate his agony only by dissolving into his native element.

On the question of form's relationship to content, which threatened to turn some 20th-century critics into secular mystics, Troy is eminently sensible. Recognizing that "the art of poetry" has always been the "maintenance of the proper harmony between the sound and the meaning of words," he falls neither into an irresponsible fixation on form (still with us in the criticism of Susan Sontag) or that exaltation of content which characterized his epoch—overtly in Marxist criticism, covertly in the disguised religiousness of the Southern critics. With strategic brilliance, he uses the poetic jottings of Paul Valéry (a culture hero for many of the interested parties) to insist that in poetry, form and content are "engaged in an intense conflict with each other, on an equal plane, to produce the poem. Or rather this conflict is itself the poem—la forme sensible." Armed with this subtle definition, Troy attacks the triumph of style over content in Virginia Woolf, which he rightly predicted would harm the novel's subsequent growth.

Free from that specious Philistinism which infects defenders of naturalistic fiction, Troy never embraced the obverse fetish: the "poetic" novel.

Thus, confronted with the romantic penumbra and ironic prose style of Stendhal, he can still prefer the documentary amplitude of Balzac, showing that Balzac's details are always subordinated to his grasp of truth.

Yet Troy's essay on Stendhal is perhaps his most dazzling. Combining close analysis of action with biographical, psychological and historical inferences, tactfully framed, Troy shows how Stendhal exemplifies a cultural idea, thereby exemplifying his own large sense of the meaning of literature:

Baylism is indeed as good as any other label to cover the moral and intellectual anarchy of the undefined individualism of the modern world. For actually the romantic will, as we have seen it [in Stendhal] is nothing but instinct parading as Machiavellian reason. The cult of the Moi becomes a cult of self-destruction the moment the individual realizes the interdependence between the sense of his own being and society. The notion of an altogether free and irresponsible individuality becomes a metaphysical conundrum if one inquires how an individual could exist without a social environment to which he may offer the resistance by which he can be measured and defined. And it may be shown that when the individual makes his instinct the sole measure not only of himself but also of the universe, as did Stendhal and many other writers of his century, he runs the risk of becoming indistinguishable from the universe—which may provide certain satisfactions but certainly destroys the possibility of individuality. In fact, he achieves a state that is indistinguishable from the state of death.

In his introduction, Hyman praises Troy for his originality, which is indeed impressive. More impressive is the enduring rightness of his judgment. He was early in analyzing The Magic Mountain, but it is more thrilling to see him finally realize that Mann's intellectual richness is shallow, that he is not "in the last analysis, un homme sérieux." His balanced dismissals of Virginia Woolf and Gertrude Stein have become standard, as has his partial retraction in Woolf's case. Honor is due Troy for being the first to recognize that "Absolution" is Fitzgerald's greatest story, but more honor is due him for recognizing it at all.

Through selfless devotion to the work at hand, Troy seldom attains the distinctive prose style of asserted personality. Nor is he notably witty. Yet when a sharp definition is needed, he can be felicitous. Thus Stendhal's heroes are "superior young men who hover about the great bonfire of love without ever wishing to approach near enough to get burned"; Malraux's The Royal Way "represents an exhaustion through the imagination, a kind of vicarious purging of the mood which was the legacy of the last generation of European writers to the present"; tragedy "provides us with a means of vision for the correction of individual astigmatism by humility." It was, after all, Troy who dubbed Fitzgerald "the Authority of Failure."

Troy was perhaps too free from the contemporary emphasis on textual analysis; his one essay on poetry ("Antony and Cleopatra: The Poetic Vision") is distressingly casual, and he seldom peers very closely through the lens of a writer's prose. Too often, his intense regard for literature makes him ask it for salvation (but in this he merely partakes in the widespread inflation without which the age's great criticism would probably not have been possible).

He was not, either in scope or intensity, a mover and shaker. But when confronted with a text, he analyzed it with a firm sense both of its inherent meaning and of its cultural implications, in a style which expresses seriousness of commitment precisely and clearly. He was better than a seminal critic; he was a usable one. That he should have been forgotten is the mark of his achievement. In the excitement of being urged back to the text, good criticism is meant to be forgotten.

ART

MAX KOZLOFF

It invokes only one more insoluble historical puzzle to ask why Italy, after an extremely adventurous beginning in Futurism, contributed hardly a trickle to the development of 20th-century art. None of the great names, and few of the lesser ones, in our aesthetic life since Cubism, are Italian. In sympathy with the general retrenching into Classicist values, and the incipient conservatism of a "new reality" that marked the twenties, Italian painting went even further and swept itself into a deep provincialism. The stillness that presided over its forms then was almost a talisman of mental apathy. Exhaustion was camouflaged by a certain archaism. If the machine had been exalted by the Futurists as a breakthrough into a new nationalism—of the modern mind—the ideals of the early Quattrocento substituted for it a narrow cultural nationalism in the work of their successors. Within this mold, but also providing the lone exception to it, by virtue of his incredibly modest intensity, was Georgio Morandi (now showing at a handsome exhibition at the Loeb and Krugier Gallery).

Despite the poverty of his colors, the single-mindedness of his theme and the physical smallness of his still lifes, Morandi's sources and references are complex. Di Chirico, of Greek origin, was enamored of Böcklin and Courbet, as well as Masaccio and Uccello. It is usually said of Morandi that he owed his greatest allegiance to Cézanne and especially Seurat. To be sure, the spirit of the latter infuses Morandi's beautiful etchings, with their delicate but pervasive gray hatchings and leafy tonal silhouettes through whose meshes a granulated light barely sieves. And in his background, there is Corot, who constructed equivalents of perceived value changes by the most precisely controlled contrasts which yet always seem bold and loose. If Corot taught everyone in this respect, Morandi's connection with him, right into this decade, is fonder and more intimate. But the real affinity shown in the Loeb exhibition is with that still obscure group of 19th-century Italian artists called the "Macchiaioli." Contemporary with the Impressionists, such men as Giovanni Fattori and Giuseppe Abbati, variously involved with the Risorgimento, had formulated a vision where shadows were observed as flat zones, and where vivid spots ("macchia") of local color told against the blond or drab campagna. Here the will toward illustrated sentiment, which had marred so much of Italian art a century ago, found subtler expression in the isolation of a very few forms, and a concomitant sense of abandonment. Morandi owes more to their registration of the oppressive aspects of their surroundings, than does Edward Hopper, say, to Winslow Homer. But instead of the rootlessness and desolation of the American experience, there is, in these Italian petits maîtres, an environment of refuge inflected with a nostalgia for the Renaissance. Yet, that they were so wedded to the immediate evidence of their eyes, however much they were inclined to simplify or abstract it, saved them from schematism, and worse, academicism. The most diffident yearning informs their art, in which a still-life configuration and a landscape subject crystallize into images of immobility. Perhaps some unconscious longing can be inferred in Morandi, too, since the taller of his spindly or fluted bottles, with their slightly wavering necks, resemble the old leaning towers of his native Bologna.

From all this cultural humus sprouted the most tender flower of an art, one that wears its associations so lightly because it is actually concentrated elsewhere, on only a tiny corner of existence. For in the end (as well as the beginning), there is nothing to support Morandi except his sensibility—a mode of seeing, a way of touching paint onto canvas, his counterpointed little groupings, a preference for certain colors within a very restricted range. These are the obvious features of his work, and they would never have served to bring notice, much less admiration, for his name, were it not for the muted breadth with which he invested them.

Of the earlier creations of his life, those sometimes harshly lit and highly designed flower pieces and scullery collections that relate a good deal to Carrá's Pittura Metafisica, there is hardly an example in the current show. This lack deprives us of a full idea of his development. But it is also true that the mood of their deliberate timelessness would have had quite a period look to it. Paradoxically, it is only when Morandi concentrates on an individual moment, his wrist tensing or relaxing in response to prerequisites of individual pressures, that a special "look" fades away. Then one knows that the goal is neither meditation nor an effect but only the realization of

I Want to Know How I Can Send a "Citizen Diplomat" to Russia for $450 (Tax Deductible) this Summer

Send me N.Y. Times editorials and information about CITIZEN EXCHANGE CORPS (CEC), a non-political, non-profit, tax-exempt foundation. TELL ME how I can help the future of our country as outlined in Presidents Eisenhower, Kennedy and Johnson's "Bridge Building" policy, by offering a scholarship for a three week study-exchange visit to the USSR this summer. TELL ME how my $450 contribution will be matched by an American student, adult or senior citizen of my choice (or from your list of qualified applicants). And how he will give me a personal report of his study and people-to-people meetings.

I WANT TO TAKE THIS POSITIVE STEP TOWARD MUTUAL UNDERSTANDING TO HELP PREVENT NUCLEAR WAR

CITIZEN EXCHANGE CORPS

CEC Building, Dept. N-450, 10 West 46th St., NY, NY 10036

his own manner, which is indifferent to historical styles (though, of course, it constitutes a very distinct style in itself). For the reason that his process of realization is noncumulative, Morandi, in fact, cannot be said to have an observable development. It is only his virtuosity, not "progression," in any sense, that absorbs him. But it is hardly a virtuosity that wants to demonstrate itself; it is not its own reason for being. Rather, the sensations he is after are available solely through conserving energy and underplaying his hand. But the beauty of the completed work can be derived only through a knowledge that he has resources which can be underplayed. There is no sense of struggle in anything he does, but neither is there a sense of easy, self-displaying accomplishment. In this intermediate zone lie his exquisitely refined taste and his lingering pleasure.

For there can be no doubt that pleasure of an extremely rare kind, disguising itself as homeliness, motivates the spread of his thin pastes and his translucent scrubbings. Morandi is constantly edging or finding the edge, of a plate or candelabra, with a slow, slightly snipped or quivering contour that conveys a hesitation without being indecisive. Because of its infinite sequence of starts and stops, this contour makes one aware of shape as something precious. However plausible in itself, shape appears to be conferred on the object rather more than to belong inherently to it. Additionally, the figure-ground relationship is a reciprocally molding interaction, at least along the termination of any plane. There is a felt sense of demarcations mutually adjusting the paths of their shortest tangents—a phenomenon which reduces an already laconic drawing to a few creases of shadow between flattened pitchers or bowls. Within a huddled-in profile, not disturbed by the minimal differences of cylinder and cube, yet frequently set off internally by checkered alternations of light and dark, Morandi's humble objects are ceaselessly restudied.

They give off an air of being almost unwitting icons, admired for their dusty surfaces and dulled glints. Through subtle degrees of definition, which never look either summary or too particular, they are made to inhabit a closed-off ambience of their own. Almost invariably frontal in their presentation, these pepper mills and flasks are dead-pan foils for each other, accented by slight vertical tiltings, or one very gentle foreshortening. But, whether the artist brings them up close, to be examined as if under a telephoto lens, or establishes a mid-ground where they hug each other in lonely protection against the void, the very aestheticism of his processes is transmuted into a droll conversation of forms. Kettles are shown to have satellite spice boxes, or wine bottles lord it over creamers. Spigots and handles act as commalike flanges that move in opposite directions. There are also pompous symmetries that contrast ironically with the prosaic identity of the objects of which they are composed. Be they of fat and thin, or bulbous and rectangular, such contrasts are enough to remind one that Morandi is the legatee of the oldest tradition of caricature in Western art.

LOOKING OUT AT NIGHT OVER ROOFTOPS

I

*A window opens late at night.
I hear voices riding in from the horizon,
Pale bears that tumble end over end,
With hair in their eyes, blotting out the stars,
Leaving a musty odor in the night, like rain.*

II

*Which of these lights is my own,
And which has been carried by the darkness
That falls in my sleep?
I look out and see their small eyes burning
Like candles. The night-moths
Shield them with their wings.*

III

*My body turns to stillness.
Stars fall close to my skin, unable to change
The darkness. They are the inner side
Of the land, what the fingers cannot touch
Except when, through the rough skin of the night,
They touch themselves.*

PAUL ZWEIG

With the driest of affection, he seems to me an underground participant in that tradition, of which it is now hard to tell if still life is the pretext or the goal.

But the most remarkable of his strategies has to do with light and color. Light, when it does not congeal as a creamy highlight on a bottle, or is isolated by delicate but opaque slivers of shadow, is a curious bleaching element. Whatever its permutations, it behaves as a white-on-white matrix, out of which color precipitates almost reluctantly. Here, a certain optical faintness emphasizes the tangibility of the calm slides of bristle marks. One adjusts to its rarified and chalky tonalities only a little more slowly than to the full-bodied and heavily saturated hues in which modern art customarily disports itself. What is more, these pale lemons, ambers, coffee browns, buffs, lavenders and diaphanous blues, slightly curdled and recherché, relate to the primary hues the way off-white relates to white. In the sense in which they withhold, and yet imply, deeper assonant energies, they comprise a highly articulate and personal chromaticism. Fairly often, a picture can go fuzzy in this precarious domain; but when Morandi picks out an accent, he can make even the most timid of salmon resoundingly musical. At such moments, and there are happily many in the present show, his focus is so adjusted that he joins in that line of pictorial luminism (in which half-lights are liquefied with magical clarity), to which Vermeer also belonged. Here archaism, that protective mask, evaporates, giving way to a breeding fortified by matchless poetry.

The Best Way To Get

THE NATION

THE NATION 6-12-67
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

- ☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ 6 Months, $6
☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Foreign and Canadian Postage
$1 a year extra)

NAME

ADDRESS

CITY

STATE ZIP NO.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1205

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS:

- 1 Henry, or Tudor? Lord knows how to live with it! (5, 5)
- 6 and 10 An artist might be occupied so, when there's no advance. (11)
- 11 See 1 down
- 12 Some stars are sheltered, or perhaps checked for qualifications. (8)
- 13 Macbeth was to pack one article in another. (5)
- 15 A useful thing, like dishes, perhaps. (5)
- 17 English to Gaelic? (9)
- 19 Chicken with brine? It proves the Chinese have depth. (6, 3)
- 21 Beat with a shovel? (5)
- 23 A call on friends with the precious little things! (5)
- 24 Corrupted a version of Neptune's other name. (8)
- 27 Periods of activity for bats? (7)
- 28 One of the twelve tribes has a solid fence, so duck! (7)
- 29 Self-administered by Father William's young man? (Perhaps one hangs out in the open this way.) (4)
- 30 Was 14 barely visible to him? (7, 3)

DOWN:

- 1 and 11 Forced to choose a course, but not placed on the rack. (4-2-5)
- 2 With minor annoyances, is missing shades of color. (7)
- 3 Lift one likes to get on the job. (5)

- 4 They deal with more than one bank that supplies them with notes of all kinds. (9)
- 5 Is it the stuffing that makes one? (5)
- 7 Set down a country and continent, in short, and state the total. (7)
- 8 He worships false lashes? (10)
- 9 It's unavailing to be in need of shoes! (8)
- 14 One of the first demonstrators for tax relief. (4, 6)
- 16 The nights spent waltzing to Strauss when one is out? (8)
- 18 Confusing the opposite of what one might be doing on the first cruise? (7, 2)
- 20 One who is starting out right in the middle of the less productive years? (7)
- 22 Take part a trifle too rambunctiously? (7)
- 24 To be able to help the sheriff? (5)
- 25 Led on from the days of the past. (5)
- 26 Sounds like a straight line of fruit. (4)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1204

ACROSS: 1 Buffalo nickel; 9 Ascot; 10 Top-drawer; 11 Tell off; 12 Scandal; 13 Quits; 14 Tailspins; 16 Associate; 18 Tiber; 19 Tidings; 21 Abalone; 22 Riot squad; 23 All in; 24 Space stations. DOWN: 1 Beat to Quarters; 2 Faculties; 3 Authors; 4 and 20 Out-of-doors; 5 Impassive; 6 Koreans; 7 Lowed; 8 Drill sergeants; 14 Transmute; 15 Imbroglio; 17 Canasta; 18 Tea cart; 21 Audit.

ART

ORIGINALS COST LESS THAN REPRODUCTIONS! Contemporary original signed etchings, lithographs, woodcuts, $3.50. Guarantee. Free brochure. GRAPHIC CIRCLE (NA), 111 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10011.

EDUCATIONAL

FIVE DAY BOARDING SCHOOL. A unique program for people who have not even considered a boarding school. Grades five through eight. THE THOREAU SCHOOL. An intimate, cooperative community, combining study with the tasks and joys of farm living. School bus brings your children home to NYC week-ends. Small classes, individual instruction. Now enrolling for September. Write: Rodman, RD 1, Wallkill, N.Y. 12589. Phone: 914-895-5523.

If you are interested in a SECULAR JEWISH EDUCATION

for your children this fall, stressing Hebrew conversation, dance, song, Jewish History and Culture, contact:

Pioneer Hebrew Schools
150 Fifth Ave., N.Y.C. 10011 ■ 255-8760
Schools in Queens, Brooklyn, Manhattan

PUBLICATIONS

"SELECTED POEMS" of George Flynn (Villiers of London $2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound."—James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at 544-82 St., Brooklyn 9, N.Y.

THE IDLER. Lively, offbeat, liberal monthly. $1 brings four different sample back issues. Idler, 413B 6th St., N.E., Washington, D.C. 20002.

AMERICAN HAIKU magazine. Subscription —$3.00 yearly. Box 73, Platteville, Wisconsin 53818.

THE BLUFF OF DEGODDING THE HUMANS by Bibi Beebi, 116 pp., price $3.00. Popular Non-Newtonian, etc., physics, astronomy, cultureology, philosophy. The Inventist, P.O. Box 17039, Los Angeles, Calif. 90017.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALGONQUIN 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

PERSONALS

I WANT TO KNOW
HOW THE CITIZEN
EXCHANGE CORPS
(non-political . . . non-profit)

BUILDS HUMAN BRIDGES TO RUSSIA

Write:
CITIZEN EXCHANGE CORPS
Dept. N-2, 550 Fifth Ave., NYC 10036

USE LAWFUL DIRECT ACTION to repeal all abortion laws LEGALIZE ABORTION, POB 24163, Los Angeles, Calif. 90024.

NON-PROFIT CAMP (Interracial, interreligious) desperately needs donation of pianos. Tax deductible. Will pick up. Box 600, c/o The Nation.

Advertising Rates

CLASSIFIED

74c a line (6 words) Three-line minimum

CLASSIFIED DISPLAY

$7.42 per inch (minimum)

The NATION

333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014
242-8400

Forewarned Is Forearmed

Tomorrow's top news story need not always catch you unprepared. Time and again, The Nation has called attention to coming events well before they happened. Two examples:

On November 19, 1960, we carried a story about the impending Bay of Pigs disaster, which actually occurred six months later. On March 27 of this year, we warned of the coming coup in Greece, four weeks before it hit the headlines. What Nation subscribers are reading this week is giving them a "sneak preview" of some of the front page news of next month, or next year. Why not join this group of alert and forewarned citizens?

subscribe to

THE NATION

This is a studied rebuke by Howard Zinn (ex-bombardier, historian, civil rights activist) to America's continued military presence in what he calls "a theatre of the absurd." The price of that presence (primarily in lives, but also in national honor and in money needed to build America's own "Great Society" and help with the economic development of Southeast Asia) is calculated, weighed, and found indefensible.

To those who argue that our international reputation would suffer, that there is an analogy from Munich, or that we must contain communism or lose the game of dominoes—The Logic of Withdrawal as Zinn develops it is both forthright and persuasive.

FREE with each NEW subscription

The NATION
333 6th Avenue
New York, N.Y. 10014

Herewith my order and payment for a NEW subscription to The Nation. Please send my FREE copy of VIETNAM: THE LOGIC OF WITHDRAWAL.

☐ 1 Year, $10 ☐ 2 Years, $18 ☐ 6 Mos., $6
(Foreign and Canadian Postage: $1 per year extra)

name

address

city state zip no.

6-12-67

Fill out the subscription coupon at left, and start receiving The Nation, this country's oldest weekly journal of opinion.

THEATRE IN EUROPE I HAROLD CLURMAN

THE
NATION

JUNE 19, 1967 35 cents

BURLINGAME

JUN 19 1967

LIBRARY

SMALL WARS: THE PERIL ESCALATES

SEYMOUR MELMAN

CLASS OF '67

THE GENTLE DESPERADOES

Harold Kaplan Karl Shapiro R.J. Kaufmann
Allan Seager J.A. Bryant, Jr. John R. Willingham
Lawrence Lipking Wallace Stegner

SUPERSONIC TRANSPORT III / KARL M. RUPPENTHAL

GAMES WITH SNOW WHITE / SHAUN O'CONNELL
THE NONPERSONALITY CULT / ALEXANDER WERTH
THE POLITICS OF ART / SHERMAN PAUL

2-21-68R PLS-1449
BURLINGAME PUBLIC
LIBRARY
BURLINGAME CA 94010

LETTERS

boom

Cambridge, Mass.

DEAR SIR: Karl M. Ruppenthal's articles on the proposed supersonic transport plane (SST), in The Nation of May 22 and May 29, bring out for the first time many of the serious shortcomings of the program. . . . Additional facts that Ruppenthal might have mentioned are: (1) When and if the SSTs are in routine use over the United States, the amount of damage their sonic booms may be expected to do to window glass, plaster, etc., is more than $1 million per day, according to a straightforward estimate based on Air Force and FAA reports on recent sonic boom tests at Chicago and St. Louis. (2) The FAA admits that there is no cure for the sonic boom. (3) It continues to refuse to ban supersonic flight over land. (4) It has no feasible plan whereby a homeowner can collect for damage done to his house.

William A. Shurcliff, Director,
Citizens League Against the Sonic Boom

Alan Swallow

San Francisco, Calif.

DEAR SIR: The place of Alan Swallow in American letters is a proud one. As poet, critic, teacher, and one of the great individualistic publishers of the country, he will take his place in history as a man of many gifts. In a time of growing conformity, when committees of editors are the rule in most publications and publishing houses, he remained the champion of individual taste and choice. One could disagree with him, but one had always to respect his judgment and integrity. Starting with his own hand press, he built up a large publishing business with a remarkable and varied group of writers. His untimely death occurred as he was receiving ever wider recognition of his achievements as a writer, editor and publisher. Those of us who published with him and knew him as a friend will miss him greatly. We hope that the means will be found to continue his rare and unique publishing venture as a memorial to him, and we pledge ourselves to help in any way that we can.

Mark Harris Hester G. Storm Richard McBride James Schevill Alvaro Cardona-Hine Walter Van Tilburg Clark Thomas McGrath Jack Beeching Richard Lyons Allen Tate Allen Planz J. V. Cunningham Natalie S. Robins Frank Waters Howard Baker Kay Boyle Yvor Winters Janet Lewis Vincent McHugh Harvey Shapiro Anais Nin Roger Hecht Martin Robbins Frederick Manfred Gus Blaisdell.

don't forget

Berkeley, Calif.

DEAR SIR: This coming summer . . . there will be mass migration of young Americans and some foreign youth to the San Francisco-East Bay area. . . . Many of these will be people of draft age. We are to be witness to a vast, artificial grouping of draft-age men, assembling under the eyes of those who are responsible for filling Johnson's war quotas. Now how long do you think it will be before the local police and federal agents start having sidewalk- and street-blocks, stopping all young "rebel" types and demanding to see the sacred draft card?

You all recall reading at least a line or two in your American History text about the Civil War Draft Riots. And do you remember that in New York and other cities many men—often Irish and immigrants just escaped from Europe's armies—fought armed gun battles with the state's agent, sometimes for weeks at a time?

That's all.

Joseph E. Fasciani

EDITORIALS

The Great De-Mythification

The military victory of Israel in the Middle East not only confronted the amazed world with a fantastically successful blitzkrieg but also punctured irreparably, in forty-eight hours, three carefully nurtured myths of international life: the image of President Nasser as the leader of the Arab world (which he had hoped to refurbish with the bold blockade of Aqaba), the present capability of the Arab nations to encircle and strangle Israel and, perhaps most important, the effective solidarity of the Soviet Union with the Arab countries in their struggle against Israel as a "tool of Western imperialism."

The upheavals created by the collapse of the first two of these grand illusions are yet to take shape and are primarily a matter of regional concern. Of more immediate interest is the fact that the UN Security Council was the stage for the toppling of the Soviet Union from its posture of champion of the Arab peoples. Ironically, this dramatic event was the only visible result of the intense activity around the Council's chamber, while the fate of the war was being decided solely on the field of battle. It was an obligation for the Security Council to go through the motions of calling for a cease-fire, although most diplomats were convinced that Israel would not heed such a call until it had obtained guarantees for its survival. Yet even this academic attempt was frustrated in the early stages by the opposing views of the United States and the Soviet Union. Washington wanted an unconditional cease-fire resolution; Moscow insisted on a clause calling for withdrawal of the Israeli forces to the positions they held before the 5th of June—that is, their abandonment of newly occupied Egyptian territory.

The only interest of this sterile exercise was to demonstrate once more that in the absence of agreement between the United States and the USSR the United Nations is powerless to assume even a purely formal role in peace-keeping. The impasse was total and the Council's well-meant agitation empty to the point of being ludicrous. All of a sudden, while the columns of General Dayan raced through the Sinai, the situation changed. It became clear to the Soviet Union that it had miscalculated, that the expensive armaments it had supplied to Nasser over the last few years lay destroyed on the ground and that the USSR might be called upon to intervene directly. Attributing—not without grounds—a similar reasoning to Washington in case of serious difficulties for Israel, Moscow backed down.

Nikolai Fedorenko signed with Arthur Goldberg on the dotted line of a resolution which contained only a call for a cease-fire, without condemnation of Israel or any request for withdrawal. Israel, which had already reached its objectives, welcomed the resolution, but continued to press on. A few hours later, the Arabs accepted the resolution to save themselves from utter rout. Following its tradition of realism in foreign policy, the Soviet Government had chosen to limit a political commitment rather than engage in a military adventure, possibly against the United States.

Although the Kremlin warned Tel Aviv that it would break diplomatic relations with it and "take other measures" if Israel did not stop its "aggression," these threats must be a meager consolation to the United Arab Republic in its hour of need. Arab history books may well cite the Soviet defection as the "stab in the back" in this ill-fated episode, rather than the "attack" by American and British planes, which was obviously invented by Cairo in the heat of the moment as a desperate excuse for its military disaster.

This may well be the vanishing point of a Russian dream. Unless the Soviet Union changes its course again very soon (a most unlikely possibility), its steadily built foothold in the Middle East will be destroyed, its role as a protector of the nations recently freed from colonialism at an end, its financial and ideological investments bankrupted. A few weeks ago, the African nations denounced in the General Assembly the withdrawal of Soviet support for their plans for a confrontation with South Africa over the territory of South West Africa. The "grand disillusion" has now engulfed all of the Arab world.

ANNE WEILL-TUCKERMAN

What Double Standard?

Predictably, the hawk columnists and editorial writers, together with their coadjutors in the Johnson Administration, sensed a heaven-sent opportunity in the outbreak of hostilities in the Middle East. One White House spokesman is supposed to have circulated an aphorism of his own making: "The doves on Vietnam are hawks in Israel." In eight words, he managed to distort the truth about as far as it can be twisted. Following his lead, or exercising their own considerable talents in that direction, the commentators let loose on the Vietnamese "doves" with a barrage of accusations of "inconsistency," "double standard," etc. At last they could go on the offensive.

Actually, nothing could be clearer than the unlikeness of the situations in the Middle East and Southeast Asia. In Vietnam the United States intervened gratuitously and, after failing to save Vietnam for French colonialism, sabotaged the Geneva accords and took over the war against the Vietnamese people. In the Middle East, Israel is a creation of the United Nations and, be it said to their credit, of Britain and the United States. Being responsible for its existence, the UN is surely responsible for its survival. This applies to the Soviet Union as well as the United States. The latter has recognized its obligation, verbally at least, while the Russians saw a chance to make trouble for us in an area close to their borders, as we

IN THIS ISSUE

June 19, 1967

EDITORIALS

770

ARTICLES

774 Small Wars: The Peril Escalates
Seymour Melman

775 Class of '67: The Gentle Desperadoes
Harold Kaplan Karl Shapiro
R. J. Kaufmann Allan Seager
J. A. Bryant, Jr. John R. Willingham
Lawrence Lipking Wallace Stegner

781 Mao's Revolution:
Keeping China Safe for Communism
James R. Townsend

786 Supersonic Transport III:
Blind Stakes in the Poker Game
Karl M. Ruppenthal

BOOKS & THE ARTS

790 The Nonpersonality Cult Alexander Werth
791 Music Over Words (poem) Richard Eberhart
792 The Politics of Art Sherman Paul
793 Visiting Italy (poem) Robert Bly
794 Good, Dirty Fun and Games Shaun O'Connell
795 An Affair of Passion George R. Stewart
797 Theatre in Europe I Harold Clurman
798 Responses (poem) Robert Hershorn
799 Crossword Puzzle Frank W. Lewis

Publisher JAMES J. STORROW JR.	Associate Publisher GIFFORD PHILLIPS
Editor CAREY McWILLIAMS	Associate Editor PHIL KERBY
Executive Editor ROBERT HATCH	Literary Editor HELEN YGLESIAS
Copy Editor MARION HESS	Poetry Editor MICHAEL GOLDMAN
Theatre HAROLD CLURMAN	Washington ROBERT G. SHERRILL
Art MAX KOZLOFF	Paris ALEXANDER WERTH
Music BENJAMIN BORETZ	London RAYMOND WILLIAMS
Science CARL DREHER	Bonn C. AMERY
Advertising Manager MARY SIMON	Canberra C. P. FITZGERALD

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July and August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1967 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel.: CH 2-8400. West Coast office: 1256 Westwood Boulevard, Los Angeles, Calif. 90024. Tel.: GR 4-2533. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give four weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE NATION
Combined with FRONTIER

Volume 204
No. 25

had made trouble for them in Vietnam. However indefensible the Russian tactic may be, the UN-U.S. obligation is clear, the more so because the abrupt withdrawal of the UN forces gave Nasser the opportunity to precipitate the crisis.

To run out on the issues in Vietnam, to lessen the pressures to end that execrable war, as a quid pro quo to induce the Johnson Administration to take stronger action in the Middle East, would be morally despicable and politically stupid. Maurice N. Eisendrath, president of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations, put the case forcefully last winter in a letter to President Johnson. "... great numbers of my fellow Jews in America," Rabbi Eisendrath wrote, "the greater number I do believe, will not sacrifice their moral convictions concerning the evils of this particular war in Vietnam to be at ease in Zion or in America."

The Flag-Burning Irritant

As several distinguished law professors testified before a House Judiciary Subcommittee early this month, flag burning is a statement of dissent, and any attempt to suppress the activity is a violation of the First Amendment's protection of free speech.

The anti-flag-burning legislation now passing through Congress (it would send to prison for a year anyone who "casts contempt upon any flag of the United States by publicly mutilating, defacing, defiling, or trampling upon it") is in reality a measure to stifle opposition to a particular war. If there was ever any doubt about that, it was blown away by an exchange between Congressman Byron Rogers of Colorado, chief sponsor of the bill, and Prof. Monroe H. Freedman of the George Washington University School of Law.

Freedman asked what national interest could justify the legislation.

REPRESENTATIVE ROGERS: There is such a thing as a little war going on in Vietnam, and I understand there has been a lot of shooting going on out in Israel this morning. Don't we have a national interest in that? . . .

FREEDMAN: The national interest in proscribing flag burning relates to the war and protest against the war?

ROGERS: Yes, it does.

FREEDMAN: So that contempt to the flag is equated with protest against the war and protest against the war is equated with burning the flag with an intent to have contempt.

In another exchange Rogers argued that the President and Congress have the duty to put down such dissent and thereby "hold together the nation in time of peril." It is the dull, dangerous theory of victory through consensus for which the White House is now infamous.

An equally clear acknowledgment that the legislation is aimed at satisfying a political majority at the expense of constitutional guarantees came from Rep. Robert McClory, who replied, when asked by Prof. Herbert Reid of Howard University, what clear and present danger to the Republic calls for such action: "We are getting thousands of letters from people, even servicemen, about these flag burnings. Doesn't that call for action?"

Reid, a Negro, coolly noted: "I think that Congress is as powerless to reach [the irritant of flag burning] as it is to reach the Klan which met yesterday in Atlanta under the symbol of the American flag and called for a blood-bath. As disastrous as that speech is, it is protected by the Constitution."

A few similarly cool voices are to be heard within Congress, but in the main it is beginning to sound like a convention of flag wavers. Rep. John Conyers of Detroit has led the defense of the First Amendment freedoms within the subcommittee, and he was joined by the old reliables, Don Edwards of California and Robert Kastenmeier of Wisconsin, in the full Judiciary Committee. They lost, of course, just as the constitutionalists will lose to the jingoists in both houses of Congress. But as long as many of the younger Congressmen who publicly support the bill admit privately their unease—as they are doing—there is at least hope that the nation is not quite ready to move on to the hysteria of total war.

A Fine Idea, If . . .

Somewhere in Main Currents in American Thought, Vernon Louis Parrington lashed out with a memorable phrase: Science, he said, had been made a "drab and slut of industrialism." Parrington, like Thorstein Veblen, died in 1929. In the thirties, many would have blamed "capitalism" rather than "industrialism," on the theory that in the Soviet Union the evils of industrial civilization had been cured, or at least therapy was on the way. But after the passage of another thirty years neither the Soviet version of communism, nor the American version of capitalism, can claim superiority over the other in making science (which in the present context includes technology) serve the ends of human welfare. Each side may blame the other for the diversion of knowledge, resources and manpower to war and preparation for war, but neither has achieved minimal decency in international relations or in the treatment of its own citizens.

On both sides, humane and intelligent citizens have few illusions on that score. The Soviet novelist Daniel Granin views the world's problems from a standpoint far removed from the customary Soviet self-praise. As reported by M. S. Handler in The New York Times (May 7), Granin's is a "one world" viewpoint: he dares to use the term "cosmopolite" without disparagement. "It is precisely the anxieties, disasters and concerns for the future," he writes, "that further the unification of humanity," and cites, as problems that cannot be solved within the framework of one country, feeding the world's population, water supply, combating influenza, weather forecasting and control, radio communications, radio astronomy and the struggle against crop-damaging insects. The world must be regarded as "a unified organism," he declares. Here is Wendell Willkie brought up to date.

An echo comes from Stanford University. In mid-May, Prof. Robert C. North told a campus conference that the technological world is changing "right under our feet," and no ideology—Right, Left or Center—is taking proper cognizance of the issues or suggesting how these are to be met. He cites such problems as population control, armament control, communication satellites, the cybernetic revolution, the prolongation of life. He sees the Chinese "cultural revolution" as an attempt by Mao Tse-tung and his supporters to cope with the technological advances of the fifties and sixties on a basis analogous to the guerrilla tactics which brought communism to power in earlier decades.

A potentially important effort in this line is McGeorge Bundy's mission to the Soviet Union as a Presidential emissary without portfolio, interrupted for the time being by his call to Washington. His objective there will be to work out a plan for an international research institute to solve problems common to all highly industrialized societies. Cited are "urban sprawl, air and water pollution, transportation difficulties, and efforts to improve education, economic and industrial management, and the innovation process." If Bundy can eventually bring this off—presumably with an infusion of U.S. capitalist funds—it will be one of the most important projects the Ford Foundation has ever tackled. The premise is completely sound. Nor does the idea come out of the blue; the Pugwash conferences have set a precedent.

The "drab and slut of industrialism" cannot be made into a respectable creature under such auspices as our Vietnamese War or the Soviet support of Arab nationalism. These can only debauch her further. Yet Granin, North and Bundy have hold of a hopeful idea. One can only wish them well.

Power Blackouts and the FPC

On May 23, 1967, Sen. Lee Metcalf introduced two bills proposing to authorize the Federal Power Commission to regulate extra-high-voltage (EHV) transmission. On June 5, five major public utilities serving eastern Pennsylvania, New Jersey and Delaware, and parts of Maryland had a power failure reminiscent of the historic blackout of November 9, 1965.

In introducing his bills, Senator Metcalf pointed out that similar legislation had been proposed in the 89th Congress by the late Sen. Clair Engle, and by Rep. John Moss in the House. He quoted FPC Commissioner Ross:

"Very bluntly, as most people in the power business realize, it is no longer the parties who control generation that control the industry—it is the parties who control the transmission, the arteries of the industry, that control the destiny of the millions of ratepayers of this nation."

As almost everyone knows by now, a consumer of electric power usually has no idea where his power comes from, nor does it always come from the same generating stations. He may be living next to a generating station, yet it may not be his principal source of supply. Today electric power is pooled. The utilities buy power from one another in accordance with supply and demand. The existence of power grids, in which such interchanges take place regularly, makes for economy and gives the utilities more leeway before the rate-making commissions. In theory, part of the savings should be passed on to the consumers, but practice does not necessarily follow theory.

The big point in favor of huge interstate networks is that they provide insurance against blackouts. Any one generating station may fail from a variety of causes and, when the load is heavy, plunge a whole system into trouble; but through the transmission lines the floundering system is supposed to be helped by its neighbors. And often it is, without the public's knowing anything about a possibly narrow escape from a serious outage. Yet, as the events of 1965 showed, this interlocking of power systems can itself be the cause of power failures, perhaps more widespread than they would have been without so much interconnection.

The basic trouble, however, is not with the power-pooling idea but with the way in which it is carried into operation. While there is always some degree of coordination among the member utilities of a grid, an intertie between two systems may be designed primarily for interchange between these two, and may have only the power-carrying capacity required for this particular transfer. It may be too weak for any larger purpose. If, in an emergency, it is overloaded, its circuit breakers trip, and the systems which depend on it for mutual support may go down in consequence.

The tie between Public Service of New Jersey and Consolidated Edison of New York is a case in point. In the 1965 blackout, with Con Edison completely out of commission, this line continued to serve a part of Brooklyn and, after many hours, helped to put Con Edison back on its feet. Had it been strong enough, it might have given PJM (Pennsylvania-Jersey-Maryland) support to Con Edison and averted the almost total blackout in New York City. In the June 5 incident, it is reported that Con Edison had excess generating capacity when the trouble began, but the circuit breakers on this tie operated. Con Edison was saved from possible involvement, but PJM received no help.

Legislation of the kind proposed by Senator Metcalf is obviously needed. The FPC should not be in the role of an interested observer; it should have authority to prescribe the building of adequate interconnections in the public interest. If interstate commerce in electric power is left largely to state regulatory bodies, the situation may become increasingly chaotic. The story is familiar: great potential advantages from technological innovation, only partly realized because of a lag in government policy.

Small Wars: The Peril Escalates

SEYMOUR MELMAN

Mr. Melman, professor of industrial engineering at Columbia University and participant in the Nation Institute's California Conference earlier this year, is the author most recently of The Depleted Society (Dell).

Before the Cuban missile crisis of October, 1962, it seemed utopian to suggest that the United States and the Soviet Union could agree not to threaten nuclear war. But such an understanding was reached. The informal paths used for developing this understanding do not detract from the fact that since October, 1962, neither government has uttered nuclear war cries.

An agreement to agree was generated once both governments found it intolerable to continue the nuclear confrontation system for political settlements. The nuclear threat menaced the physical and economic security of each society so severely as to create an urgent problem for each side that could be solved acceptably only by joint agreement to avoid nuclear war.

Nevertheless, that agreement did not imply to the governments in Washington and Moscow that military violence was no longer a competent instrument of political power. Accordingly, fresh political and military ideologies, Eastern and Western, supported the idea that small wars between states, restricted to non-nuclear weapons and limited to particular territory, could still be workable propositions. Opposing ideologies of "national liberation" and "containment of communism by counterinsurgency" were given military expression in forces designed to fight and win with "conventional" weapons.

But there is no known way of designing a small war between states, whether of the Vietnamese or the Arab-Israeli type, which does not contain a significant potential for big-power involvement and hence nuclear confrontation. A succession of small wars necessarily heightens these risks. The difficulty of curtailing small wars, either in scope or intensity, goes far to explain why no war between states has been permitted to reach a military conclusion since World War II. Despite the readiness of large and small governments to use force as an international instrument of power (and the implied readiness to violate the United Nations Charter), each instance of international violence on a large scale since 1945 has provoked the fears of other countries who, in due course and acting separately or jointly or through the United Nations, intervened to curtail military operations.

Despite the divergent political assessments, the United States and the Soviet Union have been developing areas of common interest, as yet unformulated, against the incidence of small wars, and favoring agreement on ways of avoiding them. The factors generating such common interest include the following:

(a) Nuclear wars are now well appreciated as no-win operations for the nuclear powers.

(b) Hazards deriving from proliferation of nuclear weapons are a common concern for the United States and the USSR. Small states, unable to attain their own national security in other ways, seek to become nuclear powers. A non-nuclear Germany is more difficult to insure under such conditions.

(c) Military operations by small states are not reliably limited to such governments and their territories, and can rapidly include political-military confrontations of big powers.

(d) The costs of supporting small wars, and the preparations for them, are burdensome for both the United States and the USSR—depleting manpower and other resources that are badly needed at home, and for productive growth in the developing countries. Small wars make it extremely difficult to plan productive investment in, and international trade with, such countries.

(e) Sustained fighting of small wars has involved violation of international laws of war, thereby breaking down the traditions of legal and moral constraint that were devised to limit even conflict by force of arms. Chinese boundaries are more reliably stabilized in a world where aggression against state borders is discouraged by international force. Weakening these restraints weakens the security of all men.

For the small countries, too, war has become a sure loser. Even poor states support armed forces as the main available way to insure their own security, but the quest for security through military advantage has a high price. Armed forces of developing countries are supported by their own budgets, exceeding $18 billion per year. These forces restrain productive economic growth and encourage adventurist governments in which military officers play a dominant role.

The quest for military superiority presses small states toward dependence on the great powers for military supplies, and for military alliances. However, reliance on the great powers has a counter-productive effect on the security and vulnerability of smaller states.

Small countries are rendered increasingly insecure by the proliferation and growing power of national armies—even though these are equipped with "conventional" weapons, for these weapons have been made highly mobile and quite destructive. In the Kashmir fighting during 1965, India and Pakistan each destroyed major parts of its armed forces within about two weeks. (One estimate rated the value of what was destroyed as equal to the cost of an Aswan Dam project.)

But the common interest of small states in a competent international security system is frustrated by the contradictory development of military technologies and of international political and peace-keeping institutions. Military technologies invent ways to shorten the time of movement and of firepower effect. International political and peace-keeping institutions involve political debate, votes, veto systems and long convening time. Two days may be a rather short period for a Security Council debate. But two days of military operations with modern weapons can produce great damage in small countries.

The present writer has conferred with senior foreign ministry officials of several smaller states during the past years. Their view of the world includes reservations about the workability of the present United Nations peace-keeping machinery, especially with respect to speed, impartiality and reliability. From such uncertainties, the governments of small states have concluded that they must place prime reliance on their own armed forces to preserve their national security.

The United States and Russia share an interest in trying afresh to come to grips with the main world security problem of our time: "small wars," and the absence of any reliable mechanism for dealing with small wars. A U.S.-USSR joint effort in this direction is fundamental.

The following is given to illustrate, by concrete example, some of the innovations that may be appropriate in designing an international peace-keeping force. This force, operated under the United Nations, may require characteristics that are known elsewhere, but are somewhat novel in the international sphere. The first of these is automatic triggering for speed of operation.

A big-city police force is an automatically triggered security system. When a citizen telephones, the police—following standard operating procedures—are ordered to the site without intervention of political officers or legislative bodies. At the site of alleged law breaking the police are bound by a strict code of behavior: they must establish the fact of law violation; if established the police must stop the law-breaking action. Thereafter, the police are bound by fixed orders and procedures to turn the matter over for jurisdiction to a separate judicial body.

In the international sphere a highly mobile force could be automatically triggered by a call from a government to one of, say, five centers around the world. Within hours an inspecting team could arrive at any site and establish (a) whether there is indeed an armed conflict, or an imminent conflict; and (b) whether the dispute is international. Criteria for "international" must be rigorously defined; for example, as (1) conflict between armed forces of two states; or (2) conflict for control of a government within a state in which a second state participates. Once a dispute is certified as international, the peace-keeping force itself arrives at the site, declares and administers a cease-fire. All this could be done in a matter of hours following an initial call for help. Thereafter, within a fixed time limit, the international force could be required to turn over the dispute at issue to an appropriate body. Two adjudicating bodies could probably cope with the array of conceivable disputes: an international court to settle issues of dominion between governments; a plebiscite conducting body to settle armed international disputes over who shall be a government.

Reliability of operation of the international security force could be insured by standard operating procedures which are binding on the general staff. In conventional armies standard operating procedures pertain primarily to the functioning of personnel below the general staff level. For the international security force, they must be written, with special detail, for the general staff itself.

Impartiality is designed into the international security system by two main elements: (a) the specifications of the standard operating procedures; (b) the rules governing the officer group that commands the force. The latter element is vital for insuring impartiality of peace-keeping forces. Devices like the following are required:

The general staff of the international force may be composed of, say, twenty men: ten career officers from states in the Security Council; ten nominated by a random selection from other states. These twenty are equal in rank and are assigned to functions in rotation. These and similar arrangements are intended to produce functioning according to formal rule, rather than according to political preferences of the senior staff.

In the short run, an international peace-keeping force could be composed of highly mobile mixed units of the U.S. and Soviet armies. Until the international peace-keeping machinery is fully formulated and established, this force could be deployed for peace-keeping operations at the joint decision of the President of the United States and the Chairman of Soviet Socialist Republics.

This temporary force could supervise an armistice and/or cooling-off operations in the Middle East and in Vietnam, for example, while diplomatic processes are operated. The termination of these wars and war crises, as part of the move to a wider agreement, will enhance the prestige and moral authority of the governments that undertake this action.

Class of '67: The Gentle Desperadoes

HAROLD KAPLAN
Bennington College

Ten years is apparently enough time to draw a 180-degree arc of change in the temperament of generations. Certainly the most tentative judge of the contrast between 1957 and 1967 (although one would like to place the first year of emphasis somewhat earlier than 1957) would agree that the college generation today has reversed the field on almost every point made by the participants in The Nation forum of 1957. This goes for the "careful young men" in every aspect of "carefulness," the desire for security, the stress on personal rather than social problems, the appetite for intellectual criticism, the somewhat complacent cynicism which began perhaps as the "spirit of irony and detachment" in some college classroom. One coinage of the time was the "silent generation." We can agree at least that the silence has ended.

The observer today, nevertheless, is puzzled by contradictions. He sees political activism mingle (often in the same people) with drugged or undrugged withdrawal. He sees a religious search combined with a ferocious intention to assail every orthodoxy. The apocalyptic nihilism of Genet mingles with passionate attestations for the napalmed child in Vietnam. A demonstration against war is joined largely by those whose "reverence for life" has more in common with William Burroughs and Henry Miller than with Albert Schweitzer. This may suggest that such extremes in moral manifestations have a common source in outrage and despair. Nevertheless, the observer is affected by the unappetizing mixture of extreme moral arrogance and exhibitionistic social irresponsibility. One must ask why. Why the search for purity and the claim to find it; and why the will to surrender everything, the poorly disguised death wish?

In the spring of 1957, The Nation devoted a special issue to the Class of '57 which was published under the title of "The Careful Young Men" (March 9, 1957). Now, ten years later, here are some impressions of the Class of '67 solicited, in most instances, from contributors to the earlier symposium. We regret that we have been unable, for lack of space, to include all the statements we received; in some instances, we have condensed the responses.

The generation which teaches today's youth, my generation, based its dominant intellectual tone on the vague pathos of the life of difficulty (the depression, World War II, the bomb, the cold war). At the barest level, our gospel was that of survival, a modest ironic humanism, or at a more grandiose level, a tragic humanism which underscored mutual compassion as the reward of endurance. Our text could have been taken from the words of the best writer of our youth.

I decline to accept the end of man. It is easy enough to say that man is immortal simply because he will endure; that when the last ding-dong of doom has clanged and faded from the last worthless rock hanging tideless in the last red and dying evening, that even then there will still be one more sound: that of his puny inexhaustible voice, still talking. I refuse to accept this. I believe that man will not merely endure: he will prevail. He is immortal not because he alone among creatures has an inexhaustible voice but because he has a soul, a spirit capable of compassion and sacrifice and endurance. William Faulkner, Nobel Prize Acceptance Speech, 1950.

But if that is the mood of our teaching, then I think we talk at cross purposes with many of our students today. They are turning their backs on pain and on repression, particularly as these seem ordained by necessity. They think experience is a god, they are the new romantics. They want the apocalypse in their daily lives, in each moment, perhaps because they have given up on the long-range terms for salvation, and perhaps because they are the first generation to be really aware that the world's last day is a possibility. Life is very short for them; like Ivan Karamazov and for the same reasons, they would rather not live past 30. They are contemptuous and indifferent to both past and future. Above all their trust is in their emotions and sensations. Intelligence is a betrayer, if it is not a fraud. It entangles both truth and experience in the conflict of ideologies, the relativism of science, the pragmatism of bureaucracies, the "absurdity" of the universe, and the casual universality of death.

In moral and political terms, this generation, facing death on the one hand and superfluous wealth on the other, wants simple purity above anything else. Everyone lies to them, and there is something endlessly wrong in the way action or experience invariably produces a lie. And so they search for truthful action, which may find its climax in the arms of state troopers as they haul out the manifestants from the lobbies of state capitols. A perfectly passive and perfectly sincere demonstration—burning a draft card or smoking pot—attests itself; the consequences will take care of themselves.

Surely this is a case of the young teaching a lesson, in the only way perhaps audible in the modern world's great noise; that is, by hysterical display, half in the style of slick public relations and half in the style of sincere inspiration. What is important for a well-intended observer who cannot share in the specific displays or give them direct sympathy, is to understand their meaning. Above all there is immediacy of meaning in the characteristic habits and attitudes of these young. They are pursuing most eagerly the art of exhibiting themselves and making a manifestation. They are in part determined to reproach us, even in ways related to the Japanese form of suicide which is conducted in the presence of one's enemy. One can also sense the license of those who rely on the bad conscience of others and therefore feel capable of moral blackmail.

Whatever the incidental attributes, pleasant or unpleasant, if asked to make a general judgment, one must judge that they are a religious generation and a moralizing one, perhaps finally to a degree of ferocity matched only by the old Puritans. It would surprise Marx (who has been much surprised by history) that the strongest revolutionary impulses today come from the educated middle-class young, scions of privilege and permissive upbringing. These have been brought to feel most keenly the moral taint of modern life, and they are evangelical in spirit, wanting much more than bread or even equality. They want a moral communion among themselves and the release of ultimate emotions, that is, religious emotions, within themselves. They say that drugs, sex and crowd emotions give them this, and they more than half mean it, or more than half want it. For some of us this may be the bridge of sympathy with them. What puzzles us is the silly cheapness of the price they hope to pay for such experiences.

KARL SHAPIRO
University of Nebraska

To a college professor, a generation is not thirty years but four. Every four years an army of freshmen graduate. When they graduate they are a power generation, moving into all the managerial slots. Their political lines have by now been set, from absolute left to absolute right. Only the narrow-minded, technically directed student—the medical student, engineer or educationalist—misses the intellectual crises. The others engage in the game of Overthrow the Values.

I taught at Berkeley and Davis for a year and a half just before the initial California earthquake which took place across the Bay in San Francisco, unbeknown to the University of California. The English Department at Berkeley was the largest and most catatonic I had ever taught in, still living in the afterglow of the Gold Rush. That was in 1956! The "multiversity" after a decade of shock treatment still doesn't know what hit it.

The Careful Generations had no choices but callow cynicism and withdrawal. In one aspect they became a criminal bourgeoisie with a winner-take-all attitude. Students read philosophy or psychology to gather evidence about amorality, the only ethic available to them. The California student breakthrough, like all West Coast earthquakes, was part of a series. About the time of the beat annunciation, the revolts of the twenties came home to roost. For instance, all the taboos about publication of impolite literary and political and psychological works began to be abolished in the highest courts. People of my generation saw to that. Or people of my persuasion of my generation. We did it well aware of the dangers to the values we stood for. It was an imperative to defend the Bad, which is ironically an American principle.

Shortly after I arrived in Lincoln, Neb., to teach at the state university, I was mildly attacked by the students for advocating American intervention in Hungary. "Go back to Hungary!" said signs on my door.

This was the period of seeking an underground for young university students everywhere. The structure of a withdrawal society had already been blueprinted by the beat movement. It provided—but books have been written about that—a total way of life, from clothing to poetics to God. Its greatest advantage was that it supplied a point of view about everything without any goal or rationale. It fed every yearning, and created unimaginable hungers for which there was no food. Politically, the beats were very gauche, now backing Castro, now attacking communism. But the liberal professor always felt it his duty to keep them going; in some vestigial way they represented freedom and truth and the values.

When the gloss wore off the beat movement the student generations entered the waxworks as the acid generation. Using the number four as a divisor of generations, I have taught five generations of college students. I have, I think, watched them carefully as "generations." I have seen what I think to be the ultimate generation, the generation of ultimate withdrawal. One sits around thinking of new names for them: The Autistic Generation, the Runaway Generation—what difference does it make? There is only one interesting thing about this generation: unlike all biological generational revolutions, this one does not want or intend to rejoin the human race, or so it argues. It rejects every stance which implies a discipline. In politics it cultivates amnesia, in poetics, aphasia. It adores violence and hysteria. It is the perfect cultural broth for fascism. The beat people had a marginal politick and a sense of community; their drug was weed. The new generation has no need of politick or community or poetry. They have acid.

The dissidents and intellectuals and would-be artists of the current generation are ripe for the totalitarian state of mind. Like the intellectuals in Germany in the 1930s, they turn their backs on the horrors of the "bourgeois" society which supports them. They ignore their own fate and the fate of all. They easily surrender any principle and trade in any idealism, however specious, of a Martin Luther King for a Mafia variety of Black Power. They defend Cassius Clay in the same way and for the same reasons that Hitler defended Max Schmeling. Their wall-sized posters are all icons of the movie gangster. Their love of money and expensive artifacts links them to the higher echelons of the power structure.

The Right is after power at any cost, but they are on the aggressive. The New Left is passive power which is leaking away in the pad. The Right wants to take over. The Left seems to be waiting for some Boxer Rebellion or wet nurse to get it out of bed. The Left is Easternized; it exhibits all the withdrawal symptoms of the Orient. In LSD exercises about bigger and better orgasms it even uses a stage director who reads Kahlil Gibran to the two about-to-be lovers. (Gibran, as every professor knows, is perhaps a step above Joyce Kilmer.)

I use the acid generation as a metaphor. The drug is not yet that available in the student union. I am talking about the intellectual withdrawal of a generation which uses acid or something like it as a total mystique.

Since World War II college students and their juniors have lived in a climate of absolute contempt, a climate created and fostered by their parents and their institutions. Crude and hypocritical government actions abroad and at home have reinforced the belief of the new generations that everything is SHIT. The most common noun, adjective, verb and mark of punctuation in their language is SHIT. No poem dares to leave the word out. No painting. No smile. The motto of the new generation of the Left might be: Blood, Nirvana, Shit.

R. J. KAUFMANN

University of Rochester

Why is it that, at age 42, I feel both closer and further, more definitively, apart from my students than I did ten years ago? I have tried the anthropologists' pair: shame culture vs. guilt culture, and it works passably. I can say my generation was brought up in the late afternoon of the bourgeois guilt culture of the 19th- and pre-Hiroshimic 20th century. We felt or were made to feel responsible, or at least calibrated responsibility, in terms of each person's quotient of active concern. We saw too little difference between ourselves and what are now called the "disadvantaged" to feel ashamed of our possessions; rather we felt guilty that we had been duped into complicity in prolonging an unjustified state of affairs. The world still seemed tractable to our wills if we were brave enough, if our guilt performed as the sharp spur we required it to be.

That is changed now. Few of our younger counterparts see the world as tractable, few believe in the actuality, let alone the efficacy, of the will. They do feel ashamed; and shame is a confusing emotion. It makes you apologetic for your virtues, suicidal toward your strengths.

I am interested in the inaccessible features of this current college generation whose attractions are so great, whose moral candor is so appealing. Even if they don't know what they think, or even suspect what they think, they are willing to embark on nearly any type of "trip" or expedition of "retrieval." They are disconcertingly honest; their coolness, their self-withholding is a burden to them and is only the husk of their evident natures. They love to confess, though there is much shame in the fact that they know their confessions are, however procedurally gratifying, in substance disappointing. Oh, really to be misunderstood, to have some of those densely compacted recesses which were the neurosis-producing specialty of the old guilt culture!

Noting their willingness, their institutionalized frustrations, their inner anger which stands in almost exact equilibrium with their gentleness, I ask myself what makes my students strange. It is their perception of rebellion as a form of hoarding. What are they hoarding? Fugitive memorabilia of individualism. And they are stealing, through reductive parody and popistic replay, the design specifications of official status. Jokes can perform psychic murders if they are good enough. LBJ, for example, has been subverted through popular art. For all the grim consequences of his judgments, he is no longer a serious matter. This is what is different about these students. They are ironic before experience; our generation could only be so after it. They are slowly inventing a new ethic of accommodation under the illusion of incubating revolutionary possibilities. It is a confused time, but, radically, the word "confuse" can mean a way of melting oppositions and thereby fusing a new wholeness below the familiar levels of our intellectual distinctions.

ALLAN SEAGER
University of Michigan

There is a brass plaque on the steps of the Michigan Union where, at two o'clock in the morning, President Kennedy first outlined the work of the Peace Corps before a huge crowd. Kennedy was the last hero to students and many have joined the Peace Corps. It is, I think, symptomatic of a great store of idealism that wants to express itself in a task they can feel as fundamentally good, one they can throw themselves into without reserve, with a whole heart. In the same spirit, many of the kind who worked in Mississippi among the Negroes or went on the Selma march are now going into Vista or social work in the cities. I have not heard a student say he was going out to make a million dollars in the last twenty-five years, and the student who does take a job with a big corporation does it with his eyes open, cynically.

There is a link as well as a division between this kind of idealism and the student protests. (Michigan is where the student sit-in started.) The situation is not as turbulent as it is at Berkeley, probably because many of the complaints now alive there were settled at Michigan some time ago, but there are still protests and they are so various it is hard to believe that the obvious reasons for them are the real ones. There have been protests of all kinds about Vietnam; about draft procedures; the grading system; film censorship; about nearly every aspect of students' relations with the university from the quality of food in the dorms to the right of the administration to bar students from making academic policy.

The arresting feature of all these protests is that they are not political. There are active Young Democrat and Young Republican clubs on the campus but they do not sponsor protests; no organized Communist activity is perceptible, as it was in the thirties. If asked, almost any given protester would say he was a liberal but he would be hard put to define what this means except in terms of what he is against.

What seems to inform all these angry gestures, the real cause of them, is a resentment against the quality of life in the United States. These young people have discovered that their dossiers are more important than their persons; they have learned that admissions tests, either to a university or a job, are merely elaborate forms of self-betrayal. They think most jobs are a rat race. They are cynical about most candidates running for office. They do not believe that any American who opens his mouth abroad today will be believed, since what he says has been compromised by the CIA. They see whatever form of the Establishment they know as a constricting force. They find money easy to come by, but in the midst of opulence they would like to find out the de-cencies of life. And they believe less and less that they can find them in the classroom.

One group, then, has made a satisfactory commitment (and it is significant that the Peace Corps does its work outside the United States). The other group, the protesters, are critically sophisticated. It is hard to put anything over on them, but their very sophistication prevents them from seeing a commitment they could make. They have not thought of a revolution because they are already corrupted by what they would revolt against, the technological society in which we live. It is the bag that contains all their protests but it would be like fish revolting against the sea.

J. A. BRYANT, Jr.
University of North Carolina

Some critics have written misleadingly of a "Kennedy generation"; but the real significance of the Kennedys' successes, for the young at least, has been that a generation of students, mindful that their predecessors since the end of the war had had to spend their college careers as citizens on probation, began to think seriously of immediate involvement in adult affairs. It was the civil rights movement that cracked the door for them; for in those early sit-ins, demonstrations and marches many children of affluent white parents took up the cause of frustrated Negro youth and began the long-overdue exposure of decay in middle-class mores. After John Kennedy's election to the Presidency the door swung open, and college students ever since have been marching off vigorously in all directions on a variety of causes, some genuine and some spurious, breaching frontiers and shattering taboos wherever such things seemed to stand in their way. In all their new territories, from the exploitation of sex to the controversy over Vietnam, the passion that drives them is that same deeply felt need to be taken seriously and accorded the right to chart their own course in ethics and morals, in education and politics.

The young writers speak with great seriousness about all the experiences that were forbidden to their older brothers and sisters. They imitate deliberately those orders of society and those races which they believe have not been contaminated by the conservatism of middle-class America—the Negro, the folk singer, the truck driver, the migrant worker, the current inhabitants of skid row, even the Southern poor white. They rebel on principle. So pervasive has their assortment of gestures become in the middle sixties that it has submerged the pallid and modish anticipations that went by the collective name of "beat" in the late fifties. Now that term, which once seemed certain to survive, is seldom heard except from those who are looking for a word to condemn any deviation from older standards.

Another decade at least will be necessary before we can see whether all this is a prelude to a genuine direction or whether, like the beat movement that it replaced, it has been simply a succession of nervous poses on a nation-wide scale. That the current movement continues to take place mainly on college campuses is cause for suspicion. Instead of seeking to compete in a market place, these young writers are taking refuge in the proliferating writing programs, subsisting on scholarships that have grown just large enough to be lived on, and finding an easy outlet for their poems and stories in the little magazines now being published on university budgets. Some do manage to get out a book (frequently an M.A., or M.F.A., thesis) and then proceed to capitalize on it by touring other campuses to give readings of their work and the work of their friends. It is possible for one with a modicum of talent to go on in this way indefinitely, never quite "making it" but never suffering discomfort either, and enjoying all the while membership in something that is beginning to resemble a national fraternity. The question unanswered at the moment is, just how much of this talent being generated on college campuses can survive the academic climate or, having done that, escape it to live unprotected in that outside world where ultimately any strong art must seek its proper nourishment and means of survival?

JOHN R. WILLINGHAM
University of Kansas

Unlike the "careful young men" of 1957, today's undergraduates will to be seriously involved. And if their efforts are centered on one purpose, it is to attack the "Establishment" wherever its vulnerability shows. Their stance has been aptly called "romantic anarchy": "romantic," indeed they are, but the "anarchy" is tempered by a militant idealism. If a temporary conformity will help to get a Wilson Fellowship or a Rhodes Scholarship, they will cheerfully conform. But as soon as the awards have been announced, back they will go to working over the "Establishment."

Paul Goodman provides a kind of activist testament for youth. His Growing Up Absurd (and no doubt his recently published Five Years) furnishes ammunition for unceasing attacks and siege of the "Establishment." The Christian existentialists like Bishops Pike and Robinson, Teilhard de Chardin, Leslie Paul and Paul Van Buren are familiar names to the campus intellectual even though he may not have read their books. Debunking orthodox theology, such writers stimulate campus readers who may never go near one of the denominational centers.

The best students are indifferent to the literary canons of the old "new critics." They expect to be "turned on" through reading. If the alternative is a life of attainable rationality or one of increasing absurdity, they expect fiction or poetry to exhibit less structural precision and more existentialist impact. Consequently, highly literate students prefer the Pound of the Cantos and regard Eliot with suspicion. It has been twelve years since Allen Ginsberg recited "Howl" in San Francisco, but the reverberations on university campuses still resound. When Ginsberg, Robert Creeley, Gary Snyder, Robert Bly or Denise Levertov have visited this campus, the appeal of "activist" poetry is all too obvious.

In fiction, I sense that the appeal of William Golding and J. D. Salinger is waning somewhat, although it may be more accurate to say merely that Lord of the Flies and The Catcher in the Rye seem no longer to have their former primacy. Hemingway, Faulkner and Fitzgerald are still important to undergraduates, although I think they are beginning to seem dated and perhaps a little quaint. Joyce provokes real excitement outside the classroom, much more because of Finnegans Wake than for Ulysses.

I am told that almost every male undergraduate who reads at all has digested with gusto Joseph Heller's Catch-22 and applauded its stern judgment of our civilization. For the same reason, Saul Bellow's "existential approach" to the exposure of "phonies," academe and the "Establishment" commands their allegiance. J.R.R. Tolkien's Lord of the Rings, using fantasy as a way to delineate a world of sanity and meaning, elicits a cult. James Baldwin's influence fluctuates with the ebb and flow of civil rights activity. Other writers who seem to speak to the juniors and seniors of 1967 are John Updike, John Knowles, Anthony Burgess, Kingsley Amis, Joyce Cary and Bernard Malamud. Any way you view the campus of today, it's infinitely more promising than the cool acceptance of 1957!

LAWRENCE LIPKING

Princeton University

Students have become very sensitive to the kind of interest that older generations take in them. We have too often exploited their feelings of rebellion because we need something to preach, something to fear. They will not always satisfy this need. After the recent arrests of some Princetonians on charges of possession of marijuana, C.B.S. television interviewed a few undergraduates and encouraged them to be as hip as possible. The undergraduates, however, persisted in being themselves, good-natured and sensible. Finally one of them (a Negro) delivered the last blow: "Look, I'm only a freshman, and I don't know everything that goes on around here. But I can tell you this: Princeton isn't exactly a hotbed of revolt!"

Nevertheless, students are different now from the students of ten years ago, and they read and write differently. They are much less careful young men, more impatient, more independent, even in their poetry. Last month I asked a seminar, some poets, some not, to write sonnets. Some of the replies were neatly crafted verses in iambic pentameter, perfectly rhymed, on conventional themes, with a white space between octave and sestet. These were the sonnets of the students who did not write poetry. The others, the poets, wrote a variety of free and personal lyrics. They assumed the right to make a sonnet whatever they chose.

Similarly, the books with which undergraduates sympathize tend to be scornful of any authority but insistent about the need for seriousness, sincerity, moral values. Works that defend the Establishment are thought trivial, and so are works that celebrate destruction. Michael Harrington's The Accidental Century, which balances its images of disorder with at least one faint hope, excites many Princetonians, including those who expect one day to be in the nation's service. Among novelists, William Golding is popular. Young readers (especially freshmen) are fascinated by his pictures of corrupted innocence; they identify with the innocence, enjoy the corruption, and take pleasure in wondering whether this makes them cynical. "Cynical" and "decadent," words rarely met in current literary criticism, still form a major part of undergraduates' critical vocabularies. Yet the books that matter most start from the premise of modern confusions and breakdowns but contrive to offer a solution. Even though most Princeton students do not quite believe in the reality of Bill Bradley, the all-American straight-arrow, they find his accomplishments far more disturbing than the message of any black humorist. In spite of everything, in a world of unheroism, can there still be giants walking the earth?

Ten years ago, Carlos Baker thought that undergraduates were living through an Age of Consolidation. Today, it seems that not much has been consolidated, and that acting in the present makes more sense than preparing for a future that may never come. An age of active resistance, an age of skeptical engagement, has succeeded the time when the academy could offer shelter from any immediate problem. Students, like their teachers, are learning to live without a court of ultimate appeal, but to make their conditional appeals as loud as possible.

WALLACE STEGNER

Stanford University

The hippie poet Gary Snyder, declaring that the revolution now being made by young people will leave not one value of the old America standing, is not fooling. Neither was Mario Savio, threatening to bring the University of California to a grinding halt if student demands were not met; neither was Dave Harris, who as president of the Stanford student body challenged trustees and administration and threatened alumni blood vessels, insisting on student participation in the educational process. Neither are the students and poets who chant four-letter words in crowds, either to prove that nothing is dirty or to "liberate the love-words." Walker Percy's last gentleman, who read a novel and found it "all about orgasms—forty-one," was making the acquaintance of a writer with a crusade.

I do not pretend to understand the far-out young, but one thing they clearly share, whether they are passivists on a Zen-love-pot-LSD course or activists strident for civil rights and social and educational reform, is the crusading spirit. Even the hippie who has tuned in, turned on and dropped out flings his hair, beard, clothes, habits, drug-and-sex kicks, as a dare in the face of conventional society. He wears the uniform of alienation and intransigence, though he utilizes the weapons of quietism and nonviolence.

Activist or passivist, they are moved by disgust for much that society offers, and repudiate many of its demands. Being young (except for some of their gurus, who are only cosmetically young) and having grown up in the age of antibiotics, the Pill and the Pleasure Principle, they share ample and uninhibited hormones. As a group they are reckless, they stampede toward the emancipated future like dry cattle scenting a water hole; and they are all the less regardful of consequences because their faith leads them to disparage tradition, convention, organization, discipline, the past and all forms of authority. To a puzzled elder, they often seem to throb rather than think. The eagerness with which they explore and sample the possibilities of hallucinatory drugs, hypnotic dancing, strobe lights, yoga, diet and every variety of mysticism (the past is O.K. if it's Oriental) emphasizes how bent this generation is upon losing its head.

In all this, or nearly all, these students are profoundly different from those one knew on the same campus only a decade ago. Ten years ago a visiting guru would never have got 150 Stanford students enthusiastically dancing his "trance dance" through most of a night. Ten years ago recruiting corporations would have had a respectful audience of budding company men; now they can hardly get appointments, because the potential company men are off listening to a young man expound his religion of touch as the means of universal love.

Ten years ago any appraisal of student attitudes had to take account of an alarming caution, a carefulness, an unwillingness to stick out the neck. But that was three generations back. Those students had grown up during a war that threatened everything they hoped for, and they hooked like limpets onto the nearest security. The present generation has known no war that it has to respect or subscribe to, and it has known no depression. It has grown up (and I am speaking, naturally, of the upper-middle-class children who characteristically make up both activist and passivist branches of the youth revolution) in almost uninterrupted prosperity. Adventure, not security, is what tempts them; and as the world shrinks and swarms, adventure of a physical kind is harder to come by. This generation goes to sex and drugs as the generation of the 1840s went to the Gold Rush.

Moreover, in a permissive school and home atmosphere, these children were taught togetherness as an ideal. The Haight-Ashbury young, making love not war, are only doing what we taught them. And in questioning everything, including its elders, this generation is likewise proving the efficacy of its nurture, for it was taught to take nothing on faith, to question, to doubt.

On any campus, even on the West Coast, the aggressive passivists and the devoted activists make up probably no more than 20 per cent of the student population. But they are a highly visible, highly vocal, generally intelligent and incessantly fascinating 20 per cent, and they exert influence both horizontally upon their contemporaries and vertically upon their elders. The rate of change being what it is, they may be gone by 1970, replaced by something quite other. When everything is permitted, everything will be tried. As an elder, one may take a gloomy view of the consequences of so much permissiveness, so little coercion from social traditions and norms; and one hears, again and again, a rather wistful dissatisfaction among the young themselves, though not often from those farthest out. Many would like to be told, more than they are, what is socially right, even if they have to find out later that it is wrong. Many crave a direction and an authority that we have taught them to distrust.

All of which is only to say that we have taught them to search and experiment, and they are searching and experimenting. And few generations—forget the mistakes they are bound to make, and are making—have been more alert and alive. Idealism is highly visible among the college students I know in 1967, and that goes for some of the alarming ones as well as for those, less rebellious or more hopeful of the old order, who put their devotion into the Peace Corps or Head Start or something traditionally liberal and humanitarian.

MAO'S REVOLUTION

Keeping China Safe for Communism

JAMES R. TOWNSEND

Mr. Townsend, author of Political Participation in Communist China, is assistant professor of political science at the University of California.

Hong Kong

The proponents of the Great Proletarian Cultural Revolution claim to be the vanguard of the most momentous revolution in the history of the world, engaged in a titanic struggle to push China into communism without any concessions to the temptations of tradition, capitalism or revisionism. They are indeed participants in a revolution of immense importance; perhaps their use of the superlative is correct, although we may leave judgment on that point to history. But are they really the vanguard of the revolution or have they taken up the rear guard with an outmoded revolutionary tradition of their own? Mao Tse-tung and his supporters are certainly setting the pace, and in this sense stand at the forefront of the current struggle. From other perspectives, however, their leadership evokes images that seem more in keeping with the past than with the future. Student demonstrators surging through the streets, outbreaks of violence among opposing groups, verbal and physical assaults on the remnants of traditional culture, the hint of xenophobia in intimidation of foreign residents—all these phenomena of the Cultural Revolution have parallels in the turbulent years between 1900 and 1927. More significantly, perhaps, the disorders are justified ■ ■ ■ means of perpetuating a revolutionary style that has its principal origins in the 1930s and 1940s. To be sure, China today is distinctly different from China of pre-Communist years; whatever its slogans and by-products, the Cultural Revolution is not simply a replay of earlier upheavals. There is good reason, however, to question the “revolutionary” credentials of the current campaign.

The Cultural Revolution began in November, 1965, following a September meeting of Chinese Communist Party (CCP) leaders at which Mao apparently insisted on a new campaign against “bourgeois” and “revisionist” influences within China. Two broad considerations lay behind this decision. The first derived from domestic policy problems of the preceding ten years, with Mao’s determination to preserve his revolutionary style providing the theme. In 1956-57, the CCP had engaged in a great debate over the best approach to future Socialist construction. There were then strong pressures for relaxation of political restrictions, for a more regular and institutionalized way of life and for increased reliance on the more highly trained and specialized strata growing up in Chinese society.

The “basic completion” of Socialist transformation in 1949-56 gave strength to the demands for a new approach. However, many leaders of the party were deeply suspicious of such a move. Their experience had been largely in the practice of revolution, in which under Mao’s leadership they had developed a belief in the invincible power of mass movements, provided that the masses had proper political leadership and were ideologically committed to the cause. They distrusted bureaucracy and bureaucrats, and feared that expectations of material gain might diminish revolutionary fervor and sacrifice. Above all, they feared any reduction of their own political power, especially if it were to slip into the hands of intellectuals and specialists who were largely Western trained and oriented. Not surprisingly, after an abortive experiment with “liberalization” in 1957, the CCP decided to push ahead on the familiar model of mass mobilization. It was a fateful decision, for it based Mao’s prestige and hopes (they were to become inextricably intertwined) on sustaining a revolutionary atmosphere which was certain to cause tension and frustration as China strove to modernize.

The strain soon became evident. In 1959, there was heavy criticism within the top party leadership of the people’s communes and Great Leap Forward policy—a policy which epitomized the Maoist approach. More criticism cropped up in 1961-62, following the disastrous consequences of the Great Leap; the party tacitly accepted some of the criticism and introduced significant modifications in the economic and political line of the Great Leap period. To Mao, however, this could be only a temporary retreat. In September, 1962, the Central Committee reaffirmed his call for an uncompromising march toward communism, relying on the old slogans of sacrifice, indoctrination, mobilization and, always, “politics in command.” Over the next three years, the CCP launched ■ series of campaigns designed, at least on the surface, to establish universal acceptance of the thought of Mao Tse-tung as the guarantor of the revolution’s future. But the fanfare of mass movements could not conceal the continued existence of certain concessions to the peasants’ desire for individual enterprise, of widespread yearnings for material comfort and a more settled life, and of pressures for a less politicized training and use of intellectual resources. Mao’s sense of frustration must have mounted steadily as he saw his ideas canonized but somehow never carried to realization by a complex bureaucratic structure he could no longer personally direct. Characteristically, and probably with a sense of desperation, he chose to try once more to force China into conformity with his ideals.

The second broad consideration that led to a new campaign in the fall of 1965 was the fear of an approaching crisis in the international field. The growth of American military power in Vietnam brought enormous pressure to bear on China. To continue the hard line against American involvement in Vietnam raised risks of a military clash with the United States. Could China afford this risk and how should it be met? Mao’s answer was that the risk must be accepted, though not magnified by precipitate action, and that it must be met by preparing China for a people’s war of resistance against foreign invasion. This answer must have appeared unrealistic to some of his colleagues. Possibly some proposed a more aggressive policy of active defense against the American threat. But certainly the main alternative was to consider the (to Mao) unthinkable thought of a rapprochement with the Soviet Union that would insure some degree of Russian military support and possibly open the way to a renewal of economic and technical assistance as well. The Soviet Union was plainly open to negotiations along this line. How far the idea may have been pursued is, of course, obscure, but it is safe to assume that its logic alone was sufficiently powerful to spur Mao into action against any compromise with revisionism. Therefore, although the roots of the Cultural Revolution lie deep in domestic problems of economic and political development, its timing and urgency are related to foreign policy questions.

The Cultural Revolution’s progress through April, 1967, may be divided into five general stages. In the first, from November, 1965, through May, 1966, the campaign developed slowly around a series of articles attacking a small group of writers who had been particularly critical, in 1961-62, of Mao’s leadership. The “black gang,” as the writers were labeled, were prominent but second-ranking figures in the cultural and propaganda field. The attacks were suddenly intensified in May, 1966, culminating in a reorganization of the Peking Party Committee and the purge of P’eng Chen, then simultaneously serving as Mayor of Peking and head of that city’s Party Committee. This implied that “black” influences were not only prevalent throughout the higher levels of cultural and propaganda organs (largely concentrated in Peking) but that the Peking Party organization had tried to protect them. At the same time, it became apparent that Lu Ting-yi, director of the Propaganda Department of the Party Central Committee, and some of his subordinates were in trouble. The earlier disappearance of Army Chief of Staff Lo Jui-ch'ing seemed now to have been an ominous forerunner of a more sweeping struggle. The Cultural Revolution was clearly not going to stop with the disgrace of a few writers.

"Oh, No. Not Another Cabinet Reshuffle."

Waite: The Sun; London (Ben Roth).

The second stage occupied June and July. Important editorials in early June revealed the removals and reorganizations mentioned above and informed the people that everyone was now to participate in a thorough cleansing of the infected organizations, which were still identified largely in the cultural and propaganda network. The Central Committee dispatched work teams to schools and lower-level party organizations to ferret out those suspected of revisionist tendencies. Now the educational system became the most conspicuous arena of struggle as students were mobilized to attack school and party authorities. In mid-June, a joint party-state directive announced that university admissions and entrance examinations were suspended while a major educational reform was planned. As the campaign continued, however, it became increasingly confused and disorderly. Conflict, including some physical violence, broke out within the ranks of the attackers and demonstrators. Although some lower-level officials were singled out for criticism and abuse, the movement appeared to be losing its direction and control.

This uncertainty was resolved in the third stage, which began with the Eleventh Plenum of the Central Committee in Peking from August 1 to 12. The plenum revealed that a split within the Central Committee had been responsible for the drift of preceding weeks. The "main target" became "those within the party who are in authority and are taking the capitalist road." Popular attacks on such officials were specifically encouraged without being "afraid of disturbances" and without fear of suppression. A few days later, at a massive rally in Peking on August 18, the Red Guards made their formal public appearance. The Red Guards, who were at this stage largely recruited from middle school and young university students of "proletarian" family origin, had been mentioned in earlier reports, but they now became the main vehicle for attacking all manifestations of bourgeois or traditional "culture." More important, they also began to point the finger of capitalist guilt at those top-ranking "authorities" who had allegedly obstructed the Cultural Revolution during the second stage.

Red Guard accusations plus various appearances and references by party leaders gradually filled in the general outlines of the struggle. With Minister of Defense Lin Piao as his second in command and main spokesman, Mao was trying to strip of their power all those who were withholding full support for his policies. Although he had forced from the Central Committee a vague mandate to do this, he could not rely on the party apparatus as a whole. Consequently, he adopted a two-pronged strategy to accomplish his goal. On the one hand, he neutralized the structures through which his opponents might fight back. Specifically, this meant by-passing those organizations (the CCP itself and the major mass organizations for youth, women and workers) which were presumably under the influence of high party bureaucrats, and consolidating his control over the propaganda system; propaganda departments and major publications were "reorganized" (some for the second time), while some publications were simply suspended. On the other hand, he incited the Red Guards to drive his opponents out of office by accusation and intimidation; all classes were suspended to give free rein to the Red Guards, who were permitted to eat and travel throughout the country without charge. The strategy brought monumental disorder, but failed for a fundamental reason: Mao's ultimate targets were head of state Liu Shao-ch'i (long considered his likely successor) and Party General Secretary Teng Hsiao-p'ing, who had for several years been perhaps the two most powerful men in the state and party structure, although not equal to Mao in personal prestige. Their strength, resting on established influence and control over millions of state and party cadres, made them relatively immune to verbal attack and made forceful liquidation exceedingly dangerous. Three months passed with little visible initiative from either side. Turmoil in the streets continued, but the opposition sat tight.

The Cultural Revolution moved into its fourth stage about the beginning of December. Mao and his close supporters—most prominently Lin Piao, Premier Chou En-lai, party propagandist Ch'en Po-ta and Mao's wife, Chiang Ch'ing—tacitly conceded that the earlier effort had failed and that the opposition, rather than being a "handful" of authorities, was in reality a majority of those in higher positions. As denunciations, arrests, confessions and even suicides were reported (although few were reliably confirmed), tension mounted rapidly. Open clashes among students, workers and army units became more common. In January, Mao finally gave in to the logic of his campaign and ordered the army to intervene in support of the Cultural Revolution whenever necessary. Factories, cities and even provinces became units of contention between Maoist and opposition forces, with some reports of serious armed encounters. By February, it appeared that Mao was winning, that his supporters were gradually coming out on top in key municipal and provincial organizations. But the risk of full-scale civil war remained high, and it was perhaps for this reason that the domestic confrontation receded slightly in early February. Three weeks of demonstrations against the Soviet Embassy in Peking temporarily shifted the campaign's focus to international revisionism and brought a noticeable easing of the tense military situation.

The fifth stage, which has lasted from February down to the present, appears to have produced a temporary resolution, though not a definitive conclusion, to the Cultural Revolution. The Maoists are now trying to restore a semblance of order and normalcy to Chinese economic and political life: primary schools reopened in February, followed by middle schools in March; great stress has been placed on attending to economic work, particularly spring farming; exhortations to avoid "anarchism" and violations of discipline are frequent. At the same time, they have concentrated their fire on their two most powerful enemies—Liu Shao-ch'i and Teng Hsiao-p'ing—while offering vague promises that other leading cadres who have been criticized may yet rejoin the fold if they repent in time. By the end of April this tactic was working, at least to the extent of producing an uneasy compromise. Liu and Teng, along with the few most prominent leaders who had lost their positions earlier, were clearly to be sacrificed, but the "great majority" of cadres were being wooed to join the Maoist camp. Although outbursts of violence and mass criticism of some high officials still continue, the most dangerous and destructive phase of the Cultural Revolution seems to have run its course.

The preceding outline of events suggests that the Cultural Revolution, apart from stirring up massive turmoil and unrest, has been uncertain in its results. We can nonetheless point to certain consequences which are either permanent or, if temporary, likely to be reversed only with great difficulty. First, CCP leadership has undergone a drastic shake-up in which many of the old elite have either been removed from office or so heavily criticized that their effectiveness in a regime under Mao's control is open to doubt. New leaders, whose names are largely unknown to the outside world, will be emerging in the months and years ahead, while the possibility of a "counterrevolution" by those now disgraced cannot totally be discounted. China has thus entered a period in which there will be much more mobility and instability within the leadership than in the past.

Second, the historical subordination of the Chinese military structure to party organization has been broken. Lin Piao's replacement of Liu as heir apparent, the crucial support that the army gave Mao in January, and the general weakening of the party itself have all contributed to this development. The Chinese army has not been united in this crisis, and it remains a relatively "politicized" and nonprofessional force. But though the role it will play in the future would be hazardous to predict, it is a fact that it has become deeply involved in the governing of China.

Third, the Cultural Revolution has had a profound impact on the institutions of Communist China. The bypassing of the party and the mass organizations has seriously compromised the status of what were once the primary mechanisms of Communist control of the population. The state structure at local levels has suffered, too, as a result of its close identification with what Mao regards as his opposition. It is not yet clear what permanent institutions will replace those shattered, but the model for "temporary" local government now put forward is the "revolutionary committee"—an organization based on a "triple alliance" of representatives drawn from "revolutionary mass organizations," "revolutionary cadres" and local army units. Peking, Shanghai and several provinces have already formed such committees, and the struggle to establish them elsewhere is probably the most significant political activity going on in China today. Assuming that the Maoists continue to consolidate their control, one can sense the likely atmosphere of these committees. They will, in the first instance, be carefully chosen to insure support for Mao, and their policies and style of work will self-consciously reflect Mao's ideal of "revolutionary" leadership. In line with the compromise referred to above, they will try to coopt experienced cadres who may have committed "errors" but have now "reformed"; at the same time, they will be hypersensitive to subversion by "bourgeois" influences and will devote much of their attention to continuing the campaign against such influences. All this suggests that the work of the revolutionary committees will be full of tension, particularly when considering personnel and deciding who are the true "revolutionaries." Old feuds and associations will provide much of the substance of political debate; new "errors" and "enemies" will be uncovered.

The Cultural Revolution has also shed light on two long-range trends which seem to be particularly significant. One is the depth of opposition to the Maoist revolutionary style. The leaders of the campaign have claimed that the opposition was limited in numbers and that it was guilty of a deliberate attempt to overthrow Mao's leadership. Neither claim has been convincing. The "opposition" apparently did not think of itself as an opposition at all. Rather than being a small, organized clique, conspiring to seize power, it was a loose but far-flung grouping of cadres who were in fact in power and largely responsible for the direction of Chinese society. Rather than being deliberate opponents of Mao, these men were experienced and trusted leaders who accepted Mao's prestige and nominal leadership and were wholly committed to the continued development of socialism in China.

Their "errors" were, first, that they had accepted in the 1961 to 1965 period some modifications in the Maoist line which they believed to be necessary under the circumstances; second, that they had tried in June-July, 1966, to restrain the course of the Cultural Revolution to avoid permanent damage to the party and the economy; third, and here we may only speculate, that some of them had proposed alterations in Chinese foreign policy—possibly the only "error" in which they must have realized that they were openly challenging Mao's position. What is important to note here is that the immediate consequences of the Cultural Revolution may well intensify the convictions of those who believe that the deliberate perpetuation of a revolutionary atmosphere is both damaging and dangerous. Mao's enormous prestige, the backing of the army, and an offer of redemption for those who have been criticized are no doubt sufficient at present to still the voices of heresy. It is doubtful, however, that the heresy itself can be eradicated.

Padry, aux Ecoutes. Ben Roth Agency

The second point that deserves emphasis is the extent to which the Chinese people, especially the youth, have taken an active part in the Cultural Revolution. To be sure, many have retreated quietly to avoid involvement in a movement of such uncertain consequences. It is true, too, that in a general way the activities of the Red Guards have been guided by Maoist cadres, a significant number of whom are probably drawn from the army. The fact remains that the Cultural Revolution has elicited a level of popular agitation comparable to that of the first years of Communist rule. Much of this action cannot be explained simply by directives and organization from above, for it has not been that coherent or unanimous. What we have seen is groups of students, workers, soldiers and peasants engaging in debate, agitation and even physical combat to defend their interests or implement the Cultural Revolution's objectives as they understand them. In recent years, the CCP's "mass line" had seemed increasingly ritualized, a stale slogan that evoked the romance of earlier movements but was singularly lacking in substance. The Chinese people appeared to be slipping back into political passivity. But the Cultural Revolution has shown that nearly twenty years of indoctrination and example in the value of political activism has had its impact. A great many Chinese have perceived the political implications underlying the Cultural Revolution, have formed their judgments about them, and have been willing to act on these judgments even under the threat of retaliation.

How shall we relate these consequences and trends to the "vanguard or rear-guard" question posed at the outset? The promoters of the Cultural Revolution are the vanguard of a revolution only in the sense that they propose to overturn much of the existing power structure and infuse what replaces it with a good deal of new blood. This may be a significant political change, but it is scarcely a revolution given the substance of Mao's demands. The fact is that the stated ideals of the Cultural Revolution have been the mainstream of CCP propaganda for many years; there is no reason to believe that their realization will be any easier in the future than in the past. The institutional experimentation now under way offers no real promise of a significant redistribution of wealth or power among the strata of Chinese society. The campaign is best understood, therefore, as an attempt to perpetuate a political style which has been increasingly perceived as inappropriate to the times. It is a rear-guard action which may delay the natural death of the revolutionary atmosphere in Communist China but which will simultaneously, by its disruptive effects, increase resistance to that atmosphere. The surge of popular agitation that has accompanied the campaign suggests that future resistance may be more difficult than ever to contain.

Perhaps the most damning commentary on the campaign's "revolutionary" credentials is the difficulty it has to identify its supporters and opponents in realistic socio-economic terms and to promise any major groups that they will benefit greatly from its victory. The "proletarian" classes certainly have some cause for frustration and resentment, but proletarian groups have been found on both sides of the struggle. Tendencies toward "bureaucratism" and "revisionism" are real, but are extremely difficult to associate with a class base. The much maligned "bourgeoisie" is now, after more than a decade of Socialist construction, a shadow class which simply cannot exert the influence attributed to it. Thus, loyalty to Mao, rather than a clear desire for radical change, has probably been the overriding motive in determining support for the campaign. Political opportunism has also played a part, as has a willingness to believe the worst of anyone associated with the "revisionist" epithet. Idealistic conviction that the Cultural Revolution was necessary to keep China safe for communism has been strongest among the younger students, but they, too, have found it difficult to know precisely what to do about it.

One is left with the conclusion that the primary justification for the Cultural Revolution was the perpetuation of Mao's prestige and leadership style. There is great irony in this, for in the long run he may lose on both counts. His style was not likely to survive in any case, but his prestige might have endured indefinitely, and undiminished, if he had accepted a quiet transformation of his teachings. Now, he has linked his prestige so closely with his style, and so sharpened the confrontation between himself and those who would refine his approach, that some explicit diminution of his image in the future appears probable.

SUPERSONIC TRANSPORT III

Blind Stakes in the Poker Game

KARL M. RUPPENTHAL

This article concludes Mr. Ruppenthal's discussion of the problems surrounding the projected supersonic airliner. The previous articles in the series were "Billion-Dollar Dilemma," May 22, and "Heat, Cold, Radiation & the Boom," May 29.

Impressive technical obstacles must be overcome, large amounts of money must be spent, and economic risks of unknown dimensions must be assumed before the United States can produce a supersonic transport that will cruise at Mach 3, that is, at three times the speed of sound. One set of technical problems stems from the fact that presently developed aluminum alloys will not tolerate the high temperatures that would be developed at such speeds. That being the case, why must the plane go so fast? What would happen if the United States should content itself with craft that would fly, say, in the range of Mach 2 or Mach 2.2?

That same question was asked by the British-French combine when it first entertained thoughts of building an SST, and early studies convinced them that they should content themselves with an aircraft capable of flying at a little more than twice the speed of the present subsonic jets. They came to that conclusion principally because aircraft speeds on the order of Mach 2 will produce the highest surface temperatures that aluminum alloys at present available can accept over long periods of time.

Once the builders of the Concorde decided to limit its speed, a host of troublesome problems were eliminated. They did not have to learn how to fabricate titanium or other exotic metals. They did not have to worry about using large amounts of heavy stainless steel. Because of its size, configuration and speed, the sonic boom that the Concorde will produce may be somewhat less intense than must be anticipated by the builders of the Mach 3 SST. Since it would cruise at a lower altitude (probably 60,000 feet instead of 80,000 feet), radiation hazards may be reduced. The risks of explosive depressurization would be a little smaller, and a lighter, less expensive back-up system for pressurizing the cabin will therefore be acceptable.

There is no doubt that from a technical standpoint it would be a great deal easier for the U. S. aircraft industry to build a Mach 2 transport than it will be to build one for Mach 3. But it is not at all certain that such an aircraft could be an economic success.

Probably the most impressive argument for not building a plane that will cruise on the order of Mach 2 is that the Concorde will get there first. The British-French combine began to develop their aircraft several years before studies of supersonic commercial flight were undertaken in this country. And even with its time advantage there is no assurance that the British-French Concorde will be an economic success. When the initial Anglo-French agreement was signed in November, 1962, it was estimated that the taxpayers of each country would be required to contribute on the order of $225 million. But as the plane went from the drawing board to a secondary state, the cost estimates rose and within two years they had almost doubled. In July, 1964, the best estimates indicated that development costs would approach $800 million.

The public knows little about the efforts made in Britain and in France to broaden the base of the project and thus share the risks. Some of the proponents of the airplane thought that it might become a full-fledged NATO venture. Others hoped for cooperation at least from the United States. But no strong expressions of interest came from either the American Government or the American aircraft industry. Both the Italian and the German Governments made polite responses to overtures, but they showed no active interest. The net result of the various talks was that Britain and France decided to carry the burden by themselves.

When his government took office in England, Harold Wilson was faced with a host of problems including inflation, unemployment, a balance-of-payments deficit, and severe pressure on the pound. Although there was no simple answer to England's complex problems, Wilson knew that the country could not afford to spend money on projects that were ill conceived or unduly expensive. He was concerned that the Concorde endeavor would be classified eventually in both categories.

Wilson and his advisers studied the Concorde project carefully in 1964, and satisfied themselves that the market for the plane had been wildly overestimated, that the project was unduly expensive, and that Britain could not afford it. Many members of Parliament believed that the aircraft had little economic potential. Because of its limited range, there were severe doubts that the plane could even fly nonstop from Paris to New York with a full load of passengers (the specifications of the plane have since been somewhat modified). Because its range would be far less than that of the subsonic jets, its usefulness would be limited.

The plane was originally scheduled to sell for about $16 million but better cost estimates indicated that if there were to be any possibility of recovering the tremendous investments, an additional $5 million or $6 million should be added to the price tag of each plane. But even at $20 million per plane, there was considerable doubt that enough of them could be sold for the project ever to break even.

Said James Callaghan, Chancellor of the Exchequer: "1964 was a year of reckoning for a decade of mistaken policies and false pride." The British Minister of Aviation, Roy Jenkins, concurred: "If we were convinced that the investment in Concorde from our point of view and from the French point of view would help pay our way in the world consistent with the amount of money spent on it, then of course, we would have to go ahead. But at the moment we have our doubts."

As one move to stop wasteful expenditures and prop up a shaky economy, the Wilson government decided to cancel the project. The London Observer wrote an obituary that American proponents of the SST might do well to read thoughtfully today: "The simplest reason for cancelling the Concorde is that its chances of commercial success have become extremely slender. It is already bigger, heavier, noisier, and far more expensive than when it was first conceived. . . . The odds are that, having paid for its construction, the taxpayer would have to subsidize its operations and put up with its sonic boom as well. The aircraft industry will not be restored to economic health by being paid to develop an unsuccessful aircraft."

The British announcement reverberated far beyond the aviation community. There were clear indications that cancellation would result in major damage to already fragile Anglo-French relations. The Wall Street Journal thought "it would be considered by France's de Gaulle as a stab in the back and as proof that Britain still wants to behave as a non-European island. The French President undoubtedly would charge that the British walkout would amount to sabotage and would leave the door open to American domination of Europe's aviation for years to come. Already the Labour government has had to deny rumors prevalent here and in France that it entered into a 'deal' with the U. S. to back out of the Concorde project in return for U. S. support of the 15 per cent surcharge it recently imposed on imports of manufactured goods."

There were reports that de Gaulle was prepared to retaliate in other areas. There might be unusual construction delays in the long proposed tunnel beneath the English Channel. Britain's application to join the Common Market might be put on ice. The fact of the matter was that France could not afford to go it alone.

"France is barely on speaking terms with Britain as a result of Mr. Wilson's handling of the 'Concorde affair,'" reported the U. S. News & World Report. "Without sounding out the French, the British made a spectacular announcement indicating that they had decided to write off the Concorde supersonic airliner. . . . Mr. Wilson is having second thoughts about that decision, inasmuch as the French have threatened to go to the World Court and seek heavy damages from Britain for violating a contract that has no cancellation clause."

In the face of this pressure from its partner England reversed its decision, but the fact remains that the British economists were undoubtedly correct. While there is some chance that the Concorde may be able to pay its own immediate costs of operation—fuel, maintenance wages and the like—there is virtually no possibility that the project as a whole will be self-liquidating or that the British and French taxpayers will be repaid for their investment. And Sir William Hildred, for years director general of the International Air Transport Association, maintains that a slight divergence from the confident predictions of the SST engineers could wreck the economic picture. Should there be restrictions on night operations or should circuitous routings be required because of the noise, the projected solvency of SST operations could quickly convert into losses.”

All Out For The SST Race . . .

Ben Roth Agency

The financial risks involved in the development of any supersonic transport, be it Mach 2 or Mach 3, are so large that no single aircraft company could undertake them. Karl G. Harr, Jr., president of the Aerospace Industries Association, has stated that the development would be impossible without substantial government assistance, and that view is shared by almost every responsible financial executive who has yet spoken on the subject. Indeed the cost is so large and the risks are so great that neither Britain nor France seriously thought of the SST as a single-nation project. Of all the countries in the world, probably only the United States and Russia have the requisite resources to produce the SST on their own. That fact raises interesting questions concerning the appropriate role of the United States Government in the project.

While the federal government has always indicated interest in advancing the nation's transport facilities by subsidies of one kind or another, never before in history has an agency of the government undertaken such an important role in a transport project of this magnitude. It is clear already that if the SST is to be built in the United States within the next decade, the principal financial backers of the project will not be a consortium of financial institutions and Wall Street bankers but the taxpayers. It also seems inevitable that some government agency—probably the FAA—will be the general contractor on the project. After all, it was the Federal Aviation Agency (and not the airlines that will buy the planes) which decided that the supersonic transport should be assembled by Boeing and its engines produced by General Electric. And while the various airlines have advised on the specifications for the aircraft, the FAA will have the final say. Thus, it might be said that the government has already become the project's banker and its general contractor. Now it is about to become architect for the project as well. Through the CAB, the government already has the power to determine fare levels, and as the principal investor the FAA may well set the price that will be paid for the plane.

There are also indications that in some respects the FAA is the principal promoter. On March 2, 1967, The Wall Street Journal reported that President Johnson might request additional funds for the project so that it could proceed closer to Phase III—the actual building of two test models and a flight test program of 100 hours. But before requesting an additional $200 million, said the Journal, Mr. Johnson wanted the airlines to indicate greater interest in the project through a contribution to research and development costs. “In a surprise move the FAA began early last month [February, 1967] to try persuading them to contribute $1 million of risk capital for each of the 57 planes they've tentatively ordered.”

In a report to its stockholders, dated March 24, TWA stated the matter as follows: “TWA has made down payments of $1,000,000 to the Federal Aviation Agency for the purpose of reserving delivery positions for ten supersonic transport aircraft to be built by United States manufacturers under a program sponsored by the United States Government. . . . At the request of the Federal Government, TWA has agreed . . . to participate in a plan for financing the development of two U. S. supersonic transport prototype aircraft. The agreement provides that in the event the Government and The Boeing Company enter into contract before December 1, 1967 for such research and development work, TWA will pay [$10,000,000 to Boeing]. . . . The funds to be paid by TWA will be at a total risk. These amounts will not under any circumstances be returned to TWA. . . . Other U. S. carriers holding delivery positions have been requested to make similar commitments. . . .”

This position may well be typical for the industry; however, World Airways, which has placed tentative orders for three of the SSTs, declined to follow suit. Edward J. Daley, president, said in a letter to FAA Administrator General William F. McKee that if World were to set aside $3 million of its funds now as “risk capital” for SST development, its present subsonic jet acquisition program could be seriously hampered.

Following up on the story, The Wall Street Journal reported: “A large carrier is said to have entered the talks [with the FAA] with a list of qualifications, including a request that the Government accept a formula whereby the airlines would receive $3 million eventually for each $1 million invested, if the plane were successful.” The attractiveness of this proposed arrangement may not be evident to the principal backers—the taxpayers of the United States.

Not yet fully explored is the government's role as a possible insurer of the supersonic craft. As long as the plane remains on the ground, insurance questions are relatively mundane. It is simply a matter of determining how much insurance should prudently be provided against various hazards that are known to be possible.

But once the plane is in the air there is as yet no real measure of the risks to which the operating airline may be exposed. It would be difficult enough to handle passengers' claims for alleged injury through radiation, faulty pressurization and other phenomena. But what about possible claims that may arise from aircraft accidents and the effects of the sonic boom? The dimensions of this problem are so widespread that several unorthodox solutions have been suggested.

One is that claims for damage resulting from sonic boom be severely restricted by legislation—a course of action that would be unpopular, to say the least. Another proposal is that the government simply underwrite the risks. Should that course of action be followed, the Government of the United States would automatically, and perhaps inadvertently, find itself in the insurance business, and in a very substantial way.

As the day of supersonic decision approaches, the level of government in-fighting has increased. While most of the early government-generated publicity came from protagonists of the SST, some of their detractors are now on the stage. Their position was reported by Fred L. Zimmerman in The Wall Street Journal:

"It is remarkable that this project has got as far as it has," complains an economist familiar with the project. Part of the explanation, he asserts, is that most public and Congressional discussion so far has been based on pro-SST material widely circulated by the FAA, while government critics of the program have been "placed under constraint."

Few administration SST experts still believe the FAA's claim of total objectivity about the project. This claim has long irritated SST critics, who have argued there is a basic conflict of interest, in that the FAA is running the project and yet will have responsibility for certifying that the SSTs are safe for passenger service. In effect, charges one critic, "the FAA will be asked to certify that it has spent its money wisely and that its own technical judgment is sound."

While economic questions in themselves are not always simple, aircraft economics are also intertwined in balance-of-payments questions. Roy H. Nickerson, vice president in charge of the Aerospace and Electronics Department of the First National City Bank, said at a banking forum in 1965 that a failure of the U. S. to get a supersonic transport into the air by 1972 could add a staggering $10 billion to our balance of payments deficit in the 1970s. As an aside, he pointed out that the aerospace and electronics industries had met favorable trade balances of some $1.7 billion in 1964.

"That could be wiped out if the U. S. fails to deliver a supersonic jet to market within two years after the British-French Concorde begins flying. A longer lead than that, some industry experts fear, would siphon off much of the business that the U. S. might normally get," said Dennis Duggan in the now defunct New York Herald Tribune.

But the SST detractors are not satisfied with these figures. They suspect that considerable double counting is involved, that SST proponents may rest their predictions on the assumption that without the SST U. S. aircraft exports would nose-dive. They contend that if the United States exports many supersonic craft, it may find itself substituting them for subsonic transports, which are at present an export item of considerable importance. Also largely ignored in the calculations is the fact that if the SST manages to induce large numbers of passengers to fly to the far corners of the earth, many of those passengers will be Americans. The amount of money brought in by the sale of supersonic aircraft could be far overshadowed by the dollars that U. S. travelers would spend abroad.

Zimmerman, reporting again in The Wall Street Journal, became acidic:

Economic studies done by several outside research concerns and just delivered to the FAA are so critical of the project's optimistic financial assumptions—including those about market demand, likely fare levels, and the balance-of-payments effect—that the FAA has decided to keep them secret.

When the FAA commissioned the studies last year at a cost of more than $650,000, it is understood to have said it would make them public when completed. But as it began receiving the reports and discovered almost all conclusions were unfavorable to the SST, it quickly stamped them "for official use only."

"Anything that's been done in this area is for controlled distribution only," explains an FAA spokesman in refusing to let a reporter see the studies. "This means the reports are available only to people who establish a 'need to know.'" It's believed that in the past few days the FAA decided this "need to know" didn't extend to several Congressmen, including some members of the House Appropriations Committee, and at least one powerful Democratic Senator, all of whom were denied access to the reports.

Zimmerman quoted one person in the Administration as saying: "We all agree there's absolutely no economic justification for building this plane." "This thing could become the FAA's Edsel," said another. "Among those to whom this may come as a shock," said Zimmerman, "are the members of Congress who have appropriated $511 million since 1962 for developing the plane, partly because of unequivocal assurances from the FAA that the SST would be a bonanza for the U. S. balance-of-payments position, while being highly profitable for the airlines to operate. . . ."

Several months after The Wall Street Journal complained of the official secrecy surrounding the project, the FAA made public several of the studies that had previously been classified. Now that there is less uncertainty concerning probable costs, a gigantic poker game is beginning to take shape. Participants include the U. S. aircraft industry, the Anglo-French builders of the Concorde, the conservationists, property owners on the boom paths and the taxpayers. Some of the players hold impressive cards and an imposing stack of chips. Others, less well heeled, are skillful players who seldom lose in this game. Some players are eager, while others have been reluctantly drawn into the game. And sitting quietly in the background another potential participant, Russia, silently eyes the table.

The stakes are high: several billion dollars in government contracts, billions of dollars in wages and several thousand jobs. At stake, too, are elements of national pride and technical leadership.

But also to be considered are important questions about the living qualities of the earth: how much noise should be tolerated, and who is competent to set the levels? What would be the impact of the supersonic transport upon all of the peoples of the world? And who is to decide whether it would be desirable? The full importance of the supersonic decision is just beginning to unfold. Far more is involved than the aircraft industry itself, or travel itself. Political, economic and social questions of considerable magnitude have yet to be assessed. Far more discussion is indicated before we undertake a project that promises literally to shake the world.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

The Nonpersonality Cult

KHRUSHCHEV. By Mark Frankland. Introduction by Harry Schwartz. Stein and Day. 213 pp. $6.95.

ALEXANDER WERTH

Only on those rare days when there is an election in Moscow do we get any news of Nikita Khrushchev. Western correspondents (and particularly Henry Shapiro of United Press, who was a great favorite of Mr. K.) hang round the polling station in the district where he lives, to exchange a few words with him. We learned, on the most recent of such occasions, that Mr. K. had grown much older and thinner, and that, when asked how he was, he is reported to have shrugged his shoulders, and remarked with a touch of bitter humor: "Oh, what does it matter to you? I'm just an old-age pensioner, like millions of others." So we know that Mr. K. (who was 73 on April 17) is still alive, and is living in moderate comfort in Moscow. As far as the Soviet press is concerned, however, he might not exist—and might never have existed; Stalin is sometimes mentioned, usually in an unfavorable context; but Mr. K. hardly ever. In the Stalin days, Communist leaders who had fallen from grace were usually shot; but to be killed by silence must be almost equally galling, especially for so extroverted and ebullient a person as Khrushchev, who literally dominated the Russian political scene for more than ten years, and was his own top publicity agent.

But the Western world has not forgotten him. We have had several books on Khrushchev in recent years. Some, like George Palocz-Horvath's, represent him as one of the most evil accomplices in "Stalin's crimes." Others, like Edward Crankshaw's, treat him almost as an angel of light, compared with the ogre who had ruled Russia during the previous twenty-five years. Now we have a new book on Khrushchev by Mark Frankland, a former Moscow correspondent of the London Observer which is, in some ways, more satisfactory than the others. It avoids the all-black and all-white approach; shows that Khrushchev was neither a saint nor an archvillain; and places the Stalin period in good historical perspective.

Unlike other Western writers, Frankland is conscious of the danger of allowing "Stalin's barbarism to dominate our image of the Soviet Union from the 1930's on." For him, the history of the Stalin years is "like two halves of a puzzle that can never be made to fit together. There is the positive side—the great work of building the foundations of a new society. But there is also the purposeful disregard for human life that in the 1930s assumed a dimension beyond ordinary human cruelty." To stress only one side and ignore the other is to misrepresent history; and it is only by taking full account of both halves of the "puzzle" that, in Frankland's view, the whole story of Nikita Khrushchev begins to make sense.

Frankland also shows commendable modesty. Not a Kremlinologist in the pejorative sense, he admits that any biography of a Soviet leader "must be very tentative indeed," since "most of the material on which biographies are usually based—such as private letters and diaries—is simply unavailable." And in his chapters on the postwar Stalin period, describing how Zhdanov, Khrushchev, Malenkov and others were jockeying for position, his frequent use of phrases like "it is possible," "it is likely," "the odds are that . . ."—makes it clear that his stories are based not on any written or printed material but on no more than intelligent guesswork. Even when he does produce what looks like hard facts, their sources are often, in my view, very far from reliable—particularly the "revelations" by disgracing Yugoslavs like Djilas and Dedijer.

Despite these limitations, most of which Frankland himself admits, he has written a biography of Khrushchev which makes better sense than most.

Unlike Lenin, Trotsky and even Stalin, Khrushchev was in no way an intellectual, let alone a learned Marxist; during the Civil War, when he was a sort of political commissar of the lowest rank in the Red Army, he was still scarcely literate. But he had seen life in the raw as a youth; he regarded the "foreign capitalists" who controlled many of the Donbas mines and factories as "enemies of the Russian people" who paid their workers miserable wages, and treated Russia little better than the Congo. (Actually, Khrushchev tended to exaggerate these horrors in retrospect; the Donbas miners enjoyed a certain degree of capitalist paternalism and, as Lenin himself wrote, received much better wages than the workers in the more archaic Urals industries.) What also made a great impression on young Khrushchev's mind was the military aid given to the Whites by the "Western imperialists"; this aid was insufficient and halfhearted but it prolonged the Civil War, and intensified that economic chaos from which Russia was to suffer for years after, culminating in the fearful famines of 1920 to 1922.

Frankland suggests that, for a few years, young Khrushchev's adherence to the Bolshevik party remains uncertain; he may even have been, at the early stages of the Revolution, more sympathetic to the Mensheviks or the Social-Revolutionaries. But in any case, he became a good Bolshevik soon after, and when the Civil War was over, he had the good luck of being regarded as a sufficiently reliable member of the rank and file to be admitted to one of the Ukrainian rabfacs, those "Workers' Faculties," which "remedied his almost total lack of formal education" and "provided men like him with a crash course in basic subjects before they went on to specialist studies." Neither his loyalty to the regime—after his experiences in the Civil War—nor his proletarian origin was in doubt; and men like him (he was 28 by 1922) were needed to provide a new class of Soviet specialists. Khrushchev owed his rapid promotion on the local (Ukrainian) level to none other than Lazar Kaganovich—his future victim—already Stalin's hatchet man in the Ukraine:

Khrushchev was exactly the sort of man that Kaganovich was seeking to promote in the Ukrainian hierarchy. Men like Khrushchev were malleable precisely because their approach to Bolshevism was not intellectual, because they knew nothing of the pre-revolutionary world of Bolshevism. Stalin's gradual destruction of all opposition meant little to such men. . . . Khrushchev eagerly endorsed all Stalin's attacks on his opponents. . . . In 1926 he attacked Trotsky and Zinoviev. . . . In 1929 he attacked Bukharin at the 2nd Ukrainian Party Conference.

In the early 1930s, Khrushchev's rise became spectacular; Kaganovich took him to Moscow where, in 1933, he became his number-two man in the Moscow city party; two years later he succeeded Kaganovich as head of the party for the whole Moscow region, and was also elected to the Central Committee; during the years that followed the two men were associated with that spectacular enterprise, the building of the Moscow subway.

Some of the best passages in Frankland's book deal with the spirit of Russia's "Iron Age"—the industrialization of Russia under the first three Five-Year Plans:

The heroism of this period was central to the experience of the men in Khrushchev's generation. . . . Although some Party members revolted against the ruthlessness of these [Stalin's] policies, it is not hard to understand how many believed them justified. The vision of a mighty Russia . . . appealed powerfully to both the Russian and the communist mind. . . . The fear that the capitalist states might attack Russia . . . seemed doubly justified by the birth and growth of Nazi Germany. Stalin's policy to make the Soviet Union strong . . . seemed literally a matter of life and death.

This obsession with Nazi Germany goes a long way to explain not only Khrushchev's total loyalty to Stalin and his ready acceptance of the purges but, more significantly, his unenviable role as "the butcher of the Ukraine" in the late 1930s. There were many "disloyal" elements in the Ukraine, especially after the collectivization which had been particularly fierce in that country but, worse still, it was the part of the Soviet Union in which Hitler, with his Lebensraum claims, was specially interested.

Not only did Khrushchev hound Ukrainian "nationalists" and "separatists" but he also made a serious effort to restore agriculture and stock breeding; he was at least partly successful in this, and thus acquired in Moscow his reputation as an "agricultural expert." The grain problem, at any rate, was solved by 1939, largely as a result of Khrushchev's technique of expanding the network of party organizations in the Ukrainian countryside; in 1938, he had been promoted to candidate membership of the Politburo. This chapter on Khrushchev as the essentially Russian boss of the Ukraine is interesting, though Frankland tends to pull his punches in dealing with the even greater ruthlessness Khrushchev showed in his handling of the Western Ukraine, when the Russians took it over in 1939, as a result of the partition of Poland.

In his chapter describing Khrushchev during the war, Frankland covers what is mostly familiar ground; but here he puts forward the theory that it was during these years that Khrushchev first lost faith in the "infallibility" of Stalin; for he had suffered directly from some of the major errors Stalin had committed as commander in chief. In his description of the early post-Stalin period, Frankland says little or nothing about the liquidation of the camps and the abolition of the NKVD's Forced Labor Empire. Yet it is this, and the "restoration of Socialist legality" which (though not solely Khrushchev's work) laid the real foundations for his rapidly growing popularity in the country, and prepared it psychologically for the 20th Congress of 1956 and for the famous "secret report." This report on "Stalin's crimes threw Russia into a fever"; and as we know, its effect on the outside world, particularly on Poland and Hungary, was even more violent. As a result, the opposition to Khrushchev grew, and he did not regain his balance until he had liquidated the "Anti-Party Group" in 1957.

It was in 1957-58 that Khrushchev virtually became the ruler of Russia; he not only took credit for the sputniks but also for the bumper harvest of 1958, when the Virgin Lands proved—at first—an enormous success. Khrushchev reached the height of internal popularity and world fame in 1959, a year marked by his famous trip to the United States. All seemed to be going well: Russia appeared, technically, ahead of the United States; economically, things were better in Russia than ever before; communism, with its unequaled prosperity, seemed in sight. Khrushchev boasted of "outstripping America" in the per capita output of food within a very short time, and of "burying" capitalism under the mountains of this unprecedented affluence of Communist Russia. Frankland argues that Khrushchev firmly believed that world communism would result from this prosperity. But did he? It is hard to believe that whatever his boasts he was not conscious, at heart of the geographical and climatic handicaps inherent in Soviet agriculture.

In any case, the crazy improvisations and furious outbursts by which Khrushchev's agricultural "policies" were marked during the last four years of his rule suggest that he was desperate in his realization that his exuberant optimism of 1958-59 was unfounded. The 1963 harvest proved a disaster. By depriving China of technical aid in 1960

MUSIC OVER WORDS

*Connotations, I do not want the connotations of words.
Suddenly they are gross, they get in the way of feeling.
It is all too difficult to be ambiguous
And struggle in meshes of the intellectual.*

*Nakedness! Purity! Ecstasy of sound!
Sound that ravishes me entirely, joyfully,
You take me back to the beginnings of —
Before he could articulate his deep confusions.*

*Every fiber of my body needs to salute you.
Direct and passionate you speak to me overwhelmingly,
How could we have gone so far in the funereal?
Paean! I wake to life when I hear music weaving!*

*Let the dead have their memorial syllables,
Perfect stone poems in gardens of perfect stone.
With you I writhe in the struggle of humanity,
Music, lift me to heaven, descend me to hell.*

*Music, secrete in me your strange dynamism.
In this dynamism I surge and lunge, and strike
Fate. You make me want to judge mankind,
Raising me to the height of vision.*

*Music then play the long drawn-out fantasy
Of the completest contact of tactile reality
And while you are flowing like the oceans in a great storm
I live in the height of danger and authority.*

RICHARD EBERHART

(he did this without consulting anybody), he made an enemy of that country. His "coexistence" with America suffered one setback after another—partly owing to American bad faith (the U-2 incident), partly to Khrushchev's own errors of judgment (the Cuban missile crisis). The test-ban treaty of 1963 was not enough to save Khrushchev. His cultural policy was so incoherent that he lost the support of the intelligentsia. By 1964 he had antagonized not only it but also the heavily taxed peasantry, the working class (who were short of food, and had to pay high prices for what little was available), the Chinese and, finally, even the Czechs and Poles when he sent his son-in-law on an unofficial mission to West Germany, thus by-passing Foreign Minister Gromyko.

Frankland touches on most of these points. Apart from the animosity Khrushchev had created among his colleagues on the Presidium, there was also another factor which greatly contributed to the atmosphere in which his elimination in October, 1964, was possible—and, indeed, easy. And that was the general discontent in the country over shortages, over the emptiness of Khrushchev's promises and extravagant boasts, besides the growing uneasiness over the new "personality cult." I remember the angry shoulder shrug with which, two months before Khrushchev's fall, a Leningrad editor openly complained to me that he had to put another Khrushchev picture on his front page, and "fill up nearly the whole of the paper with more of his crap on agriculture."

Today, more than three years after his fall, Khrushchev remains a puzzling and rather fascinating figure—good and bad, shrewd and stupid, subtle and clumsy, cautious and reckless. Have things greatly changed in Russia since his fall? In his introduction, Mr. Schwartz says they haven't. Like Khrushchev, Kosygin, he says, believes in coexistence abroad and prosperity at home. But there are, surely, some major differences. The style of governing Russia has changed; Khrushchev's improvisations have given way to more efficient methods; the boasting about outstripping America and the "inevitable" advent of world communism have been replaced by a more sober assessment of Russia and the world. The cultural policy (witness the Siniavsky-Daniel trial) has not improved. But there is a marked desire to come to terms with America and especially with Western Europe and to accept the "Gaullist" idea that Russia is "part of Europe" and even—as Andrei Voznesensky suggested in a recent poem —the shield that will protect Europe against Asia. This rapprochement with Western Europe is something new. At heart, Khrushchev took only America seriously. At least as long as the war in Vietnam lasts, Kosygin will look for friends and economic partners elsewhere—in Britain, in France, in Italy. Today, Khrushchev's patronage of the Third World is being pursued halfheartedly. "Friends" like Nkrumah and Ben Bella have been eliminated; Indonesia is in a mess, and the Russians are not even sure where they stand with Castro. While throwing anxious glances at China, they want, above all, to cultivate their own garden—an astonishing offspring of Marxism-Leninism in the nuclear era. But will history—and the Pentagon—allow them to?

The Politics of Art

THE REACTIONARIES, Yeats, Lewis, Pound, Eliot, Lawrence: A Study of the Anti-Democratic Intelligentsia. By John R. Harrison. Introduction by William Empson. Schocken Books. 224 pp. $6.

SHERMAN PAUL

Mr. Paul teaches English at the University of Iowa. His most recent book is Edmund Wilson: A Study of Literary Vocation in Our Time (University of Illinois Press). He is also the author of Louis Sullivan: An Architect in American Thought (Prentice-Hall).

There was never any question that these writers—and much of the modernism to which they heavily contributed—were reactionary, and Mr. Harrison adduces familiar literary evidence. The still troublesome question, which makes his forthright examination and judgment of these writers so challenging and significant, concerns the relation of a writer's politics (social and cultural sentiments, political views and action) to his art (aesthetic principles and practice). We seldom raise this question because we have been taught by these as well as other writers, whose views still dominate the literary world and the classroom, that art is separable from life, and superior to it. In our worry over mass culture we may speak now of the "politics of culture," but it is not yet fashionable to speak of the politics of art—or to think of the artist as seriously engaged in the affairs of society.

There has been, increasingly, an expression of discontent with the modernist sensibility, but except for Edmund Wilson in Axel's Castle (1931), no one until now has so fully addressed himself to the implications of this sensibility for politics. Wilson impugned the writer's withdrawal from the world of affairs and proposed a close alignment of imagination and politics—made art an instrument of social engineering, and tributary to man. But because Wilson's book introduced writers such as Yeats, Valéry and Eliot to a wide audience, it did more to further symbolist views of the autonomy and supremacy of art than hinder them. So did the actual politics of art of the 1930s and early 1940s, and since that time we have been wary of any such alliance. Only now, stirred by the activism and protest of a new generation of writers, have we been willing again to admit that art, inevitably, has political aspects. This is what Harrison,

I WANT TO HELP BUILD A HUMAN BRIDGE TO RUSSIA WITH CITIZEN EXCHANGE CORPS This Summer

Send me FREE reprints of N. Y. Times editorials telling how CITIZEN EXCHANGE CORPS (CEC), a non-political, non-profit organization acts to implement Presidents Eisenhower, Kennedy and Johnson's policy of "Building Bridges" to Russia. Tell me how I can participate this summer in a 3 week CEC program of people-to-people contact and seminars that is open to Americans of all ages and occupations. AND HOW THIS PROGRAM CAN BE A MAJOR STEP TOWARD PREVENTING NUCLEAR WAR.

3 WEEK EXCHANGE VISITS LEAVE NEW YORK CITY
July 14 — Aug. 5 — Aug. 26 or Meet CEC in Moscow

Name
Address
City
State Zip

Mail to:
CITIZEN
EXCHANGE CORPS.
550 Fifth Ave. (Dept. N-11)
New York City 10036

VISITING ITALY

*We are tired of this art that is never finished!
Mosaics that describe the approaching fall,
The hot streets that never ended,
Whorls in wine-pots,
Bits of time scattered everywhere,
Like hairs from the barbarians sleeping under the arena floor.
Pale and exhausted torsos,
Long arms reaching into the ocean of nothing,
Arenas that hold only dark corridors and galleries rushing through the air two stories up,
Air like the acid breath of the lions
That has wiped out the faces of all the statues.*

ROBERT BLY

A young British scholar of this generation, insists on; and his book, which scrutinizes the politics of these writers and tests them against the standards of liberal democracy, may be taken as a sign—favorable, I think—of the changing social and intellectual climate.

In the years since Axel's Castle we have come to see more clearly that the symbolist view of art and the kinds of repudiation represented by it may underwrite the mentality of fascism; and we have come to see that those who upheld such aesthetic doctrines were often political in their concern for power and leadership. We do not think of these writers, as Van Wyck Brooks narrowly did as early as the 1920s, as "coterie" writers, or vilify them as "life-deniers" even though in the battle between Culture and life, which Ortega said was the theme of our time, they stood in many respects for Culture and turned to past achievements for solutions to present needs. We have come to understand them, to understand how much their response measures the inadequate solution of modern problems, and sometimes we even share their distaste for what Yeats called "this filthy modern tide." But in light of the record—not only of actions like Pound's but of the often virulent content of their work—we may readily assent to Julian Benda's prediction that "this denunciation of liberalism, notably by the vast majority of contemporary men of letters, will be one of the things in this age most astonishing to history."

The modernist sensibility is defined by its anti-modernism, by its repugnance to the many forces in our time that have brought change and instability. It has shaped itself against democracy (parliaments, pluralism, humanitarianism, the masses); against science, industrialism, and sometimes capitalism, and against secularism (humanism, relativism, historicism, rationalism). Mr. Empson, in his introduction, says that it leads to a "cult of Unnaturalism"—and it does, countering what it considers the "softness" of its arch-foe naturalism with "hard" modes of thought whose authoritarian and closed character is sometimes supported by religion. This sensibility is not a sport or the possession of literary men alone. It is a frequent phenomenon, as Harrison explains, of 19th-century and recent history, a familiar reaction to all sorts of displacements and dispossessions. And as Benda's statement and Harrison's "social surprise" (the phrase is Empson's) indicate, it is not the illiberalism, the preference for "cruel, authoritarian, bellicose society," that is astonishing but rather the connection of writers with it.

In studying this relationship Harrison has followed the kind of engaged sociology of literature one finds in Raymond Williams' Culture and Society, and in some respects his study is a supplement to it. His directive is taken from Orwell: "a writer's political and religious beliefs are not excrescences to be laughed away, but something that will leave their mark even on the smallest detail of his work." He is not wholly successful, I think, in finding such substantiating elements of style—the result perhaps of thinking T. E. Hulme's definitions of "geometric" and "vital" art sufficient proof, and of overlooking the most brilliant study of modernist form and thought, Joseph Frank's The Widening Gyre.

But Harrison is successful in taking seriously a writer's political and religious beliefs and, like Raymond Williams, in putting before us the content of a writer's work. And what is very much his own is the critical tact with which he treats his subjects and the value of human sympathy by which he finally judges them: "The ultimate argument is one of sympathy. It is impossible to prove scientifically that it is right to respect other people and treat them humanely, and wrong to hate and terrorize them. To have sympathy for one's fellow human beings, whether individually or in the mass, seems to me to be an eminently desirable human quality. There is little doubt that the writers here discussed were lacking in this quality."

The virtues of sanity, decency and honesty that inform this statement inform Harrison's book and more than compensate for the lack of incisiveness in conception and style, the sketchiness, and the occasional naïveté (Hemingway's "main interests in life were big-game hunting and bull-fighting"—"Jews are not only good at finance; probably no race is more widely gifted"). The most serious deficiencies, I think, are due simply to insufficient reading and meditation: for example, the failure in the case of Lawrence to consider his contest with Whitman ("I am he at-testing sympathy") over the claims of aristocracy and democracy; the failure to consider in writers other than Lawrence the connection between their sexual and political attitudes; and the failure to set these writers against a foil, a peer in art such as Joyce, who in depicting Bloom ("... it's no use, says he. Force, hatred, history, all that. That's not life for men and women, insult and hatred") discounted almost everything the reactionaries stood for.

JAMES DICKEY POEMS 1957-1967

"the work of a . . . major poet. . . . I have no doubt that it will prove to be the outstanding collection of one man's poems to appear in this decade."

— LOUIS UNTERMEYER,
Saturday Review

"James Dickey is a good poet, very good."

— MICHAEL GOLDMAN,
The Nation

"he has achieved a remarkable and deserved popularity."

— WILLIAM MEREDITH,
The N.Y. Times Book Review

315 pages, $6.95

WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY PRESS
Middletown, Conn. 06457

Good, Dirty Fun and Games

SNOW WHITE. By Donald Barthelme. Atheneum Publishers. 181 pp. $4.50.

SHAUN O'CONNELL

Mr. O'Connell teaches English at the University of Massachusetts.

It's not Disney's Snow White (heigh-ho). That impinged. Nature out of whack—stepmother, half-men, domestically helpful wildlife, a poisoned apple, “death.” Pity and terror. Then nature's healthy order re-established—the prince, bye-bye boys and birds, back to a castle. Catharsis. Disney whipped up a Jungian archetype for 7 year olds. Who—older, weightier, taxed and a bit puzzled by what's happening, baby—might be more put off than on by a Snow White who makes it in the shower with her munificent seven, wears People's Volunteer trousers or black vinyl pajamas and has anxiety hang-ups waiting for her prince to come.

But Barthelme doesn't want from us the investment which we so promiscuously gave Walt. We must be cool enough to get the games that are being played in his novel. Like Muckrake the Myths. Barthelme did this before in “The Joker's Greatest Triumph,” making Batman vaguely faggy. Here Snow White is done in.

The witch figure, Jane Villiers de l'Isle-Adam, is prevented from poisoning Snow White with a vodka Gibson by the suddenly princely Paul, “a friend of the family,” who downs it himself.

Paul falls, and with him another of our treasured myths. (Saul Bellow has suggested that many Americans hide within them a “sealed treasure,” some gem of culture like Anna Karenina or Madame Bovary. Barthelme suggests, with more persuasion, that the things we really treasure—which thus are worth evoking and debunking—are those great tawdry, lyrical, chintzy fantasies which exploited us when we were young.)

Or Identify that Allusion. After a marvelous list of princes who might come for her (Prince Andrey? Prince Philip? Prince Hal? Prince Matchabelli? Prince Valiant?) Snow White ponders, waiting in a lovely parody of Lorenz Hart. “But slash me if I will let it, this waiting, bring down my lofty feelings of anticipation from the bedroom ceiling where they dance overhead like so many French letters filled with lifting gas.” After the halting, hyped-up rhetoric—making “this waiting” more visible by hanging it out in apposition—Hart's already strained conceit (“She dances overhead/ On the ceiling near my bed.”) is overloaded with another analogy and the whole thing falls into bathos. Many allusions are word plays, like Woody Allen one-liners: “The Fire Next Time Bar & Grill”; Pete Seeger's “Where Have All The Flowers Gone?” get transformed in, “where have all the buffalo gone?” But other allusions have more ambitious reach.

Paul once considers joining “the President's war on poetry,” a neat compression of the Shriver/Lowell sides of the President's mind. Snow White's seven make Chinese baby food (because there is now more money in this than in mining diamonds?), following the recipes of their father. “Try to be a man about whom nothing is known,” our father said, when we were young. Our father said several other interesting things, but we have forgotten what they were.” (Henry James said, “try to be one of the people on whom nothing is lost!” This plea for perception is altered by Barthelme to fit themes of anonymity and alienation; whatever else James might have said is forgotten in this anti-traditional novel.) Sometimes significant, always funny, the allusions really serve a more important function; after the reader's long trips through odd syntax and weird doings they periodically refer him to a recognizable world only, of course, to show that what he thought was inviolable is now turvy-topsy.

This, then, is a nice product of the literature-as-fun-and-games persuasion. In these terms Snow White is beyond challenge; Barthelme has a raucous wit and talent to burn; the fun is good and dirty, the games are tricky. Barthelme could be discussed in the framework of anti-novel theory: the novel should give up introspection (Sartre), should have no content (Robbe-Grillet), should not satisfy the reader's “passion to understand” (Sontag). But let that go. Barthelme is never so chilly and weighty as these theoreticians. He mocks himself (a built-in boring discussion of his own techniques and a questionnaire for audience responses) as Twain and West did, never goes wholly ga-ga for his own gimmicks as Burroughs does.

Even when we grudgingly grant that Barthelme has every right to do what he wants to Batman and Snow White (marry them off next?), does it follow that literature is merely blague? Or, to put it another way, in order for the artifice of literature to work, doesn't it have to break through its own arbitrary restrictions, create an illusion against its own illusion? All literature is a game. Of course. But to convince us that it is more than Monopoly a work has to impinge. Too abstract? Take Lolita. This is clearly a game. Nabokov takes a vile old nymph-lecher, doesn't gloss over the ugliness of what he is doing, but through the most marvelous rhetoric, both artificial and touching (“my dolorous and hazy darling”), gets so far inside Humbert Humbert that the reader is involved, implicated in his being, one with his terrible, lyrical lust. That's the game; but in order to make that game work we must be touched by the reality of what happened to Humbert and Lo.

Lolita may have begun as a literary experiment, but in order to prove the validity of the hypothesis the quick and the pain of life had to be touched in silly, pathetic H. H. and lost, lovely Lolita. “I insist the world know how much I loved my Lolita, this Lolita, pale and polluted, and big with another's child, but still gray-eyed, still sooty-lashed, still auburn and almond, still Carmencita, still mine.” Humbert's love is wholly moving. If the anti-novel or the fun-and-games-novel disapprove of this stuff of life then they can march in the avant-garde fields, (no depth, no content, no goal) alone.

Yet Donald Barthelme knows more than just the games people play. Several stories in his first book, Come Back, Dr. Caligari, are wildly funny dramatizations of loony incidents in the service of sharp perceptions. In “Me and Miss Mandible” a 35-year-old failure—as soldier, husband and insurance adjuster—is returned to the sixth grade for retraining. This wacky

The Best Way To Get

THE NATION

THE NATION 6-19-67
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

- ☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ 6 Months, $6
☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed
(Foreign and Canadian Postage $1 a year extra)

NAME

ADDRESS

CITY

STATE ZIP NO.

premise is based upon an insight which is internally convincing. "the distinction between children and adults, while probably useful for some purposes is at bottom a specious one, I feel. There are only individual egos, crazy for love." From this conviction all else follows—teachers acting as "authorities" on a world they don't understand, children twisted with a Debbie-Eddie-Liz view of love. In "A Shower of Gold" Barthelme further dramatizes the sadism of an adult society whose entertainment is humiliating television "game" shows. After careful consideration Peterson, a minor artist, decides that "the world is absurd," goes on a television program and harangues his audience: "My mother was a royal virgin . . . and my father a shower of gold. My childhood was pastoral and energetic and rich in experiences which developed my character. As a young man I was noble in reason, infinite in faculty, in form express and admirable, and in apprehension. . . ." Then came "maturity" and an absurd world. Snow White is never up to these crazy-lovely stories, but it has its moments—Snow White's bitching about the ennui in being an American "horsewife," another's disquisition on the money that could be made in the manufacturing of "plastic buffalo humps," to help raise the per capita production of trash. "It's that we want to be on the leading edge of this trash phenomenon, the everted sphere of the future." But these moments don't cohere around a central vision; his "novel" remains a collection of wild and witty set pieces, often beautiful in themselves but, after the stories in Come Back, Dr. Caligari, disappointing. What is really worrisome is the thought that Barthelme might now—after Snow White, who?—consider this kind of story coherence too conventional. I—invoicing the incontestable authority of Disney and Nabokov—hope not.

An Affair of Passion

THE CALIFORNIA OATH CONTROVERSY. By David P. Gardner. University of California Press. 245 pp. $5.50.

GEORGE R. STEWART

Mr Stewart, professor emeritus of the University of California, is the author, among many other books, of The California Trial (McGraw-Hill) and Committee of Vigilance (Houghton Mifflin). His The Year of the Oath (Doubleday) was written in collaboration with other professors of the University of California.

In his opening sentence the author expands upon his title and presents "the loyalty oath controversy that for three years convulsed the largest university in the nation." He means the University of California, and the years extend from 1949 to 1952.

One wonders how many people, even those of full maturity, still remember that controversy. Much has happened since. But during a trip to Europe in 1951 I found that intellectuals in all countries were interested and concerned about the affair.

In any case, it is a fit subject for historical review, and the present work is a valuable one. With a high degree of objectivity, it offers a detailed and accurate account, based chiefly upon regental, administrative and faculty records. The author has also read private letters, diaries and memoranda, and has talked with many of the numerous still surviving leaders. His actual use of such informal records, however, appears to be comparatively slight. Perhaps for this reason, the narrative gives little sense of immediacy, and the characters of the participants do not appear vividly. In general, the account might be called bureaucratic, keeping close to the documents and quoting often and voluminously.

No historian can be wholly objective, and Mr. Gardner guardedly states his own feelings, which seem to put him on the side of the faculty.

The book is admirable in the presentation and appraisal of the historical background of the times, when such names as McCarthy and Hiss were on everyone's tongue, and when, in the middle of the local action, the Korean War blazed up. The account emphasizes, also, the failure of communications between regents and faculty, concluding Chapter 3 with: "The Regents, the President, and the Faculty fell victim to their prior inconsistencies and inability to communicate one with another."

Although Tolstoi is not, I think, mentioned anywhere, Gardner suggests a Tolstolian world, where things and mass feeling take charge, while individuals, for all their strugglings, are impotent. Step by step, the president was forced aside, and regents and faculty locked into a combat that neither of them wanted. Often the voting margin was so close that it could be called ridiculous, if it had not been so generally tragic.

One motion in the senate at Los Angeles was carried by 102 to 101. A typi-

$4.95 from your bookseller

HOLT, RINEHART AND WINSTON, INC.

FOR WRITERS!

Enrich your style through Herbert Spencer's and Edgar Allan Poe's classic principles that have influenced many of the world's great authors. A help for writers eager to get published. Send $1.00 to

PAGEANT PRESS

101 5th Ave. N.Y. 3 Dept. 1

$2.95 each

SAVE YOUR COPIES OF

The NATION

• Each file holds ■ full year's copies.

• Jesse Jones Volume Files for every publication.

• Covered in durable leather like Kivar, title embossed in 16 Kt gold.

Satisfaction guaranteed

Attractive and practical for your home or office

3 for $8.25

ORDER NOW — send check or money order.

MAGAZINE FILE CO.
520 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 36, N. Y.

FREE DESCRIPTIVE FOLDER UPON REQUEST

cal vote of the regents was 12 to 10; once a crucial vote that might have settled the whole matter stood at 10 to 10, with the precedent motion thus confirmed.

The reviewer, who himself passed through the whole affair, feels a limitation upon the method here employed, to present the controversy almost wholly from official documents. It becomes a battle that is seen only from the generals' reports. In reality, it was a soldiers' battle, arising from individuals' beliefs, and maintained by stubborn (some said, pigheaded) will. It was a matter of little meetings in private homes, of quick talks in the hallways, of nightlong mental wrestlings of men caught between expedience and what they believed to

100 Years of Fighting Stampedes

THE NATION

has managed to survive, the Decatur (Illinois) Herald observed on the occasion of our centennial, "by fighting stampedes for over 100 years."

Heading off stampedes is peculiarly American; the country has the energy and space to set hoofs really thundering. We call to mind only a few of the most irrational flights: the jingoism that plunged us into wars with Mexico and Spain, the hypocritical hysteria of Prohibition, the "uproar" of McCarthyism, "Let's Get Hoffa!", "Send in the Marines!" (to Haiti, Nicaragua, the Dominican Republic, Cuba, etc.), "we must beat the Russians to the moon," the anti-missile missile, the SST. The list is long. Some of the stampedes of the last 102 years ran over us roughshod, some we slowed a bit, some we helped to stop. But there are few we failed to challenge. If you think Bonanza is where the action is, come out on the range with The Nation.

*("Stampede, any headlong flight of a large group; from the Mex.-Sp. estampida or 'uproar.'")

FREE with each NEW subscription

Ralph Nader's

Ralph Nader's articles on auto safety first appeared several years ago in The Nation. This is but one example of how The Nation raises important issues—before, not after, they become fashionable ones.

UNSAFE AT ANY SPEED

The NATION
333 6th Avenue
New York, N.Y. 10014

Herewith my order and payment for a NEW subscription to The Nation. Please send my FREE copy of UNSAFE AT ANY SPEED.

☐ 1 Year, $10 ☐ 2 Years, $18 ☐ 6 Mos., $6
(Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 per year extra)

name

address

city state zip no.

6-19-67

be duty. It was an affair that was full of passion.

The present volume misses all of this, and so the essence. Having read it, and being otherwise uninformed, anyone might still be mystified as to what caused the trouble and what it was all about.

In addition, some of Gardner's conclusions may be challenged, one of which may even be considered his chief conclusion, since it is almost a fixation, being stated flatly on page 1, and repeated on 7 additional pages. It is that the controversy was not "mostly a conflict over principles" but that it was a "power struggle." This last phrase is, of course a present-day cliché. Obviously, any kind of struggle involves power. But the actual motive-force of this controversy was always the conscientious scruples of a certain number of the faculty. These men and women were not seeking power in any reasonable sense of the word. Yet, without their maintaining a position, the whole controversy would simply not have been there.

Neither can I agree with the author's double-pronged final conclusion that the struggle of the nonsigners had been a "futile" one which gained a "hollow victory," and that it resulted in "the tragedy of their personal lives." To be sure, victories in this world are likely to be somewhat hollow, since issues tend to be recurrent. Those who refused to sign the loyalty oath, however, were vindicated in the courts; the faculty ended, I believe, by gaining some sense of its own potentiality; the university's next president was a faculty member who had been sympathetic to the nonsigners; in his term the regents officially accepted tenure.

As for tragedy in the personal lives of the nonsigners, I simply fail to see it, and I have known most of them through the years, some of them rather intimately. Though they suffered immediate strain, they never had to endure destitution, and after a few years all of them who so wished returned to their posts, able to enjoy the sense of having behaved as they believed their consciences demanded.

Not theirs was the tragedy, but others suffered. The ones who said that they would not sign, and then did so (even for the best of motives)—those, and I knew some of them, were the tortured ones. Also in the list that might be termed tragic were some who as leaders had done their best, gone down to defeat, and suffered vilification along with frustration.

Although one may thus differ from Gardner in some respects, one gladly grants the excellence of his accurate presentation of the record.

THEATRE IN EUROPE 1

HAROLD CLURMAN

London

In The Male Animal, the Thurber-Nugent comedy of yesteryear, a college instructor suspected of "pink" tendencies when asked by a suspicious university trustee why he had gone to Moscow replies that he went to attend a theatre festival. The interrogator snaps back: "That is a long way to go to see a show!"

It is a long way to Berlin and Prague but, for a theatre person at least, the effort is well repaid by the pleasure. One is reminded of how wide the scope of the theatre may be not only in dramatic texts but in modes of production.

In my present view of the English stage I won't dwell on the Shakespeare of London and Stratford, where ever since Peter Hall and his associates of the Royal Shakespeare Company began producing the Bard's plays in a non-romantic manner seeing them once again became stimulating. These productions now constitute a "new wave" in the English theatre.

The past London season has by all accounts been disappointing. The two events which have been met with unqualified praise are Laurence Olivier's playing of Strindberg's The Dance of Death, and Rosencrantz and Guildenstern are Dead by Tom Stoppard, aged 30.

There can be no doubting the brilliance of Olivier's wife-bedevilled and wife-tormenting army captain in the Swedish play. All previous productions I have seen struck me as not so much tragic as burdensome. Olivier's performance turns the play into a black comedy. Though I am not at all certain that this is what Strindberg had in mind, I am sure it is a most effective way of interpreting the play for contemporary — particularly English or American — audiences.

Olivier's acting is thoroughly calculated, exact to the last smile, grimace, step and stance. Every detail registers with entertaining truthfulness. The observation is remarkable. We are constantly kept alert in anticipation of every added stroke to the picture. And yet, and one almost hesitates to say so, one is never moved.

I say "hesitates," not from a reluctance to voice the slightest reservation about so justifiably admired a performance, but because one is uncertain whether Olivier expects us to be moved. Perhaps he wishes us merely to observe, to assume an objective and quasi-humorous attitude toward the torment of the captain whom his wife hates and whom he in turn loathes, though both are indissolubly welded in wedlock. Perhaps we are meant to watch the captain with something like surgical interest as he wriggles, writhes and leaps in matrimonial bondage.

Yes, perhaps so. But I also conjecture whether there is not a point at which Olivier's enormous talent is checked: the point where intelligence, observation, virtuosity and sheer stage magnetism become absorbed in an unforced flow of feeling. The "music" of acting (what Stark Young called "the flower") appears only where the imitation of nature ends and the humanity in the actor, stirred by the play's spirit and meaning, takes over and suffuses his being.

There were moments in Olivier's Titus Andronicus when I sensed that this had happened and it is reported that this was also the case with his Coriolanus. I shall not cite The Entertainer as another example because I saw him in the play on the discouraging second night in New York, but I have come to think of Olivier as a superb actor (than whom there is probably no finer on the English-speaking stage today) but not as a tragedian. Tragic acting is as rare today as tragic drama.

Olivier is a magnificent portrait painter, or what is usually called a "character actor," with especially marked gifts in comedy. His Shallow in Henry IV, the boozy braggart in Farquhar's The Recruiting Officer, the swishy fop in Sheridan's The Critic, the light-brained lecher in Congreve's Love for Love are comedy masterpieces beyond cavil. And what charm withal.

The high regard in which Olivier is held should not overshadow the presence on the English stage of many actors of outstanding ability among members of the younger generation. These came into prominence with the emergence of the new English playwrights: Osborne, Pinter, Arden, Wesker. Both actors and playwrights were an expression of an altered social climate. The continuity of excellence from Olivier, Gielgud, Redgrave, Richardson, Guinness, Ashcroft, to the period of Albert Finney, Maggie Smith, Robert Stephens, Joan Plowright, Ian Holm and others composes an impressive picture (of which the English are justifiably proud and we envious), and requires special study for America's enlightenment and progress.

English acting is verbally splendid. I do not refer to mere "declamation" but to a sense of language as a dramatic instrument. Voice and speech on the English stage are a positive source of delight. The English actor sounds like a person who belongs on the stage. Then too his physical bearing makes it seem a place of honor. His being an actor is no accident. He is a thorough professional.

All this may be said with only slight complimentary connotations; in fact, I have heard it said in derogation. Such an attitude is stupid and ignorant. For though it is true that one has seen serious plays done in London as if they were exercises in diction and many in which there was more artifice than art, the elements in which the English excel are vital to the theatre.

Most of our older actors understood this, but with their disappearance and

RADICAL THEATRE TOUR

SAN FRANCISCO
MIME TROUPE

touring Fall-Winter 1967

2 commedia dell'arte plays

"... an adept troupe, a real ensemble." N. Y. Times

Contact: R. G. Davis

S. F. Mime Troupe

924 Howard St.

S. F. 94103

415 GA 1-1984

More CHALLENGING Than Chess!

Now YOU can lead an army! BLITZKRIEG game of "lightning warfare" . . . gives you that opportunity. YOUR skill and tactical judgment in commanding land and air troops through well-planned strategic maneuvers determine victory or defeat! By far the largest, most realistic of all battle games, with gigantic terrain map-board. Instructions included for beginners, aficionados and game sophisticates. Enjoyable and stimulating challenge for 2 players over age 12. $6.98

Available at local game counters, or send $6.98 to Dept. B-3,

Avalon Hill, 4517 Harford Rd., Balto., Md. 21214

Name _____

Address _____

City _____ State _____ Zip _____

☐ Send FREE brochure ☐ Sorry, no C.O.D.

with the advent of actors and directors who insisted that acting is not centrally a matter of intelligent speech and social grace in movement, many of our young performers began to think only of "emotion" and "true feeling." This has not infrequently resulted in a special sort of distortion and coarsening. Only a vulgar obscurantism of theatre discussion insists on such alternatives as technique or feeling, skill or truth.

The English actor tends to a certain formality because his background (the civilization in which he has been reared) is given to formality. Even when he is of working-class origin, as many of the young actors today are, his models impress formal virtues, a manner of cultivated behavior, on the stage aspirant's consciousness. This is rarely true of the American, who must apply himself strenuously to supply what his whole environment so conspicuously lacks. Let us face it: our civilization is becoming increasingly crude. And there are some who regard this as an asset. It is presumed to be more honest. In any case, a certain unvarnished roughness in our arts as well as in our conduct has long been regarded as characteristic.

Apart from the formal felicities of English acting, it often possesses its own tangy savor in low as well as in polite comedy. The English actor also displays a keen eye for oddities and eccentricities of character. (One remembers Wilfred Lawson with affection.) The younger actors have begun to be more susceptible to feeling and have learned to convey it more convincingly than many of their forebears. The emotions which they appear to experience more frequently than others are contempt, frustration, mockery, rage and breakdown.

The crucial difference between English and American acting has less to do with qualities of temperament or natural ability than with other factors. No English actor I have seen possesses greater initial endowment than did John Barrymore, none is more fluent in feeling than Alfred Lunt or more originally inspired than Marlon Brando, Kim Stanley or Maureen Stapleton. And at all times we seem to have been generously provided with wonderful comedians. What is absent among us, more than ever today, is something which urges the English actor to excel in honor as well as in material success or noisy acclaim.

A significant aspect for us to emphasize in an evaluation of Olivier's career is not alone his talent (Alfred Lunt, I have implied, has as much) but the great contribution to the theatre which he has been able to make with his talent. This is not only a matter of artistic integrity or personal ambition but also a response to the pressure of general public and critical demand, which is one of the things meant when we speak of "tradition." This prevailed in England even before the National Theatre and the present Royal Shakespeare Company were founded, but now that they exist they set a standard. Our theatre is in every respect and ever more an anarchy.

At the moment London's "sensational" play is, I repeat, Rosencrantz

RESPONSES

leaving the bird house central park zoo
a small boy asks me mister did you kill all the birds?
i offer him a plastic crackerjack prize
i ask do you know what that is?
yes he says
what is it?

ROBERT HERSHON

and Guildenstern are Dead. It is a highly civilized entertainment, and that is no little thing in the theatre today.

A comedy, it is gratifyingly literate, frequently witty and altogether intelligent. It also evinces a particular kind of originality. Its author has taken the plot of Hamlet and looked at it through the eyes of the two paltry puppets invited to spy at the maleficent court of Elsinore. The point of the play is that Hamlet's university companions have only the faintest notion as to the nature or meaning of the tragedy in which they are constrained to enact the most hapless roles. They are entirely ignorant as to what is involved. Perhaps the funniest line of the play is the one in which Rosencrantz itemizes the facts of Hamlet's situation (his father's death, his failure to succeed to the throne, his mother's sudden marriage to his uncle) and then asks in effect "What in the world can be troubling him?"

The play aspires to something more than a comedic commentary on the classic. Rosencrantz and Guildenstern are ordinary men in the sense that the two vagrants of Waiting for Godot are. Like them, Rosencrantz and Guildenstern are at a loss about the world into which they have been summoned. What is really demanded of them? Why are they trapped in a maze and turmoil which is accidental, meaningless and finally murderous?

In brief, the play is a comedy parable of unheroic man's (the bulk of humanity's) position in the universe, the disastrous puzzlement of life. On this level I regard it as a wise joke only, a bright intellectual charade. But who except suddenly stimulated reviewers overcome by the theatre's mediocrity will claim an exalted stature for the play or be vexed with me for not allowing that it achieves the heights of comedy? We ought to be glad that a gifted new playwright has appeared on the English stage and has made his debut with something better than another clever show.

(To be continued)

AGENTS WANTED

CHRISTMAS CARDS—Business and Personal. Customer's name imprinted. Earn unusually high commissions from this medium-and-high-priced line. No investment. No inventory. Free Sample Album. Process Corp. (our 46th year), 3440A S. 54th Ave., Chicago, Ill. 60650.

PERSONALS

SALASACAN WALL-HANGINGS—Tapestries, hand-woven by the Salasacan Indians of the Andes. Moderately priced (C.D. Project). Write: ANDEAN, Box 2948, Quito, Ecuador.

NON-PROFIT CAMP (Interracial, interreligious) desperately needs donation of pianos. Tax deductible. Will pick up. Box 600, c/o The Nation.

STUDENT at Music & Art High School needs summer employment. Willing and able. Box 601, c/o The Nation.

SHORT PLAYS, SONGS and WRITERS needed immediately in National Theater for Peace. No pay? Send money! Committee of the Professions, 250 West 57 Street, N.Y.C. 10019.

The Nation SUBSCRIBERS' BOOK SERVICE

Offers the following at discount prices:

- | | Price |
|--|--------|
| <input type="checkbox"/> HELL'S ANGELS: A Strange and Terrible Saga by Hunter Thompson (Random House, $4.95) | $3.95 |
| <input type="checkbox"/> THE ACCIDENTAL PRESIDENT by Robert Sherrill (Grossman, $5.00) | $4.00 |
| <input type="checkbox"/> THE FREE WORLD COLOSSUS: A Critique of American Foreign Policy in the Cold War by David Horowitz (Hill and Wang, $6.95) | $5.55 |
| <input type="checkbox"/> FRIENDSHIP AND FRATRICIDE: An Analysis of Whittaker Chambers and Alger Hiss by Dr. Meyer A. Zeligs (Viking, $8.95) | $7.15 |
| <input type="checkbox"/> DE GAULLE: A Political Biography by Alexander Werth (Simon and Schuster, $7.50) | $6.00 |
| <input type="checkbox"/> THE PSYCHOLOGY OF POWER by Ronald Sampson (Pantheon, $4.95) | $3.96 |

Remittance accompanying orders should be made payable to THE NATION, 333 6th Ave., N.Y. 10014

☐ Payment enclosed ☐ Please bill me

Readers can avail themselves of our regular offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S. at the retail price post-free. When ordering, please give title, author and publisher, if possible.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1206

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS:

- 1 One is quite capable of taking in the point; later retraction might be applauded. (14)
- 9 See 21 down
- 10 Little boys take them out of tool chests, perhaps. (7)
- 11 Underfoot, but not out with 21 down.
- 12 In general, wait around the vessels for him. (8)
- 14 Boy-catchers, possibly because of several effective lines. (7)
- 15 Was the flute of opera, and the mountain of literature? (5)
- 17 One of these was a full-length feature when "Cyrano" was produced. (5)
- 19 Familiar to mathematicians, one might find valuable minerals in them. (7)
- 21 What a golfer gets out of the game? Remove the game, and it's leather-bound.
- 23 See 4 down
- 25 Is this confined to situations where your company is British? (7)
- 26 Stand-out bit of work? (7)
- 27 Critical remarks provided by an article with one angry series of interpretations. (14)

DOWN:

- 1 Certain categories of known criminals sometimes come under this. (9)
- 2 Doesn't favor work with what a model does. (7)
- 3 The drawer is rather loose in such designing; however pads on the table might hold them. (9)

- 4 and 23 Holds out for the way refreshment purveyors might be supplied. (10)
- 5 Unless Haig remains in prison? (10)
- 6 British painter or writer. (5)
- 7 Time for smoothing things out? (7)
- 8 He's a good tennis player, obviously! (4)
- 13 Went and gave out a description of the port strength in the pitcher. (4-6)
- 15 From Noah, smart races obviously resulted. (9)
- 16 Sounds like what the visitor to the East Village might be looking for, but one might find aspiring pitchers there. (9)
- 18 Old musical oriental, but one finds his performance soporific. (7)
- 20 A huntsman's cap is not more styled. (7)
- 21 and 9 across Does it provide a firm understanding of what George Hamilton claims to be? (4, 7)
- 22 Ill met to appear regarded as having blood relationship to a particular family group. (5)
- 24 Projecting part, perhaps even part of it.

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1205

ACROSS: 1 Manor house; 6 and 10 Withdrawing; 12 Screened; 13 Thane; 15 Asset; 17 Sassenach; 19 Yellow Sea; 21 Scoop; 23 Opals; 24 Poisoned; 27 Innings; 28 Gadwall; 29 Airs; 30 Peeping Tom. DOWN: 1 and 11 across Made to order; 2 Nuances; 3 Raise; 4 Organists; 5 Sated; 7 Indiana; 8 Horsewhips; 9 Bootless; 14 Lady Godiva; 16 Thousand; 18 Shaking up; 20 Learner; 22 Overact; 24 Posse; 25 Olden; 26 Plum.

EDUCATIONAL

If you are interested in a SECULAR JEWISH EDUCATION

for your children this fall, stressing Hebrew conversation, dance, song, Jewish History and Culture, contact:

Pioneer Hebrew Schools

150 Fifth Ave., N.Y.C. 10011 • 255-8760
Schools in Queens, Brooklyn, Manhattan

FIVE DAY BOARDING SCHOOL. A unique program for people who have not even considered a boarding school. Grades five through eight. THE THOREAU SCHOOL. An intimate, cooperative community, combining study with the tasks and joys of farm living. School bus brings your children home to NYC week-ends. Small classes, individual instruction. Now enrolling for September. Write: Rodman, RD 1, Wallkill, N.Y. 12589. Phone: 914-895-5523.

ART

ORIGINALS COST LESS THAN REPRODUCTIONS! Contemporary original signed etchings, lithographs, woodcuts, $3.50. Guarantee. Free brochure. GRAPHIC CIRCLE (NA). Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10011.

PUBLICATIONS

THE IDLER. Lively, offbeat, liberal monthly. $1 brings four different sample back issues. Idler, 413B 6th St., N.E., Washington, D.C. 20002.

"SELECTED POEMS" of George Flynn (Villiers of London $2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound."—James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at 544-82 St., Brooklyn 9, N.Y.

THE BLUFF OF DEGODDING THE HUMANS by Bibi Beebi, 116 pp., price $3.00. Popular Non-Newtonian, etc., physics, astronomy, culturology, philosophy. The Inventist, P.O. Box 17039, Los Angeles, Calif. 90017.

WORLD DEMOCRACY by Bin Dir Woor, Self-Designated Symbolical World President. Unique. Entrancing. $2. Greenwich Book Publishers, 282 7th Avenue, N.Y.C. Bin Dir Woor says that if you will continue to work and pray for World Democracy after his death, God Willing, he will try to appear to you in a dream and bless you with a prayer.

MALVINA REYNOLDS PRODUCTIONS

At your bookshop:

Little Boxes and Other
Handmade Songs	$2.45
The Muse of Parker Street	2.45
Tweedles and Foodles
(children's songs)	1.75

At your record shop:

Malvina Reynolds Sings the Truth
(Columbia 2614)

or write:

Schroder Music Co.

2027 Parker St., Berkeley, Calif. 94704

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALGONQUIN 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

SUMMER RENTAL

CONGENIAL business couple desires room with kitchen, Monroe or vicinity, week-ends. Call evenings, 201 WA 6-5196.

Advertising Rates

CLASSIFIED

74c a line (6 words) Three-line minimum

CLASSIFIED DISPLAY
$7.42 per inch (minimum)

THE NATION

333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014
242-8400

WORLD CONFERENCE ON VIETNAM

STOCKHOLM, SWEDEN — JULY 6-9

¶ The Lawyers Committee on American Policy Towards Vietnam will lead the discussion before the First Commission—International Law—of the Conference on the question of the legality of the United States involvement in Vietnam.

¶ Observance of the law, our Committee has maintained, would have spared the American people and the Vietnamese a cruel war. Our original Memorandum of Law, introduced into the Congressional Record on September 23, 1965 and thereafter sent to more than 173,000 lawyers and 3,750 law professors throughout the country, documented the inescapable conclusion that U. S. intervention in Vietnam contravened the essential provisions of the United Nations Charter; violated the Geneva Accords, which we pledged to observe; was not sanctioned by the SEATO treaty; and violated our own Constitution.

¶ In March 1966, the State Department issued its reply. This was the first time in history that a government found itself compelled in the course of a war to file a "reply brief." On January 15, 1967, we published in The New York Times, our rejoinder. Some 23,000 reprints of the Times statement have been distributed.

¶ Last month our Committee published "Vietnam and International Law," prepared by our Consultative Council, which is a definitive reply to the State Department's position that U. S. involvement in Vietnam is legal.

¶ The World Conference on Vietnam is an initiative of the Swedish Peace and Arbitration Society and sponsored by: The International Confederation for Disarmament and Peace; The International Peace Bureau; The World Council of Peace; The War Resisters International; The International Fellowship of Reconciliation; and The Christian Conference for Peace.

¶ Leading authorities on international law, history, politics—and renowned peace leaders and parliamentarians—will explore with delegations from Asia, Africa, Australia, Europe and the Americas, ways and means of ending the barbarous war in Vietnam.

¶ The panelists include Prof. Gunnar Myrdal (Sweden); Prof. D. F. Fleming (U.S.); Prof. Philippe Devillers and Jean Lacouture (France); Lelio Basso (Italy); Dr. John Takman (Sweden); John McDermott (U.S.); William Standard (U.S.) and representatives of our Consultative Council.

¶ The flare-up of violence in the Middle East dramatically underscores the critical need, at this juncture, for a reappraisal of American policies and the need for a revitalization of the role of law in world affairs. If the cease-fire resolution unanimously adopted by the Security Council is followed by first steps toward a lasting settlement in the Middle East, cannot similar measures be achieved under UN auspices in South East Asia?

¶ To carry forward the work of our Committee, we need the prompt and generous support of those who share our concern with peace and world order.

LAWYERS COMMITTEE ON AMERICAN POLICY TOWARDS VIETNAM

Make checks payable to:

Lawyers Committee
38 Park Row, New York, N. Y. 10038

I enclose $..... as a contribution.

Name
(Please Print)

Address

City State Zip

Each contributor will receive a copy of
"VIETNAM AND INTERNATIONAL LAW"

WILLIAM L. STANDARD, Chairman; CAREY McWILLIAMS, Vice-Chairman
JOSEPH H. CROWN, Secretary-Treasurer

CONSULTATIVE COUNCIL:

RICHARD A. FALK, Chairman, Milbank Professor of International Law,
Princeton University

RICHARD J. BARNET, Co-Director, Institute for Policy Studies,
Washington, D. C.

JOHN H. E. FRIED, Professor of Political Science,
City University of New York (City College)

JOHN H. HERZ, Professor of International Relations,
City University of New York (City College)

STANLEY HOFFMANN, Professor of Government and International Law,
Harvard University

WALLACE McCLURE, Lecturer on International Law,
Universities of Virginia, Duke, Dacca, Karachi

SAUL H. MENDLOVITZ, Professor of International Law,
Rutgers University School of Law

RICHARD S. MILLER, Professor of International Law,
Ohio State University College of Law

HANS J. MORGENTHAU, Albert A. Michelson Distinguished Service Professor of Political Science and Modern History, University of Chicago

WILLIAM G. RICE, Professor of International Law, University of Wisconsin Law School

QUINCY WRIGHT, Prof. Emeritus of International Law, University of Chicago

BURLINGAME

LOWELL AT YALE JULIUS NOVICK

JUN 26 1967

THE

NATION

JUNE 26, 1967 35 cents

One Cheer for the Hippies

JACK NEWFIELD

THE MIDDLE EAST GUIDELINES FOR POLICY

NADAV SAFRAN and STANLEY HOFFMANN

THE YANKS AND THE GOOKS

The Deserters MIKE WALLACE

WHAM! TED KOPPEL

Cleveland: Recipe for Violence

ROLD0 S. BARTIMOLE and MURRAY GRUBER

The Ideology of Negritude NADINE GORDIMER
Lowry / Aiken Symbiosis RICHARD HAUER COSTA

5-21-68R PLS-1449
BURLINGAME PUBLIC
-LIBRARY
BURLINGAME CA 94010

LETTERS

Mr. Spender and the CIA

London

DEAR SIR: I hope it is not too late to answer various statements which have been made about Encounter and my connection, and that of Mr. Frank Kermode, with it, in The Nation.

In your editorial of May 29, you state that Mr. Spender "resigned because he had been kept in total darkness about the covert CIA connection." And Mr. Alexander Werth writes ["Literary Bay of Pigs," The Nation, June 5]:

What is puzzling is all this lamblike innocence of the distinguished editors. . . . The rumor of CIA subsidies had been current for years, but nobody on Encounter except "Mel" Lasky, we are now told, knew anything about it, not even Stephen Spender, one of the co-editors who "soldiered on in ignorance," until the truth about the CIA subsidies (as The Observer put it) "began to break in the U.S.A. a year ago." After that Spender resigned, apparently with a great show of indignation.

I have never denied that I heard rumors about the CIA and Encounter. Mr. Werth cites as the sources of his information The Observer and The Sunday Times. He does not mention what he could have gathered from them, that because I had heard these rumors, three years ago, I went to Mr. Cecil King of the International Publishing Corporation in London and asked him to support Encounter so that we might free ourselves of support by the Congress for Cultural Freedom. Mr. King generously agreed to do this, and Mr. Lasky entered warmly into the arrangements. However, Mr. Lasky omitted to mention that what were for me rumors were to him certainties, as he has now admitted.

A year ago, two years after Encounter's being sponsored by Cecil King, The New York Times published its articles about the CIA in which it asserted that Encounter had received CIA funds by way of the Congress. I had understood that the particular source sponsoring Encounter, by way of the Congress, was the Farfield Foundation. Accordingly, I wrote to the president of that foundation, Mr. Julius Fleishmann, and I also made inquiries of its New York director. In both cases I received the most categorical denials that there was any truth in the rumors.

When just over a year ago Frank Kermode succeeded me as co-editor of Encounter, I thought I had a responsibility to tell him all I knew about the suspicions which had attached to the magazine's past. Since Encounter, at the time of his joining it, had for two years been sponsored by Mr. King's organization, Kermode took the view that he was not involved in any arrangements which may have existed two years before he joined. He made it clear, though, that if statements were made about Encounter's previous backing which were subsequently discovered to be false, then he would resign. After this, The New York Times published the article I have mentioned about there being CIA aid for Encounter by way of the Congress for Cultural Freedom. Irving Kristol, Melvin Lasky and I sent a letter to The New York Times claiming that editorially Encounter was completely independent, and expressing our confidence that no funds had come from the CIA. I signed this because I accepted the assurances of the directors of the Congress and of the Farfield Foundation. Similar statements were made to other publications, including The Nation. I am sorry that they should have been made, but if I had thought they were untrue I would have resigned there and then, as I indeed did as soon as I discovered them to be untrue.

Three months ago I learned from Ramparts that Encounter had in fact received money channeled from the

(Continued on page 821)

EDITORIALS

A New Deal for the Middle East

The one thing the great powers must avoid in the Middle East is what Marquis Childs calls "the ostrichism of the past." Zoologists tell us that the ostrich does not actually hide its head in the sand—but human beings do. Nowhere has willful blindness been more in evidence than in the relations of the United States and the Soviet Union with Israel and its Arab neighbors. After the termination of the second Arab-Israeli war in 1956, we acquiesced in the fatuous notion that nothing much needed to be done in that part of the world.

The tensions were obvious, but it was assumed that the flash point would never be reached. Things would take care of themselves, somehow, as long as we could keep the oil flowing and the Soviets out. The refugees, of course, were a sore spot, but the UN was feeding them, partly with American contributions. At least they were not starving, and if they were miserable wasn't that the way things had always been in the desert? We assumed there was no need, really, to induce the Arabs to call off the war and acknowledge Israel's right to exist, much less to open the Suez Canal to its shipping. We had more important things to attend to in Southeast Asia.

As Philip Geyelin writes in the Providence Sunday Journal (June 11), the object of our affections in the Middle East was the status quo. In an area so full of explosive tensions, the status quo was the last thing in which a prudent nation would put its trust, but successive administrations had no better ideas. All we can be sure of, now, is that a lapse into the same passivity will have even worse results the next time around. The fourth Arab-Israeli war, if it comes, will more likely than not involve resort to nuclear weapons by both sides.

In one direction we did play an activist role: together with our Soviet rivals, we poured arms into the Middle East. The conventional picture of the Soviet Union arming the Arabs for aggression, while we armed Israel for defense, is far off the mark. The Pentagon has revealed the figures. The U.S. supplied at least $350 million in military aid to ten of the Arab countries backing Egypt, the principal recipients being Saudi Arabia and Jordan. But this amount covers only the military-assistance program. How many millions in U.S. arms were purchased by the Arabs through other channels is not disclosed. In short, although the Soviets were the major arms suppliers to the Arabs, we were in the business up to our ears. The end was foreseeable (but the end is not yet).

Israel, according to reports through fiscal 1966, received U.S. military aid amounting to $27.6 million. It has on order what the Pentagon describes as "modest amounts" of miscellaneous items such as missiles and recoilless rifles, but has not received twenty-four F4 fighter-bombers which we agreed to sell some months ago.

We gave little support to the United Nations, our practice being the same for the Middle East as elsewhere. When it suited our ends to use the UN, we did, but we saw no need to strengthen its hand. As the most powerful member nation we had a special responsibility, but we shrugged it off. Yet where the power is, there responsibility rests. The USSR and the United States are responsible for the third Arab-Israeli war, even more than the actual belligerents. Between them, these two nations could have backed the UN, could have averted the calamitous arms race. It is now a joint U.S.-Soviet responsibility to help bring peace to the area, to help relieve the tensions, to set the stage for understanding.

In this issue (p. 806) we carry a set of guidelines for U.S. policy by two experts, but to their comments we should like to add our own. We should stop meddling in the affairs of Arab states (we don't meddle in those of Israel) but inducements to reasonable behavior, in the form of aid programs through the UN, can and should be offered. There is need for some rectification of Israel's borders, but in general the commitment to maintain the territorial integrity of the nations involved should be met. This will be difficult for us to achieve as long as we are fighting in Vietnam, where our actions are grossly inconsistent with our pleas for peace in the Middle East. Before we can expect the Israelis and Arabs to abstain from force, we must show some inclination to refrain ourselves. It may not be what we will do; it is only what we should do, and what would best serve our interests, and those of mankind, in the long run.

There is such a thing as political timing. A time comes in political struggle when action can be taken, when new policies can be initiated, when the mistakes of the past can be remedied. Not to act at such a juncture is fatal. The opportunities do not come often, and when they recur, are likely to present themselves in a more intractable form. The only hope remaining in the Middle East is that the present chance will not be neglected, as others were in the past ten years. For once, Dean Rusk had a flash of insight—he said that everyone was the loser in this war, including the United States. If the Johnson Administration will act on this premise, it may enlist the cooperation of the Soviet Union, and eventually of the victors and the vanquished in the war in which all have been losers.

Will They Listen?

Some voices of eminent good sense are heard in the Senate urging a settlement of the two world crises: Vietnam and the Middle East. Senators Fulbright, Morton, Cooper, Mansfield, Mondale, Magnuson, Eugene McCarthy, Stephen Young are among those who have spoken out along these general lines. President Johnson is keeping his own counsel. He has given no indication of changing U.S. policy in Southeast Asia. He has stayed in the

IN THIS ISSUE

June 26, 1967

EDITORIALS

802

ARTICLES

806 The Middle East:
Guidelines for Policy

Nadav Safran
and Stanley Hoffmann

809 One Cheer for the Hippies

Jack Newfield

The Yanks and the Gooks:

811 The Deserters

Mike Wallace

812 WHAM!

Ted Koppel

814 Cleveland: Recipe for Violence

Roldo S. Bartimole
and Murray Gruber

817 Bombs and Suburbs

Nicolaus C. Mills

818 New England Power:
The Gaslight Industry

Wallace I. Roberts

BOOKS & THE ARTS

822 "The Path and Not the Goal" Nadine Gordimer

822 Collioure (poem) Paul Blackburn

823 The Lowry/Aiken Symbiosis Richard Hauer Costa

824 Above Sea Level (poem) Sandra Hochman

826 Poetry/Drama in Harlem Sidney Bernard

827 At the Dead Center Henry S. Kariel

828 Eye of the Innocent Donald Fanger

829 Theatre Julius Novick

831 Crossword Puzzle Frank W. Lewis

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Copy Editor
MARION HESS

Theatre
HAROLD CLURMAN

Art
MAX KOZLOFF

Music
BENJAMIN BORETZ

Science
CARL DREHER

Advertising Manager
MARY SIMON

Associate Publisher
GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Associate Editor
PHIL KERBY

Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIAS

Poetry Editor
MICHAEL GOLDMAN

Washington
ROBERT G. SHERRILL

Paris
ALEXANDER WERTH

London
RAYMOND WILLIAMS

Bonn
C. AMERY

Canberra
C. P. FITZGERALD

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July and August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1967 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel.: CH 2-8400. West Coast office: 1256 Westwood Boulevard, Los Angeles, Calif. 90024. Tel.: GR 4-2533. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give four weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE
NATION
Combined with FRONTIER

Volume 204
No. 26

background in the Middle East situation and, when he finally held a press conference, told the reporters practically nothing of his plans. We can only hope that he is listening to the voices of sanity and thoroughly exploring the possibilities they suggest.

It sometimes happens, in the affairs of nations as of individuals, that one trouble coming on top of another makes both more manageable. Invention may be stimulated by the multiplication of difficulties and the realization that earlier measures have failed. Mr. Johnson must realize with increasing concern that in Vietnam we—he and all of us, including the military leaders—are in dire trouble. The bombing targets are nearly exhausted; we are practically dependent on the North Vietnamese to rebuild or repair facilities so that we may have something to attack. Increasingly, reporters return from Vietnam with intimations that the war may not be “winnable.” The pacification program has come to a standstill. A new report assesses “force levels” with nothing but dark prospects—more men, more materiel will be needed, and results are doubtful no matter how much more blood is spilled.

The Los Angeles Times (June 4) comes out with a long editorial, “Reassessment in Vietnam,” which begins with an orthodox avowal of faith: the Times supported the Vietnamese War to prevent a Communist take-over of South Vietnam, and believes the bombing of military targets in the North must continue “so long as there is a strategic need for it.” Military pressure on the Communists in the South must be maintained, the Times adds. But the bulk of the editorial is devoted to warnings against further escalation. “There is danger,” the writers say, “that U.S. power may be used in ways that will compromise or even destroy the American intention of keeping the war limited, that by accident, inadvertence or miscalculation a confrontation with the Soviet Union or Communist China will be made inevitable.”

In short, we are in trouble, with force no longer offering any prospect of a way out. In the Middle East everybody is in trouble, but the Russians even more than the United States. Their role in support of the Arabs has been ludicrous. These firebrands evidently hoped that when it came to a showdown the Russians would come to their help with military tangibles; instead, Kosygin talked with Johnson by teletype and limited his support to verbal expostulations in the Security Council. These demonstrations will continue in the Assembly, but in the meantime Israel holds large swaths of Arab territory, which neither the Council nor the Assembly can make it relinquish. Militarily the Arab defeat has been ignominious, and the Soviet Union must share the Arabs’ discomfiture. The United States and the Soviets may supply token replacements of arms in that region, but neither is likely to engage in a full-fledged arms race again. That much of a lesson has presumably been learned.

When Premier Eshkol speaks—and he is by no means

SUMMER SCHEDULE

During July and August, The Nation will appear on alternate weeks: issues will be dated July 3, July 17, July 31, August 14 and August 28.

the most defiant of the Israelis—whose example is he following if not that of the great powers? He says Israel will decide what is in Israel’s national interest, just as big countries decide for themselves, letting no considerations of morality or equity interfere. We are surely the last ones to be in a position to remonstrate with him. If the Israelis fired the first shots after Nasser told the UN to get out of Sinai, filled the desert with men and tanks and blockaded Aqaba, who shall say they were the aggressors? From a study of these two wars, one so brief, the other with no end in sight, who shall define aggression?

How, then, can the United States provide effective leadership in the long-term process of reconciliation and settlement in the Middle East as long as the Vietnamese War drags on?

If Mr. Johnson ponders on these facts, he can scarcely fail to see that the Middle East crisis offers his Administration a kind of psychological cover for a settlement in Vietnam. In somewhat the same way, the proceedings in the UN Assembly provide a cover for a Russian effort to reach an understanding with the United States for a relaxation of tensions in both areas of conflict. Either side, if it wishes, can find insurmountable obstacles to agreement, but the dangers and frustrations that confront both may give both the vision that can lead to a peaceful solution.

Two Rallies

Some 18,000 persons jammed the Hollywood Bowl at a Rally for Israel on June 11 and heard Gov. Ronald Reagan, Sen. George Murphy and Mayor Sam Yorty attack the Soviet Union as the sole instigator of the conflict. A thousand persons gathered the same weekend at a Los Angeles hotel to hear and applaud an attack on U.S. intervention in Vietnam.

Without so much as a nod at the substantive issues in the Middle East, Governor Reagan and Senator Murphy tried to manipulate the pro-Israel rally into a cold-war spectacular. “The men who died on both sides were in reality the victims of the cold war,” Reagan said. “Let us make sure,” he continued, “that no place is made at the bargaining table for the Russian bear.” Senator Murphy, calling—at least by strong inference—for escalation of the Vietnamese War, said Israel’s quick military success demonstrated what a “small but determined people” can do without bothering about world opinion or quibbling over words like “escalation” or “proliferation.”

Mayor Yorty conceded a place at the conference table to the Soviet Union, but said the "Soviet Communists" must be blocked from winning in negotiations "what they instigated but were unable to win in battle." The Los Angeles Mayor was the only political speaker who attempted to deal with reality. He spoke of the need for a final settlement of the Arab refugee problem and said that Israel's "illogical, makeshift borders must be corrected."

It remained for actor Edward G. Robinson and other nonpolitical speakers to inject a somber note. Robinson observed that in Israel "they're not celebrating—they are burying the dead."

The rally was phenomenally successful. Pledges of financial support for Israel announced from the stage amounted to nearly $6 million, and it was predicted this figure will grow to possibly $10 million.

Among the participants at the Hollywood Bowl was actor and writer Carl Reiner, who the evening before was chairman of the principal session of the conference on Vietnam—arranged by The Assembly of Men and Women in the Arts Concerned with Vietnam.

The Assembly sponsors ruled out discussion of the Middle East as "divisive," and it plainly would have divided both speakers and audience. In contrast, there was total agreement against U.S. policy in Vietnam. The arguments were not new, but the tone was sharper. Dwight Macdonald and Alfred Kazin spoke of the brutalization of the American people. Macdonald said this country is committing genocide in Vietnam, not in the pattern of Hitler's Germany, but a "sorry about that" kind of genocide." Kazin said, "We drink beer as we watch the killing on television."

Prof. Hans Morgenthau said the war is an "Un-American war" because it is a "betrayal of the basic ideals of this nation." David Schoenbrun said the nation is fighting the war with "poor Negroes and whites." If the United States wanted out of Vietnam, Schoenbrun said, "a solution could be found tomorrow morning."

Too many liberals, according to Prof. Noam Chomsky, accept the assumptions on which the war is based. "With [Arthur] Schlesinger and [Richard] Goodwin, the Kennedy liberals, the language of imperialism is somewhat muted, apparent only in the assumptions that guide their analysis and proposals."

In an oblique reference to the Middle East, Bronson Clark of the American Friends Service Committee said U.S. intervention in Vietnam prompted the Soviet Union to "play the same game." We can destroy Vietnam, but we cannot "win," Clark said, adding, "I have visited 'pacified' provinces where Americans live in forts behind barbed wire and only venture out in armed convoys." Russell Johnson, also of the AFSC, who has traveled widely in Southeast Asia, including North Vietnam, said, "The major violence in Asia is the violence of the status quo, a quiet violence that does not make the headlines, but which destroys human life and possibility as inexorably as does the assassin's knife."

As dissent escalates, the war escalates, but "intellectuals," said Professor Morgenthau, "must continue to perform their moral function. There must be people who speak truth to power."

That statement got the biggest applause at the conference.

Dodd Is Not Being Persecuted

Some things are very fitting about the Senate trial of Thomas Dodd—for instance, the people who are supporting him. Within the Senate, no ally is more appropriate than Russell Long, author of the thoroughly discredited campaign contribution plan whereby the Democratic National Committee can recover from the $4-million debt accumulated mysteriously in the 1964 election (the largest campaign debt in history) and gear up for another spending spree in 1968. There are a number of dubious overtones about the way the Democratic funds were raised in 1964 and about the manner in which the debt is being paid off. If Russell Long can defend shady actions by the DNC on the $4-million level, he would naturally see nothing wrong with Dodd's misspending a mere $116,000.

As for Dodd's allies outside the Senate, they also are just right, considering his hysterical right-wing anti-Communist record. The three best-known directors of the National Committee for Justice for Dodd are William F. Buckley, Jr., editor of National Review; Lev Dobriansky, a professional hard-liner and chairman of the National Captive Nations Committee; and Henry Salvatori of California, who bankrolls many right-wing movements and especially Gov. Ronald Reagan. Drew Pearson recently wrote that the man behind the National Committee for Justice for Dodd is Lewis Rosenstiel, chief executive officer of Schenley Distillers Corp. This would figure. Rosenstiel gave the money to establish the J. Edgar Hoover Memorial Foundation and a J. Edgar Hoover endowed chair at some university (not yet specified). Dodd, an ex-FBI man, and Hoover have been good friends over the years.

Also, Dodd is getting some propaganda aid from the Citizens Anti-Communist Committee of Connecticut, which has been placing newspaper ads in his behalf. Behind the support is a tale of piquant loyalty. President of the CACC is Edward J. McCallum (see "Connecticut's One-Man Posse," The Nation, June 3, 1961), who heads the Everready Supply Co. of Bridgeport. In 1948, he ran into trouble with the Internal Revenue Service and was sentenced to six months in a federal prison. Dodd was his attorney.

For the most part, however, the Senate trial of Dodd is a self-serving ritual intended to beguile the public into thinking that that august body is searching its soul when actually it is ducking for cover. In delivering the charge that the Senate must consider, John Stennis, chairman of the Ethics Committee, spelled out his surrender. The "sole basis" of the censure resolution, he said, "is the use of the money" Dodd collected ostensibly to pay off campaign debts. Thus he steered the Senate away from considering the much more serious charges of conflict of interest made by Dodd's former employees: that he had (1) threatened to investigate the movie industry but, after taking a political contribution from the Motion Picture Association, dropped the probe; (2) threatened to investigate the television industry, but dropped the matter after taking money from a major member of the industry; (3) taken money from insurance companies while supposedly investigating them; (4) taken money from the firearms industry, and thereafter cooled in his ardor to control interstate shipments of guns; (5) used an airplane belonging to McKesson & Robbins, the drug makers, while sitting on an antitrust subcommittee investigating the drug industry; (6) taken a gift from Westinghouse's lobbyist while sitting on a judiciary subcommittee probing price fixing in the electrical industry; (7) sought favors and jobs for a number of groups and individuals who had contributed to his seemingly bottomless need for money.

Stennis' Ethics Committee was aware of these matters before it began its laboriously inexact investigation into Dodd's career but it did not look into them, and in its April 27 report brushed them off in three vague sentences referring to "allegations which, if proven, might possibly constitute violations of existing law." With that, the subject was dropped. Two volumes of testimony and exhibits, totaling more than 1,000 pages, were printed by the committee, and in all that glacier of verbiage you will find only one sentence indirectly alluding to the above charges.

And so the farce boiled down to the least important of all the charges—whether or not Dodd, in his own words, "flimflammed anybody at a testimonial dinner." Even if he were convicted, would the Senate trial spread the guilt widely enough? There were seven testimonial occasions at which he raised money that he is accused of spending not for political debts but for personal comforts. On four of these occasions Lyndon Johnson, Dodd's good friend for thirty years, was the featured guest. Did he know what Dodd was up to? The Ethics Committee's report carefully states—twice—that Johnson was ignorant of the fact that any of the money would be used for personal purposes. That is not enough. To clear himself of collusion, Johnson would have to state that he was informed that the fund raising was specifically for political debts, and this he has not done. In an April 22, 1966, press conference Johnson stated, "I didn't know that it was for personal, or political, or local campaign, or national." Four times does seem a bit too often to be innocently ignorant. In any event, Johnson spoke as though it was a matter of small consequence to him what the money was raised for. Considering his own experiences in the fund-raising line, that is believable, but to the extent that he willingly contributed to the misunderstanding, he is as guilty as Dodd. The Senate trial avoids all such questions.

THE MIDDLE EAST

GUIDELINES FOR POLICY

NADAV SAFRAN & STANLEY HOFFMANN

Mr. Safran and Mr. Hoffmann are both professors of government at Harvard University, the former specializing in Middle Eastern affairs and the latter in international relations. Their recent publications are as follows: Safran—The United States and Israel and Egypt in Search of Political Community (both Harvard University Press); Hoffmann—The State of War (Praeger) and Contemporary Theory in International Relations (Prentice-Hall).

Crises such as the present one in the Middle East are very dangerous moments for the international community generally and for the United States specifically, but they are also moments of great opportunity if they are wisely treated. After the Cuban missile crisis came the opportunity for the test-ban treaty and a détente in Europe. Positions that have been frozen may melt in the heat of war; assumptions that served as premises for rigid positions may be confirmed or denied by the test of reality.

Consequently, notions which appeared totally unrealistic only a week or two earlier become premises for sound action. The crucial aim is to allow vision and imagination to catch up with the changed realities.

The first notion to be assimilated in the present context is that the recent Israeli-Arab war was not like the war of 1956. This time all the Arab countries were involved, the leading Arab country had taken the initiative in altering the status quo, and had openly challenged Israel to an armed test. Israel, for its part, acted without the help of outside powers, and at the risk of losing its political existence if its expectations of military success had proved wrong. Consequently, what is involved now is no mere violation of the armistice agreements, which could be repaired and sanctioned by the restoration of the status quo ante as the UN chose to do it in 1956 (under U.S. leadership and despite Israel's objections; Israel's warnings about the dangers of such a restoration—merely camouflaged by the fragile presence of UNEF —have been vindicated). Whatever international lawyers may say juridically on this question, there is no doubt that the premises of the armistice agreements have entirely collapsed. A complete revision of the political relations in the area is required.

The most important change wrought by the war is the possibility it opens up, for the first time since 1949, for the conclusion of peace: real, formal, lasting peace treaties. There were two fundamental reasons why the Israeli-Arab conflict has been so intractable since the conclusion of the 1949 armistice agreements. One was that the Arab countries, with the exception of Jordan, had very little if anything to gain from peace, while Israel had very little it could concede to the Arabs to induce them to make peace. The Arab governments sensed they could avoid making peace both because, thanks to the machinery of the armistice agreements established by the UN, the formal continuation of a state of war did not expose the Arab states to the possibility of penalization through the resumption of hostilities (this has been throughout history a crucial factor in inducing the losers of a war to move on to peace), and because a formal state of war gave them the advantage of denying Israel some of the benefits of peace (such as diplomatic relations and free passage through the Suez Canal). Arab governments therefore found it convenient to sit back and dream of revenge.

The second reason was that Egypt, as the leading Arab country, exerted a heavy pressure to discourage other Arab countries from making peace. It is significant in this respect that the other Arab countries did not dare to sign even the armistice agreements until Egypt itself had signed.

The present war has affected the first reason fundamentally. Israel has made crucial war gains which it can concede back in exchange for peace, and the Arab countries have an incentive to give something in order to recover their losses. The United States can make this a key to an enduring settlement if we do not encourage any impression on the part of the Arabs that periodic defeats can be incurred on the battlefield because they will soon thereafter be erased on the diplomatic front.

And the present war has also drastically affected the second reason which has kept the Arab countries from accepting peace. Egypt has led its Arab associates into a war in which its own armed forces have been crushed and the other Arab countries have suffered grievous losses; any Egyptian claim to leadership has been shattered and Egypt's capacity to intimidate other Arab countries from reaching a settlement with Israel has been diminished. This is particularly true with regard to Jordan. Of course, President Nasser has shown in the past a capacity to convert military defeat into political victories; but he has succeeded heretofore only with the help of outside powers—like ourselves and the Russians in 1956—and only where the setback suffered was neither as total and unmitigated nor as obviously inflicted by tiny Israel as is the present one. If, therefore, we make it our conscious purpose not to do anything to help restore Nasser's Pan-Arab leadership and, on the contrary, do what we can to convey the facts of his defeat to his people and the other Arab peoples, the second funda-

Horner, New Statesman (London): Ben Roth

"Gentlemen, We Have To Figure Out a Way To Persuade Our Customers That the Stuff We Sell 'em Is Too Dangerous To Actually Use."

mental obstacle to peace in the past will have been minimized.

Another factor which must be considered in this connection is the attitude of the Russians. Until very recently, the implicit expectation of Nasser and of the Syrian Government that in a showdown with Israel the Russians would come decisively to the rescue, as they did in 1956, has encouraged them to think in terms of an eventual violent and "final solution" of the Israeli problem rather than of some kind of peaceful accommodation. The attitude which the Russians actually took in the recent war—stopping as it did short of action—must be reckoned as encouraging a fundamental settlement.

Indeed, the Russian attitude may well forecast a basic reorientation of Soviet Middle East policy which, if the United States helps, could be extremely useful in arriving at an enduring solution. In the four or five years following the first Soviet "breakthrough" in the Middle East by means of the 1955 arms deal with Egypt, the Soviets tried at each crisis occasion to achieve recognition as a member of the club of Middle Eastern powers, only to be repeatedly rebuffed by us. Accordingly, they went on to build their position in the area through intensive cooperation with Nasser's Egypt and with other willing Arab countries and succeeded so well that when we, early in the present crisis, finally invited them to join the club, they decided to hold back. Apparently they hoped that a triumph by Nasser would eliminate the West completely and leave Russia as the one big Middle Eastern power. The collapse of Nasser's position after the Russians had invested so much in building it up might lead the USSR back to the idea of asserting its influence on Middle Eastern affairs through the big powers' club rather than on its own. This does not mean that the Russians would abandon their involvement with Nasser, Syria, et al., since those associations would remain useful as a justification for their membership claim. But it does mean that they would be more interested in a stabilized situation. And it is consonant with the present course and long-term interests of U.S. policy to make the USSR a partner, as long as Soviet behavior contributes to moderating the international system.

It should not be lost sight of that the defeat of Nasser (and his allies) not only unfreezes the positions underlying the Israeli-Arab dispute and opens up prospects of a far-reaching reorientation of Russian policy but also makes likely the liquidation of the Yemen conflict and the easing of the problem of Aden and South Arabia. The materialization of these prospects, as of all the other opportunities, would depend decisively on our not doing anything that might permit Nasser to regain a position of Arab leadership.

Against this background it becomes possible to suggest what we, in the United States, should seek to accomplish by taking advantage of the new opportunities for settlement. As often at such moments, there are maximal and minimal objectives.

As a maximal objective, we should strive to achieve complete formal peace, including a solution to all the key problems of refugees, boundaries, transit of men and goods through waterways, on land and in the air. The means through which this might be achieved must be left to the professional diplomats; but two crucial observations should be kept in mind:

(1) We must avoid at all costs putting the Arab countries together on one side of the table and Israel on the other. This would be a sure formula for the reassertion of Nasser's Pan-Arab leadership and for encouraging intransigence. The example to follow is that of Ralph Bunche, who presided in 1949 over the conclusion of the armistice agreements, and who succeeded only by bringing the Israelis face to face with one Arab country at a time. Reinforcing this experience is the sad lesson of the Palestine Conciliation Commission which doomed its mission of peace to failure from the moment it got the Arab countries together as one collective side in the negotiations.

(2) We should not dump the problem of finding a settlement in the lap of the United Nations—General Assembly or Security Council. This would be a sure formula for disaster. The Israeli-Arab conflict is one of the most complex international problems. It calls for alert, patient, wise statesmanship, and not for UN resolutions. These are inspired by a motley of extrinsic considerations on the part of the voters (often totally ignorant of the elementary facts of the situation), and they can obtain the number of votes necessary for adoption only at the cost of either extreme vagueness or dangerous political compromises. The UN may be made to play an important role only as a subsidiary and support to the work of quiet and deliberate statesmanship. This must be provided by the big powers jointly and separately, in conjunction with the Middle Eastern countries concerned. A Locarno-type agreement might be a useful framework, permitting the formal association of the big powers with a peace settlement in the role of parties and guarantors.

The minimal objective should consist of some package such as the following:

(1) Joint and separate big powers formal guarantees of the territorial status quo before the crisis, rectified to reduce the most glaring threats to Israel's security, plus specific guarantees regarding free navigation in the Gulf of Aqaba and the Suez Canal.

(2) An arms rationing scheme for the Middle East to which would adhere all potential suppliers, restricting shipments to weapons needed for minimum internal security.

(3) The placement of all nuclear installations in the area under the control of an international atomic energy agency.

(4) A specific formal commitment by Egypt renouncing belligerent rights, with particular reference to the Suez Canal and the Gulf of Aqaba, and similar commitments on the parts of all other Arab countries with specific references to control of borders, infiltration into Israel, etc.

(5) The Gaza Strip to be put under Israeli military control, with an appropriate presence of and role for the United Nations.

(6) The big powers, jointly and separately, to launch a major program of economic and technical assistance to all Middle Eastern countries in order to encourage them to turn their attention to problems of development and welfare. This, together with the diversion of resources which have gone into the arms race since 1955, should open up hitherto undreamed-of prospects of real progress. It would be criminal to allow a return to a situation whereby Egypt, for example, spent $4 billion over a twelve-year period on defense and armaments, while its people were starving and while its government had to go begging for a measly $60-million loan. The same applies mutatis mutandis to all the other countries of the area.

One final note on the tragic problem of the refugees: As part of the maximal plan, one might expect Israel to make a significant contribution by taking back a certain number of refugees and compensating the remainder. The other Arab countries and the world at large should also make a contribution by absorbing additional numbers. For the remainder, a program of rapid development supported by the United States and the world should provide opportunities to reconstruct their lives.

As part of the minimal program, the placing of the Gaza Strip under Israeli control should permit the launching of rehabilitation programs on a massive scale, should facilitate the movement of the refugees to places anywhere in the world where opportunities beckon, and should depoliticize and defuse the most embittered and miserable concentration of refugees. As for the refugees elsewhere, the measures envisaged in relation to the maximal scheme above would apply to them.

In conclusion, American steps in relation to the current crisis in the Middle East should be based on the following considerations:

¶ The basic U.S. interests and purposes in the area are to keep the peace; to assure secure transportation, communication and trade, and to keep any actual or potential enemy from controlling its resources.

¶ The foregoing basic purposes entail these operational objectives: (1) To terminate the nineteen-year-old Arab dream of the eventual destruction of Israel. (2) To prevent control of the Middle East by any single political leader or group actually or potentially hostile to the United States. (3) To contain Nasser, and oppose any political leaders who may arise of the type of Nasser, Ben Bella, Nkrumah, or Sukarno. (4) To prevent growth of Soviet power in the area while seeking to channel Soviet influence through a collective big-power concert.

ONE CHEER FOR THE HIPPIES

JACK NEWFIELD

Mr. Newfield is an assistant editor of The Village Voice, New York. He is the author of A Prophetic Minority (New Amsterdam Library).

Politics is dead. Culture is dead. The world stinks.
—Emmett Grogan, founder of the Diggers

I am a Roman Senator, not a Digger.
—Paul Goodman

The hippies are happening. Ed Sanders of the Fugs is on a cover of Life. Tulsa, Okla., which went for Barry Goldwater by 30,000 votes, recently had its first love-in. Gray Line sight-seeing buses detour through Haight-Ashbury to display the local "freaks" to the Babbitts. Squares (not hippies) pay $4 to see the psychedelic Billy Graham—Dr. Timothy Leary—preach his "turn on, tune in, dropout" sermons. Hollywood has adopted the vibrating, "acid art" poster style of the Fillmore Auditorium, using it in ads to promote the big-budget James Bond film, Casino Royale. And the folk-rock group, Jefferson Airplane, has recorded a commercial for white Levi denims—even as 460 of that company's employees strike in Blue Ridge, Ga., against the chronically exploitive conditions of Southern textile mills.

Individually, the hippies are beautiful. They know a lot of things the squares don't. They know that marijuana is mildly pleasant and doesn't give you lung cancer; that Bob Dylan, John Lennon and Leonard Cohen are authentic poetic voices for all those who have grown up absurd; that it is better to make love than war; that most things taught in college must be unlearned later in life; that it is healthier to be spontaneous, communal and tolerant than repressed, materialistic and bigoted; and that it is groovy to read Herman Hesse, Snoopy and Allen Ginsberg.

All this being eagerly granted, the point must now be made that the hippies have been overrated. Their ultimate vision is in no way superior to that of the New Left, of Mailer, Camus or Pynchon. The hippies will not change America because change means pain, and the hippie subculture is rooted in the pleasure principle. They have an intellectual flabbiness that permits them to equate an original talent like Kenneth Anger with a put-on like Andy Warhol. For this reason they are vulnerable to the kind of exploitation symbolized by the Jefferson Airplane commercial. They lack the energy, stability and private pain to serve as the "new proletariat" that some in the New Left perceive them to be. Bananas, incense and pointing love rays toward the Pentagon have nothing to do with redeeming and renovating America; Leary's call to "drop out" is really a call to cop out.

The whole hippie contagion seems to be a recoil from the idea of politics itself; it is not merely apolitical but anti-political. "Civil rights is a game for squares," one hippie told me. "Why should I demonstrate to get the spades all the things I'm rejecting?" And the Berkeley Barb, one of the best of the dozen underground weeklies, scorned the April 15 anti-war Mobilization for being "deadly serious, militant and political."

The hippies, in fact, have more in common with the nihilism of the 1950 beats, than with the activism of their generational comrades in the New Left. The beats opted out of a repressive, maternalistic society because they felt impotent to change it. Ike, McCarthyism, Korea, Madison Avenue, the cold war, the defeats of Stevenson, made politics appear impossible to the alienated young of the 1950s. Without hope, they sought escape by withdrawing into Eastern religions, sex, jazz, drugs and madness. It required foreign examples of effective student radicalism—in Korea, Japan, Cuba and Turkey, all in 1959—to inspire the young here.

The New Left took root in 1960 and 1961 because social change through political activism suddenly seemed possible with the election of John Kennedy. There were sit-ins, and lunch counters were desegregated. There were freedom rides, and bus terminals were desegregated. There were heroism and death in the Deep South, and a Civil Rights Act was drafted. There was a free-speech movement at Berkeley, and educational reform of the dehumanizing multiversity became a fashionable symposium topic. SDS organized around the ideal of participatory democracy, and the "maximum feasible participation of the poor" clause was written into the anti-poverty program. For a time there appeared to be in Washington a higher moral authority which would respond humanely to protest.

But just as the beats did not develop in a vacuum, neither have the hippies; their growth has been in direct correlation to the country's drift to the right since the Gulf of Tonkin "incident" and the Watts "rebellion." The young who once idolized JFK perceive his successor—correctly, I think—as an anti-democratic manipulator who has stultified the possibility of change through dissenting politics. Johnson has become a depressing Ike figure and Vietnam the monstrously swollen equivalent of the Korean police action. In 1963 Bob Dylan sang of changes "blowin' in the wind"; today he chants: "Although the masters make the rules/ for the wise men and the fools/ I've got nothin', Ma, to live up to." In 1962 more Harvard seniors wanted to volunteer for the Peace Corps than wanted to work for a large corporation; this is no longer the case. The Haight-Ashbury scene jumped into national prominence in the same month that the voters were sanctioning Reagan, Wallace and Maddox, and the Vietnamese War turned a corner into its present open-ended escalation. Suddenly, it seemed more possible to change private reality with LSD than America's reality with SDS.

My own quarrel with the hippie ethic can be summarized in five arguments.

The first is that I don't think it will be permanently impossible to alter America through radical political action. The hippies seem to side with Sade when he says: "And why should you care about the world outside? For me the only reality is imagination, the world inside myself. The revolution no longer interests me." But the New Left is closer to Marat, who answers (in Peter Weiss's Marat/Sade): "Against nature's silence I use action. . . . I don't watch unmoved; I intervene and say this and this are wrong, and I work to alter and improve them. The important thing is to pull yourself up by your own hair, to turn yourself inside out, and see the whole world with fresh eyes."

What the hippies forget is how unlikely social change seemed in 1957 and 1958. It took a new generation of kids, who had not read On the Road, to prove that America had not congealed into a static cage. Reform will become possible again, especially once the Vietnamese War ends. What the pleasure-oriented hippies can't accept is that political action is a painful, Sisyphean task that includes sacrifice, boredom and defeat.

My second point against the hippies is that precisely because they are not a real threat to anything they are used to goose a lifeless middle class, and are even widely imitated. Thus they create the illusion of influence when the jet set adopts their fashions, slang and music. But it is huckster America that profits by merchandising everything from "psychedelic salami" to "psychedelic earrings."

Third, the hippies think their vision of a drug-induced, homogenized love is an original panacea. One hippie even told me: "Man, I love everything. That fire hydrant, LBJ, Wallace, all them cats."

America is surely short on love, but the love the hippies invoke is so generalized and impersonal as to be meaningless. And as an observer I don't detect any greater love content in relations within the hippie subculture; they are just as exploitive and ego-centered and neurotic as the rest of us.

Fourth, the philosophical rationale the hippies cite for dropping out is that life is essentially absurd anyway, and since it has no meaning, it is pointless to try to change events. It is better, they say, again echoing Sade, to savor all possible personal experience instead.

Evidence certainly mounts to support an absurdist interpretation of recent history, beginning with the assassination in Dallas, through the CIA's secret life, up to Byron de la Beckwith now running for lieutenant governor of Mississippi. Yet both Sartre and Camus accepted—and then transcended—absurdity, and were able to embrace an even deeper engagement and commitment. Sartre and Camus did not "turn on and drop out" when the Nazis marched across France; they both joined the underground.

Finally, there is the dilemma of LSD. I have read several research papers and find much of the evidence is contradictory. Clearly, LSD has been useful, in a therapeutic sense, in treating problems like homosexuality, impotence and alcoholism. But LSD has also caused plenty of mental damage, recurring hallucinations, freak-outs and visits to hospital emergency wards by teeny-boppers who think they are giraffes. And, in general, the effect of acid on activists is to make them fugitives from the system, instead of insurgents against the system. Acid-heads tend to withdraw from politics (as Dr. Leary recommends), pursue private or politically unrealistic goals, and become disruptive if they remain inside activist organizations. They lack the patience and stability for the drudgery of organizing and scholarship.

The alternative to the hippies remains the New Left, which contrary to some reports, seems still to be growing. The spring semester indicated how deep the roots of student discontent have penetrated, with major campus rebellions at Long Island University, Texas, Drew University, Catholic University, Howard, Jackson State and Oklahoma. In May, card-carrying SDS members were freely elected student body presidents at Indiana and Northwestern. More than 350 students have signed an ad in the Harvard Crimson asserting that they will defy the draft. Vietnam Summer claims to have 2,000 organizers in the field.

Undeniably, the hippies represent an important break with the past and have considerable merit. Their musical innovations will, I suspect, ultimately prove as rich as the bop revolution forged by Bird, Dizzy and Monk in the 1940s. The diggers, who run the indigenous mission halls for their hippie brethren, are closer to St. Francis than to Cardinal Spellman.

But, finally, Dylan, pot and bright colors are the hippies' liberation. The poor, the voteless, the manipulated, the spiritually undernourished—they are oppressed by injustice that is crystallized in institutions. Only a radical political movement can liberate them. I want to save the squares too.

THE YANKS AND THE GOOKS

The Deserters

MIKE WALLACE

Mr. Wallace is a C.B.S. News correspondent, recently returned from two months in Vietnam.

During 1966, according to candid statistics released by the Americans in Saigon, one in every five men wearing the uniform of the army of South Vietnam (ARVN) deserted his outfit. Various tired of the endless war, eager to be at home with their families, disgruntled because others were profiting in safe civilian jobs in Saigon, fed up with corrupt officers or afraid of combat duty in the field, 116,000 Vietnamese soldiers put down their arms and went over the hill.

Though the rate had been building sharply through the three preceding years, desertions reached their peak in 1966. It seemed that as more Americans arrived to take over the brunt of the fighting, more Vietnamese soldiers decided they were content to let Americans do the job. In fact, just over a year ago, the desertion rate had accelerated to the point where only one in every four Vietnamese fighting battalions had enough men to operate in the field.

The American commanders were seriously worried, because they had two special chores in mind for the South Vietnamese army. First, they were counting on the ARVN to secure the Mekong Delta, that densely populated, difficult, rice-paddy country which for so long had been fertile ground for Vietcong recruitment. Second, the Americans planned to have the ARVN take over the protection of the Revolutionary Development or Pacification program throughout the country. They were to be charged with setting up a military shield behind which the villagers in territory ostensibly under government control could plant their crops, clear their roads, build their schools and slowly put together a nation, secure from interference or terror by the Vietcong. It was an emergency, and the American command, concerned also that news of the Vietnamese desertion rate would be circulated at home at the same time that American casualty rates began to rise, succeeded in impressing on their Vietnamese counterparts the need for urgent remedies.

First came a tough new anti-desertion law. Prior to its passage, the Vietnamese deserter had been liable, by American standards, to little more than a slap on the wrist. The Vietnamese Code of Military Justice said that a wartime deserter could be punished by a prison term of from six months to six years, with the possibility of solitary confinement for those who deserted to a foreign country. And even this law was loosely enforced and the sentences handed down tended to be light.

The new law, made effective at the end of last year and now being enforced by the Vietnamese with unaccustomed vigor, makes a peculiarly pragmatic point. It says, among other things, that desertion "must be eliminated . . . to prevent the waste of national funds through training of personnel who subsequently desert. . . ." It decrees death for a soldier who abandons his unit to join the enemy, hard labor for life for one who deserts in the face of the enemy, five years of hard labor for the man who deserts while not in combat.

But the most important provision of the law deals with the conditions under which the deserter shall serve his term. He is no longer confined to prison. Instead, he is assigned to hard labor with a combat or combat support unit. As a result, he finds himself, when captured and convicted, back in the line of fire, doing the most menial jobs; and sentenced to serve longer under those unappetizing conditions than had he simply waited out his tour of duty.

But the Americans understood the need for more than a tough anti-desertion law. At a time of urgent concern for the well-being of the American fighting man, the appalling conditions in which the Vietnamese enlisted man was forced to live prompted American commanders to make recommendations to the Vietnamese about improving the lot of their troops. Vietnamese military pay was minuscule, and living conditions for the soldier and his family were abominable. (Families live with the men in the base camps.) The headquarters of the Vietnamese Twenty-First Division at Vi Thanh in the Delta was typical, with garbage strewn about dependents' quarters, the most primitive sanitary facilities, inadequate schools, and mud virtually knee-deep everywhere during the rainy season. The Americans had a name for the Twenty-First's base camp: "Squalor Holler." Accordingly, the American command in Saigon urged upon their Vietnamese opposites higher pay, larger family allowances, more nearly habitable living quarters, improved mail and PX services, promotions and decorations for enlisted men who had demonstrated courage and leadership. In short, they asked that the Vietnamese stop treating their rank and file like combat animals.

The concept was revolutionary to the Vietnamese military mind; but Gen. Cao Van Vien, the South Vietnamese Chief of Staff, working with an American Assistant Chief of Staff, Brig. Gen. Donald McGovern, decided to give it a try. Today, the Vietnamese private with a wife and three children, who must buy all the food he and his family eat, receives the equivalent of forty-three American dollars a month. It's 25 per cent more than he used to make. Today, a radical change is under way at "Squalor Holler" and in numerous other base camps. A genuine effort is being made to replace the dirt floor shacks with tin-roofed, cement-floored hooches. Cigarettes and soft drinks are becoming available at reduced prices at the still primitive commissaries. Mail service has been speeded up, television masts are rising on the parade grounds, social service workers have begun to offer advice and help to the soldiers' wives. The schools are getting better. And little by little, the Vietnamese soldier is beginning warily to respond.

But, generally speaking, he is still no patriot. He feels no kinship, no sense of involvement in the concerns of

Waite, The Sun (London): Ben Roth

"Now That's More Like a Demilitarized Zone."

the Saigon government. Col. John Walker, senior American adviser to the Vietnamese Fifth Division, north of Saigon, explains the difficulty:

The soldier has been promised many things but they have not always been delivered. So he remains skeptical.

Our people in the United States are raised from childhood to look on a deserter as a low form of criminal. This is just not true in Vietnam. Over the years the soldier has been exploited so he doesn't have the same feeling about desertion that Americans do. The Vietnamese just doesn't consider it bad.

The Vietnamese Fifth Division, which Colonel Walker advises, had one of the worst records for desertion of any in the country. It is stationed near Saigon; the bus that runs past its front gate every thirty minutes costs just 15c for a trip to the Saigon back-alley labyrinths in which a deserter can go underground. But in the Fifth, as in other divisions up and down the country, the tide has begun to turn.

One measure of progress came during the crucial Tet season, over January and February. Tet is an amalgam of our Fourth of July and New Year's holidays, a time when the Vietnamese likes to go home to his village and his family. Frequently, the soldier who goes home on leave during Tet decides to stay there. Last year, during Tet, there were more than 23,000 desertions. During Tet in 1967, the number was cut just about in half. And since Tet of this year desertions have continued at only half of last year's rate.

Cheered by those statistics, the Americans prepared a press release and suggested to the Vietnamese that they circulate it. Either from a sensitivity on the whole subject of desertions, or from fear that the downward trend will not continue, or possibly because desertions have increased in the Revolutionary Development teams, which are being hit with increasing and devastating frequency by the Vietcong—for whatever reason, the Vietnamese have not released the figures. Instead the Americans leaked them to reporters in Saigon. The South Vietnamese are in general reluctant to talk much about their troops, and perhaps it's understandable. Unfavorable comparisons can be made between their performance and that of the Vietcong and North Vietnamese. Those two armies, after all, are of the same stock, essentially the same background as the South Vietnamese. Yet they consistently fight with greater valor, demonstrate a tighter discipline both in their dealings with the civilian population and in battle. And the evident reason is that they are more strongly motivated; they feel a deeper sense of kinship with their top leaders, a deeper involvement in the cause for which they fight.

Perhaps the most crucial difference between the two opposing groups of Vietnamese fighting men is in the officer corps. With the Vietcong, a man achieves officer status by long and arduous performance in the field. Frequently he has come up through the ranks. There is little talk of nepotism and corruption in the Vietcong. But the South Vietnamese army is notorious as a haven for corrupt and frequently cowardly political hacks, officers with no taste for battle and little concern for the well-being of their troops.

This shoddy leadership is not overlooked by the men who do the fighting. It is reflected in the desertion rate which, though declining, remains a powerful indicator that the South Vietnamese army has little stomach for the jobs that have been assigned it. Some American commanders speak spiritedly—in public—of how their counterparts are developing the vital qualities of leadership, of how the Vietnamese troops are beginning to take hold and demonstrate valor and determination in battle. But privately, there are few Americans in Vietnam who feel real confidence in the capabilities of their allies. The desertion rate is coming down. But still, despite the tough new law, despite a raise in pay and markedly improved living conditions, most of all despite the fact that the battle reports indicate they're on the winning side, still a thousand Vietnamese soldiers every week are willing to take their chances and desert.

WHAM!

TED KOPPEL

Mr. Koppel has been on assignment for A.B.C. in Vietnam since the beginning of March.

Saigon

An Australian corporal walks into a snack bar near Vung Tau, South Vietnam. Marching up to the counter he makes his pleasure known: "Eh, Gook! Gimme a hamburger!" WHAM!

A pair of American civilians stand at a corner of the Tu Do Street in Saigon. It is approaching 11 P.M.; almost curfew time. Apparently they are looking for a taxi, but because they have been drinking rather heavily two or three of the midget Renault cabs slow down and then pass them by. The louder of the two civilians poises for the next taxi and then lets loose with a remarkably well-aimed kick at the left-rear fender. WHAM!

WHAM is a caustic acronym coined in Vietnam to represent one of the favorite slogans of American leaders here. It stands for "Winning the Hearts and Minds" of the people. WHAM might also be less imaginatively but more realistically defined as the distance between the ideal objective and the attainable goal. The time is perhaps long overdue for us to give up the naive assumption that the bigot from Bayonne, the dropout from Dayton, the hood from Hattiesburg and the plain, uninterested marine from Montgomery have, in the long trip to Southeast Asia, been magically transformed into effective good-will ambassadors.

One of our Vietnamese crews—Doan Van Tung the cameraman, Nguyen Xuan De the soundman and I—arrived one evening in the marine camp at Khe Sanh. The battalion commander, a colonel, graciously offered to let us sleep in his command bunker. Only the night before, Khe Sanh had been rather heavily mortared and the colonel felt we would be safer underground. While Tung, De and I go down into the bunker to drop our gear, the colonel tells a marine corporal to bring a couple of extra cots. The corporal and the cots arrive five minutes later. "You meanta say I lugged these f-----g cots for these goddamn gooks?!!" WHAM!

The picture is not totally one-sided. I would estimate that the vast preponderance of Vietnamese don't like Americans either; but somehow, whatever their motivation, they are a shade more successful in disguising their feelings.

It is a multifaceted dilemma. Reduced to its simplest terms, it is as though you were to blindfold a man and then beat him insensible. When your victim regains consciousness, he is surrounded by ten men. Only four of the men, you tell him, are his enemies—the other six must be cultivated as friends. Regrettably, you say, you don't know which men fall into which category, but "do your best."

For his part, the GI must live with the daily paradox that exposes him on the one hand to the ARVN, whom the average GI appraises with something less than unalloyed admiration, and on the other to the ARVN's cousin or father, brother or fellow villager, the Vietcong. The more he condemns the merits of the ARVN as a soldier, the more the GI must ponder the undeniable tenacity and fighting ability of the Vietcong. They are cut from the same cloth, but seem to fight with disproportionate effectiveness. The American soldier's typical reaction is to reject all Vietnamese. They are all suspect. They are all "gooks."

Then there is the dilemma of trying to unite Americans and Vietnamese in a common cause while keeping them at arm's length. The best interests of the South Vietnamese economy and of Vietnamese-American relations approach the irreconcilable. The flood of piasters that would be released were all American servicemen allowed free access to the cities and towns of South Vietnam would buckle the economy. The alternative is to limit contact between American and Vietnamese troops to purely military relations, or to the brief orgy of an in-country rest and recuperation period. Neither has proved conducive to a mutual blossoming of respect and admiration.

Even when they are fighting a common enemy, the American and the South Vietnamese soldier are fighting for different reasons. At best, the Vietnamese soldier is fighting because he loves South Vietnam and is firmly opposed to a Communist take-over. At worst, he is fighting because the Saigon government exercises a firmer control around his home and could potentially cause him more trouble than could the Vietcong. Most frequently he is fighting because of a little bit of both. The American soldier, by and large, cares only rather vaguely about the threat of communism to South Vietnam. He is here, in effect, serving something that approaches jury duty; it is expected of him. He is prepared to serve his time and do his duty bravely; but he does it from obedience to his own country, not from any concern for Vietnam. Already, hundreds of seasoned professionals, American non-coms and officers with up to sixteen and eighteen years of service, are retiring after their Vietnamese tour, but before their twenty years are completed, rather than face returning for a second tour some two years hence. This is not lost on the Vietnamese. Few Americans are in Vietnam for "the duration" as they were in Europe during World War II. Most of them are in Vietnam for twelve or thirteen months. It's enough time for a man to do his duty, but not enough time to do the job.

The South Vietnamese are plagued on the one hand by the specter of an American pull-out that would leave them practically defenseless at the hands of the Communists, and on the other hand by the almost equally undesirable alternative of an American take-over. A few miles south of Da Nang I spoke recently with a small group of marines about to go out on an operation. One of them summed up the dilemma of American involvement neatly: "I told the mama-san who does our laundry, 'If you people don't shape up, we're gonna take this country away from you and make you all our slaves.'" He was joking, and the laundrywoman, so he says, knew it; but the joke is endemic to the problem. The frustration of fighting in Vietnam makes many an American soldier, officer as well as enlisted man, toy with the idea of how it might be if only the United States could "take over." Even as things stand, the increasing prominence of the American fighting machine in Vietnam makes many a South Vietnamese uncomfortably review his country's shrinking sovereignty. It is all very well for American statesmen and generals to speak glowingly of how unlikely, indeed practically impossible it would be for the United States to sustain a military defeat in Vietnam now. But the South Vietnamese have not forgotten the words of Presidents Kennedy and Johnson—each of whom said at one time that, in the final analysis, the war in Vietnam would have to be fought and won by the Vietnamese themselves. Seen from that perspective, each infusion of an additional 10,000 or 50,000 American soldiers bears witness to the fact that, if anything, the South Vietnamese are in less of a position to win this war on their own than they ever were. It represents a loss of face to the Vietnamese and a growing frustration to the Americans, who are finding it increasingly difficult to wage a bitter war on tiptoes.

A popular bon mot that has been making the rounds in Vietnam for some time is attributed to an American general who said: "Grab 'em by the balls and their hearts and minds will follow." The converse, it should be pointed out, is probably also true; but it is practically impossible to do both at the same time, and that is the most baffling dilemma of Vietnam.

Cleveland: Recipe for Violence

ROLDO S. BARTIMOLE
and MURRAY GRUBER

Mr. Bartimole, formerly welfare and housing writer for the Cleveland Plain Dealer, is now with the Cleveland office of The Wall Street Journal. Mr. Gruber is a member of the Community Organization faculty, School of Applied Sciences, Western Reserve University. He was a planner with Hough's Community Action for Youth during last year's riots.

Cleveland

The United States is the only Western democracy in which economic and racial problems produce riots in major cities. Here, the array of urban problems that test the viability of the city and the patience of the ghetto can be found in most metropolitan communities, but Cleveland points up most clearly the inevitability of violent rebellion when peaceful change is aborted.

In April, 1966, the Civil Rights Commission ripped away Cleveland's carefully nurtured façade of social progress. Hearings gave the ghetto a chance to speak, and even it was shocked by the cumulative findings. However, there was little time to redress social and economic grievances before summer, and in July Hough erupted in five days of rioting that took four lives.

Now there has been more time, but it has brought few changes. Almost a year after the hearings, Civil Rights Commission Chairman John A. Hannah returned a sobering appraisal: "The list of accomplishments is very short, and the agenda of unfinished business is very long." Cleveland leaders insist gradual progress is being made, but the position of the Negro in reality is deteriorating:

¶ Between 1960-1965 the number of poverty families in every Negro planning area increased, and the median income slumped. In Hough, median income skidded from $4,732 to $3,966, and two other areas, with 60,000 Negroes, had median incomes lower than Hough's.

¶ Unemployment in March reached 15.6 per cent for Negroes in poverty areas, with 58 per cent of the young males jobless or earning below poverty level wages.

¶ Negro unemployment in general hovers around 9 per cent while the community rate is 2.3 per cent.

¶ The building trades remain impregnable, with only thirteen Negroes among 11,500 workers in the five major construction trades.

¶ Only forty-three Negroes were among the 1,350 apprentice trainees in federally sponsored programs last year.

¶ Some 38,000 Negroes get aid to dependent children payments, pegged far below poverty level (73c a day after rent) on a state formula set at 76 per cent of its own minimum standard.

These bread-and-butter issues generate intense pressures in the ghetto. Adding to the severity of economic problems, the city has failed miserably in urban renewal (all residential projects are in ghetto areas); Mayor Ralph S. Locher and influential business leaders are at loggerheads; the civil rights movement is a shambles; and there is little organization in the ghetto.

Cleveland is a recipe for violence. Already three white grocers have been murdered in the ghetto, and robberies are up 300 per cent. A white policeman, part of the department's tactical force, the "Green Berets," was killed by gunfire this month. Fire bombings are nightly occurrences, with white businesses, vacant houses and schools all prime targets. On one balmy April evening, more than fifty fires were set in the Central area, south of Hough. One school was completely destroyed; the replacement cost will be more than $1 million. Teen-agers on a rampage smashed windows in stores along a 20-block area in Hough. Between September and March, fifty-nine teachers have been assaulted in schools.

Traditional cleavages in the community are more bitter than ever. The Ku Klux Klan and the North American Alliance of White People plan summer programs. Whites fear that guerrilla warfare will spread to them and Negroes anticipate gangs of white toughs. Apartment dwellers—black and white—at the edge of Hough take turns keeping armed guard on rooftops; the cultural center of Cleveland, almost surrounded by the ghetto, has its own police force. Several suburbs recently passed anti-riot laws and have special riot-control equipment.

Even before the riots, Hough was a ravaged community. Streets were desolate with boarded-up businesses and abandoned buildings; garbage-filled yards were inescapable, and streets glittered from curb to curb with crushed glass. Little has changed except that burned-out buildings left by the riots intensify the wasteland appearance of the 2-square-mile area where live some 55,000 of Cleveland's 280,000 Negroes (one-third of the population). Hough has become the symbol of Negro hopelessness, but equally hellish are the other east-side areas which with it account for 99 per cent of the black population. The west side remains almost totally white.

An official of the Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD) described Cleveland as his department's Vietnam: "We'd like to get out but we don't know how." Cleveland had its progressive reform movement too early, at the turn of the century with Mayors Tom L. Johnson and Newton D. Baker. Since then it has depended upon caretaker mayors. Corruption-free government has been more important than planning and problem solving. The private sector—rampant elitism, a powerful welfare industry and well-financed community foundations—has been sanctified, and almost all problems are delegated to committees of private citizens.

Choked with problems, Cleveland's ostrich compulsion has given way to a billy-club mentality. Each warning spasm from the ghetto is met with "get tough" proclamations and repressive measures. More than 100 policemen were hired in May. In addition to the Green Berets, there are other parallels to Vietnam. A special police helicopter buzzes low every night over the ghetto, scanning the ground with a searchlight. The helicopter, armed with a Thompson submachine gun, was financed by private groups, including the Rotary Club and Group 66, a young businessmen's organization.

One minister predicts the imposition of "emergency apartheid" to seal off the ghetto this summer. "Those of us who have read The Rise and Fall of the Third Reich," said the Rev. Charles Rawlings, director of the Council of Churches Metropolitan Division, "know well the early rationalizations advanced to the German people which prepared them to accept the first excesses by government. . . . The thinking in some private circles in Cleveland is that should violence erupt in our ghetto again, we will seal it off, permitting no one to enter or leave."

The history of police-community relations and current activities gives plausibility to Rawlings' fears. Detective Sergeant John Ungvary, head of the subversive activities squad, testified before Sen. James O. Eastland's Internal Security Subcommittee that "What we need is a law that would let us charge them all [black nationalists] as conspirators . . . before an overt act is committed. Wouldn't this be far better than to wait for an overt act?"

But the police are only willing functionaries; they deliver what public officials want. Mayor Locher ordered police to "fill the jails . . . put a stop to this rowdiness. This is no time for theorizing . . . but for bold action." Councilmen were more blunt: "Shoot 'em dead," said one. And another: "If the police break skulls what will the reaction be? Let's find out." A third said: "The best way to leave these hoodlums is face down in the street." Ghetto militants warned: "Just let one of those cops start beating on a brother." Safety Director John McCormick, anticipating charges of police brutality, said, "I don't care." But Bertram E. Gardner, a Negro and director of the Community Relations Board, takes another tack. He tells Negro groups that "if you see the police using a little force, look up at the stars, look away."

When tensions rise in other cities, officials cautiously avoid provoking the ghetto. Not so in Cleveland. Although the "get tough" tactics are ostensibly aimed at a small number of troublemakers, statements of public officials are manifestly racist and all-inclusive. Law Director Bronis J. Klementowicz, second in command at city hall and a confidant of Mayor Locher, recently warned a state legislative committee that "if the Cleveland police department fails, crime will spill all over Cuyahoga County," hinting that Negroes would carry crime to the suburbs. He added a gratuitous slur on Negro family life,

Long, Hot Summer

Macpherson, Toronto Star

claiming there were "10,000 women in Hough without husbands." This implied they are unwed mothers. There are, in fact, less than 10,000 husbandless females in Hough, including more than 4,000 single women and some 1,200 widows.

Later Locher branded Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., an "extremist" when the Negro leader came to Cleveland to preach nonviolence to youth in ghetto high schools. Locher refused to meet with King, as he has repeatedly rejected meetings with Cleveland Negroes.

City officials find a well-tooled instrument for suppression in the Cleveland police department. Testimony during the Civil Rights Commission hearings revealed that police often hold Negroes without charge; disregard state law on the right to make telephone calls by those arrested; make wide use of a "suspicious person" city ordinance to haul Negroes into the station. Then, before releasing persons held without charge, the police tell them to sign a "waiver," by which they forfeit the right to sue the city for unlawful arrest and detention. (One commissioner called the waiver a "fraud.") The suspicious person law was ruled unconstitutional by a municipal judge, but remains in use by the city's chief prosecutor, who avoids that particular judge.

In December, a team of experts described the police department as "defensive, isolated, parochial and mistrustful of the public it serves." The department views any community relations work as "yielding to radical and subversive elements in the community." It rejected a proffered $15,000 grant from the U. S. Department of Justice to plan a community-relations program, and to divert criticism from this obstinacy created its own community-relations division, naming as head a thirty-two-year veteran cop who has been State Fraternal Order of Police president for nineteen years!

Police also have a simple method of handling complaints against themselves. Complainants are told that the police officer charged will take a lie-detector test. If he fails, appropriate action will be taken. However, the complainant must also take a lie-detector test, and if he fails, must serve a six-month jail sentence and pay a $1,000 fine for filing a false complaint. That usually eliminates the complaint, a police official said.

Symbolizing police contempt, Police Chief Richard Wagner rode into Hough during the riots armed with his personal hunting rifle, which he used against snipers. When a woman, searching for her children, was killed by gunfire, Wagner remarked, "There was a similar occurrence in the Chicago riots. They sacrifice one person and blame it on police brutality."

Even with the problems and the police-state tactics, violence might be avoidable if some safety valve existed. But there is almost no communication between officials and the ghetto. (Gardner, in answer to a question about the police chief, told reporters this May 21, "I don't know Chief Wagner. I know what he looks like, but I don't know him.") Beaten down, seemingly without hope, the grass-roots people have not organized viable protests.

Militants are pushed to extreme positions by a Southern-type community response. After the Hough riots, a special grand jury, headed by Louis B. Seltzer, former editor of the Cleveland Press and an avid believer in his ability to prescribe what is best for Cleveland, linked several militants to the riots. The grand jury reported that the riots were "... organized, precipitated and exploited by a relatively small group of trained and disciplined professionals at this business." It went on to blame the Communist Party. The findings were refuted by the U.S. Justice Department, and even the FBI disagreed. Anyone who had read Seltzer's newspaper during the Civil Rights hearings would have known that Negroes didn't need Communists to convince them to rebel.

Unable to indict any of the militants, the police have used harassing tactics, slapping housing violations on store-front offices operated by them. Efforts by white groups to maintain lines of communication to the ghetto are stifled by police and community pressures, with constant rebukes from the newspapers.

Last year some officials of the Council of Churches attempted to keep open the JFK (Jomo Freedom Kenyatta) House, a youth center. JFK House was operated by Lewis G. Robinson, labeled an agitator by police and "a recurring figure" in the Hough riots by the grand jury. The council has been accused of engaging in a conspiracy with violent militants, an accusation Rev. Mr. Rawlings calls "unspeakable insanity." Privately both police and city officials insist the council is diverting funds to be used for violence. In business circles the council is regarded with paranoid suspicion. Earlier this year, its officials met in New York with Saul D. Alinsky to discuss a ghetto organizational drive this summer. Ralph M. Besse, chairman of the board of the Cleveland Electric Illuminating Company and chairman of the Inner-City Action Committee, a group of community elites formed after the Hough riots at Locher's request, said the ghetto "doesn't need an agitator." Another civic elite, John A. Reavis, lawyer-businessman and head of the Businessmen's Interracial Committee, formed after the school riots in 1964, said it would be a "tragedy" if Alinsky were to come. Reavis indicated that financial pressures would be brought on the council.

Recently Floyd McKissick, of CORE, met with Besse and other business leaders. He was startled by their inability to understand the need for ghetto organization. McKissick said privately that Cleveland was the first city he had visited where he could not find a few high-level business leaders who understood that the ghetto needed to develop its own economic and political strength.

As the war fever mounts, a three-way conflict has developed among business interests, city hall and the federal government. Business interests are feeling the pinch of the inept renewal program. Cleveland's credit rating has dropped from "Aa" to "A," already costing the city $70,000 in higher interest rates on improvement bonds. The main downtown shopping center has been in a decline that is reflected in some $4.4 million in tax reduction for the downtown core since January. The County Board of Tax Revision blamed the drop on the "complete deterioration" of the area. For two years prior to some recent activity, there were no acquisitions or disposition of land in the $16-million downtown Erie-view project. Interest on Erieview bonds has exceeded limitations and is pyramiding at $50,000 a month. During the last eleven years the city has failed to complete a single urban renewal project; it is now stuck with more land under renewal projects than any other city in the nation. In the Hough area, part of the largest rehabilitation project in the country, only 15 per cent of the planned work has been completed after four years of construction.

By January the urban renewal bungling had forced HUD Secretary Robert C. Weaver to take the unprecedented action of denying new funds for Cleveland (six more projects were in planning stages). Weaver also turned down a request for $23 million more for Hough renewal and withdrew $10 million already committed for the second stage of downtown commercial renewal. He warned that if "substantial progress" was not made by July, HUD would cut off funds for the administration of projects which have been in execution since 1956. One of the jeopardized projects is Cleveland State University, a downtown complex which business sees as essential for revitalizing the area.

With business interests threatened, Besse offered to assist the city administration in urban renewal. But after a meeting with him a Locher aide reported to the Mayor, "All in all, I was not encouraged to believe that the portion of the business community represented by Mr. Besse would be willing to offer any real assistance except on its own terms." Again in March, Besse offered the assistance of the business community. The quid pro quo was the replacement of Locher's urban renewal director with Maj. Gen. Stanley Connelly, director of Besse's Inner-City Action Committee. Locher rejected the offer and Besse severed relations with the city administration.

In a bitter letter, Besse said: "The causes of the frustration of the mobilized effort of the community to assist you are identical with those which have frustrated the federal government. . . . These causes are to be found primarily in the inadequacies of executive personnel and almost complete lack of effective coordination. . . ."

Locher hit back, charging the business community with an attempt to take over city hall. With considerable truth, Locher declared: "I have not yet seen one real constructive action taken by the [Inner-City] committee. So far we have heard some cries from them and they have made some demands on us. Where's their action?" (Besse subsequently said if he had it to do over, he would exchange the word "Action" for "Coordinating.")

While Locher and Besse play politics, decent housing is a top priority for ghetto residents who also want to know where the action is. Last year they answered with fire bombs and called it "instant urban renewal." In March, a black nationalist, Fred (Ahmed) Evans, made national news when he predicted riots for May 9 to coincide with a partial eclipse of the sun. That date passed quietly enough, but the police can take no credit. With loaded shotguns, they burst into Ahmed's astrology store front in Hough, arresting him and others on "housing violations." That same night two police detectives visited the Plain Dealer editorial rooms, searching for N.B.C.-TV cameramen from New York City because they "know where the riot's going to start tonight."

All the elements for tragedy are now present in this city, self-proclaimed "The Best Location in the Nation." It may be too late for Cleveland, but there are lessons here for other cities that want to avoid disaster.

Bombs and Suburbs

When racial violence occurs in the city of Cleveland, no one is surprised. Jobs are scarce, housing is poor, and the Mayor and police department lost the confidence of the Negro community long ago. But it is a different story when racial violence occurs in Cleveland Heights, an established and prosperous suburb to the east of Cleveland. Cleveland Heights has none of the economic or the administrative problems of the city, and although its population is more than 60,000, it has only about eighty Negro families.

Yet in the past ten years six bombings, all traceable to racial discontent, have occurred in the northwest corner of this suburb. The target of the latest of these bombings was J. Newton Hill, the first Negro to head Karamu House, an interracial theatre and art center in Cleveland. [See "Art and Argot at Karamu" by Bennett Kremen, The Nation, September 19, 1966.] On May 14, a time bomb containing fifteen sticks of dynamite ripped the front of the Hill home, causing an estimated $3,000 in damage. Hill and his wife were asleep in an upstairs bedroom and were unhurt by the blast, but there is no telling when they will move back to their home.

There is no doubt how Mr. Hill's neighbors and many other residents in Cleveland Heights feel about the incident. Hill himself is confident that "it wasn't racial hatred in the neighborhood" that caused the bombing, and so are those who live near him. When he told them, "I am sorry to have caused this to happen," the only reply was that of a neighbor standing next to him, who said, "Please, sir, don't ever say anything like that again, please don't." Later that same morning, an estimated 500 persons met at St. Paul's Episcopal Church in Cleveland Heights and pledged $4,234 as a reward for the arrest of the guilty party. In the gathering were the leaders of a number of religious and civic groups, including the Heights Citizens for Human Rights, a fair-housing organization.

Unfortunately, it seems improbable that Hill's neighbors or the Heights Citizens for Human Rights will be able to guarantee that future incidents do not occur. Yet steps could have been taken to reduce their likelihood. The City Council of Cleveland Heights could by now have passed a fair-housing ordinance and established a human relations commission with a professional staff. Such action, while not promising miracles, could have made it clear that an attack upon a Negro home in Cleveland Heights is an attack upon all homes.

Instead, the Council has rejected a proposal to take a more open stand on fair housing, and the only action from all the talk has been a library exhibit on Negro culture. That will scarcely interest the bombers, and it will certainly not intimidate them.

NICOLAUS C. MILLS

THE GASLIGHT INDUSTRY

WALLACE I. ROBERTS

Mr. Roberts is a reporter on the Providence Journal-Bulletin.

Since the gaslight era, power in New England has been controlled by the private companies, but recent developments initiated by public-power advocates suggest that the Yankee capitalists, who have administered the industry with an amazing lack of their traditional ingenuity, may be forced to change their ways. Except for a transmission system half owned by Vermont and providing about a quarter of the state's electric needs, there are no large publicly owned generating or transmission systems in the six states, so they have escaped until now the passionate, flag-waving defenses of free enterprise that have previously been exhibited in private vs. public power battles in nearly every other section of the country. The controversy in New England has taken the form of a series of complicated legal and financial maneuvers, a somewhat misleading public relations and advertising campaign, and intensive political lobbying. It has all been most decorous, but with the April announcement by the Justice Department that it is making preliminary investigations of possible antitrust violations by the private New England utilities, and with the threat of similar action by the Federal Power Commission, things may become less restrained.

Beginning two years ago with a request for money to finance engineering studies for a federal hydroelectric project on the St. John River near the town of Dickey in northern Maine, the conflict has grown and developed on several additional fronts. It promises not to be over for some time, given the determination and recent successes of the public-power groups and the distaste for change exhibited by most private company officials.

If there is no agreement about what kind of power projects to build, there is absolute agreement as to why they are necessary—New England's electric rates are the highest of any region in the country. There are many ways to compare the cost of electricity, and by any of them the New England states, except Vermont with its public power, are at the top of the list. Federal Power Commission figures for 1963 show that the average price per kilowatt-hour sold by the private utilities in New England was 2.48c compared to 1.77c for the private utilities of the country, a difference of 40 per cent. Similar comparison reveals that fewer kilowatt-hours per customer are sold in New England. Higher prices inhibit sales, and lower sales force the prices even higher because a smaller total revenue must be spread over the fixed charges.

Private company executives acknowledge the region's high rates, but their reply has become as automatic as an echo: "Yes, but our fuel and labor costs and taxes are so high." There is some substance to that explanation, though Joseph C. Swidler, former FPC chairman, said several years ago that if New England utilities had to pay only average fuel costs, the region's electric bills would be lowered by less than 5 per cent.

An equally substantive explanation, however, is the fact that administrative expenses range, depending on how they are measured, from 33 to 100 per cent above the national average, and, according to William D. Shipman, professor of economics at Bowdoin College, account for one-quarter to one-half of the difference between the average price for electricity in New England and in the rest of the country. Local taxes, which are one-third higher for New England utilities, are the only significant inequity that is apparently beyond much control.

The most important factor in rate reductions is increased per capita use. Because New England is an "old" region in demographic terms, neither its industry nor its population, and hence its per capita use of electricity, has kept pace with the rest of the country. A slow growth rate in per capita use is almost a built-in barrier to lowering prices, but reductions can be encouraged by cutting costs through efficiencies.

Compounding the high fuel costs, the coal or oil is burned in plants that for the most part are little old teakettles, barely able to get up enough steam to whistle, when compared to the giant and efficient boiler-turbine-generator combinations that have been available for years. The region does have one show piece, the Brayton Point, Mass., plant of the New England Power Co. It opened in 1964 and was rated by the FPC as the most efficient in the country, but for thirteen years before that New England had no entry on the commission's list of the top ten most efficient plants.

Mechanical inefficiency cannot be blamed on the region's age or geographical deficiencies; it is the result of administrative decisions. Two generations ago, Samuel Insull, the man who did for electricity what Henry Ford did for the automobile, showed the power industry that it was much more efficient to use large generating plants serving as many people as possible. No one believed him at first, and it might appear that many private company executives in New England still don't. On average, the public utilities companies of the country serve three times as many people as do the companies of New England, and there are more than one and a half times as many people for every generating plant. This means for New England more executives, more plants and lines to maintain, more secretaries, more maintenance workers, more pensions and insurance, and higher labor costs per customer. New Englanders are paying to perpetuate a quaint private industry organization that is not nearly as charming as a covered bridge and much more expensive.

Attempts at consolidation have been made, but the pace is slow. In some places in New England, covered bridges have rotted away before the public realized what was happening. It is unlikely, however, that any private utility in the region will collapse, for they are protected by the state regulatory agencies and an apathetic public. Almost all of the region's utilities make the maximum profit allowed by law, and a few are considerably above the prescribed limit. Blackstone Valley Electric Co. of Rhode Island earned in 1965 a return of 9.34 per cent, almost twice the limit.

Only Vermont's Public Service Board seems to take seriously its obligation to set reasonable rates. New Hampshire and Connecticut appear indifferent at best, and the regulatory agencies in Maine, Massachusetts and Rhode Island have exhibited what can only be called an affection for the private companies. The Maine and Massachusetts agencies have been hostile, almost insulting, to recent appearances by public-power groups.

Part of this situation results from the fact that none of the agencies has money or staff to do an adequate job. Most are so short of skilled help that they are forced to accept company operating statistics as a basis for determining rates. Unless the public demands it, the regulatory agencies are not likely to hire qualified accountants or engineers, and the prevailing public attitude is that the cost of electricity has formed a triumvirate with death and taxes. The result is that the regulatory agencies are permitting monopolies to earn good profits with equipment and organizational structures that would drive them to the wall if they were faced with even moderately aggressive competition. Allowing each utility exclusive control of its sales territory prevents wasteful duplication of plants and lines, but it also creates an attitude of status quo complacency. Creative regulatory policies could impose penalties for continued use of outmoded steam plants, instead of allowing them to be included in the rate base.

However, conventional steam plants have had their day in New England. After 1969, the region's power industry will most likely build only lower-cost nuclear plants. It already has an experimental nuclear plant, Yankee, at Rowe, Mass., and five others are either under construction or committed. These five are part of what the private companies have dubbed their "Big 11 Power Loop"; the other six installations consist of five conventional steam plants and a pumped storage plant. All eleven are scheduled to be finished by the end of 1972 and will be connected by 900 miles of 345-kilovolt transmission lines. The cost of the project is about $900 million, and the plants will provide about 6.3 million kilowatts of power.

The name "Big 11 Power Loop"—but not the plants or transmission lines—is a gimmick, pure and simple. No engineering plan or study supports the location, type or design of the plants on a system-wide basis. It all started with a full-page newspaper advertisement announcing the "Loop" and implying that the whole thing was thought out well in advance. The campaign, carried on with television commercials costing about $200,000 a year, was devised by the private companies' trade organization, the Electric Coordinating Council of New England (ECCNE), in response to the threat of the federal government's Dickey-Lincoln School hydroelectric project.

As one company official put it: "We felt the public should know about our plans because Dickey was getting a lot of publicity, but the important thing is that the eleven plants were planned long before Dickey came up. We did not just decide to build the plants after Dickey's first appropriation, as some of our opponents have said."

That first appropriation for the government project in 1965 was for $800,000; last year it received $1,100,000. This year, President Johnson asked for $1,600,000 to finish engineering studies and begin construction. The 794,000-kilowatt project is to cost an estimated $212 million and, if all goes well in Congress, will be finished in April, 1975.

The dam at Dickey is the practical reality left over from the dream of harnessing the tides in Passamaquoddy Bay at the eastern tip of Maine. [See "Reviving Passamaquoddy" by William S. Ellis, The Nation, July 13, 1964.] It was the request for its first appropriation that started the political and verbal six guns blazing. The members of the ECCNE opened an intensive lobbying campaign and sent their forces to Washington equipped with large packets of propaganda purporting to show that Dickey was objectionable on just about any conceivable ground. They had some effect, especially on the New England delegation of twenty-four Representatives, twenty of whom voted against Dickey on one roll call. Congressional resistance to a large public-works project for the home region is unusual, and the New England vote raised speculation as to whether the area's Congressmen felt more obligated to the private utilities or to their constituents.

Projected Nuclear Power Station, Near Waterford, Conn.

Dickey is not enormous; by 1980 it will provide only 1 per cent of the area's electrical requirements. But it will probably bring with it a Northeast Power Commission to market the power. It is expected that the cheaper power of Dickey, combined with the prodding effect of the power administration on state regulatory agencies, will be to force lower electrical rates. The members of the ECCNE fear, with justification, that Dickey will oblige them to cut administrative and generating expenses and become more efficient. The private companies put it a little differently, however, saying that Dickey will force them to lose money by trying to meet its prices. The federal government's experience, on the contrary, has been that its low-cost power stimulates consumption and increases revenues for surrounding private companies.

The ECCNE has introduced masses of statistics at Congressional hearings to prove that Dickey will not break even. Public-power advocates pointed out that the same kind of argument has been used against every federal power project in recent years. In an attempt to reconcile contradictory figures supplied by the ECCNE and the Corps of Engineers, the House Appropriations Committee assigned its staff to investigate the situation. Its report, made public June 5, offers no specific recommendations, but concludes that the project will produce power at a cost lower than any comparable alternative proposed by the ECCNE. The report also contained several biting observations on the long-range planning by New England's private utilities and noted that the companies "have not produced any document supporting central planning with the exception of the newspaper advertisement," and that "the most current transmission study by the ECCNE was completed in 1963" and includes plans for none of the Big 11 projects.

The fight over Dickey is overshadowing several other power conflicts that may have even greater effect on New England. One is a plan to import 1.25 million kilowatts, almost twice as much as Dickey would generate, from a giant hydroelectric project at Churchill (formerly Hamilton) Falls in Labrador.

This scheme was seen as a real threat by the private companies when it received the backing of Gov. Philip H. Hoff of Vermont, a bright young Democrat in the land of Republicans. In January, 1966, he introduced a bill in the Republican-controlled legislature which would have created a quasi-public, nonprofit corporation to import the Canadian power and resell most of it to municipal and cooperative utilities in Massachusetts and Connecticut.

The bill was sidetracked to the legislative council which reported it unfavorably, thus killing the bill but not the idea. Even before the report was issued, a group of the state's municipal and cooperative managers got together and formed their own company to do just what the one outlined in Governor Hoff's bill would have done. Currently, that company is negotiating with both Canadian suppliers and prospective buyers in Massachusetts and Connecticut.

One group of prospective customers, the Municipal Electric Association of Massachusetts (MEAM), is also waging the private vs. public battle on several other fronts and with some success. Two years ago the MEAM was dormant; its thirty-nine members serving 239,000 customers were at the mercy of the private companies from which they were forced to buy power at rates imposed by the sellers.

Then Shrewsbury, Mass., won an FPC decision, later upheld by the U.S. Court of Appeals, forcing the New England Power Co., the area's largest wholesaler, to sell the town power at a wholesale rate, not at retail as before. Other towns followed up the victory and negotiated from NEPCO lower prices that saved $2 million. Since then the association has raised its dues, hired a first-class Washington lawyer and consultant engineers, and filed legal objections to every move made by the ECCNE.

The MEAM had tried earlier to join the ECCNE, but the private companies are apparently unwilling to let the municipals have a say in the development of the region's power industry. The application was never actually refused; the council simply voted not to change a rule it made in 1964 prohibiting municipals from joining. Reversing a cliché, the MEAM declared: "If you can't join 'em, lick 'em." It has appeared before state utility regulatory agencies in Maine, Massachusetts and Vermont, and before the FPC and Securities and Exchange Commission, challenging some of the engineering aspects of the Big 11 plants and transmission system, and hinting that it may raise antitrust objections to the fact that the ECCNE has "blackened out" the municipals from direct participation in the Big 11 nuclear plants.

Besides trying to join the ECCNE, the MEAM has tried to buy its way into two of the Big 11 nuclear plants, Maine Yankee and Vermont Yankee. These plants are being built by various combinations of the members of the ECCNE (a good but almost singular example of regionalization of the industry) and have about a dozen owner-utilities each. The MEAM wanted a piece of each of these plants because the electricity they generate will be sold directly only to owners, in proportion to the amount of stock owned.

The MEAM has not yet had a clear-cut victory on this issue, but it has been partly successful and indications are that it will have to be reckoned with. The Vermont Public Service Board has declared that municipals should be given a chance to purchase stock in Vermont Yankee, and because of the MEAM objections, the FPC has received a staff recommendation that it institute antitrust proceedings against the ECCNE if it does not permit the MEAM to participate in future planning. The Justice Department apparently has been made aware of the FPC's staff report. On April 21, Donald F. Turner, assistant attorney general in charge of the antitrust division, in reply to a request from Sen. Lee Metcalf (D., Mont.), announced that the department has been conducting "exploratory studies" of the power industry's possible exclusion of municipals and cooperatives from participation in new generation and transmission systems planned by the private companies. Mr. Turner did not mention New England specifically, but Senator Metcalf, who has recently pained the industry's leaders with his book, Overcharge, had referred to the situation in New England in his request for antitrust action.

The answer to New England's power problems is not simply a matter of choice between private and public power; government bureaucracy can be just as inefficient as private management. What is needed above all, whether it is private or public, is a regional power company, or at most two or three. If it must be private, a corresponding and effective regional regulatory agency and competing public projects must also be established.

The area is too small, its population too dense, its problems too common to deal with electricity on a state-by-state basis, or to allow it to remain exclusively a private business. The private companies claim that they are moving toward regionalization. They said that a decade and a half ago, and there has been little change. The private company executives are wrestling with their own egos; what president, even of a small, local power company, wants to become the district manager of a six-state monolith? In this sense, as in several others, it can be said that the private companies are not acting in the public interest because they are bound to laissez-faire capitalism, and that was proved obsolete before Edison set up his Pearl Street station.

LETTERS (Continued from page 802)

CIA. I immediately informed my English colleagues on Encounter. In the course of a long interview Mr. Lasky then admitted to Frank Kermode that he had been told in 1963 by a director of the Congress about the CIA backing, but that he had promised not to tell his colleagues. In these circumstances, Mr. Kermode and I resigned. Not only had confidence between colleagues been destroyed by the deception but Mr. Kermode, in particular, had been put in the position of threatening the New Statesman with a libel action if they published an article by Dr. Conor Cruise O'Brien, discussing the matter of CIA backing. Our resignations were accepted by the trustees of Encounter, and Mr. Lasky continues as editor. I should add that in view of the fact that I had been associated with Encounter since its beginning on terms which I would never have agreed to if I had known of them, and of which I was kept in ignorance, I would have resigned in any case, as I would at any time if and when I had known. My view, like that of Kermode, was that Encounter should, editorially, have a new start. I would not however consider that Kermode was involved in arrangements which had been altered long before he became editor, though most unfortunately he had in his ignorance been involved in the false statements about those arrangements.

I must count among the unfortunate results of the CIA affair not only that confidence is destroyed between colleagues but that one is open to the kind of attack made by Alexander Werth for having had confidence in colleagues. I still find it difficult to accept that it was reprehensible to believe the kind of assurances given to me by the Congress and the head of a foundation.

Stephen Spender

We feel that in this letter Mr. Spender has made proper amends for the somewhat threatening letter signed by him, Irving Kristol and Melvin Lasky and published in our issue of June 13, 1966. We cannot see, however, that anything in Mr. Spender's present account of events contradicts Alexander Werth's interpretation of them. Mr. Spender did in fact "soldier on in ignorance" and his failure to discover the facts, while credible, cannot fail to suggest a surprising innocence.

Editors

plea for Captain Levy

Mesquite, Tex.

DEAR SIR: Sunday, June 4, The New York Times carried a picture and article about Captain Howard Levy, on the front page where it belonged. He was being taken from the farcical thing they call a court-martial to begin his three-year sentence at hard labor. A colonel had hastily and eagerly put him in handcuffs, since, as always, the most hated and dangerous threat to the depravity of the majority in power are men of moral courage.

With a few alterations one might quote Henry Thoreau's "A Plea for Captain John Brown." Possibly this excerpt says enough: "We talk about a representative government, but what a monster of a government is that where the noblest faculties of the mind, and the whole heart, are not represented! . . . What shall we think of a government to which all the truly brave and just men in the land are enemies, standing between it and those whom it oppresses?" Captain Levy stood against the captors and oppressors of our sons and the Vietnamese people—the military and the government. I hope there are present-day Thoreaus to make their "Plea for Captain Howard Levy."

Mrs. Lee Dresh

phoenix of Egypt

Seattle, Wash.

DEAR SIR: Exactly ten years prior to the day, June 1, 1967, on which the feuding Jordan and Egypt patched up their differences with a five-year defense pact, and Israel let it be known that it would "undergo every sacrifice" to reopen the blockaded Gulf of Aqaba, The Nation [June 1, 1957] treated the question "Is Nasser Kaput?" in an editorial as follows:

Is President Nasser of Egypt finished, kaput? The New York Times thinks so. In an editorial the other day, it wrote, "The power of President Nasser as the dominating and domineering leader of the Arab nations has been broken." It went on to devote a column to offering thanks for his political demise.

We hate to intrude in the Times' fun at Nasser's wake. But we don't like to see a reputable paper encourage public delusions. It's true that King Hussein's emergence as master of Jordan was a setback for Nasser. So, too, was the Baghdad meeting of Saud of Arabia and Feisal of Iraq. . . .

Who really believes, however, that these Nasser reverses offset his historic triumph in the Suez conflict? One after another the United States, Britain and all other maritime nations—except, for the moment, France—have capitulated to little Egypt's terms. His victory is the more impressive when one matches the West's armed might and money against Egypt's military impotence and impoverishment.

If the "silent diplomacy" of the West—this time allegedly aiming at a total revision of its Mideast policy—fails to take a deep look into the record of its past misconceptions about Nasser's final intentions, then we may better brace ourselves against a rerun of the West's capitulation of a decade ago.

Karl Oskar Pisk

BOOKS & THE ARTS

'The Path and Not the Goal'

THE LITERATURE AND THOUGHT OF MODERN AFRICA. By Claude Wauthier. Translated by Shirley Kay. Frederick A. Praeger. 323 pp. $8.

NADINE GORDIMER

Miss Gordimer is a South African novelist. Her most recent book is The Late Bourgeois World (Viking).

To the English-speaking West, negritude is a politically aggressive attitude, or a term in the vocabulary of literary aesthetics—both associated with the black man's late-come celebration of his blackness. These are, so to speak, the gaps in our ignorance.

With the translation from the French of Claude Wauthier's L'Afrique des Africains — Inventaire de la Negritude, a vigorous mind burns up this morning haze like a dispassionate sun. The clear view is an enlightening one. Originality, in a work of this kind, lies in the author's ability to discern and present intelligibly a total concept where others have dealt (however well) with bits and pieces. Basil Davidson and Henri Lhote have rediscovered Africa historically, Janheinz Jahn has instated its philosophical and artistic conceptions, and Frantz Fanon has analyzed its psychology of submission and revolt. Cool and self-effacing in approach, M. Wauthier traces the essential relationship between these aspects of African culture and examines, through the works of more than 150 writers, the correspondence between the demand for national independence and a cultural revival that includes, along with the purely literary aspect of negritude, anthropology, history, law, theology and folklore.

He brings together in the context of evidence not only contemporary writers from French-, English- and Portuguese-speaking Africa, and French- and Spanish-speaking writers from the Caribbean but also the work—18th century and earlier—of the first African intellectuals writing in European languages, in whose thinking it is fascinating to recognize the present dilemmas of African intellectuals taking shape. Even without the interest of its thesis, this book might stand alone as a unique anthology of Negro thought and literature from Gustavus Vassa and such literary curiosities as Boilat, Panet, Holle, to Chinua Achebe, Peter Abrahams and Camara Laye, Sheik Anta Diop, Léopold Senghor and Sékou Touré. The Negro personality is approached neither as a mystique nor as a reaction to the white personality but as a positive human value—although, in "The New Desdemona," for example, a fascinating chapter on the treatment in Negro literature of black-white sexual taboos, Wauthier shows the extent to which that personality has been conditioned by the attitudes of the white world.

He points out that there is nothing new in nations aspiring to freedom seeking the affirmation of their original contribution to arts and letters. Inevitably, the first (1956) Congress of Negro Writers and Artists passed the resolution: "No nation without a culture. No culture without a past. No authentic cultural liberation without political liberation first." What is new is what he calls the "strange destiny" of Africa's intellectual elite—a tiny minority in a continent of the illiterate, educated "almost exclusively in the language of the colonial powers," "coming from the social class closest to the colonists" and yet playing a leading part in national independence movements. The contradictions inherent in this situation are studied mainly in the period from World War II, which gave the African urge to independence its final impetus, to the present day.

In the beginning, for Africa, there is the dilemma of the word. Although linguistic experts agree that African languages are as conceptually rich as any other, the fact remains that written language came to the continent only with the European, and modern education has come to the African through the medium of a European language. African intellectuals must express themselves in a foreign tongue, think in a foreign language, and face the problem of whether, however carefully one incorporates the traditional arts of the past, one can create in a European language a genuinely African culture.

In an outstanding chapter on politically committed literature, Wauthier presents the controversy over the value of negritude as a call to revolt and/or

COLLIOURE

*The town laid in there bright orange and pink at the eastern edge of the Pyrénées Orientales, is full of refugees from a civil war
two generations back .*

*The cat in the middle of the street resting at mid-day, faced with what be referred to as a motorcar, is not inclined to move . The street too narrow for any alternative maneuver, he must descend,
pick up the cat,
cradle and move it to a doorway,
then proceed .*

Clouds skim the hills and the far scalloped fish-shape of bay. The towers hang on from 800 years — the flank, one is a fortified church, and those boats drawn up down there on the northeast beach are used for something every morning early .

PAUL BLACKBURN

the exaltation of Negro values, in particular through a comparison of the views of Ezekiel Mphahlele and Frantz Fanon—each of whom, the one under apartheid in South Africa, the other in the Algerian war, experienced brutal European domination. Both—for different reasons—denounce the exoticism they feel inherent in negritude. Mphahlele asks, “Where do we come in—we (in South Africa) who are detribalised and are producing a proletarian art?” Fanon thinks that negritude is a necessary stage for the Negro of the colonies, engendering intellectual freedom from colonization, but believes that later “this historical obligation on the African cultural elite to speak more of an African than a national culture will lead them to a dead end.” Both writers, as Negroes, have felt “in the real and blazing terrain of daily combat” that “an academic pilgrimage back to their Negro origins was less indispensable than efficiency in the fight and field of protest.”

Yet if, as Wauthier shows, the ideological concept of negritude has served its most obvious function as the inspiration of political movements for independence, there remains its relevance to the fear that, as a price of entering the white man's world, the African personality, carried so perilously through slavery and colonial humiliation, may be lost. He suggests that negritude has a valid role in these post-colonial “Soldiers’ Years” of the coup, in the cultural reinforcement of the foundations of the African personality, and thus by extension, of the political and social structures at which, with many setbacks, Africa is nonetheless aiming.

After a brilliantly disinterested survey of African nationalist objectives—independence, unity, neutrality, socialism—as revealed in the writings of the broadest possible spectrum of African intellectuals, he measures results against theoretical objectives. Knowledge and insight qualify him to question trenchantly: how real is African independence? Evidence emphasizes that factors of dependence characteristic of colonial times are still largely in operation. The disproportion between African needs and resources yawns wide. We are reminded (we surely cannot be too often) that Africa remains overwhelmingly a producer of raw materials, whose price in the world market has dropped, while the prices of industrial products, which she must buy, have risen steadily. Thus the great powers, ex-colonial or no, are still “sculpting the face” of Africa.

As for unity, colonial Balkanization—ironically “consecrated” by independent Africa in an effort to prevent fratricidal warfare, and also out of financial egoism—has given way to further fragmentation rather than cohesion. But some form of Pan-Africanism remains, for Africans, not merely an ideal but an economic necessity, if Africa is to get for herself not only steel mills but also full bellies. Apropos neutrality, the author points out the underdeveloped countries’ anxiety about an alignment “quite other than that of capitalist against socialist regimes: namely, a split between their world and that of the other hemisphere, the white race and industrialisation.” Between two worlds, the Third World fears to be left behind once again. As for socialism, to some form of which most African leaders feel themselves committed, writers from Fanon to Senghor suggest that “the social structure of African states does not seem to have been greatly modified.” Which brings to mind the question, dealt with elsewhere in the book, of whether class warfare is valid for Africa, a continent with no industrial proletariat outside the Republic of South Africa.

Sartre sees negritude as “the low ebb in a dialectic progression . . . white supremacy is the thesis; negritude’s role as an antithetical value is the negative stage. But this . . . will not satisfy the Negroes who are using it. . . . They know that they are aiming for human synthesis or fulfillment in a raceless society. Negritude is destined to destroy itself; it is the path and not the goal. . . .”

Maybe. Wauthier is concerned with interim objectives. Writing of negritude and the future, he says of the role of the second generation of African intelligentsia: “Unity is still to come. Neutrality has suffered many compromises. Socialism—in most cases—has yet to be built. . . . In these circumstances one might imagine that literature and scientific research would set their sights on completing the first conquests of emancipation, and that this would determine the literary themes and general direction of scientific research. . . . The cause of unity could be decisively upheld by the ethnologists who would uncover the common ground in the beliefs and institutions particular to each African tribe. Historians could also take up the work by drawing the military conquerors, empire-builders and outstanding figures of African history as the forerunners of a future United States of Africa. . . . One might expect Negro historical novels exalting the memory of the fight for independence.” For the present, “an aggressive literature might be developed, criticising opportunism . . . and customs shackling economic development.”

Of contemporary ideas, Gaëton Picon wrote: “To grasp the meaning of a human fact is to involve oneself in it and to find it in oneself.” The real meaning of negritude is to be understood and evaluated at this level in this consummately informative and elegantly written book.

The Lowry/Aiken Symbiosis

RICHARD HAUER COSTA

Mr. Costa's critical biography of H. G. Wells has just been published by Twayne. He is spending this year at Purdue University on leave from Utica College of Syracuse University. He interviewed Conrad Aiken last Easter while completing research for a book on Malcolm Lowry.

Only on rare occasions in the decade since the death of Malcolm Lowry has his old friend, Conrad Aiken, written publicly of what he once called “the remarkable spiritual and aesthetic and psychological symbiosis” between himself and the man who was to write Under the Volcano. When a flurry of posthumous Lowry activity produced a volume of stories and the first American edition of the apprentice novel, Ultra-marine, Aiken announced for readers of Time (June 16, 1961) what had long been known in literary circles. He disclosed that Hambo, the drunken wanderer—the youthful writer “so visibly . . . happily alight with genius”—in Aik-en's surrealist autobiography Ushant (1952) was a high-fidelity portrait of Malcolm Lowry.

Early this year, in response to a Times Literary Supplement leader on Cape's publication of Selected Letters of Malcolm Lowry, Aiken spoke out again (Times Literary Supplement, February 16). His letter, couched in characteristic good humor and punning (he writes of Lowry, his amanuensis, as a “tope-recorder”), must be read as a corrective to the expanding image of Malcolm Lowry as the architect of one of the tragic myths of the 20th century: that of the anti-heroic artist-addict, the forlorn Adam, the Consul of Under the Volcano, who chooses a spiritual baranca of uncontrolled dipsomania and unredeemed love.

Aiken's letter tells us that although Under the Volcano was not published until 1947, its essential drafts were written by Lowry in Cuernavaca, Mexico (Lowry changed the name to Quauhna-huac in the novel), where for two years, 1936-38, he lived in alcoholic extremis and, in the process, became the dispossessed Consul, Geoffrey Firman. Like Proust's Marcel who found that "I myself seemed actually to have become the subject of my book," Lowry once wrote to Aiken: "I do not feel so much as if I am writing this book as if I am myself being written."

What Aiken sees as ■ distortion in the current Lowry mystique is clear from this section of his letter:

ABOVE SEA LEVEL

*Taking root on this abandoned peak, we
No longer remember how to fall from brightness,
No longer plunder the ocean's depth
Where all is pure violence. We have forgotten
Undersea landscapes, living new lives
Above sea level.
Tidal zones fall like towers
At the ocean's rim.
The sea divides itself into three realms:
The realm of the Shallow Seas, the Zone of Light,
And, beneath that, the end of the sea —
That secret and silent Zone of Perpetual Darkness. These Zones are no longer our concern.
Slowly we came to this gentle place,
Walking past stones, trees,
Dry earth, shacks, layers of garbage,
And were stared at
By hill people. They dared us to take Root in the earth, dared us to break
Like new flowers without stalks. They saw us Ascending.*

*Once water was basic to our life. We farmed the sea,
Hauling out food
From salinity. Mud, fish, the cold current Gave us our lonely lives. Waves and the tides —
Starfish, scallops, wild floating colonies
Of sea-grapes, crabs, mussels, sea-pork,
Rockweeds and shells sharp as razors
Gave us our living.
Now we no longer dream of sea-palms,
Our memories have burned out sharks —
The feeding frenzy of killers.
We have ascended through sea weather
To the top of this mountain. Here grass
Blows in green waves,
Light falls on our mouths like rain, and Nets of white clouds tighten around our lives. We Are free of the extremity of the sea! Free
To live with our calm Self-Nature. Now —
Farewell to bleeding whales,
Oil bearing targets for whaler's harpoons.
Our net is tightened. If we leave now
It is not for the sea — but for the endless path
That will raise us even higher
Above sea level.*

Well, I can imagine him roaring with laughter about all this in his Ripe young grave in Sussex, and in this I join him. For to have manufactured such a myth, and turned himself into it, was perhaps a feat of literary trompe-l'oeil without parallel. . . . And for Malcolm, it was all just a great joke, even with the tragedy thrown in, which incredibly turned itself into a great book, or a great melodrama. . . . And it was a great joke: his whole life was a joke: never was there a gayer Shakespearean jester. A fact that I think we must remember, when everyone is saying What Gloom, What Despair, What Riddles! Nonsense. . . .

But Aiken's view contains a subtle irony. If we tend to confuse Malcolm Lowry, the man who died an alcoholic's death at 47 in 1957, with Geoffrey Firman, whom Anthony Burgess recently called "a giant character whose sloth or accidie ironically suggests the Promethean rebel," the confusion between author and fictional persona stems from Lowry's subjective aesthetic. And Lowry learned that aesthetic—the ultra subjectivity of the flawed poet-turned-novelist—from his mentor, Aiken.

Lowry, through his double, Sigbjorn Wilderness in "Through the Panama," said the only literary work he had ever enjoyed with detachment was Aiken's long poem, "House of Dust." In the preface to that work, Aiken declares that his art is based on the theory that consciousness represents a goal; "that in the evolution of man's awareness, and in his dedication of himself to this supreme task, man possesses all that he could possibly require in the way of a religious credo. . . ."

Demarest in Aiken's Blue Voyage muses:

What was this singular mechanism in him that wanted so deliberately, so consciously, to break itself? A strange, a rich, a deep personality he had—it baffled and fascinated him. Everybody of course, was like this—depth beyond depth, a universe chorally singing, incalculable, obeying tremendous laws, chemical or divine, of which it was able to give its own consciousness not the faintest inkling. . . . A universe that contained everything—all things—yet said only one word: "I."

The passage provides a perfect rendering of Aiken's obsession with consciousness. He is at all times an "I" writer. He neither could nor wished to separate his life from his work. Aiken told this writer with a pride undiminished by forty years that everyone in Blue Voyage was drawn from actual life, that everything happened as recorded. The pattern of Blue Voyage, as well as that of its successor, Great Circle (1933), is wholly autobiographical. Cather, in the latter novel, feels that "life is going to be good. Unexplored, unfathomable, marvellous and terrible. Filthy, and incalculable . . . the wonderful and acceptable nightmare!"

Malcolm Lowry, reading Blue Voyage at 19 while seeking a technique for his own first novel, was fascinated by the power of Demarest's self-analysis. The desire to see himself in Demarest's (Aiken's) image was irresistible.

The circumstances of their meeting are very well known and need only be sketched here. Lowry's first letter to Aiken begins: "I have lived only nineteen years and all of them more or less badly. . . ." He quotes from "House of Dust" and within a few months a transatlantic correspondence is under full steam. Lowry begs, even tries to bribe, the 40-year-old poet to take the beginner into his household in the "other" Cambridge. In the summer of 1929, before going up to Cambridge, Lowry set sail for Boston by way of the West Indies. He arrived on Aiken's doorstep with a battered suitcase containing an exercise book in which were notes for Ultramarine, the projected novel of his sea experiences. "The fact is," Aiken recalled nearly twenty-five years later, "that we were uncannily alike in almost everything, found instantly that we spoke the same language, were astonishingly en rapport; and it was therefore the most natural thing in the world that a year later, when difficulties arose between him and his father, I was able to act as mediator . . . and . . . for the next three years, in loco parentis, I became his father."

SANDRA HOCHMAN

From "that wonderful summer" of 1929, the relationship deepened. In time it grew into a parasitism in which each took turns being starfish to the other's oyster. "Every angle of it had been studied in mirrors," Aiken writes in Ushant, "each of them with an eye . . . to making use of it first." Lowry often broached the darker side—the possibility that the "son" would eventually destroy the "father"—but misgivings were dispelled by the invariable good humor of each. In the early 1930s, the Aikens moved back to Rye, within throwing distance of Henry James's old quarters, and Lowry moved in with them during vacations from Cambridge. The exercise book expanded into Ultramarine. The novel was published in 1933 to little acclaim but Aiken's, whose ardor was less a critic's than a midwife's. Ultramarine was a lesser and later twin to Blue Voyage; its title was a play on Aiken's, although the mentor had originally suggested Purple Passage.

In an undated and unpublished letter, which I discovered in the Lowry Special Collection at the University of British Columbia, Lowry makes one of his many apologetic gestures for drawing so freely from Aiken's material:

. . . I must try to find some mitigating factor in its being parasitic on Blue Voyage. . . . It has given me for a time a dominant principle. . . . Blue Voyage, apart from being the best non-secular statement of the plight of the creative artist with the courage to live in the modern world, has become part of my consciousness, & I cannot conceive of any other way in which Ultramarine might be written. . . . Nevertheless, I have sat & read my blasted book with increasing misery: with a misery of such intensity that I believe myself sometimes to be dispossessed, a spectre of your own discarded ideas, whose only claim to originality exists in those ideas. . . .

"Malc had this way of being admirably predatory in the using of other men's writings and contrite about it at the same time," Aiken told this writer. The late Conrad Knickerbocker, who did not live to complete Lowry's biography, learned that Lowry, under narcohypnosis, once told a London psychiatrist that he wished to remain obscure so that his plagiarisms would not be discovered. Aiken feels that Ultramarine's debt to Blue Voyage could best be proved by feeding both into an IBM computer. However, Aiken's own productivity flourished during the Lowry years of 1929-34, when he wrote the long poems "John Deth," "The Coming Forth by Day of Osiris Jones" (the poem anxiously but futilely awaited by Joyce during the last weeks of his life), "Preludes for Memnon"; the novel, Great Circle, the one work of fiction kept by Freud on the bookshelf in his reception room; and a story collection, Among the Lost People.

Lowry, meantime, after his graduation from Cambridge with 3rd class honors in the English tripos, and after the publication of Ultramarine, bummed about London and Paris for a year (this phase is described by Charlotte Haldane with admirable fidelity in her novel, I Bring Not Peace). He married his first wife in Paris (Aiken had introduced them, and the triangle assumes a sinister aspect in Ushant), rejoined her later in New York, and went with her at the end of November, 1936, to Mexico, where Under the Volcano was begun and his marriage went desperately to pieces.

The reunion in Cuernavaca in 1937 of Aiken and Lowry provided Aiken with the material for the powerful ending of Ushant. He regards this autobiographical narrative as the culmination of a statement on art and the artist which he began with Blue Voyage twenty-five years earlier, and the episodes dealing with D. and Hambo—that is, with Aiken and Lowry—provide a candid insight into the maelstrom union of coeval geniuses. Hambo's drunken words promise the fulfillment of a kind of reciprocal murderer's pact. ". . . Now it was my turn to kill you."

Hambo points to his wife Nita as the instrument of death, both wound and weapon: "For of course we both knew that both of us were powerfully drawn to that open wound—you first, but with your own obligations to (your wife) . . . and therefore guiltily offering her up to me, but in effect proposing to share her . . . as foul a sort of voyeur's incest as any second-rate God could imagine." D. acknowledges his "visceral and feculent scheme" but defends it as humane, for the marriage might "stop your drinking. Pull you together. Take you out of the endless chain of aguardientes, the daily round of cantinas, and the ultimate slobber of drunkenness in which you daily threatened to kill me." They discuss Nita's infidelity, presumably an effect—or was it the cause?—of Hambo's drinking, and Hambo half threatens to kill D. with his own hands. "My dear Hambo, you are killing me," D. answers. Hambo asserts his dominance: "You no longer know your boundaries. You are a nation invaded. And as I'm younger, and as I'm stronger, in appetite, in will, in recklessness, in sense of direction, it will be no use your trying to compete with me . . . you will no longer have a personality of your own." As the scene ends, they drink to betrayal and death.

Lowry also exploited the mescal-inflamed talks in Cuernavaca. Near the end of Under the Volcano, just before the Consul flees his wife Yvonne and

In his new book, the brilliant social critic

PAUL GOODMAN
author of Growing Up
Absurd—gives his answers to the question: How can we prevent American civilization from committing suicide?

LIKE A CONQUERED PROVINCE
THE MORAL AMBIGUITY OF AMERICA
$4.95, now at your bookstore
RANDOM HOUSE
Photo: Robert Anderson

half-brother Hugh for the cantina refuge that will lead to his death, he engages in an invective-laden conversation with Hugh which can be taken as the equivalent of the one in Ushant. Ostensibly, the argument is about communism, with the Consul lashing out at Hugh's "indoor Marxmanship" and at the futility of involvement in all those "people's revolutions" that were so much a part of the political climate of the thirties. But on another level, the debate is also between Geoffrey Firman and the embattled aspects of his psyche — represented by the fragments of his identity—by the artist manqué, by Hugh, by Yvonne, by Yvonne's French ex-film-director lover. Aiken tells us in his recent letter to the editor that the bitter exchange—one which proves to be the last confrontation of the Consul with his alter ego—was a verbatim report of an argument between Lowry and himself, with the positions reversed: what the Consul says, Aiken said.

It is not too much to suggest that the role of Conrad Aiken in Lowry's masterpiece goes beyond the pupil's free adaptation of the teacher's material—the William Blackstone alienation theme, for example, which Lowry took whole cloth after Aiken developed it during that first summer together, or the scores of Joycean puns ("hello—pussy—my—little—Priapusspuss, my—little—Oedipusspusspuss . . . my little Xicotancatl") which Aiken insists were first given utterance by himself. And the civilized, sensitive, idealistic figure of Geoffrey Firman—the archetypal Great Man invaded by addiction and a doleful period of history—is largely built on the artistic and spiritual conflict between Aiken and Lowry. Aiken's true subject in his novels is his own effort to live with the gargoyle disharmony between man's egotism and his unimportance; this effort takes the form of a search for consciousness in the void. Lowry seeks artistic and actual salvation in the unconscious, for it is the only refuge against, as he once put it in explaining why he drank, "the complete baffling sterility of existence as sold to you."

If, then, the Consul is the amalgam of conflicting forces represented by the death-seeking son burning in Moloch-Mexico and by the life-sustaining father, the novel and its tragic hero stand finally as a monument to the efficacy, despite all the demons, of Lowry and Aiken's symbiosis. Reading Aiken's letters or chatting with him in his Savannah, Ga., apartment on the "Hambo theme," one feels the irony of the "literary accident" which permitted Under the Volcano, the novel Aiken had helped "coach" into being, to be spoken of in the same breath as Ulysses, a landmark behind whose shadow Aiken's own long fiction has been relegated.

But it is possible—and Aiken expresses confidence in it—that a major Aiken revival is under way. It may be, too, that literary history will show Aiken as a major literary force, the discoverer of, and catalyst for, other talents. With the Lowry wave about to crest, Aiken must be given his full share of credit for the alchemizing of that almost comic Hambo figure into the creator of the Consul—a most convincing prototype of 20th-century man catapulting to hell.

Poetry/Drama in Harlem

SIDNEY BERNARD

Mr. Bernard is New York editor of Literary Times and roving editor of The Smith.

Intermediate School 201 in East Harlem is a new plant with an excellent auditorium and stage—a kind of reduced version of New York University's Loeb building with curving brick walls and wide-open sight lines. Physical shape aside, the school has been involved in an administration hassle from the start, Board of Education and parents having sharp differences on how it should be run.

In a recent Saturday evening visit to the school, where the New Heritage Repertory Theatre was offering an evening of Negro poetry cum dramatic readings, no whisper of the dispute was heard. (Prompting the thought: Art is where it's at; life trails behind.) Rather the opposite—for two hours the mood was strictly upbeat among the mixed audience of around 100, consisting of neighborhood parents and students, teachers from the school, and several Harlem actors, poets and dancers. The production had the umbrella title Hip, Black and Angry, and that too is where it's at.

Director Roger Furman, an energetic man who doubled in the lights booth, and who made a curtain plea for continued support of the Repertory's efforts, had arranged the readings in a series of quick-paced tableaux. The acting company of around a dozen made fast costume changes, from one piece to the next, and presented each poem with an eye (and ear) to its dramatic, or sardonic, or even political overtones. The result in sum was an evening of heightened theatre impact, most of which gave added urgency to the poems. Now and then, and perhaps inevitably, a particular piece seemed to be put across too crisply—and speedily—with the result that the poet's private mood would suffer from the meditative level of the printed page, to the more open and "showy" level of the theatrical. That some of this can be improved goes without saying—the company after all is underexposed, what with but four performances under its belt. (Another performance was scheduled for Friday, June 23.) And that poetry-into-drama is an alchemy that doesn't always "work," even given the best conditions, goes too without saying.

The opener was a short piece by LeRoi Jones—a kind of chanting rally cry with the company snake dancing off-stage, and through the audience, and back on stage again. Later came a five-part recital of a poem from Africa—with a proud motif of negritude in the lines, "I am a Negro/black as the depths of Africa. . . ." Emphasis was on the urban scene, and here the group did its best work, capturing in sharp focus the seesaw moods of the ghetto: love-despair-

NEWS

FOR NEW WRITERS

Three old publishing houses
CONTINENTAL BOOKS
BOOK AWARDS
DOARS HEAD BOOKS

tired of the daily barrage of me concerned mostly with sex at its vulgarest—have declared war on a reading trend that has turned a core of writing concept into an artery of the commonplace.

Under the editorship of Samuel Roth—who introduced modernity into American reading by injecting into it works such as those of Joyce and Lawrence—they plan to reorient American writing into the channels of its original greatness, something to be accomplished only by reorienting the American writer.

Admittedly, nothing can be done to modify the working habits of the contented in their sexist stiles. But unrarried authors can still be influenced.

When a manuscript reaches one of the above publishers, it is assigned to a reader for a partial reading sufficient to enable him to answer the two questions uppermost in the mind of every unrarried writer: 1. Am I really a writer? 2. What are my prospects as a writer?

That is why every me must be accompanied by a reading fee of $10 as well as postage for its return should that be necessary.

If your me is a finished product, we may offer to buy it from you and add the reading fee to the price agreed on. Where more work on the me is needed, an arrangement will be offered depending on the amount of work required. A hopeless manuscript will be returned with our sincere regrets.

Reading fees should be addressed to:

BOOK AWARDS
458 Broadway, New York 10013

humor-anger. Most of the urban pieces were by Langston Hughes and Gwen-dolyn Brooks. Mr. Hughes's light, airy tone, and Miss Brooks's glints of poignancy and glossy wry commentary, were among the evening's chief pleasures.

Comic tour de force of the program was a piece called "Soul Food," a breezy jape on all the clichés of the black man's dietary weaknesses. The company recited the piece while doing a spoof of an 18th-century minuet—each of the three men and three women done up in elegant lacy frills and their movements as elegantly outrageous. "Thirty pounds of pigfeet, /soul food" one of them would mince; "Forty pounds of fatback, /soul food," the partner would answer.

All in all, upward of a dozen poets were represented. Music from a sound track, and several weaved-in choreographic turns, gave the program a variety fullness. The performers were Emily Banks, John Byrd, Barbara Carter, Danielle Haynes; and Yusef Inman, Charles Jenkins, Janet Leader, Henry Miller, Ethel Parks, Doris Washington and Joseph Washington, Jr. An insert in the program read: "This performance is dedicated to the memory of Langston Hughes."

In answer to our query, Mr. Furman gave the Repertory's goal as "very quiet LeRoi Jones." He explained that last year's Black Arts Repertory (directed by Jones), with its emphasis on "hate Whitey," had met with resistance in Harlem. Furman said, "Our audiences resent the mother-epithet thing on stage. They want art. The other they can hear on street corners."

At the Dead Center

ANTI-POLITICS IN AMERICA. By John H. Bunzel. Alfred A. Knopf. 301 pp. $6.95.

HENRY S. KARIEL

Mr. Kariel is professor of political science at the University of Hawaii and the author, most recently, of The Promise of Politics (Prentice-Hall).

If democratic politics entails the active participation in the making of decisions by all affected interests, there are innumerable enclaves in America within which politics has no place. Within the decision-making centers of business corporations, labor unions, advertising agencies, military installations, mental hospitals, zoning commissions, boards of health, safety councils, universities and prisons, policies are made (and sometimes not made) by self-perpetuating elites free to ignore a whole range of conflicting interests. In and out of government, the powerful make (and sometimes veto) policy to accommodate one another; the organized, the articulate, and the influential distribute resources among themselves. This does not mean, of course, that they neglect the outsiders. The outsiders are in fact treated with considerable solicitude. Large strata on the periphery of American life are generously "administered"; the poor, the aged, the sick—and also consumers, students, small businessmen, prisoners, migratory workers, TV viewers and highway users. The pace and direction and boundaries of their lives are fixed by insiders who, behind partially closed doors, make public policy. Concerned with political stability and economic growth, the insiders decide on matters of war, manpower, transportation, housing, health, research, prices, wages and recreation.

To be sure, there is no sharp dividing line between the actors within our establishments and the nonactors outside. The outside shades gently into the inside, and boundaries are not clearly drawn. Yet however much the notion that we are two nations caricatures reality, we know that at one pole of our public life, men are privileged to engage in politics and at the other, men are deprived of the opportunity to experience its rewards.

There is of course widespread acquiescence in this state of affairs. After all, our polity is commendably stable, scarcely ruffled even by Presidential assassination. Moreover, it does provide a surfeit of goods, and we seem determined to distribute them even among the least privileged. Our delimited politics as well as our national consensus are thus quite easy to understand. Nor is it surprising that social scientists such as Bernard Berelson, Seymour Lipset, Robert Dahl, Lester Milbrath and others have helped reinforce it, maintaining that the present arena of politics is ample enough, that the existing level of participation is healthy, that more would be destabilizing. This soothing academic rationalization is one expression of anti-politics in America.

Now John H. Bunzel, a much respected professor of political science at San Francisco State, has written a book which deals with what he calls America's "anti-political temper and its distortions of the democratic process." But he questions neither the prevailing structure of politics nor its apologists in the universities. Without making the point explicit, he assumes the United States to be the very model of a successful democratic society.

Committed to what is—what is well established, stable, mature and productive—he readily identifies as "anti-political" those social movements and academic analyses which depart from dead center. The margin, he knows, is irrational. Right or Left, pacifist or activist, America's fringe movements fail to avail themselves of the conventional channels of politics. Given the health of the Center, which the author takes for granted, the margin is sick. This does not mean he is intolerant: as he condescendingly notes, the extremists have their value, especially since they help make things more lively at the center.

From Bunzel's point of view, it is impossible to perceive the distracted, bewildered individuals at the margin who are effectively frustrated by the prevailing pseudo-politics. Nor does his perspective allow him to see that in their disorganized way, they have in fact been acting politically, testing the American reality, trying to inject politics into it, seeking themselves to become visible and achieve recognition. But so far, their experiments—demonstrations, "gestures," marches, boycotts—have merely disclosed that the opportunity to share in political power remains unequal. What Mr. Bunzel's book ignores is that the policies some of them advocate (when they succeed in being articulate at all) may be aimed at enlarging the political arena. Though uncouth, unwashed, and unfamiliar with Robert's Rules, might they not be attempting to crash into the enclaves within which

WILLIAM GOLDING'S

new long story

On the Escarpment

is in the June issue of

THE KENYON REVIEW

Available from booksellers—or address The Kenyon Review, Box 73,
Gambier, Ohio 43022

Plus: C. H. ROLPH on the problems of literary censorship public decisions are privately made?

Mr. Bunzel's indiscriminate indictment of all marginal groups, his failure to distinguish between movements which aim to rehabilitate politics and those which seek to destroy it, helps rationalize our arrested political development. In carefully describing the outbursts and fanaticism of Populists, Quakers, "intellectuals," Birchers and pacifists, he remains "objective," "balanced" and "realistic," at least as these terms would be defined by those who find their nourishment at the center. But insofar as he perceives only what is manifestly present, patronizing America's repressed and oppressed impulses, what his realism masks is an unexamined genteel conservatism.

Such a position, it should be added without irony, has its charm, as Bunzel's style makes clear. Not for him the gritty jargon and baroque tautologies of his colleagues. Where they might ask for rigorous argument, he remains casual and relaxed, as often as not reconstructing a conversation or inserting a personal anecdote. He disarmingly says his book is not for the specialist, and he is right. For it is unrestrained, by the current scientific method, which he asserts to be elitist because it can "only be taught to and understood by a limited few."

Thus, Bunzel has written simply for his students. But if, perhaps merely out of respect for himself, he had raised his sights, introduced some scientific rigor, and written truly for himself (and thereby for his equals), he might also have succeeded in engaging the concerned nonspecialist. In this he fails, yet not without redeeming his failure by contributing to the ideology of contemporary America. Because he likes it he permits us to see that domestic balance of power which has been put into jeopardy by scholars such as E. E. Schattschneider, Norman Jacobson, Grant

McConnell, Peter Bachrach, Joseph Tussman, Christian Bay and Theodore Lowi. Moreover, his work has unintentionally provided a view of the popular, vigorous teacher at work, exciting on the surface, complacent below, undoubtedly successful in making the classroom a lively place in which to adjust students to American public life as it is—not as it might yet be brought into being.

Eye of the Innocent

ABOUT US. By Chester Aaron. McGraw-Hill. 239 pp. $5.50.

DONALD FANGER

The author of Dostoevsky and Romantic Realism (Harvard University Press), Mr. Fanger teaches Slavic and comparative literature at Stanford University.

This is a beautiful and original book, thirteen stories that turn gradually into a novel, lyrical without mushiness and tough without posing, full of a truth that cannot be abstracted from the words that carry it.

About Us therefore invites misrepresentation. Among the things that could and probably will be said are that it is touching, funny, full of memorable characters and incidents. Worse yet, it is (God help us) not just about a Jewish family; it is about boyhood, about depression and war, about a Pennsylvania mining town. Aaron could hardly have chosen a moment likelier to produce a sensation of déjà vu from the briefest glance at his work.

A look at the table of contents, however, gives a clue to the saving grace at work here. These chapters, each representing a year in the narrator's life, all parallel the form of the title; that is, they are about individuals, each one a self-contained scenario. There is no risk of epic tedium because the emphases are constantly changing, along with tone and the story form itself.

This is why summary falsifies. As a novel, About Us tells of the disintegration of a family, recording the scarcely perceptible stages through a pure present tense that becomes gradually complicated with a past and with intimations of a future. In each chapter, the present itself measures change against the present of previous stories and previous years. Each chapter re-creates the awareness of Benny Kahn, the youngest son, favorite of the family and of fate, from his eighth through his twentieth year.

In this way naturalistic gloom is successfully avoided. Benny's is the innocent narrative eye (innocent in the sense that Huck Finn's is, that is) free of the parents' dogmas and anxieties, and free of his siblings' knowledge, involvement and responsibility. As one reads, the main lines of the novel's progress are no more than shadows on the periphery of the stories that make it up. In the wonderful "About Rachel," for instance, the death of the tender teen-age sister from a clumsy abortion takes hardly a paragraph to record. In retrospect, it marks the beginning of the family's decline, the first of a series of tragedies and reversals. Yet the center of attention is a bum who calls himself Texas Jack, says he has worked as a movie cowboy, and appears to the 12-year-old Benny and his friends like a god out of a boxcar. He has played with Lupe Velez in Ace of Spades—"that's the one they never let kids in to see"; maybe he shouldn't tell them what it's about.

We plead. We all but get down on our knees. Goose promises to bring him home-made cookies the following day and I promise to steal him a pack of Lucky Strikes.

"Well," Texas Jack says, "it's about this. . . ." He pauses and sucks some food out of a tooth. He rolls a cigarette. "It's about this whore. And I'll tell you boys, there ain't a man in this great country who knows more about whores than me."

My throat is parched. It feels like a million ants are crawling around inside my lower abdomen. Roman's head is drooping over the edge of the top bunk, his flat face upside down. Goose sits absolutely still, his finger stopped halfway to his nose.

I WANT TO HELP BUILD A HUMAN BRIDGE TO RUSSIA WITH CITIZEN EXCHANGE CORPS This Summer

Send me FREE reprints of N. Y. Times editorials telling how CITIZEN EXCHANGE CORPS (CEC), a non-political, non-profit organization acts to implement President Eisenhower, Kennedy and Johnson's policy of "Building Bridges" to Russia. Tell me how I can participate this summer in a 3 week CEC program of people-to-people contact and seminars that is open to Americans of all ages and occupations. AND HOW THIS PROGRAM CAN BE A MAJOR STEP TOWARD PREVENTING NUCLEAR WAR.

3 WEEK EXCHANGE VISITS LEAVE NEW YORK CITY
July 14 — Aug. 5 — Aug. 26 or Meet CEC in Moscow

Name
Address
City
State Zip

Mail to:
CITIZEN
EXCHANGE CORPS.
550 Fifth Ave. (Dept. N-111)
New York City 10036

Texas Jack's voyeurism makes Benny the accidental witness of his sister's death at the end of the chapter, but this is something he cannot understand at the time. His eye is for adventure, and it is marvelously fresh and acute.

Not since the early Hemingway have we seen writing that can convey with such lyrical economy and immediacy the feeling of the woods, the sense of beauty and love—all of it shot through with humor—that we find in the section "About Poppa," which serves in the larger scheme of the book to represent the family in its palmiest days, the father in his prime, the time just before the fall. This freshness is a consistent feature of the novel and explains what may be its major achievement, the provision of delight on acceptable terms. Delight is in the truth and honesty—which is to say in the sensitivity and discipline—of the writing. Only because of this is it worth noting the complex themes that underlie the surface simplicity, and pointing out that About Us manages to be simultaneously a chronicle of small-town boyhood in the thirties, a study of one version of the Jewish immigrant's fate in America, and the social history of a town.

There are flaws. Some editor should surely have caught the anachronistic references to Nazi crematoria and gasoline rationing in 1940. And a tendentious note does appear from time to time in discussions of religious and philosophical questions. Brother Reuben, whose victory over the corrupt town commissioners makes one of the best chapters, turns up later, in the key title story, as a cliché-ridden raisonneur whose style, an apparently unconscious parody of the narrator's, gives us one awful glimpse of the depressing novel this might have been. Even Benny, the narrator, blurs toward the end, making it clear that this is not quite a Bildungsroman. We have a clear sense of him as a child—but who is the man piecing together this picture? With no hint as to how he has turned out, a last perspective is missing.

One could go on carping, just as one could—and for a considerably longer time—go on praising this book. As it stands, it is a remarkable first novel, able in its authenticity to bear comparison with the best of its kind.

Michael Goldman, Poetry Editor, will be on leave until September 15. During that time no poetry will be considered for publication; we shall welcome submissions again in the early fall.

THEATRE

JULIUS NOVICK

"The Yale School of Drama presents ROBERT LOWELL's adaptation of Aeschylus' Prometheus Bound," read the program, and the billing was apt. The adaptation is a very free one—"Half my lines are not in the original," says Mr. Lowell in a program note—and the play belongs really to the American poet-playwright, not to his Athenian fore-runner.

For quite some time, Mr. Lowell has been interested in reworking, for his own modern purposes, material bequeathed to him (and, of course, to all of us) by writers of past ages. Concurrently, he has been feeling the peculiar fascination that the theatre has traditionally exercised over poets. These two tendencies Lowell expressed simultaneously some years ago in a trilogy of one-act plays, based on stories by Hawthorne and Melville, and entitled (with all kinds of ironies) The Old Glory. Two-thirds of this trilogy was produced in 1964 at the American Place Theatre in New York, and one play, a dramatization of Melville's novella, Benito Cereno, found wide favor.

Its particular champion was Robert Brustein, then as now the drama critic for The New Republic, who after several seasons as the Jeremiah of Broadway, was casting about for possible messiahs.

The social-psychological theatre of the thirties, which culminated in the Actors Studio and Lincoln Center [then under the management of Robert Whitehead and Elia Kazan], has now proved itself utterly incompetent to deal with a serious work of the imagination, or anything other than Broadway and Hollywood commodities. And the American theatre will never find itself again until all these outmoded methods and limited versions have been swept away.

Just such a renewal seems to be occurring now at the American Place Theatre where Robert Lowell's The Old Glory is currently enjoying an inspired production by Jonathan Miller.

Mr. Brustein subsequently became Dean Brustein of the Yale School of Drama, and he seems to have interpreted his appointment as a mandate to do whatever he could to bring about the theatrical revolution he had been preaching. Thus Prometheus Bound, directed by Jonathan Miller, as the culmination of Brustein's first year of deanship.

All this represents, I believe, no ignoble disposition on Brustein's part. It would have been easy for him to go on as he had done, holding his nose at the top of his voice; he was good at it (as indeed he still is); in fact he was becoming famous for it. (And God knows, there was—and is—a need for it.) Brustein had his function as denunciator neatly and successfully marked out; it took courage, therefore, for him to go out on a limb with some positive assertions as well, and to be willing to use his new resources to turn assertion

MAO TSE-TUNG'S

- Selected Works in 4 vols., ea. $2.75
- Poems $3.00
- Selected Military Writings $2.75
- Quotations, the original handbook of the Chinese Red Guards; also Lin Piao's People's War, both $1.00
- Subscriptions to Peking Review $4.00

Send payment with orders to:

CHINA BOOKS & PERIODICALS

Licensed Importers & Distributors
2929 24 St., San Francisco 94110

Free catalog on request

The Nation

SUBSCRIBERS' BOOK SERVICE

Offers the following at a discount:

- | | Price |
|---|--------|
| <input type="checkbox"/> AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF BERTRAND RUSSELL, 1872-1914 (Little, Brown & Co., $7.95) | $6.35 |
| <input type="checkbox"/> HELL'S ANGELS: A Strange and Terrible Saga by Hunter Thompson (Random House, $4.95) | $3.95 |
| <input type="checkbox"/> THE ACCIDENTAL PRESIDENT by Robert Sherrill (Grossman, $5.00) | $4.00 |
| <input type="checkbox"/> THE FREE WORLD COLOSSUS: A Critique of American Foreign Policy in the Cold War by David Horowitz (Hill and Wang, $6.95) | $5.55 |
| <input type="checkbox"/> FRIENDSHIP AND FRATRICIDE: An Analysis of Whittaker Chambers and Alger Hiss by Dr. Meyer A. Zeligs (Viking, $8.95) | $7.15 |
| <input type="checkbox"/> THE PSYCHOLOGY OF POWER by Ronald Sampson (Pantheon, $4.95) | $3.95 |

Remittance accompanying orders should be made payable to THE NATION, 333 6th Ave., N.Y. 10014

- ☐ Payment enclosed ☐ Please bill me

Readers can avail themselves of our regular offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S. at the retail price post-free. When ordering, please give title, author and publisher, if possible.

6-26-67

into action. I would only object that in his writing at least, he is sometimes somewhat premature, somewhat prone to confuse an isolated stimulus to his hopes with the beginning of their total realization. Genuine revolutions, however necessary, however eagerly desired, are hard to come by.

Prometheus Bound did not strike me as a very long step toward Brustein's Third Theatre, which is to combine reality and joy. The play is marked from end to end by Lowell's fineness of mind; it has a peculiar purity about it; it has dignity without pretentiousness; it has moments of great eloquence. And what a pleasure it was to meet in the theatre (of all places) a modern American writer who can be absolutely depended upon never to lapse into cliché. The play was given admirable and lavish production (financed in part by a U.S. Government grant). Yet it did not, as we say, "work."

Prometheus, of course, is the archetypal rebel, maintaining a posture of splendid defiance, asserting the primacy of the individual against the system. As such, he has frequently been reincarnated by modern dramatists—by that dwindling band of modern dramatists, at least, who keep hold of their Romantic heritage, and refuse to concede that significant action is impossible. In our century, Bernard Shaw, T. S. Eliot,

Arthur Miller and Robert Bolt have all created Promethean heroes. Usually Promethean drama resolves itself into a rousing paean to the heroism of the martyr for conscience's sake. The current Prometheus has his moments of splendid defiance (hard-bitten in their irony, never pompous or smug), but on the whole Lowell seems interested in something else. What? I find it hard to say (although some clue may be afforded by the fact that around the Drama School they referred to the play as Waiting for Prometheus).

The new Prometheus Bound, like the original, lacks dramatic thrust, progression, suspense—in a word, plot. At the beginning of the play Prometheus gets fastened to a rock; he receives several visitors; long speeches are delivered back and forth; at the end a new punishment begins. I do not maintain that every play should keep us diverted with plenty of plot; but plot is the strongest kind of through-line a play can have, and the dramatist who dispenses with it had better provide us with plenty else to hold onto. The static dramaturgy inherited from Aeschylus makes it particularly unfortunate that at a first hearing of Prometheus Bound, it was often difficult to make sense of what Lowell's characters were saying.

There were moments when the writing was economical and precise. An old man (an old god, literally speaking, but all Lowell's characters function as men), who has sold out to the tyrant Zeus, says: "I have grown old and carefree by learning how to give in." Prometheus himself says of Zeus: "Suppose he is powerless to pardon, and only almighty in his ability to inflict pain"—which may or may not be a reference to the escalation of the war in Vietnam. (In the early part of the play several references to Zeus made him sound like President Johnson. "No contemporary statesman is parodied," Lowell insists. "Yet I think my own concerns and worries and those of the times seep in." And the President is well known to be one of Lowell's concerns and worries.)

But there was something peculiarly evanescent about large parts of the play. I found myself at many points wanting to stop the action (or rather, the talk) and say, "Can we have that again?" Enlightenment—some idea of how the speech currently being spoken related to the rest of the play—usually seemed just around the corner, but there, for the most part, it stayed.

I am tempted therefore to dismiss Lowell's play as closet drama—but I wonder if any play completely without theatrical value could have given rise to so beautiful a production as Prometheus Bound received under Jonathan Miller's direction at Yale.

In Miller's program note he says: "There is a ghastly piety about most productions of the Greek drama . . . an empty classicism which reflects scholarly respect more than any direct engagement of the imaginative sensibility." We all know what he means: a lot of actors in white nighties posturing before a temple front. Miller has reformed this altogether, "setting the play in a shattered seventeenth-century castle-keep," with stained and dusty costumes that would not be out of place in a production of Mother Courage. Setting and costumes were designed by Michael Annals, who teaches scene design at the Drama School, and the lighting was by Phil Dixon, a student; their work looked magnificent. The set seemed to extend up to infinity, and down almost as far; its detailing was copious, yet its outlines strong; as the lighting changed, it constantly took on new fascinations. And, majestic as it was, it seemed in accord with Lowell's evident intention of making Prometheus a human hero, not a demigod.

Prometheus himself was played brilliantly by Kenneth Haigh, who created the role of Jimmy Porter in Look Back in Anger. Since then, he has never quite won the recognition his talents deserve. (With his gift for irony, and his air of virile intelligence, why have we never seen him play Hamlet?) His Prometheus was a stocky, tousle-haired, unpretentious fellow, with a kind of bitter zest to him, nonetheless a hero for being at the same time a Mensch.

Irene Worth was splendid as Io, persecuted by Hera for having been loved by Zeus. The Drama School's two resident professional actors were both highly effective in smaller parts: David Hurst as Ocean (a sleazy time server in the Zeus administration), and Ron Leibman as Hermes (a braying thug). Indeed all the acting was admirable; nowhere in this country, I dare say, could the play have been better done.

Some of Miller's ideas were questionable, but throughout the production there was the sense of an audacious yet responsible mind, and a skilled hand, at work. But Miller, for all his talents, was unable to make Lowell's Prometheus viable for the theatre (I doubt if anybody could), and so the event as a whole must be called a failure. But it was a stimulating failure, a vigorous, serious, intelligent failure—just the sort of failure that a drama school ought to have. Theatre people often sound self-indulgent when they talk about "the right to fail." A production such as this one justifies that right.

The Best Way To Get THE NATION

THE NATION 6-26-67
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed
(Foreign and Canadian Postage
$1 a year extra)

NAME

ADDRESS

CITY

STATE ZIP NO.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1207

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS:

- 1 Temperance plea for the British dramatist? (10)
- 6 and 24 down Smart, and understands Mother Carey's aren't, in the usual sense. (8)
- 10 Spuming violence, assails by words. (7)
- 11 Down Memory Lane, is it the old block? (7)
- 12 One's character stemmed from Seth. (4)
- 13 Existing around 10, if changed to be improving. (10)
- 15 See 9 down
- 16 We get rid of some money around it to keep from falling. (7)
- 17 Proving the U.S.S.R. has light cavalry! (7)
- 20 Mail departure celebrated by it? (4-3)
- 22 Men in disgrace reached by effort. (10)
- 23 Remembered by Van Druten through play. (4)
- 25 Immutable. (7)
- 26 Chief officer. (7)
- 27 Fish only seen at the bottom? (4)
- 28 Those against, or in favor of examining officials. (10)

DOWN:

- 1 The features of these might be seen through glass. (5-2, 8)
- 2 Burst in with a little spirit on deposit. (7)
- 3 Those who 1 across only, might not appreciate their spirit. (4)

- 4 They could be applied to questions of rawness, possibly. (7)
- 5 The lead's character could be changed by application of them. (7)
- 7 The U.S. is an unusual setting for one who follows a reformer. (7)
- 8 The clue to 26 would apply, in the absence of a minister. (6, 1, 8)
- 9 and 15 across Where points are important when nervous and upset. (2, 4, 3, 7)
- 14 Stalin, as a product of the people. (9)
- 18 Radishes don't with some people, according to the family of poets. (7)
- 19 It's intended to show a beginner's skill with 15. (7)
- 20 A dark patch that might have a magnetic effect. (7)
- 21 Mineral-like, implying a little work on a railroad, perhaps. (7)
- 24 See 6 across

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1206

ACROSS: 1 Swordswallower; 10 Nippers; 11 Insole; 12 Burnside; 14 Sonnets; 15 Magic; 17 Noses; 19 Theorem; 21 Sandtrap; 25 Limited; 26 Project; 27 Animadversions. DOWN: 1 Suspicion; 2 Opposes; 3 Doodlings; 4 and 23 Withstands; 5 Language; 6 Orpen; 7 Evening; 8 Ashe; 13 Left-handed; 15 Marathons; 16 Campsites; 18 Sandman; 20 Montero; 21 and 9 Sole support; 22 Totem; 24 Apse.

PUBLICATIONS

"SELECTED POEMS" of George Flynn (Villiers of London $2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound."—James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author ■ 544-82 St., Brooklyn 9, N.Y.

THE IDLER. Lively, offbeat, liberal monthly. $1 brings four different sample back issues. Idler, 413B 6th St., N.E., Washington, D.C. 20002.

AMERICAN HAIKU magazine. Subscription —$3.00 yearly. Box 73, Platteville, Wisconsin 53818.

THE BLUFF OF DEGODDING THE HUMANS by Bibi Beebi, 116 pp., price $3.00. Popular Non-Newtonian, etc., physics, astronomy, culturology, philosophy. The Inventist, P.O. Box 17039, Los Angeles, Calif. 90017.

ART

ORIGINALS COST LESS THAN REPRODUCTIONS! Contemporary original signed etchings, lithographs, woodcuts, $3.50. Guarantee. Free brochure. GRAPHIC CIRCLE (NA), 68 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10011.

EDUCATIONAL

If you are interested in ■ SECULAR JEWISH EDUCATION

for your children this fall, stressing Hebrew conversation, dance, song, Jewish History and Culture, contact:

Pioneer Hebrew Schools

150 Fifth Ave., N.Y.C. 10011 ■ 255-8760
Schools in Queens, Brooklyn, Manhattan

FIVE DAY BOARDING SCHOOL. A unique program for people who have not even considered a boarding school. Grades five through eight. THE THOREAU SCHOOL. An intimate, cooperative community, combining study with the tasks and joys of farm living. School bus brings your children home to NYC week-ends. Small classes, individual instruction. Now enrolling for September. Write: Rodman, RD 1, Walkkill, N.Y. 12589. Phone: 914-895-5522.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALGONQUIN 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

PERSONALS

POLITICAL SCIENTIST NEEDED. Ph.D. or near Ph.D. desired. Contact: Chairman, Government Dept., Texas A&I College, Kingsville, Texas 78363.

MEET YOUR IDEAL MATE

(Computerized Matching—All Ages)

"Let TEAM make you a team."

Write:

TEAM Project

P.O. Box 359, Church St.
New York, N.Y. 10008, Phone 889-6020

2-inch ANTI-WAR RUBBER STAMPS "WITHDRAW U.S. TROOPS FROM VIETNAM NOW"—$1. Any other message up to 4 words $1.25. 8 words $1.75. Order from: F. SANTO, 148-03 90 Avenue, Jamaica, N.Y. 11435.

NON-PROFIT CAMP (Interracial, interreligious) desperately needs donation of pianos. Tax deductible. Will pick up. Box 600, c/o The Nation.

HELP! Girl, 21, with literary background needs stimulating work. Writer, researcher, girl Friday, etc. Will relocate anywhere. Box 602, c/o The Nation.

Advertising Rates

Classified: 74c a line (6 words) 3 line min.
Classified Display: $7.42 per inch (min.)

THE NATION, 333 Sixth Avenue, N.Y. 10011
242-8400

Readers are invited to send for a free copy of Mr. Lewis' "ground rules." Address your request to Puzzle Department, The Nation, 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014.

FREE with each
new subscription

Your Choice of an Outstanding Book

- BROTHERS UNDER THE SKIN by Carey McWilliams
- THE FBI NOBODY KNOWS by Fred J. Cook
- THE FERVENT YEARS by Harold Clurman
- THE NATION CENTENNIAL ISSUE
- RUSSIA AT WAR, 1941-1945 by Alexander Werth
- UNSAFE AT ANY SPEED by Ralph Nader

subscribe to

NATION

America's most habit-forming magazine

THE NATION
333 6th Avenue
New York, N.Y. 10014

Herewith my order and payment for a NEW subscription to The Nation.

☐ 1 Year, $10 ☐ 2 Years, $18 ☐ 6 Months, $6
(Foreign and Canadian Postage: $1 per year extra)

Please check free book desired:

- | | |
|---|---|
| <input type="checkbox"/> BROTHERS UNDER THE SKIN | <input type="checkbox"/> THE FBI NOBODY KNOWS |
| <input type="checkbox"/> THE FERVENT YEARS | <input type="checkbox"/> THE NATION CENTENNIAL ISSUE |
| <input type="checkbox"/> RUSSIA AT WAR | <input type="checkbox"/> UNSAFE AT ANY SPEED |

name

address

city state zip no.

